Precautions had been taken to prevent the accomplishment of this plan; a number of Bow-street officers, and of the patrol, had been directed to go to Cato-street, to watch the movements of those who might assemble there; and at a convenient season, before they should take their departure from thence, to secure those who were assembled. A party also of the Guards, who were stationed at Portman-street barracks, were directed to attend in John-street, to aid the civil power; and you will find, that at the very moment when they were selecting those of the party who should be the foremost in the execution of their daring and horrible enterprise: at the very time when Thistlewood in the loft was separating from the rest those to whom was to be assigned this assassination and murder, the officers entered the stable. Upon their entrance they discovered two persons; one will be proved to be Davidson, he was remarkable from his colour, as he is nearly a black; he had cross belts over his shoulders, and a belt about his loins; in one of the former was suspended a sword; he had a gun upon his shoulder, and pistols in the belt that was round his waist: he was stationed just within the door. The other man, who will be clearly identified to be Ings, was posted at the bottom of the ladder. He was armed with the knife I have mentioned, a gun, and a cutlass.

The officers, with a resolution hardly credible, when you consider the desperation and the determination of the conspirators who were assembled above, ascended the ladder. The first who went up was Ruthven, he was followed by Ellis, after whom came an officer whose name undoubtedly you must have heard mentioned, the unfortunate Smithers, who met his death that night by the hand of the prisoner at the bar. Upon Ruthven's ascending the ladder, one of the men below called out to those above, as a signal for them to be upon their guard; and when Ruthven had gained the loft, Thistlewood, who was at a little distance from the landing place, and whom the officer distinctly saw (for there were lights in the loft), receded a few paces; the officers announced who they were, and demanded the surrender of the persons in the loft. Ruthven, as I told you, was followed by Ellis, who drew up close by him; Smithers proceeded forward in a direction to seize Thistlewood, the prisoner, who instantly retreated into one of those small rooms which I have described, and the moment he saw Smithers approaching, he drew back his hand, which held a sword, and immediately thrust it at the unfortunate man; he received the wound near the heart, and had only time to exclaim, "Oh God, I am killed!" before he sunk into the arms of Ellis and died. Ellis seeing the blow given by Thistlewood, immediately discharged a pistol at him, which missed its aim; a great confusion ensued; the lights were struck out; the officers were forced down the ladder; many of the party followed; Thistlewood amongst the rest came down, and not satisfied with the blood of one person whom he had already killed, he shot at one of the officers, as he descended the ladder, a man of the name of Westcott; he then proceeded through the stable with his sword in his hand, cutting at every one who attempted to oppose him; and the soldiers at that moment not having arrived at the spot, Thistlewood ran into John-street, and so towards the Edgware Road, and was not at that time taken. The other persons were equally desperate in the resistance they made; conscious of their purpose, they waited not to know on what charge they were to be apprehended. You will find, that Ings, Davidson, Tidd, and Wilson, all made a desperate resistance, and each of them, I believe, fired at the officers and soldiers who attempted to arrest them; but their resistance was ineffectual, and they were fortunately secured. Davidson, Inga, Tidd, Wilson, Bradburn, Strange, Gilchrist, and Cooper, were taken either in the street, or in the loft. The only persons who then effected their escape, out of the eleven comprised in the indictment, were Brunt, Harrison, and Thistlewood. Several others, assembled upon that occasion, whose names are not known, also made their escape.

The officers not only secured the prisoners, but possessed themselves also of the various articles of arms and ammunition that were in the stable: they will be produced to you in the course of the trial.

Brunt went home, and you will find by his apprentice Hale, that he arrived there between nine and ten o'clock; the boots which he wore were covered with dirt. He was immediately followed by another man, whose name the boy does not know, but who, from the conversation with Brunt, was evidently one of the party at Cato-street. When he appeared, Brunt was rejoiced to see him; and from what passed, Hale collected that they had been together, and had both escaped; but that the stranger had been seriously hurt by blows he had received. Brunt fancied that having escaped, his person had not been discovered, and that no one would disclose the transaction. He slept at home that night, but on the following morning he rose early, called the apprentice boy, asked him if he knew some street in the Borough which he named, and stated that he wanted him to take to that street two baskets, which were in the room that had been let to the prisoner Inga. Those baskets were tied up by Brunt, and one of them was wrapped in an apron belonging to his wife, and which had been nailed up against the window of the room occupied by Inga, for the purpose of preventing observation. He had hardly effected this operation, and gone into his own room, when the officers who had received information that he was one of the party in Cato-street, entered the house, apprehended him, and at the same time seized the two baskets. It was most important to Brunt to have conveyed away those proofs of his guilt, for in those baskets were contained grenades, fire balls, and other preparations which had been made for accomplishing their design. He affected ignorance of the contents of the baskets; but you will find, from evidence that cannot be contradicted, that he had just packed them, to be sent into the Borough.

Thistlewood did not return to his house in Stanhope-street; he secreted himself in a house in White-street, Finsbury-square, belonging to a man of the name of Harris. Intimation, however, was received by some of the police that he was there concealed, and between ten and eleven o'clock on the Thursday morning, a party of officers, headed by Bishop, went for the purpose of securing him. They first searched the rooms up stairs, and not finding him there, they descended to the ground-floor, and observing a door, which on trying it was found to be locked, leading into a room opposite the sitting room of the people of the house, Bishop demanded the key, and knowing the desperation and determination of the prisoner at the bar, he opened the door as softly as he could. On entering, he perceived that the window-shutters were closed; but there were holes in them to admit the light, by which he discovered the prisoner Thistlewood in bed. Thistlewood raised his head: Bishop, immediately recognized him, and threw himself on the bed to secure him; and Thistlewood, perceiving that resistance was unavailing, surrendered.

By these means the prisoner at the bar was taken into custody, and here the narrative of the facts would naturally have closed, but there is one important circumstance which I have omitted to mention, and which I must now bring to your notice. On the 28th of February, when they met at Brunt's room, previous to going to Cato-street, after their plans were discussed, their objects avowed, and they had resolved upon the assassination of his majesty's ministers (thinking that by that event, such dismay and confusion would be every where excited, that they should the more readily attain the ulterior objects they had in view) they held some further consultation as to what should be done after that blow had been struck. I have already told you, that part of their plan was, to set fire to certain buildings; and amongst others the King-street barracks, near Portman-square, were fixed upon for conflagration. Harrison, one of the conspirators (who had been, I am sorry to state to you, in his majesty's service), was acquainted with the situation of that building; and had stated that he could easily, by means of a window which opened at the back part of the premises, and communicated with a loft in which straw and hay were kept, throw in one of the fire-balls, which would create great confusion among the troops who were quartered there, and would prevent their getting themselves and their horses accoutred, when they were called upon to act.

Upon that occasion Thistlewood sat down to write a proclamation addressed to the inhabitants at large of this metropolis. For the purpose of writing this proclamation, some sheets of cartridge paper were wanted, and the boy Hale was sent out to obtain it; on his return, Thistlewood wrote in large letters the following words, or to the following effect:—"Your tyrants are destroyed, the friends of liberty are called on to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting." If any doubt could be entertained of the ulterior designs of these conspirators, and that they were not confined to the assassination of his majesty's ministers, this proclamation would put the matter out of all doubt: he wrote two or three copies of it—he read it aloud to the parties assembled, and told them, it was to be stuck up near the houses on fire; that the people might the more readily see it. He afterwards endeavoured to compose another address to be issued to the soldiers. It contained a call upon them to join the friends of liberty, and a promise of their immediate discharge, with full pay for life, and a donation of 20*l.* to take them to their respective homes. Whether or not that address was absolutely completed may be doubtful on the evidence, but the proclamation, of which I gave you the substance, was read by Thistlewood. The written proclamations were taken away by the prisoner, but there will be no doubt whatever of the contents of them; they will be proved to you by a person who heard them most distinctly.

I was stating, before I mentioned this important circumstance, that I had nearly closed the narrative of the facts which will be proved against the prisoner at the bar, and I ask you, if these facts are proved, whether any one of you, calmly and dispassionately considering these facts, can entertain a doubt of the guilt of the prisoner at the bar. What answer can be given to them, I am at a loss to conjecture. Will any be given, or attempted? If no answer be given by evidence, what can be said by way of observation? Will it be urged to you, that this plan was so wild in its nature, so impracticable in its execution, that its existence cannot be credited in a court of justice? Is that argument to be used upon this occasion? You and I, judging of others by ourselves, are very inadequate judges of the belief to be entertained of the existence of a plan of this sort. Men, with heated passions, and a determined purpose, conceive schemes which in themselves may be impracticable, or not likely to be brought to a successful result; but as the inventors brood over them—as they consider their machinations from day to day—they work themselves up into a belief at last, that their means are more powerful than they really are; they diminish the difficulties which are interposed between the conception of their plan and its completion; they fancy that there are other persons as wicked as themselves, who though they cannot be prevailed upon, in the first instance, to embark in their nefarious schemes, will, when a blow is struck—when something is done to excite their feelings and their passions, immediately join the standard of insurrection. You and I, gentlemen, reasoning calmly, may, as I have said, be very inadequate judges of the workings of the minds of men of this description; but facts will be proved which admit of no solution, which allow of no explanation, consistent with the innocence of the prisoner and his associates.

Your judgment is not to be formed upon an inquiry whether the scheme of these men was practicable, or whether it could ever have entered into rational minds. Those are not the questions for your determination. If a plan has been formed for the purposes charged by this indictment—however wild and however visionary it may appear to you—if you are convinced that such a plan did enter into the minds of the prisoners, and that they took one single step towards its accomplishment, then, and I state it without the hazard of contradiction, that conviction will justify a verdict of guilty.

I have no doubt it will be stated to you, that many of the facts in the case are proved (for they can only be so proved) by persons who were participators in all the criminality of the transaction: and it will be urged to you, with great force, that accomplices are not to be believed unless they are confirmed by other witnesses. In plots of this nature, contrived in secret, and which can only be effected by concealment (I mean in their original concoction and formation), if the testimony of an accomplice were not to be received, perfect immunity would at once be held out to the inventors of the blackest schemes. Fortunately, it is neither the law of England, nor can it be the law of any country that has reason for its guide, that an accomplice in a crime cannot be a witness to prove its existence. But as in this case I am far from being anxious to press the proof one iota further than it ought, in justice to the community, to be carried, I freely admit that the testimony of an accomplice should be received by you with the greatest jealousy and caution; you should watch the manner in which he gives his testimony; you should weigh the credibility of his story; but above all you should see whether he be or be not confirmed in the material parts of that story by other and uncontaminated evidence; not in every particular, because if it were possible so to confirm him, then you need not his testimony at all; the witness by whom he could be so supported would render the testimony of the accomplice unnecessary. If his account is corroborated to such an extent as to render his whole testimony credible; if you find him speaking truth in those parts capable of, and which shall have received, confirmation, you have a right, you are bound to conclude that the rest of his narrative is true. There are always in these transactions some things which cannot be proved except by the participators in guilt. No men contriving such a plan as this would ever venture to discuss it in the presence of others whom they did not believe to be fully prepared to go all lengths with them for the completion of it; their secret deliberations, known only to themselves and to God, cannot be divulged unless the testimony of their accomplices be admitted. I say, therefore, to declare that an accomplice is not a credible witness, that he is one upon whose testimony a jury cannot act, would be at once to establish the principle that the darker the design, the more nefarious the purpose, the greater shall be the immunity of the offenders, the less their liability to detection. The more heinous the crime, the more secret it will naturally be kept; and it will be utterly impossible to bring to justice those who contrive and execute schemes of villainy, unless the evidence of others who have been to a certain extant participants in the guilt, can be resorted to, and made available.

Not only is it the law of England, but it is the daily practice of its courts, to admit the testimony of accomplices. In trials for murder, how often do you find not only that an accomplice is received, but that reward and pardon have been held out to him to induce him to become a witness against the accused? Happily for the ends of justice in this case, no question of doubtful confirmation will occur; a man of the name of Adams will be called, a guilty accomplice with the prisoners, meeting them and consulting with them daily, from the latter end of the month of January till they assembled in Cato-street. He will prove what passed when he was present, and the acts to which he was a party. The account he will give you of the treasonable conspiracy will, in a variety of its leading circumstances, be so confirmed both by the oral testimony of unimpeachable witnesses, and the production of the arms found upon the persons and in the houses of the conspirators, and in the loft in Cato-street, as to leave, I fear, upon your minds, no doubt whatever of the guilt of the unhappy man at the bar.

Another witness I shall present to you is not so implicated; I mean the man who first communicated the transaction to lord Harrowby. To a certain extent he had been made acquainted with the schemes of the prisoners; and had listened to the detail of them, with apparent approbation; but without at all engaging in them, he immediately disclosed what had been imparted to him.

We cannot always account for the operations of the human mind. Some men, if they had once embarked in such a plot, might mistakingly consider it an imputation upon their courage to recede; others, when the ultimate objects of the conspirators were developed, might, from disapprobation of them, or from timidity, withdraw themselves, and still be so unmindful of their duty to society, and of their allegiance to the king, as not to make known the mischiefs that were in contemplation; others, when they came to reflect upon the matter, might feel that they were bound to make it public—that they were called upon by the common feelings of humanity to avert from the devoted victims of this bloody scheme the destruction that awaited them. Hiden is of the last description, and is no credit to be paid to this man? is his testimony such as you are to discredit; Weigh it in the scales of caution, scrutinize it anxiously, but permit me to observe that I see nothing in the conduct of Hiden on this occasion to impeach his veracity.

A person will be called to you, of the name of Dwyer, who was supposed undoubtedly by Thistlewood and some of the others, to be worthy of their confidence, and who was expected to assist them on the evening of the 23rd. Having had a previous acquaintance with Davidson, Dwyer was applied to on the morning of that memorable day; they communicated to him their intention of meeting in the evening at Cato-street, for the horrible purpose of attacking his majesty's ministers, at lord Harrowby's. He almost instantly communicated it to an officer in the army, with a desire that he would make his majesty's ministers acquainted with it; and that was accordingly done.

But this is not the whole of the case on the part of the prosecution—it will not depend upon the testimony of Adams, Hiden, and Dwyer only, for there are facts in this case requiring, on the part of the prisoner, such an explanation as I am afraid it will be impossible for him to give, but which, unless he does give will put the seal to his guilt. What was the purpose for which these persons were assembled in Cato-street on that night? Men with no common bond of union—not related to each other—not connected with each other, except in the nefarious schemes they had in contemplation—are found assembled in a stable, in an obscure street, with a large collection of arms of the description I have given you. In addition to those instruments of mischief which were seized by the officers and soldiers in Cato-street, there were found in the houses of two of these persons, Tidd and Brunt, other materials and implements of death. For what purpose, I ask, if their object was confined to the murder of his majesty's ministers, were eleven or twelve hundred rounds of cartridges procured? Why were quantities of grenades and fire-balls prepared? For other objects and other purposes than the attack in Grosvenor-square; for the objects described, and the purposes charged in this indictment.

I cannot anticipate that the learned counsel to whom the prisoner has confided his defence, will put it upon this issue. I am convinced it will not be contended that this plan was to begin and end in the assassination of his majesty's ministers. His majesty's ministers! had they, as individuals, offended any of these prisoners?—Had they, as individuals, excited in the minds of these men any motives for revenge? No, gentlemen, the blow was not aimed at them as individuals; it was directed against them for the official character which they filled. It was not against the earl of Harrowby that the dagger was to be raised, but against the president of the council. It was not the earl of Liverpool who was marked by the conspirators for destruction—a nobleman whose person probably they might not know, and who could never have offended them in thought, word, or action; it was the first lord of the treasury they intended for their victim. Can you doubt that when they meditated the destruction of his majesty's ministers, they contemplated it as an act which was to be the commencement of that wild and visionary revolution they had in view; and with the intention of establishing that provisional government alluded to in the proclamation the prisoner Thistlewood had drawn up? Can any man, much less persons in your station and rank of society, imagine a motive for this conspiracy against his majesty's ministers, if the subversion of the government was not the ulterior object of the conspirators?

With these facts before you, I shall not fatigue you by the detail of many minute circumstances in which the principal witnesses will be strongly confirmed. I will not allude to the evidence which will come from uncontaminated sources, particularly from the apprentice of Brunt, who was no participator in the guilt of his master. If the case rested on the evidence of those alone who may be termed, by the prisoner's counsel, participators in the crime, you will have facts proved by them which must lead you to the unavoidable conclusion that the charge in the indictment is substantiated. What was the conduct of the prisoners when they were surprised in the loft? I assure you, I am most desirous that that conduct should not be considered by you any further than as it tends to the conclusion of the guilt or innocence of the prisoners on the charge you are sworn to decide. The officers endeavoured to secure them. If they were there for an innocent purpose, why did not they surrender when the officers called upon them to do so? What was their conduct?—the most determined, the most ferocious; one of the officers is inhumanly killed, and others are attacked and fired at. Do not misunderstand me; as far as the death of the unfortunate Smithers is concerned, you are not trying the prisoner at the bar for that act; but you are bound to take all their acts in the stable into your consideration, they cannot be dismissed from it. It is a fact in the case, that they resisted the civil power by all the means they had, to the utmost extremity. The prisoner at the bar effects his escape, flies from his dwelling-house and secretes himself in a different part of the town, and is there found. With all these facts before you, if they shall be proved, let me ask you, as reasonable men, what conclusion can you draw from them favourable to the prisoner?

The issue of this case is undoubtedly of the very deepest importance to the unfortunate man who stands before you; it involves not only his character, but his life. On the other hand, reflect upon the importance of it to the community at large.—If this plot was contrived, if this man invented or adopted it, and the means were used which I have described to you to carry it into execution, can you hesitate to do that act of justice to your country which such evidence imperiously calls upon you to perform?

When the period for making up your minds upon this momentous question arrives, you will weigh the evidence calmly and dispassionately;—if you think the scale preponderates in favour of the prisoner, an event I own that I cannot anticipate, you will satisfy your consciences by finding him not guilty; but if all the facts proved inevitably tend to the conclusion of guilt; if the charges against the prisoner at the bar be substantiated, it will be your indispensable duty, however painful that duty may be, to pronounce a verdict of guilty.

Mr. Gurney.—It will be necessary that the other prisoners should be present for the purpose of their persons being identified.

[The other prisoners were placed at the bar.]

Mr. Adolphus.—My lord, I have to request that the witnesses for the crown may be directed to withdraw until their examinations. I do not desire it of any persons in a respectable situation of life, or of the police officers.

Mr. Attorney General.—Under those circumstances I should wish that all the witnesses should retire. The witnesses for the crown will be out of court throughout the trial.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—The solicitor for the prisoner will take care then that the witnesses for the prisoner shall be out of court.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Robert Adams sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor-General.

Where do you live?—No. 4, Hole-in-the-wall Passage, Brook's-market.

What are you by trade?—A shoemaker.

Were you ever in the army?—Yes.

In what regiment?—The royal regiment of Horse-guards.

How long is it since you left that service?—Eighteen years last Christmas eve.

Did you know the prisoner John Thomas Brunt?—Yes.

Where did you first become acquainted with him?—At Cambray, in France.

By what name did he then go?—Thomas Morton.

How long is that ago?—In 1816, I think.

Do you know the prisoner Thistlewood?—Yes.

When did you first know him?—On the 13th of January last.

Where did he live at that time?—In Stanhope-street, Clare-market.

Where did you see him first on the 13th of January?—In his own room, the two pair front room.

How came you to go there? did you go alone, or did any person go with you?—I was introduced by Brunt and Ings.

When you saw Thistlewood, what conversation passed at the meeting on the 13th of January?

Mr. Adolphus.—I submit that this cannot be evidence. This indictment charges a conspiring against the person and government of our sovereign lord the king, that is, the now king George the fourth; the witness is talking now of a conversation on the 13th of January; that was during the reign of the late king.

Mr. Solicitor-General.—I am giving evidence of the conversation, not of acts.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Supposing that the scheme began in the reign of the late king, but was intended to be carried into effect in the reign of the present king, we must hear the whole story.

Mr. Adolphus.—I would submit whether that which passed on the 13th of January, must not be considered as referring to the then king.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—We cannot refuse to hear the commencement of the scheme.

Mr. Adolphus.—Then my objection will be too late.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—The jury will of course be informed, that the parties cannot be convicted on this indictment, if the intention was only to depose his late majesty: but if, having commenced in his late majesty's reign, they have gone on with the intention to depose his present majesty, then it will apply to the indictment: we must hear the whole of it; if it stopped short there, then it would not apply to the indictment.

Mr. Solicitor-General.—When you were introduced to Thistlewood by Brunt and Ings, what passed?—I was introduced into the room by Brunt; on going into the room Brunt said to Thistlewood, "This was the man I was speaking to you about." Thistlewood said, "you were once in the Life-guards."

He said that to you?—Yes.

What did you say to that?—No, I said, I was not; I originally belonged to the Blues. He said, "I presume you are a good swordsman." I told him I could use a sword sufficient to defend myself, but I could not say I was so clever in the sword as I was some years back, not being in the habit of using a sword or arms of any description for some time. On this he began to allude to the genteel people of this country, endeavouring as much as he could to make them mean and contemptible; saying there was not one who was worth ten pounds, that was worth any thing for the good of his country.

Did any thing further pass at that time?—Yes. As to the shopkeepers of London, he said they were a set of aristocrats altogether, and were all working under one system of government, that he should glory to see the day that all the shops were shut up, and were plundered. His discourse then turned upon Mr. Hunt; that Mr. Hunt was a damned coward, and a man that was no friend to the people; and he had no doubt, were he to get into Whitehall, and examine the books, he should find his name there as a spy for government.

That if he, Thistlewood, got into Whitehall, he should find his name on the books of government as a spy?—Yes.

How long did this interview last?—I have not done. He next turned his discourse upon Mr. Cobbett, saying Mr. Cobbett, with all his writings, was of no good to the country; and that he was a man that did not wish them well; and that he had no doubt he was a spy equally the same as Mr. Hunt himself. I believe that finished the discourse, so far as I can recollect.

You had afterwards the misfortune to be confined in White-cross prison for debt?—Yes, I had.

When was that?—On the 17th; it was prior to the 17th.

Some other conversations took place between you and Thistlewood, before you went to prison?—Yes.

I do not want to go into the whole of them?—There were several before the 17th.

Where did those interviews take place?—The next interview I had with Mr. Thistlewood was on Sunday the 16th.

Where was that?—At the White Hart.

Where is the White Hart?—In Brook's-market. It is kept by a person of the name of Hobbs.

What kind of room was that? was it a room belonging to the public house, or a room in a back yard?—A room in a back yard; a small room.

Was any person present besides Thistlewood, at that conversation?—Yes; Ings, Brunt, Hall, and in the course of the forenoon, before it broke up, there was Tidd.

Mr. Caywood.—Will your lordship excuse me—

Mr. Solicitor-General.—I am not going to ask as to any thing that passed at that meeting; I have no objection to your asking to it; but it is not necessary, and therefore I will not take up the time. You afterwards, you say, went to prison?—Yes.

How long did you remain there?—I came out on Sunday, the day after the death of the king.

That was on the 30th?—Yes.

After you came out, did you go to any place where Thistlewood was present?—I saw him on the Monday evening, the 31st.

Where was it you saw him?—I saw him in a room on the same floor where Brunt lives; in a back room.

Where is that?—I cannot exactly tell you the number in the court.

What is the name of the court?—Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane; it runs from Gray's-inn-lane to Brook-street.

Who were present at that meeting besides Thistlewood?—There were Brunt, Ings, Hall, and Davidson. I cannot charge my memory at this moment with any body else.

What conversation took place at that meeting?—Nothing particular took place that night to my recollection.

Did you meet them on the following night, on the Tuesday?—I cannot recollect whether I did or not.

When did you meet them again, according to the best of your recollection?—To the best of my recollection, I met them on the Wednesday evening.

Who were present on that Wednesday?—Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison and Edwards.

What passed at that meeting?

Mr. Curwood.—I must object to that, my lord, because it is an overt act not stated on this indictment. They have stated a meeting on the 5th of February, at the parish of Marylebone, and at divers other times and places. I apprehend “divers other times and places,” is not a sufficient statement to give the prisoner notice to be prepared. I am well aware, that even a substantive treason may be given in evidence to support an overt act of another treason; but in this case, where they have stated the overt act of meeting, without designating either time or place, I humbly apprehend it is not such a meeting as can be given in evidence under that averment. It is necessary to state the overt act on the indictment, that the prisoner may be prepared to contradict the account given of that meeting. That is my short objection; if I have made it understood, that is all I desire.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—This is the invariable form of every indictment, drawn either for high treason or conspiracy, that the parties met and did such and such acts, and no objection has ever been taken to the generality of such an averment; if that objection could prevail, and it were held necessary to set out the time and place of every conversation, it would lead to infinite prolixity and inconvenience.

Mr. Curwood.—I thought it my duty to submit the objection.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—I shall be happy to attend to any objection which occurs to you, Mr. Curwood.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What passed upon that occasion?—Nothing particular passed upon that occasion, only that I saw a number of those pike staves. Thistlewood was anxious to have them feruled, and as far as I could understand, Thistlewood expressed himself rather surprised that Bradburn was not come.

Is that Bradburn the prisoner?—Yes.

What was Bradburn by trade?—That I cannot say. Davidson in particular began to express himself dissatisfied because Thistlewood said that Bradburn had been supplied with money to buy ferules to put upon those staves, and that they were not done.

Were those staves in the room at the time?—They were.

In what state were they?—They were quite green, and appeared as if they had just come from the country.

State any thing further that passed at that meeting?—After Davidson expressed himself dissatisfied with Bradburn not coming forward to ferule the sticks for the pikes, he said he “would not give a damn for the man; he dare say he had spent the money; a man like him was not worthy of consideration.”

Do you know any thing else that passed at that meeting?—There was nothing else further than Thistlewood making a reply, “No, no.”

I do not ask you as to any thing that passed relative to these disputes, but on any other subject?—I do not remember that any thing further passed.

How often were those meetings held?—Those meetings were held twice a day.

Up to what time were they held twice a day?—Up to the 23rd of February.

From the time you came out of prison?—Yes, they were in that room.

Did you collect from them who had hired the room?—Yes, I heard Brunt say he had hired the room for Ings.

Did he say for what purpose the room had been hired?—No, he did not; I can only conjecture for what it was hired.

Was there any furniture in the room?—No, except a stove that was fixed.

But the meetings continued to be held there from the 31st of January to the 23rd of February, in that room?—Yes.

When did you go there again?—I cannot charge my memory exactly, but I can recollect one circumstance particularly. One evening about nine or ten days before the funeral of the king, I went up into the room where a meeting was held; there was Thistlewood and Harrison sitting by the fire; they were in deep discourse, and there were two chairs; they made room for me to sit down; Harrison sat in the middle, and Thistlewood on one side and I on the other: they began to tell me the discourse that had passed between them. Harrison told Thistlewood he had met with one of the life-guards, who told him, that all the life-guards that could be spared, and could be mounted, would be at the funeral of the king; and likewise as many foot-guards as could be spared, and likewise the police officers. Harrison said it struck him, after he left this life-guardsman, that this would be a favourable opportunity for what they had in view, as the soldiers would be out of town, and the police officers as well; that it would be a very favourable opportunity to kick up a row, and see what they could do that night.

Harrison stated this to Thistlewood?—Yes, and then Thistlewood improved it; afterwards Thistlewood laid a plan.

What did Thistlewood say?—It quite met with his approbation, he said it certainly would be a very favourable opportunity, and he had no doubt, provided they could take those two pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane, and the six pieces of cannon from the Artillery Ground, that they would have an opportunity, before morning, to put themselves into the possession of London.

What further passed?—Thistlewood quite agreed with the plan, so far as this, he said, if once it began and if communication went from London to Windsor to inform the army here that they were to come to London, they would be so tired when they got to London they would not be able to do any thing.

What further passed?—Mr. Thistlewood said, he thought by persevering after they had got the cannon, it might be so ordered that they could go to Hyde Park and prevent any orderly leaving London to go to Windsor to make any communication of what had passed in London.

Was any thing further said?—In the next place he said it would be highly necessary to go to the telegraph, over the water, and take possession of that to prevent any intelligence being conveyed to Woolwich; he next proposed, as he thought by this time they should be able to form a provisional government, to seek for a provisional government, and for that provisional government to send down to the sea-ports to prevent any gentlemen being permitted to leave this country without a passport from the provisional government, he particularly mentioned Dover, Brighton, Ramsgate, and Margate, and last of all he bethought himself that Brighton would be the most particular place of any; he said it would be necessary to take a force down there sufficient to take it, "not that I suppose the new king will be able to be there at that time, or even to be at the funeral of his father," he did not consider he was well enough, but "it will be necessary to go down there to prevent any person leaving it; and as to the prince regent or the king, we cannot think of his ever wearing the crown, the present family have inherited the crown long enough."

Did any other persons come into the room during that meeting that evening?—Ings and Brunt.

What did you say about not wearing the crown?—He said, "I think it is no use the new king ever thinking of wearing the crown."

You have told us, at first Harrison and Thistlewood and yourself were there; did any other persons come in?—Brunt and Ings were not in the room at the time this conversation passed, but they came in afterwards.

After they came in, was any thing said to them?—Thistlewood got up and went to Brunt and Ings and communicated what Harrison had brought, as to what might be done on the night of the funeral of the king; Brunt and Ings heard what he had to say, but they both positively declared that there was nothing short of the assassination which they had in view, that would satisfy them.

The assassination of whom?—Of the ministers.

Had any conversation taken place on that subject before?—Yes.

At that, or a former meeting?—At a former meeting.

Will you tell us what that conversation was respecting the assassination? what that plan was?—I asked them frequently what was the plan, but the first meeting I had with Brunt he told me what was the intention.

What did he say?—He said there were two or three of them who had drawn out a plan with a view to assassinate the ministers the first cabinet dinner that they had.

Was there any talk either at that meeting of which you have just spoken, or at any former meeting, about this assassination?—They never scarcely met but that was the object, part of it.

Was any thing said as to what was to be done, besides the assassination of the ministers?—Not at that time.

Not before that meeting when the conversation took place about the funeral?—No.

Do not speak to any thing which took place after that meeting where the conversation took place about the king's funeral, because we will go to that by and by, but do you recollect any thing further respecting the former meeting?—I cannot charge my memory with any thing further.

You say you saw some pike staves in that room; was there any thing but the pike staves carried into that room?—Yes.

Confine your statement for the present to any thing previous to the meeting at which the king's funeral was spoken of, was there any thing carried into the room previous to that time?—I cannot say whether there were previous to that time, afterwards there were, I cannot charge my memory as to the exact dates until I come to the 19th of February.

What day of the week was that?—The Saturday.

What time in the day did you go there?—Between eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon.

This room in Fox-court?—Yes.

Who was there at that time?—I saw Thistlewood, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, Brunt and Hall.

Tell us, in the order of time as accurately as you can, every thing that took place at that meeting, every thing that was said and every thing that was done?—On the Saturday the 19th, on my going into the room they were all set round the room seemingly in a sort of confusion, in a deep study. I had not been in scarcely a minute before they all got up and turned themselves short round upon their heels, saying, "Well, then, it is agreed we are come to the determination then if nothing occurs between this and next Wednesday night, next Wednesday night we will go to work." It was said that they were all so poor that they could not wait any longer. Thistlewood directly proposed that a committee should sit to-morrow morning, on the Sunday at nine o'clock, in order to draw out a plan to go by what they were to do. Thistlewood said to Brunt "you had better go round this afternoon and acquaint what men you think you can bring forward, in order to bring them to the committee to-morrow morning." Brunt said he had got some work to finish, and he did not think he should have any time, but he might get up in the morning and acquaint a few that they might attend, but they did not want a great many to be in the room, Brunt appeared as if he was leaving the room, and Thistlewood seemed to recollect himself, and said, "oh, Brunt, it will be highly necessary for all that attend the committee to-morrow morning to bring arms with them in case any officers should come up." On this Brunt said, "damn my eyes, if any officers was to come into this room I would run them through, murder them, and take care after I had done it, it should never be found out." This, to the best of my recollection, finished what I saw on the Saturday in the evening, I did not go up on the Sunday morning till just turned of eleven o'clock I entered the room.

Who were in the room at that time? how many?—On going into the room, what with the fog and thickness of the snow, the room was in a state of darkness. I made towards the fire-place, but it was so dark I could scarcely tell who they were till one spoke to me; that was Tidd: he said, "How do you do, Adams?"—I said, "Is it you, Tidd? I did not know who it was."

Did you afterwards collect, from the conversation and the looking around you, who were there?—Yes, I did.

Who were there?—There were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Davidson, Harrison, Cook, Bradburn, Edwards, myself, and Wilson.

Will you tell us what took place at that meeting? tell us it in the order of time?—A very little while after this, I found that the business they had met upon, which was to begin at nine o'clock, had not been entered on. Mr. Thistlewood, on looking round and counting the number of heads, says, "I think it is high time gentlemen to begin the business." Counting the heads and seeing there were twelve, he said, "I think that is quite enough to form a committee." On this Mr. Tidd was proposed to take the chair.

Thistlewood proposed that Tidd should take the chair?—Yes. Tidd takes the chair, and he takes a pike, and he sits with a pike in his hand; Mr. Thistlewood standing up on his left, and Brunt upon his right. Thistlewood began. Says he, "Gentlemen, I presume you all know what you are met here for," turning his head to the door with an allusion that he would not name what they had met for, or call the names of the different ministers over, but he turned to the door and said, "the west-end job." Brunt perceiving this, said, "Damn my eyes, never mind, mention their names, what signifies?" He was called to order directly from the chair. On this Thistlewood speaks again he says, "Gentlemen, we are come to this determination, as we are all of us tired in waiting so long for the doing this job, and as we find there is no probability of their meeting all together—"

Of whose meeting all together?—Of the ministers. "If in case they do not dine all together between this and Wednesday night we are come to a determination within ourselves to take them separately at their own houses; we shall not have such an opportunity of destroying so many as provided they were to dine all together: if we take them separately, we must content ourselves with getting two or three or four, as we can get them. I suppose," says he, "it will take as much as forty or fifty men to do the west-end job with: and I propose, at the same time, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn lane shall be taken, and the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground shall be taken." Cook proposed himself, to take the lead, and take the command upon himself, at the taking of those cannon. He proposed, after these were taken, taking the Mansion-house as a seat for the provisional government; then they were to make an attempt upon the bank of England: he directly proposed, that Mr. Palin should be the man that should be intrusted to set fire to the different buildings in different parts of London.

Was Palin to do this by himself?—If you will let me go on in my statement. To the best of my recollection this pretty well finished Mr. Thistlewood's plan that morning, and he said there was time enough between that and Wednesday night to improve it, as they could not come to any decision what time to begin, but they should have time between that and the Wednesday night to settle all that. He said he should drop the subject for the present, as Brunt, or Mr. Brunt (I cannot exactly recollect which of the two), had a proposition to make to them, respecting the assassination of the ministers, how it was to be done. On this Brunt coming forward to state his plan, Thistlewood said, "Stop, this proposition I have said to the men in the room had better first be put from the chair, to see whether they are all agreeable to what has been said." Thistlewood said to the chairman, "You had better, before you put the question, ask them all round separately whether they are agreeable, or whether any of them have any thing to say on what has been said." It was put by the chairman. The chairman asked several of them whether they had any thing to say on what had been said; nobody speaking, it was put from the chair, and was carried unanimously. Mr. Brunt now came forwards with a proposition that he had to make. He proposed that as many of the ministers as they could form an idea that they could assassinate, that it should be done on Wednesday night, without an opportunity occurred that the ministers dined all together between this and the Wednesday night. That as many men as they could get together that would go forwards to the assassination of the ministers, as many as they thought they could assassinate, those men should be divided into separate lots. After the men were so lotted, he proposed then that out of each lot there should be a man drawn for the sole purpose of assassinating the party that they went to do; and whoever it fell upon to do the assassination, that man should be bound to do it, or be murdered himself. Whatever man the lot fell upon to do the part of the assassination, if he attempted the deed, and failed in doing it, he swore by all that was good, that man should be run through upon the spot. Upon this I got up myself, and said to Mr. Brunt, "I wish to ask you this question upon the few words you have drawn: Do you suppose it is not possible for a man to go and attempt to do a thing like that, and for the man to fail in it? Do you mean to say that that man so failing shall be run through upon the spot himself?" He said, "No, certainly not; unless the man that attempts it, if there is the least sign of cowardice attached to it, I say that he shall be run through: but, if he fails in doing it, if he is thought to be a good man, of course he shall not be run through." Mr. Brunt here dropped his discourse for the present. It was put the same as the measure of Mr. Thistlewood, from the chair and it was agreed to. Two minutes after this, before any thing had occurred, in came Palin, Potter, and Strange; they were asked to sit down by the fire, being wet, being covered with snow. Palin came and sat down next to me; as to the other two I cannot say. Thistlewood immediately proposed, or at least told them that the two plans they had drawn up between themselves, and which had been proposed by him and Brunt, had been stated; but as they were not in the room at the time they were stated, he thought it highly necessary those plans should be stated to them.

Did he relate them to them?—Yes, the same as before; Mr. Thistlewood his plan, and Mr. Brunt his, and they agreed to them the same as the rest had done. After this had been gone through by Mr. Thistlewood and Brunt, Palin gets up and says, "Mr. Chairman, I have a few words that I wish to speak on what has been dropped by Mr. Thistlewood and Mr. Brunt. Agreeing as I do with the plans that have been proposed, and having been one amongst the number that have held up my hand to assent to it, there is one thing I want to know: there are so many objects you have proposed to carry all at one time, certainly if it can be done it will be a great acquisition to what we have in view, but this is what I want to know: you talk of taking from forty to fifty men to the west-end job; now I should be glad to know where you are to find those men that will take this cannon at Gray's-inn-lane? Those cannon at the Artillery-ground, where they are to come from? No doubt you know better what strength you have got than I do: as for my own part I can give no satisfactory answer at the present what strength or what men I can bring forward to assist me; but I want to know, in the next place, before my going round to the men I intend to call upon this afternoon, whether I may be intrusted, from the committee, to communicate to them what is to be done, and then I shall better know how to act. I want to know," says he, "in calling upon the men, whether I can have the liberty to tell them in part, if not in full, what is to be done, and when they will be wanted?" The chairman, turning his head to Thistlewood and to Brunt, says, "I suppose Mr. Palin there is no doubt but what he knows what kind of men he will have to depend upon, he will know of course whether he can depend upon the men in case he states what the plan is, and when they will be wanted. If Mr. Palin gets men of that description that he can depend upon, I do not see where the harm will be in his communicating to them what is to be done."

That was the answer given to Palin?—Yes, it was agreed to by Mr. Thistlewood and Brunt too, the chairman, for Mr. Palin to have that liberty. Mr. Palin, finding he had liberty to act in that kind of way, sat himself down and seemed satisfied. This finished the business to the best of my recollection; there was nothing transacted regularly in the chair after that, but they began to think of going home to get their dinner, in order to go in the afternoon round to their different men. On this, Mr. Thistlewood, all on a sudden, turned himself round to Brunt, and said, "Oh, Brunt, well thought of, now Mr. Palin is here, I would advise you to take him to the spot close by, and see whether it is practicable or not." That was, to go and see the new Furnival's-inn building in Holborn, to see whether it was practicable to clap fire to it.

Fox-court is close by Furnival's-inn, I believe?—Yes, it is.

In consequence of that, did they go out?—In consequence of that Mr. Thistlewood said, "as it is not far, Mr. Palin and you go up together, and return here, and give a report in."

Did they go?—They went, and were out of the room, I suppose, for the space of ten minutes to the best of my recollection.

Palin and Brunt?—Yes.

Were you there when they returned?—I was; when Palin and Brunt came back, Mr. Palin gave it in that it was a very easy job, very easily done, and it would make a damned good fire; on this they began to depart. I do not recollect that Mr. Palin continued in the room after that, but a very little while; but before they left the room, Mr. Thistlewood said he thought it would be highly necessary, either Tuesday or Wednesday, to get what men they could together, and to give them a treat; but he did not know how this was to be accomplished, we are all so poor. Brunt turning himself sharp round on his heels, he was standing by the fire, walked across the room, came back again—"Damn my eyes, I have not done little or no work for some time, but I have got a pound note for that purpose, and I will be damned if I do not spend it upon the men we have got."

Upon that, did you separate at that time?—Not just directly: on this Thistlewood said, "Where can you take them to, I should suppose we might have the room below stairs at the White Hart." Brunt replied, "I do not know; I do not much like to go there after what has been said, but never mind. I do not see that we have no cause, as time gets on, to be afraid of the bloody traps; for if they come into the room they should not go out again." On this he bethought himself that he could send his apprentice, and his own son, out of the way by giving them a holiday, and that then he could have his own room; but he thought he should still call and hear what Hobbs should say.

Hobbs is the landlord of the White Hart?—Yes, he is. Thistlewood at the same time said he would take them up to his room; but directly after, on giving it a second thought, he said "No, that will not do, as there is an officer that lives so opposite to me, that if that officer should perceive men coming backwards and forwards to my place it will be a means of giving some suspicion there is something in it." I believe, to the best of my recollection, that finishes the Sunday morning business.

When did you meet again?—They met on the Monday morning; but I beg leave to state one circumstance that occurred in the interval of that time, of the meeting breaking up on the Sunday morning, and my calling on the Monday morning: on the Sunday evening I went to the White Hart—

You must not tell us what passed with any body else. You went and had a communication with Hobbs at the White Hart?—Yes.

That cannot affect the prisoner at the bar; therefore you must not state that.—Then we must drop that; but the principal part of what took place on the Monday morning arose in consequence of that.

Tell us what took place on the Monday morning, and, as far as that is material, it will come out in that narrative?—On the Monday morning, I went into the room about ten o'clock.

Was the prisoner at the bar, Thistlewood, there?—Yes.

Who else?—Brunt, Harrison, Hall, and Ings; I cannot charge my memory as to the others.

What took place?—They asked me how I did. I told them rather unwell, I seemed to be rather down in the mouth. What passed at the moment I cannot precisely say, but I said to them, "Gentlemen I have something to communicate to you." They all turned their eyes upon me directly, they wanted to know what I had to say. On this, I communicated to them what I had communicated to me the evening before.

You told them what had passed between you and some other person on the Sunday night?—Yes.

Who was that other person?—Mr. Hobbs, of the White Hart.

Tell us what you told them?—I told them that Hobbs had told me that there had been a couple of officers, one from Hatton-garden and another from Bow-street, to ask him whether there was not a radical meeting held there. I told them, as Hobbs told me, there was information at Bow-street office, and likewise at lord Sidmouth's office, that there was a meeting of that description held at his house, the White Hart.

This you told to the meeting?—Yes.

Upon that, what was said or done?—Harrison turned himself round to me like a bull dog, "Adams you have acted damned wrong." I said, "In what?" Brunt turned upon me like a lion, and said, "You have acted wrong;" he said, "whatever you had heard it is your duty to come and communicate it to me, or Mr. Thistlewood." I said, "I did not conceive that I had any right to withhold it from any one; that I thought it my duty to communicate it to all, as it concerned all." They swore at me again, and said I had no business to communicate it to any body except them two.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Will your lordship permit my learned friend Mr. Gurney, to proceed with the examination?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Certainly.

Mr. Gurney.—What was said in answer to that observation of yours?—They said I had no business to communicate any thing I heard out of the room. I said, "What would you have thought of me had I after hearing such a communication as this, such a report as this out of doors, that the proceedings were reported out of Bow-street office and lord Sidmouth's office, kept this to myself, and suffered you to go on? After you were taken and all prisoners, it would have come out that I was the person that knew of that, and might have prevented it."

Did any thing particular more pass at that meeting?—There was nothing particular.

How soon did you meet again?—There were some other circumstances on this morning before the meeting broke up. After I had met with this rebuff from them, they directly began to propose leaving, saying they had a number of men to call upon, and they must wait upon them; and that they had a meeting of what they called the Marylebone Union.

Was any thing proposed by either of them to be done respecting the Marylebone Union?—Brunt said he must wait upon the Marylebone club, and that there were several of them said they should attend there themselves; that they would all be there, for that they wanted some money. It was asked by one in the room, whether he thought it would be of any use calling there upon that speculation? He told them yes, it would.

Who said that?—I cannot charge my recollection who it was; it was one of the party. It was Brunt that said, "Yes, it would." I cannot recollect who it was that put the question.

Before you went, was any arrangement made about where you were to be in the evening?—Yes.

Where were you appointed to be in the evening?—I was appointed to be in the same room in the evening.

That was the room in Brunt's house?—Yes; that was proposed by Thistlewood.

Were you told what answer you were to give to any that might come?—I had no orders to that effect.

Was there to be any meeting there that night?—There was not, further than this, I was ordered to attend in case any one should come that was not there in the morning; as those that were there in the morning had all of them pretty well agreed to be in the Marylebone Union that night.

You were to say there was no meeting there that night?—Yes.

Did you go there that evening?—I went to Brunt's room.

Did any of the persons that you mentioned come there that evening?—Potter called, I think.

Any body else?—No; I had not been there long before Potter, being wet, called, and said he would go and have a pot of beer, and he went to the White Hart.

And you went with him?—Yes.

Did any persons come to you there?—Yes.

Who were they?—Palin and Bradburn.

The next morning did you go again to the room?—Yes, I did.

That was Tuesday morning, the 22nd?—Yes.

Who were there at that time, or in the course of the morning?—There were Brunt, Thistlewood, Ings, Hall, Davidson, Harrison, Wilson, Palin, Potter, and Bradburn.

While you were there, was any intelligence brought you respecting any cabinet dinner?—Yes; Mr. Edwards came in and went to Thistlewood, and tells him there was a cabinet dinner to be on the Wednesday night.

That was the next day?—Yes; Thistlewood said, "I do not think that is true."

Upon that, was any thing done to ascertain whether it was or not true?—Yes; Thistlewood proposed to send for a paper to ascertain it.

Was a newspaper sent for and brought?—It was.

Upon that, what passed?—Upon the paper being brought into the room they were all satisfied, from the statement that the paper made.

Was the paper read?—It was read by Mr. Thistlewood, he read it out; that the cabinet were to dine at earl Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square, on Wednesday evening.

What was said upon this being announced?—Upon this Mr. Brunt walked towards the window, "Now," says he, "I will be damned, if I do not believe there is a God; I have often prayed that those thieves may be collected all together, in order to give us a good opportunity to destroy them, and now God has answered my prayer." Upon this Thistlewood proposed that there should be a committee sit directly.

Do you remember Ings saying any thing?—I cannot charge my memory at the moment.

Who was put into the chair?—I was put into the chair myself.

Upon that, did any person make any proposition?—Mr. Thistlewood came and stood by me, after I was in the chair, and had called to order, he came and began to speak. Now I beg you to hear me state some things which, if you pay attention, I will tell you, what has transpired.

What did Thistlewood propose?—He proposed to sit directly, to form a fresh plan regarding the assassination. He was going to proceed, I being in the chair, I interrupted him.

What did you interrupt him to say?—I said, "Gentlemen, after what fell from my mouth yesterday morning, I hope you have all given it a due consideration."

That was your mention of what Hobbs had said to you?—Yes; this same discourse had passed between me, Bradburn, and Palin, the night before.

Had you mentioned to Palin what had passed the day before?—Yes.

What did the meeting say or do upon this?—Upon this Harrison walked backwards and forwards in the room, they were all in a state of confusion, more like a set of madmen than men. Harrison looked at me, and said, "Damn your eyes! the next man that dropped a word to cool any man, and to prevent their going forward to do the deed they had determined on, he would run that man through with a sword."

In the result, did you remain in the chair, or were you put out?—I remained for a few minutes.

Were you put out then?—I was.

Who was put in?—Mr. Tidd. Thistlewood wanted to proceed in the business, Palin sitting down, said, "No, stop; what has dropped from Mr. Adams's mouth, respecting what was communicated yesterday morning, I want to be satisfied on, before the business proceeds further."

Without giving me all the discussion that took place, did it end in Brunt making any motion to do any thing?—Yes, Brunt got up; he proposed, in order to do away any suspicion from what had passed, that there should be a watch put on the earl Harrowby's house that night.

What was that watch to do?—There were to be two men go on at a time.

What was the object of their watching?—The object of their watching was, that they should watch to see if any men or soldiers went into the house of earl Harrowby, in order to way-lay any body that might go in.

Was that motion approved of?—It was.

At what hour that night was it ordered that any watch should be set?—At six; men to go on at six stop till nine; at nine they were to be relieved by two more, that were to stop till twelve; then the watch was to commence again on the Wednesday morning, at four o'clock.

That was carried, and the watch ordered?—Yes.

What did Brunt say after that?—I cannot charge my memory.

Did Hall make any motion?—Not directly; Thistlewood then came forward, when Mr. Tidd was in the chair, "Now," says he, "after what has fallen from Mr. Brunt's mouth, I hope every one will be satisfied, if in case there is nobody found to go into the house, such as officers or soldiers."

By officers, do you mean police officers?—Yes; that he thought it would be best to enter into a fresh plan; that if nobody was seen to go into the house, they were determined to do what they talked of to-morrow evening; the plan altogether of the Sunday morning was altered, so far as respected the assassination. Mr. Thistlewood proposed that it would take from forty to fifty men; forty men ought to be allowed, but more if they could get them. "It would answer our end," says he, "much best their dining altogether, than to run the risk of taking them at their own houses separately. In doing that," says he, "we could not command more than three, I dare say, at most. In doing this," says he, "their meeting all together, as there has not been a meeting so long, there is no doubt there will be fourteen, or we will say sixteen, which will be a rare haul to murder them all. I propose," says he, "going to the door with a note to present to earl Harrowby; when the door is opened for the men to rush in directly, seize the servants what are in the way, present a pistol to them, and directly threaten them with death, if they offer to make the least resistance or noise." This being done, a party were to rush forwards to take the command of the stairs: two men were to be placed at the stairs, leading to the upper part of the house; one was to have fire arms, to be protected by another with a hand-grenade in his hand: a couple of men were to take the head of the stairs leading to the lower part of the house: those two men placed at the stairs leading to the lower part of the house, were to be armed the same as the others at the other stairs. If any servants attempted to make any retreat from the lower part of the house, or from the upper part of the house, these men with the hand-grenades, were to clap fire to the hand-grenades, and fling it in amongst them altogether. Two men at the same time were to be placed at the area, one with a blunderbuss and another with a hand-grenade: if any body attempted to make their retreat from the lower part of the house that way, they were to have a hand-grenade thrown in amongst them there. At the same time all these objects were to be accomplished by the means of securing the house; those men who were to go in for the assassination, were to rush in directly after.

Into what part of the house did he propose they should go?—Where their lordships were.

And what to do?—To murder all they found in the room, good or bad; he said, that if there were any good ones they would murder them for keeping bad company.

Was this proposition agreed to or dissented from?—It is not finished. Ings volunteered himself to enter the room first—

Did he say what with?—That he would go in with a brace of pistols, a cutlass, and his knife in his pocket, with a determination, after the two swordsmen that were appointed to follow him had despatched them, to cut every head off that was in the room, and the head of lord Castlereagh and Sidmouth he would bring away in a bag; he would provide for the purpose two bags. As soon as he got into the room he said he should say, "Well, my lords, I have got as good men here as the Manchester Yeomanry. Enter citizens and do your duty." Upon this word of command from Ings, as I have before observed, the two swordsmen were to enter, to be followed by the rest of the men with pikes, pistols, cutlasses, or whatever it might be, and to fall to work immediately in murdering as fast as they could.

Whom did Thistlewood propose to be the two swordsmen?—Harrison was one that he picked out, and I, myself, for another, being the only men, as he supposed amongst them, that were used to the use of the sword, and men of the greatest strength and power.

Had Harrison been a soldier as well as you?—Harrison had been in the life-guards. On Harrison being proposed to go into the room, Thistlewood turned his head to me and said, "Adams will not you be one?" I seeing no chance of escape, knowing that if I did not assent my life was in danger, I assented to it.

Did Thistlewood propose any thing to be done in any other places except lord Harrowby's?—After the execution was done in the house they were to leave the house as quickly as possible; in doing this, Harrison was the man that was appointed to go to King-street horse barracks, I believe it is in King-street, the barracks where the horses were at any rate, and to take one of those fire-balls to fling into the straw shed to set fire to the premises.

Whither was the party to go from Grosvenor-square?—Harrison was to be supported by Wilson; after they had left the square they were to proceed—

Do you mean Harrison and Wilson, or the rest of the party?—The rest of the party: they were to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane to the City Light-horse barracks.

For what purpose?—For the purpose of meeting a party of men that were intended to be planted there, and in case those men found themselves not sufficiently strong to take the two pieces of cannon at the Light-horse barracks, they were to wait their arrival and they would assist them.

To what place were they to go then?—They were to proceed from thence to the Artillery-ground, where Mr. Cook was to be appointed, in order to lend him a hand in case he had found himself not sufficiently strong to take the six cannon there.

To what place were they to go then?—Mr. Cook was to wait there for the arrival of Mr.

Thistlewood? if he did not like to proceed he was to bring the cannon from the ground into the street, and to load it, in order to be ready to fire on any persons that might interrupt them, but if he found his strength sufficient to enable him to proceed, he was to advance from there to the Mansion-house; if he found himself capable of advancing to the Mansion-house he was to divide the six cannon into two divisions, and take three on one side and three on the other, three on that next the Royal Change, three next Cornhill; then he was to demand the Mansion-house, and, on a refusal he was to fire at it on both sides; it was thought, on doing that they would soon give it up.

Did he say what use was to be made of the Mansion-house?—It was for the provisional government to sit in.

After the Mansion-house was taken and made a seat of the provisional government, what was done next?—This underwent a little alteration the succeeding day.

Was any other place mentioned near the Mansion-house?—Yes, the Bank of England: that was the next place to be attacked.

What did he say was to be done there?—To plunder the Bank of all they could get, but not to destroy the books if they could any way help it, for they thought by keeping possession of the books that would enable them to see further into the villainy that had, he said, been practised in the country for some years past; the further proceedings, as far as the regulations of it altogether, were to be left till the Wednesday, but it was mentioned particularly that Palin's plan should be proceeded in the same as had been proposed; but as to the time, they did not come to any decisive time, though it was talked of between eight and nine o'clock, but it was not settled.

Was any watch set on lord Harrowby's house on the Tuesday night?—Yes.

Who were the first that were set?—I wish to state something before that, if you please.

What is that?—After the chair was left, being in a bustle about the room, Harrison proposed there should be a counter-sign, and the men that were to go about that day to inform men that were to help them the next evening should communicate the counter-sign, the counter-sign was button, the man that came up was to say, b, u, t, the man that was in waiting that was to be appointed to receive him was to say, t, o, n, these put together were to produce button, this being done was a token that the man that pronounced this was one of the party; a man was to be appointed to stand at the end of Oxford-road, in order to communicate to any man that came up to him the room where they were to be appointed to meet at the next night.

In the course of that evening, or that night, did you go on watch at lord Harrowby's?—I did, but there is something I wish to state before I come to that.

Mention any thing I have omitted?—In the afternoon, if you will allow me, after I left them I called up in the room again; in going up stairs I perceived a strange smell in the house, on going in I found Edwards, Ings, and Hall.

What were they doing?—Edwards was making fuses to put to the hand-grenades.

What was Ings doing?—Ings was dipping some rope yarn, picked for the purpose, into stuff to make what they termed the illumination balls for Mr. Palin.

What was Hall doing?—Dipping those into an Iron pot.

He was helping Ings then?—Yes, he was. Hall was putting shreds of paper on the floor to receive these after they came from the pot, to prevent their sticking to the hand, they were wrapped up in it.

While you were there did any other persons come in?—Not then; I did not stop a very few minutes, I had a little business of my own; I called up again the same evening.

When you called up again, what was that for?—When I called up again in the evening I found a couple of strange men I had never seen before.

Whom did you find them to be?—I found one of them to be Harris; I do not know the name of the other.

Were Brunt and Tidd there?—Brunt was there, Tidd was not, Thistlewood was there; there was nothing particular transpired.

Did any body go off to keep watch?—Yes.

Who went?—They did not go from there, to the best of my recollection.

Did any body come as from the watch?—No; Davidson was one that went on at six o'clock.

You suppose Davidson was to have gone at six?—He was there; because I was one that relieved him.

When did you go?—About half past eight o'clock; Mr. Tidd came into the room, saying, that he was disappointed in a man that was to have met him, that he was to have brought up there: on this Tidd and Brunt, being appointed in the morning to go and watch at nine o'clock, they conceived it, within themselves, time to start; they started, and in less than five minutes afterwards Brunt came back again; they had, in the interval of Brunt's leaving the room, called at a public house in order to meet the man, and found him there. Brunt came back, saying, that Tidd could not go; that Tidd had met the man that was to go, and that he was a man likely to be of great consequence; on this, looking round the room, he asked me to go. Just as I was going out, in came Edwards from the watch. I asked Edwards if there had been any thing particular seen, he said, "Whatever was seen I shall communicate to Mr. Thistlewood." I took that for a slap of the face for what had been said by me on the Monday evening.

Did you go to Grosvenor-square?—I did.

Who went with you?—Brunt.

When you got to the square, whom did you find on the watch?—When I got to the square

I saw Davidson; Brunt went up to him, I walked forwards, there was another man, but to say who he was, I could not.

Did Brunt and you keep watch?—Directly Brunt had relieved Davidson. I had, prior to going up to the square, hinted to Brunt that I felt myself rather tired.

Did you and he go to any public house?—Yes, we did; we had some bread and cheese and porter; we took some bread and cheese with us, and got some porter there.

Where is this public house?—Directly behind lord Harrowby's house, at the corner of the mews leading up to lord Harrowby's house.

Did you do any thing there?—There was a young man that was sitting there; there were, in fact, two or three that had been playing at dominos.

Did either of you play at dominos with him?—This young man gave Mr. Brunt a challenge, and he played at dominos with him.

Did you then go out and walk in the square?—We stopped there till eleven o'clock, and then we went out.

Did you walk in the square?—Yes. I walked some time till I got ashamed of myself, and I walked to the back of the square, and met him on the other side of it.

Who relieved you?—Nobody.

At twelve o'clock, did you and he go home?—We went home.

Mr. Solicitor General.—On Wednesday, the next day, did you go again to Fox-court?—I went in the afternoon, not before. Mr. Edwards called on me before I was up; my wife was not dressed; she asked who was there.

What time did you go to Fox-court? Were those persons assembled?—I went there between two and three o'clock.

Whom did you find at Fox-court at that time?—I found nobody there but Mr. Brunt, in his own room; his wife was going in just at the time.

That was in the front room?—Yes.

While you were in that room, did any body come in?—Strange came in.

Did Strange come in alone, or was any person with him?—He came in by himself.

Did any others come in?—Two more came in, in five minutes. I turned my head and saw two pistols lying upon the drawer. In consequence of these two fresh men coming in, Brunt proposed to go from that room to the room where we regularly met.

Had any thing been done with the pistols before that? Had they been touched?—No farther than handling them.

Was any thing done with the flints?—Now I recollect: they were trying the flints in them.

Who was trying the flints in them?—Mr. Strange, and one of the strangers who came in.

Brunt proposed going into the back room?—Yes.

In consequence of that, did they go into the back room?—They unlocked the door, and went into the back room directly.

Did you go with them?—I did. On going into the room, I saw a number of cutlasses. I saw a blunderbuss. I saw several pistols, and those pistols that were in Mr. Brunt's room as well were brought from there into the back room. They placed themselves, the two strangers in particular, and began to put the flints into the pistols. We had not been long in the room before Mr. Thistlewood came in. Thistlewood had not been long in the room before Ings and Hall came in. Thistlewood, on coming into the room, looks round him, "Well, my lads, this now looks something like as if there was something going to be done." He comes to me, claps his hand upon my shoulder, and says, "Well, Mr. Adams, how do you do?" I told him I was very unwell, and was very low in spirits. He said, "What is the matter?" "Why," says I, "one thing, I have not had any thing to drink to-day. I feel myself very faint." He said, "you shall not be very long without." He said, "Brunt, send out for something, Mr. Adams is low in his spirits." He said, "By God, you shall not be long without something," and he sent out for some gin and some beer.

That was produced, I suppose?—Yes, in the interval of this time of the beer being fetched, Thistlewood said he wanted some paper in order to write some bills on.

Upon that, what was done?—He wanted a kind of paper, he could not tell what to call it but the paper the newspapers were printed on. I said to him, "Cartridge paper will answer your purpose equally the same as the other, as you do not know the name of the other; that will answer your purpose." Thistlewood said, "who will fetch it?" Brunt says, "Either my boy or the apprentice shall fetch the paper."

He had both a son and an apprentice?—Yes. He put his hand into his pocket, and gave Brunt a shilling to fetch half a dozen sheets of cartridge paper: the paper was brought, a table fetched out of Mr. Brunt's room, and a chair, in order for Mr. Thistlewood to sit down and write upon the table. Thistlewood sits down to write three bills to stick up against the different buildings that might be set fire to, to acquaint the public what deeds had been done. The bills, to the best of my recollection, I will not pretend to say that I can tell every word that was written on them—

Was this bill afterwards read by Thistlewood?—It was read by Thistlewood.

Will you tell us what words he pronounced?—"Your tyrants are destroyed. The friends of liberty are called upon to come forward. The provisional government is now sitting. James Ings, secretary, 23rd February, 1820." In writing the last bill, I perceived Mr. Thistlewood to be extremely agitated, so much so that he could hardly write: he expressed himself to be extremely tired; he did not know what was the matter with him, but he could not write any more.

After these three last papers were written, was any thing else written?—There were three other bills that were proposed to be written; one was drawn up in part. These other bills were to make an offer to the soldiers.

You say one of these was drawn up in part?—Yes.

Was it drawn up by Thistlewood, or by any other person at Thistlewood's desire?—By another person at Thistlewood's desire.

You have told us that Thistlewood was very much agitated, and expressed himself extremely tired: In consequence of that, did he make any proposal to any other person that was present?—Yes; he proposed first that Hall should take the pen. Hall refused it: another man that was in the room, whom I had never seen before, was proposed to sit down and take the pen, he objected, but afterwards he took it.

The proposal was made by Thistlewood to Hall who declined; in consequence of which a proposal was made to another person in the room whom you do not know, but though he objected at first, he afterwards sat down and took the pen?—Yes.

Did this person who took the pen write of his own head, or did Mr. Thistlewood or any other person, dictate to him what he was to write?—Mr. Thistlewood dictated to him what he was to write.

Will you tell us what was dictated, as well as you can recollect? I do not ask the precise terms, but the effect and the substance?—I will give you what I saw wrote——

Mr. Curwood.—My Lord, I object to that.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did you hear the words expressed by Thistlewood?—Yes, not only then but several times.

There are certain rules of law by which we must abide. Tell us the words he dictated to that other man.

Mr. Adolphus.—Tell me first, have you any memory of it but from having seen it in writing? Did you see it in writing?—Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Do you recollect what Mr. Thistlewood said at the time? What were the words that he uttered?—Yes, I can recollect so far as this.

Mr. Adolphus.—I shall take your lordship's opinion upon this. This professedly is reduced to writing. I apprehend when any matter is put down in writing that cannot lie nor alter; it is not to depend upon the recollection of a bystander, but having assumed an embodied form, the writing is to be the evidence of what is reduced to writing.

Mr. Solicitor General.—To avoid all argument, let us ask a single question. What became of those papers? Were they left with Mr. Thistlewood?

Mr. Adolphus.—That is not the way of putting the question.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What became of those papers?

Mr. Adolphus.—The mischief is done now by the question.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—I am sorry for it; but I am not sure that, strictly, it is not correct, to ask whether they remained with him, or were taken away.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What became of those papers?—I cannot say; the last time I saw them they were doubled up. I saw one in the hands of Mr. Thistlewood, doubled up; another in the hands of Ings, as he was equipped; I naturally supposed he had put it into Ings's hands.

Have you seen any of them since?—No, never.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Then now we have given notice to all the prisoners.

Mr. Adolphus.—I admit the notice, but you do not prove the possession.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—The last he saw of them was in the hands of Ings and Thistlewood. This is the last account we have of them: therefore you must trace them out of your possession.

Mr. Adolphus.—These papers are a joint act written by another person.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What became of the paper you are now describing, written by the dictation of Thistlewood?—I do not know what became of that more than another. I will tell you what I can swear was upon the paper.

Mr. Adolphus.—That is just what I am objecting to.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was that paper completed?—It was not completed.

What was the reason that it was not completed?—The reason it was not completed was, the man that was writing it and Thistlewood together could not come to know the particular terms respecting the wording of the bill altogether, and in consequence of that the bill was drawn. Mr. Thistlewood, at the same time, expressed himself very much dissatisfied, saying, that he had spoken to a man to do those bills for him as much as a fortnight ago, that the bills were drawn out, and he had not seen him since.

You say he was not satisfied as to the whole of it. What did you hear Thistlewood tell him to write down.

Mr. Adolphus.—I object to that.

Mr. Solicitor General.—I did not ask what was written, but what Thistlewood told him to write down.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Do you mean to argue it further, or do you rely on the argument you have raised? You object to the reception of this evidence on the ground, that what was said by Thistlewood was taken down in writing?

Mr. Adolphus.—Yes, my lord: and all the evidence which has since been added is, that all that he dictated was written, that the paper was left unfinished, and that he said he had given instructions to another man, a fortnight before, but that it was not done.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—What became of this paper?—I do not know.

In whose hands did you last see it?—The hand that I saw the writing in last, was the hand of the man that last wrote it.

And who he was you do not know?—Who he was I do not know.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Mr. Solicitor General, we entertain some doubt.

Mr. Solicitor General.—If your lordships entertain any doubt, we will not press the evidence.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—There is some doubt entertained in some part of the court; you will not press it then?

Mr. Solicitor General.—No, my lord. Before those bills were written, was Ings in the room?—Yes.

Did he do any thing for the purpose of preparing himself in any way?—He was preparing himself in the manner he intended to enter the room where their lordships were, he puts a black belt round his waist, in order to contain a brace of pistols; he puts another black belt on to hang a cutlass to his shoulder: after this, there was a bag hung to each shoulder, a large bag to each shoulder, in the form of a soldier's haversack. When these bags were on, he placed a brace of pistols, one of each side; he hung a cutlass; he viewed himself and said, "Damn my eyes! I am not complete now. I have forgot my steel!" With that he pulled out a large knife, and began to brandish it about.

Describe that knife?—I will mention it presently. He brandished his knife about as if he were in the act of cutting the heads of those he intended to cut off; he would bring away a head in each hand; and the hand of lord Castlereagh he would cut off and procure that which might at a future day be thought a great deal of; and these expressions of his have been repeatedly used; it would be impossible for me to say I could stand here and recollect the times he had said this.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—He had expressed himself in this way many times?—Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General.—He described the knife?—Yes, the knife is a large broad-bladed knife, to the best of my recollection; it is from ten to twelve inches long, according to the calculation of my eye; the handle is bound with wax end; this was bound round as he declared, in doing the thing that his hand should not slip; and the breadth of the blade of the knife with the best calculation I could make with my eye, I never measured it——

While Ings was arming what were the others doing?—Arming, fixing the leathers to hold pistols with, and placing them in the belts. Another man was busy in putting the cutlasses into slings, to hang by the wrists; it would be impossible to describe all the transactions.

At what hour did the first persons leave the room, to go to these transactions?—As near as I can tell about half-past four, or a little before five.

About half-past four or a little before five?—Yes, or from that to five.

Do you remember Palin's coming in?—Yes.

At what time do you suppose he came in?—About half an hour before I left.

Tell us what passed when he came in?—Thistlewood and Brunt were there at the time, but Palin had not been in at the time before; Thistlewood and Brunt on some business or other left the room, but what I do not know: during their absence, Palin began the concern, to speak to what men there were in the room. He said, "Gentlemen, I hope all that have met here this afternoon are well acquainted what you have met upon; you are informed what you are met here for; in the first place, you ought to think within yourselves, whether you are going to do your country a service or not: if you are in possession of what you are going to do, you first of all ought to examine yourselves whether you think the assassination will be countenanced by your country: if you conceive that the assassination will be countenanced by your country, and that the people of the country, after you have done it, will turn of your side: it is necessary, I say, that every man that is here going to turn out on this piece of business, will come to an explanation with yourselves, that every man that flinches from his duty, or turns out a coward, should be run through by one of the party directly on the spot." He said, "unless you come to this determination, it will be impossible to do any good." He was going on to say a few words more, but a tall man in the room interrupted him.

Where were Thistlewood and Brunt then?—They were not come in.

Do you know who that tall man was?—No.

Should you know him if you saw him?—No.

What did he say?—He said, "you seem to speak as if every man were in possession of what we were going upon, now this is what I should like to know, what we are actually going about."

That man was a stranger; had he attended the previous meetings?—He had not.

It was the first time you had ever seen him?—It was the first time I had ever seen him.

He said to Palin, "I can see pretty well the meaning of your speech, as for myself, if we come to any determination to turn out, with a view to serve our country, I am a man that is not afraid of himself, and that man that is afraid of himself, ought not to have any thing to do with a concern like this."

How long was this before Brunt and Thistlewood came into the room?—I do not recollect seeing Thistlewood after that on that day.

Do you remember Brunt starting?—Yes.

At what time? and who went with him?—Brunt came after this, and perceiving an alteration in the countenance of the meeting, he wished to know the cause of it: he was told there were some in the room who wanted to know further of the plan, and what they were to do.

Upon this being told to Brunt, what did he say or do?—He said, this was not the room for them to be told what they were to do, but go along with him to the other room in Edgeware-road, there every one should be apprised of what they were going about. Brunt directly began to wish to put them in movement in order to go, he said he would take good care all that went along with him should have a drop of something to drink, to put them in spirits. This tall man, in answer to that said, "I hope you are not going to drunkenness, because drunkenness in a thing like this was of no good; because a man drunk the only service he is of is to run himself into the hands of his enemies."

That was the same stranger you mentioned before?—Yes.

After this did Brunt go away?—He began to be on the movement to go away.

Who went with him?—I went out first, and there was Strange at that time and this tall man, and three or four others, that I do not know, that went with him: it was agreed they should go along the street, in order to put a stop to any suspicion from going along in a body, they were to walk two and two in the street, and not to walk in a body with each other. I starts, and going along Holborn I had a tap on the left side, calling me by my name, Mr. Adams.

Who was that?—I cannot swear to that, it was a little man.

Was he one of the persons who had been at this meeting?—Yes.

You had now got out of the room?—Yes.

Was there any cupboard in the room?—Yes.

What was usually kept in that cupboard, during the interval from the time you first went into the room, after your first liberation from prison?—That cupboard was applied to keep the different things that were brought to the room, such as swords, the first thing I saw in it; the next thing were some hand-grenades.

Do you remember any flannel bags?—Yes.

What purpose were they used for, and how were they filled?—For the cartridges for the cannon.

Were they filled?—I saw one filled, and no other.

You have said before, there were some poles which appeared to have been recently cut?—Yes.

And some ferules fixed on them; where was that done?—In Brunt's room.

In the back room?—In the back room.

Were all the arms kept in the room?—No, they were not.

Where were the rest kept?—The dépôt was at Tidd's.

Do you know where Tidd lived?—Yes.

Where was it?—In the next room adjoining to myself.

That was in Hole-in-the-wall passage?—Yes.

Near Baldwin's-gardens?—Yes.

Was that the place where the greater part was kept, or how?—That was the place: I found them after I came from prison, the day or night afterwards: that was the place appointed to take in things. Thistlewood was always in a hurry when there was any thing in readiness to be taken there; he called it the dépôt.

Did he give any reason for that?—Yes.

What was that?—In case any body should come up, such as any officers or any person, who had no knowledge of their intention, to see these things, might have some suspicion that there was something in it more than they were aware of, that these things should be put out of the way, in order for a blind.

You told us a short time ago, that you and several persons left the place at a certain time; what had you? had you any arms?—I had a blunderbuss; it was proposed I should carry it being tall; that I should with the sling that was attached to it, cover my coat over it, without its been seen, and Brunt had got a broomstick prepared to receive a bayonet, it was proposed I should take this, which would serve as a walking stick.

Was there any other description of arms but those you have mentioned, that you knew of?—There were the hand-grenades.

You have talked of pike handles, were there any pikes made for them?—Yes.

What were they made from?—From old files pointed up.

Were there any old bayonets?—There were some old bayonets.

You have mentioned a kind of blunderbuss you were directed to carry; what kind of barrel was it?—Brass.

Did Brunt go with you all the way?—When this little man came to me, in Holborn, and told me to slacken my pace, that Brunt was gone back, that if I would slacken my pace they would overtake me, before I got to the top of Oxford-road; in consequence of this, I slackened my pace; I then went on to the top of Oxford-street, this side where Park-lane leads to, I crossed over to see who was behind me; seeing no one behind me that I had no knowledge of, I turned to the wall to make water.

You found none of your party were in sight?—No.

Did you in consequence turn back?—I went forwards.

Did you afterwards turn back?—I afterwards turned back to the end of Park-lane.

Did you meet Brunt?—I did not then.

Did you afterwards meet Brunt?—I met him afterwards.

Where did you meet Brunt?—Some considerable way below Park-lane, but I had been walking about so long.

You had missed your associates, and returned back and met Brunt?—I met Brunt, and he said where are you going? I said, I am going home: then there was another man with him: I said I do not know where to go. I did not know where to go.

It at last came to this, that you returned with him?—I returned with him.

Did you go along the Edgware-road?—I did.

Did you then meet Thistlewood?—I did.

Did you then with Brunt and Thistlewood, go on to Cato-street?—Yes.

Where did you go to in Cato-street? did you go to a stable?—Yes.

When you got to the stable whom did you see at the stable door, or near it?—As I got to the archway (I walked some short way behind them) I saw Brunt enter, Thistlewood followed.

Did any body come up while you were staying behind, and say any thing to you?—Harrison came up and said, Adams, come, go in.

Whom did you see in the stable?—I saw on the ground-floor Davidson, sitting down, and Wilson standing, it appeared to me as if they were doing something to the pikes.

Did you go up the ladder?—Yes.

Did you find Thistlewood there?—Yes.

Whom else?—I found Thistlewood and Brunt, Ings, Hall, Bradburn, Strange, Cooper, Wilson (Wilson was below), this tall man I have alluded to, and several others that I did not know by name.

How many were there above stairs, in the first place?—There were above stairs at the conclusion of it——

When you first came?—I cannot say.

How many were there at the conclusion of it?—At the conclusion Thistlewood made—at the conclusion there were eighteen, and two below.

When you went in did you see any carpenter's bench?—Yes.

What was on it?—Arms of different descriptions.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—There were candles then?—Yes, one.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was there any chest at that time?—Yes, at the end of the window where I placed myself; a kind of a trunk.

When you first went in what were they doing?—I found them all handling the different things, some cutlasses.

Was there any refreshment of any kind?—There was some beer standing on a table or a bench.

Was Tidd there at that time, or did he come in afterwards?—I did not see him for twenty minutes before the officers came in.

When Tidd came in, what passed?—Tidd proposed going from the room to the square, to see whether there was any noise particular, or whether the ministers of state were getting together to lord Harrowby's house, and he was gone for some time.

Who was?—Thistlewood. On Thistlewood's coming back, as I was standing up in the loft I heard below stairs in the stable a deal of talking, in consequence of that I went down.

Whom did you see below?—I found Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, and Wilson on going down into the stable; as soon as they perceived me, before they perceived me, they were talking closing together, they saw me and said what good news they had got, and all in a bustle; I said, what good news? and they said, the carriages are getting there as fast as they can, no less than six or seven carriages are already arrived—Brunt turned round, and said, "Damn my eyes! what a haul we shall have amongst them!"

Did you go up stairs after this?—Yes.

What happened?—The first thing was seeing Thistlewood and Brunt in this form together, seeing Thistlewood much agitated.

Did Tidd afterwards come in?—Yes.

How soon afterwards?—A very little while.

Before Tidd came in was any thing said about Tidd?—Yes, that was what Thistlewood and Brunt were talking about; on Thistlewood turning away, it was perceived there was something the matter. Ings turned round and said, "Do not think of dropping it now; if you do I shall hang myself, I shall go mad." It turned round the room, that Tidd was not like to come; Thistlewood said, he would forfeit his existence that Tidd would come; afterwards I saw him come in.

Without going through the detail of all that passed up stairs, was any thing afterwards done or said by Thistlewood, to move some of them on one side to ascertain what should be done?—On Thistlewood making an observation at the end of the bench, that he hoped they would not give up what they had begun, if they did, it would turn out another Despard's job.

Was that after Tidd came in?—Yes, upon this Thistlewood began to count the number of men that were in the room, "Let us see, there are eighteen in the room, two below stairs, altogether there are twenty; you say, there are not sufficient to go; I say there are plenty."

After he had counted those above stairs, and those below, and said there were plenty, what did he propose?—He said, fourteen would be sufficient to go into the room, and the other six would be sufficient to take care of the servants, and of the house; on this the fourteen men were picked out on that side of the room that the ladder led into: on the men being called together there, Brunt starts the gin bottle round, which I believe he produced from his pocket: "Now (says he) I conceive this number of men is quite sufficient."

Brunt said?—Thistlewood. "Supposing lord Harrowby should have sixteen servants; they are not prepared, we are; we can go and do what we have to do and off, in ten minutes time." I do not recollect any thing particularly dropping from Thistlewood after that.

Did you hear any disturbance below about that time or shortly afterwards?—Almost directly afterwards.

What did you hear or see?—We heard a person down below, and all of a sudden there was a voice at the bottom of the ladder, "Holloa! shew a light."

At the bottom of the ladder leading up to the loft?—Yes; upon this signal being given at the bottom of the ladder, Thistlewood turned round to the candle at the bottom of the bench, and turned round to see who was coming; and he put the candle at the bottom of the bench quite confused. At this instant of time the officers ascended the ladder, took the command of the room, at the head of the ladder in the room.

What do you mean by the command of the room? got into the room?—Got into the room.

How many?—Two stood in the room, at the top of the ladder, with two small pistols, presenting them in this way, and said, "Holloa, is any body in the room? here is a pretty nest of you." The officers said, "Gentlemen, we have got a warrant to apprehend you all, and as such we hope you will go peaceably;" at this instant of time one of the officers that was behind upon the ladder, "Make way" (said he) "and let me come forward." This was the man that was murdered.

A man that was behind on the ladder, said, "Let me come forward"?—Yes.

The two officers at the head of the ladder made way to let him come in; at this instant of time there was a group that had got into a little room?—Yes.

A group that had got into the little room before the officers had come there?—After the officers had entered the room.

Was it a group of persons that had been in the room before the officers had got there, who had got into the little room?—Yes; and on this the man that was murdered came into the little room; this group in the little room came forward, and amongst the group I saw an arm rush suddenly forward, at the same time I saw a pistol.

When the officers came forward, you saw one arm advance forward, with a sword in it?—I did not perceive what weapon he had.

But you saw an arm?—Yes.

And another arm with a pistol?—Both at one time; the hand that presented the pistol was rather below the arm that presented the other weapon.

What was done with the other arm?—As soon as ever the pistol was fired, out went the candle, that it was impossible for me to see what transpired.

Did you get away then?—On this, it was given out that one of the officers was murdered.

Did you get away?—Yes.

How?—After the officers got out and called for the soldiers to assist them, I went into the little room, to see who was there.

Did you get away?—I did.

How?—I went down the ladder and through the stable, as unquashed as if nothing had been the matter.

Did you go home?—Yes.

This was on the Wednesday night?—Yes.

How soon after were you apprehended?—On the Friday.

Have you been in custody ever since?—Yes, I have.

Look at the prisoners that are standing at the bar, and tell us their names. Who is that below?—Thistlewood.

Is that Thistlewood?—Yes.

Who is that behind him, the man of colour?—Davidson.

Who is on Davidson's left?—Wilson.

Who is that in the green coat?—Brunt.

Who is that who has moved?—Ings.

The butcher?—Yes.

Do you know the other man on the right hand of Brunt, with a coloured handkerchief?—Cooper.

Who is that short man? do you know him? [Strange.]—I cannot say that I can swear to the man, I have seen him.

Now the other man, who is that? [Bradburn.]—I do not know his name.

Now the tall man behind?—That is Harrison.

Who is that standing by him? [Gilchrist.]—I do not know him by name.

Now the other one, the stout man?—That is Tidd.

Mr. Solicitor General.—There are two or three that he has not spoken to, I wish they would stand forward.—I cannot say that I can swear to that man. [Strange.] I know his face too, but there is a difference in the dress, or something.

Do you know that man? [Bradburn.]—I have some recollection of him, but to swear to him I cannot.

Go down from the place where you are. [The witness removed.] Who is that? [Strange.]—I do not know the man by name, to say I can command his name; but I know him by sight.

Did you see that man at any of the meetings?—Yes, I think I have.

Robert Adams cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

You went with a full intention of assassinating his majesty's ministers?—No, I did not: I deny that.

What carried you there?—My legs.

Look at the jury, will you. Your legs carried you there?—Yes.

What intention carried you there?—What intention? I certainly cannot say, but I went there under that pretension to every outward appearance.

What was your inward intent?—My inward intent was entirely against them.

Against them? which did you say, against them, or against it?—Against the plan that was pursued.

According to your own account, you had attended many meetings at which this plan was debated?—I had.

One night you were chairman, you say?—One morning.

Then if your intention was against it, how came you to join them again?—I joined upon them in this way, gentlemen of the jury; there had been threatening language several times held out by Brunt, if any man that belonged to the party concerned, withdrew himself from it, he would take care that that man should be marked out; what could I do then?

Then it was fear made you join them?—It was fear that kept me to them.

Your original friend, I think you say, was Mr. Brunt?—Yes, my original acquaintance.

And you became acquainted with him in the year 1816, at Cambray, you say?—Yes.

Were you then a soldier?—No.

You had quitted the army for some years then?—Yes.

What line of life had you been in, after you quitted the army?—Principally in my trade, as a shoemaker.

Were you ever a treasurer at a benefit fund?—Never in my life.

What carried you to France at that time?—I went with the intention to follow my trade there.

Had you no other motive for leaving England?—Any other motive?

Yes?—Not in particular.

Did you carry much money with you?—I carried some with me.

How much might it be?—Between thirty and forty pounds.

Was not it more than that?—No.

Was it all your own?—I conceived it my own.

Some persons conceived it belonged to other people?—What other persons conceived I do not know; but what belongs to me I will acknowledge to the truth of.

Were not you charged with carrying away money belonging to other people?—No.

You never were charged before a magistrate with it?—No.

You went to France to carry on your trade as a shoemaker?—Yes.

That was your sole motive?—Yes.

Having become acquainted with Brunt, what purpose did he introduce you to Mr. Thistlewood for?—For the purpose of assassinating the ministers.

That was the purpose of the first visit?—Yes, this was proposed to me by Brunt before I ever saw Thistlewood.

And that being proposed to you, you agreed to be introduced to Thistlewood for that purpose?—Yes.

And you joined every meeting where that question was debated, till you were taken into custody?—Not every meeting.

A variety of meetings?—Yes.

And having joined for that purpose?—Yes.

And having joined for that purpose, and having heard it debated, you still continued to go to those meetings?—Yes.

You told us you were selected for your adroitness at the sword?—Yes.

Were you to be the most active at the assassinating plot?—I told you before, I was to be one to be appointed as a swordsman to go into the room along with Harrison.

How long is it since you have been an evidence to give an account of this plot?—The first account I ever gave in was on the Saturday after.

Did you give it then under any understanding that you were to become an evidence?—I did not.

It was from pure compunctious visitings of your own breast that you then disclosed it?—It was, indeed.

Not out of any regard for your neck?—The motive I did it with was this: my conscience was accused I had acted wrong, and I leant to heart; and I made a solemn vow, that if God Almighty would spare me, I would make a disclosure of all I knew.

You did not like to be hanged?—I do not know who would.

And you had rather thirteen others would be hanged than yourself?—I only came here to give the truth: if it is against the prisoner I cannot help it.

Had not you rather thirteen men should be hanged on your evidence than that you should be hung yourself? however, I will not distress you about that; but you had none of those feelings before you were in custody?—Yes, I had some prior to that.

How long before you found yourself in custody?—I had them before I entered the room; but after I entered the room, and the man was murdered, I was worse.

Before you entered the room that day?—Yes.

Were you very much shocked at it?—I were.

Because just now you told me you went down stairs and walked away as if nothing had happened?

Mr. Solicitor General.—He did not say that.

Witness.—I walked down to give myself up to the officers, but I saw none, and I did not find the officers, and I walked off.

Mr. Carwood.—You found no officers?—No.

And that is the reason you did not surrender yourself?—Certainly.

Did you think of surrendering yourself the next day, before you were taken?—I did not think of surrendering myself, or of making any escape; I made up my mind to run all chances.

To wait the event?—Yes.

You have given us a very circumstantial account; how many were the most that at any time you saw assembled?—The most that I saw assembled together were on the 20th of February, in the morning; there were about fifteen, I think; leaving the room in Cato-street out of the question.

Were any of them wealthy men that you have not named?—I know no more than I know here.

All poor men?—All poor men for what I know.

You sent one day for the paper?—Mr. Thistlewood did.

How did you raise money to pay for that paper?—I am not to tell how Mr. Thistlewood came by his money.

Was it not raised by a halfpenny and penny raised round the room?—No.

How was it raised?—Mr. Thistlewood gave the money out of his pocket, and sent Hale to fetch it.

I do not mean the cartridge paper, but the newspaper?—I mean the newspaper too.

The utmost you saw, before the meeting in Cato-street, was fifteen men?—Yes.

What was the largest sum of money you found among them?—The largest sum was six shillings, which I saw produced by Thistlewood to Brunt.

Somebody said he had a one pound note in reserve on this great occasion?—That was Mr. Brunt.

It was proposed, you say, not only to assassinate the ministers, but to take the two guns in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six guns at the Artillery ground, and to seize the Mansion-house?—Yes.

As you seem to have been deep in this, where were the forces to come from to do all this?—That I cannot tell: I speak no more than what I know.

Then you never saw any return of the men that could be brought into the field?—Never.

Where was the depot?—At Tidd's.

Was it in a corner-cupboard?—They were kept in a box under his window, the grenades; and as to the pike staves, they were put out of sight; where I do not know.

Did you see any cannon-ball anywhere?—No.

What were you to do with the cannon when you got them, do you know?—Yes; in the first place, they intended to put a cartridge into the cannon, and in the next place it was proposed to take a sledge hammer along with them, and knock off the iron railing to charge the cannon with, as it was conceived it would do greater damage than cannon ball; this was the proposition of Mr. Thistlewood.

You have not told us yet where the men were to come from?—I do not know, and what I do not know I will not answer to.

I think you named a person of the name of Edwards there continually, where is he now?—I do not know.

Have not you seen him to-day?—I have not seen Edwards since the 22nd.

VOL. XXXIII.

He was a very active man there generally?—I have seen him as active as the rest of them.

More active than the rest?—He seemed to be in more close communication with Harrison, Brunt, Thistlewood, and the rest of them.

You do not know where he is now?—I do not know, I never heard of him.

What newspaper was it you received the information of the dinner from?—The New Times.

Have you since learned whether it was true that there was to be a dinner there or not that day?—I have never made any inquiry, but I saw it in the paper myself.

You only know what the paper informed you?—No.

You have given a confused description of what passed in the hay-loft?—I do not know what loft it was.

It was over a stable?—Yes.

The unfortunate accident was to a man who said, "make way, let me come forward"?—Yes.

And you described an arm came forward with a sword in it?—I did not say a sword.

Were you pretty near at that time?—I was at the end of the room, under the bench, next to Cato-street.

How near was that arm to your own body?—I suppose it could not be above four or five feet off; I mean the arm that extended from the door.

Was not your own arm within sufficient reach to have done that mischief yourself?—It could not be, for I had not an instrument of any description in my hand.

Answer the question:—was not your own arm within sufficient reach to have done that mischief yourself?—I might have done it with a pistol, but not with a sword.

Then you were not sufficiently near?—I was not.

Do you recollect who put out the candle?—I do not know whether it was put out by the report of the pistol, or blown out intentionally.

You did not put it out?—I did not; at the report of the pistol the candle was out instantly.

Robert Adams re-examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You were at Cambray?—Yes.

Were you carrying on your trade there?—Yes.

Were the English soldiers there?—Yes.

Were you carrying on your trade among the English soldiers and officers at the time?—Yes.

Eleanor Walker called.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—It is quite impossible that we can finish to-night. That must be felt on all sides.

Mr. Attorney General.—Our attention has been directed to that, my lord; but then it becomes proper to consider the most convenient time, to break off for the night, so that we may have strength for another day.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Will you conclude now?

Mr. Attorney General.—This is the most detailed examination.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—It is quite clear we must have a third day, and therefore we need not exhaust ourselves the first day. Is there any preparation to accommodate the gentlemen of the jury?

Mr. Sheriff Rothwell.—There is, my lord.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Gentlemen of the jury, according to what we learn from the attorney-general, and the counsel for the defendant, it is impossible that you, or I, or any person concerned in this trial, should have strength to go through it without adjournment. Probably some of you have come from a distance; and as we must adjourn, probably you may think this as convenient a time as any other: proper care has been taken to provide for you.

Adjourned to to-morrow morning nine o'clock.

TUESDAY, 18th APRIL, 1820.

The Prisoner was set to the bar, the other persons indicted with him being placed behind.

Thistlewood.—My lord, will you have the goodness again to-day to indulge me with a seat?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Certainly.

Davidson.—If your lordship will be pleased to let me have a seat, I was very unwell last night, with standing so long?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—They may place two or three chairs there, and you may relieve one another.

Eleanor Walker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you servant to Henry Rogers?—Yes.

Where does he live?—At No. 4, Fox-court.

Is that in Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

Had you a lodger in your house of the name of Brunt?—Yes.

What rooms did he occupy?—Two. One was a large one, and one a small one.

On what floor?—The second floor.

Were they front or back rooms?—Front.

Both front?—Yes.

In the month of January last was there any two-pair stairs back room to let?—No, there was not to let; there was one occupied; a back room was occupied in January.

Did the person come in in January, or when did he come in, to the best of your remembrance?—In January.

Who introduced him to you?—Mr. Brunt.

As well as you can recollect, how long before Brunt was taken up?—A month or five weeks.

Brunt you say introduced him to you?—Yes.

Did Brunt tell you what he was?—No, he did not tell me what he was; he said he was lately come from the country, and he wanted a lodging, and he knew we had one to let, and he wished us to take him in.

Did you afterwards find out the name of that person?—No, I never heard the name.

At what was the lodging taken, how much a week?—Three shillings.

Was it furnished or unfurnished?—Unfurnished.

Did the person tell you any thing about furniture?—He said, perhaps he might not bring his goods in for a week or better.

Did he ever bring any furniture in?—No, not to my knowledge.

Should you know him again? the lodger?—No, I do not think I should.

And you do not recollect hearing him, called by his name?—No, I do not.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—What room was it that was taken?—The two-pair back room.

Mr. Gurney.—While this person occupied the room, did you see any persons go up and down stairs?—I have never seen them. I have heard people go up and down stairs, but not seen them.

Mary Rogers sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

We understand you live in Fox-court?—Yes.

And that Brunt lodged with you?—Yes.

Eleanor Walker is your niece and servant?—Yes.

Do you remember the circumstance of her letting the two pair of stairs back room?—While I was absent she did.

Did you ask any question of Brunt, your lodger, who it was that had taken your room?—I did, after he had been in my house about a week.

What did he say respecting him?—I said, "Mr. Brunt, you have brought in a lodger, I understand; I hope he is a good one." He says, "I hope he is, Mrs. Rogers; I have no doubt he will always pay you." I said, "I think it is very right I should know." "I know nothing more of the man," says he, "than the seeing him at a public-house, and that he was inquiring for a lodging; knowing you had one to let, I recommended the lodging."

Did he say what he was?—I asked him what he was; he said he was a butcher out of work.

Did he ever sleep there?—Not to my knowledge.

Did he ever bring any furniture in?—Never.

How many weeks did he pay you for?—Four or five, I could not swear which.

While he was there, did you observe any persons going up and down stairs?—I did once; one evening.

Was that when you were going to put your children to bed?—I was putting my children to bed.

How many did you observe going up?—Three; the middle of the three was a black man.

Were you upon the stairs as they went up?—No, I had a little room up the one pair; and as I came from my own door, the light from my room shone on their faces.

You were on the landing-place?—I was; I saw them go up.

At other times, have you observed whether any persons were going up and down stairs?—I have early in the day seen a strange man, but taken no notice who nor what they were.

Had you, in any parts of the day, observed persons going up and down stairs?—No: being so seldom at home, I had no opportunity.

Joseph Hale sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Are you apprentice to Brunt?—Yes.

How long have you served of your time?—Two years the 3rd of last February.

Have you lived with him in Fox-court?—Yes.

Do you remember any person taking the back room two pair of stairs in Fox-court in January?—I remember a person coming up there, but I do not know exactly what month it was.

Who was that person?—It was a butcher.

What was his name?—Ings.

Who looked at the room with him?—Brunt.

Brunt and he looked at the room together?—Yes, they did.

After they had looked at the room, or while they were looking at it, did you hear Brunt say any thing to Ings?—When they came out of the room I heard Brunt say to Ings, "It will do, go down and give them a shilling."

Brunt said that to Ings?—Yes, he did.

After that time did Ings use to come to the room?—Yes.

Who kept the key of the room?—The key of the room was mostly left in Brunt's room.

Then when Ings wanted to go into the room, what did he do?—He used to come to Brunt's room for the key.

From that time till your master was taken up, did there use to be any number of persons coming to that room?—Yes.

Was that seldom or frequent?—Every evening.

Whom have you seen come to these meetings every evening?—Different persons.

Can you give me an enumeration of their names?—Yes.

Who were they?—Ings, Tidd, Thistlewood, Bradburn, Edwards, Hall, Potter, Strange.

Do you remember a man of the name of Adams?—Yes.

Did he come?—Yes.

Do you recollect any black man, or man of colour?—Yes.

What was his name?—Davidson.

Did he come?—Yes.

Do you remember whether there were more than those you have named?—I remember more used to come, but I do not know their names.

How long in the evening did they use generally to stay?—Nearly about two hours in general.

Was there any furniture in the room?—None that ever I saw.

What did they do for seats?—They used to take chairs in, out of Brunt's room, to sit on.

Did you hear them talking, occasionally, and speaking to each other?—No.

Did you ever hear them call Thistlewood by any name?—Yes; they used to call him sometimes T. and sometimes Arthur.

Do you remember any day seeing the door open, and observing any thing in the room?—Yes.

What did you see?—I saw some long poles.

What were they like?—They were like branches of trees.

Cut rough from the tree?—Yes.

How many do you think?—I suppose about twenty.

Did you at any time hear any work going on in the room?—Yes.

What kind of work?—I have heard hammering and sawing.

Your master was taken up on Thursday, the 24th of February, was he not?—Yes, he was.

On the Sunday morning before that (that would be the 20th) was there any meeting in that room?—In the morning.

Was that a meeting of the usual number, or a smaller, or a larger number than usual?—There were more that morning than ever I had seen come up before.

Were the persons whom you have named to me all there?—Yes.

After the meeting had broken up, did you see any person in your master's room with him?—In my master's own room there was one.

Who was that?—Strange.

He had been at the meeting you have told me?—Yes, he was.

Was there any meeting on the Monday evening?—Yes.

On the Tuesday evening was there any meeting?—Yes.

On the Wednesday, do you remember any number of persons coming?—There were several persons in and out in the course of the day.

Did any of them come into your work-shop?—Yes.

That was one of the front rooms?—Yes.

Did they do any thing there?—Yes.

What?—They had got some pistols, and were putting new flints into them.

How many pistols do you think you saw?—Five or six.

Did they finish flinting the pistols there?—No.

What stopped them?—One of the men said that there were people overlooking them, and Brunt told them to go into the back room.

Overlooking them from the opposite house ?
—Yes.

Who were the persons who were so putting in the flints ?—Strange, and a man whom I did not know.

Did they then go into the back room ?—Yes.

In the course of that afternoon, how many persons do you remember seeing in that back room, or going in and out of it ?—I cannot say, but I saw several in the course of that day.

Did you see Thistlewood there ?—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—On the Wednesday ?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—In the course of the afternoon, did he ask you for any thing ?—Yes.

What did he ask you for ?—A piece of writing paper.

Did you give him a sheet of writing paper ?
—Yes, I did.

To what place did he take it ?—I believe into the back room.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You gave it him in your master's room ?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—After that, did any person come out of the back room and give you any order to fetch any thing ?—Yes.

Who was that ?—My master, Brunt.

What did he desire you to get ?—Six sheets of cartridge paper.

What money did he give you ?—Sixpence.

Did you go and buy it ?—Yes.

To whom did you give it ?—My master.

Where did he take it to ?—He took it into the back room.

About what time, as well as you remember, in the afternoon was that ?—Between four and five.

At about what time did the persons who were in that back-room go away ?—The last that went away, about eight in the evening.

Did any of them go away about five or six ?
—I believe they did : I heard people go down stairs.

You were in your work-shop ?—Yes.

Did your master go out ?—He was in and out several times in the course of the day.

What time did he go away finally ?—About six.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You did not see him after six ?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—He went away, as you thought, about six ?—Yes.

Was he alone, or was there any person with him ?—There was a man with him.

Do you know that man ?—I do not know whether I should know that man again.

Was that one of the men you had been used to see there ?—No.

Had any table from your mistress's room been taken into the back-room ?—Yes.

On that day ?—Yes.

When your mistress was going to drink tea, did you want that table ?—Yes.

What did you do to get it ?—I went to the back room for it.

Did you go in, or knock at the door ?—I knocked at the door.

Who opened it ?—A man by the name of Potter.

Did you ask for the table ? and did he give it you ?—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You did not go in ?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—By the opening of the door, were you enabled to see whether there were any persons in the room besides Potter ?—Yes.

How many do you think there were ?—About four or five.

After your master was gone, did you see Tidd ?—Yes.

At about what time ?—Between seven and eight, nearly eight.

Into which room did he come ?—Mrs. Brunt called him, and he came into her room.

What did she then do ?—She took him to the cupboard, and shewed him a pike head and a sword.

This was in your master's room ?—Yes.

What passed about them ?—Mrs. Brunt asked him what she could do with them.

What did he do with them ?—Mrs. Brunt gave them to him, and he took them out of the room, I believe, into the back-room.

After that time, did you hear any persons go down stairs ?—Yes.

Did any person come into Mrs. Brunt's room ?—Yes.

Did he leave any message ?—Yes.

What was it ?—He said, if any person came up after any one, he was to be sent to the White Hart.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—Whose direction was that ?

Mr. Gurney.—He does not know the person, my lord. Did any persons come shortly after, and inquire for your master ?—Yes.

Were they sent to the White Hart ?—Yes.

Did you go and show them the way ?—Yes.

Did any person come whose name you have mentioned ?—In the course of the evening.

Did Potter come ?—Yes.

Did you send him to the White Hart ?—Yes.

Did you go and show him the way ?—No, he knew the way.

How many were those you had gone to show to the White Hart ?—Three.

Was Potter alone, or were there any persons with Potter ?—There were some persons with him.

Did your master come home that night ?—Yes.

At about what time ?—At about nine o'clock.

Did you observe any difference in his dress from what it was when he went out ?—It was dirtier.

Did he appear composed or otherwise ?—No.

In what state did he appear to be ?—He seemed confused.

Did you hear him say anything to his wife of what had happened?—I heard him say to his wife it was all up, or words to that effect.

What else did he say?—He said that where he had been a great many officers had come in. Any thing else?—Just as he spoke these words a man came in.

Did he say any thing about himself before the man came in?—He said he had saved his life, and that was all.

You say, just as he had said that, another man came in?—Yes.

Do you know the name of that man?—No.

What did Brunt say to him upon his coming in?—He shook hands with him, and asked him, when he came in, if he knew who had informed.

What answer did the man give?—He said, "No."

Did the man say whether any thing had happened to him?—Yes; he said he had a dreadful blow on the side, and was knocked down.

Did Brunt say any thing more?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said, "there is something to be done yet."

After that, what did he and the other man do?—They went away together.

After they were gone, did you and Mrs. Brunt do any thing?—Yes.

What did you do?—We went into Ings's room.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—That was the back room?

Mr. Gwary.—What did you see there?—I saw several things in the cupboard.

Were the twenty poles there which you had before seen?—Only one.

In the cupboard you saw what?—I saw several rolls of brown paper with tar in them.

Any paper twisted up?—Yes.

What paper was that?—A piece of cartridge paper.

Did you see any thing with strings?—Yes.

How were the strings?—They were rolled round them.

How large were they?—About as big as two fists.

What do you understand them to be?—I have heard since they are hand-grenades.

Did you see any iron pot?—Yes.

Had you seen that before?—Yes.

Who had it?—Brunt had it.

Had he had it long, or was it a new purchase?—He had had it some time.

Weeks or months?—Some time before, I cannot say how long; he used to use it himself in his own room.

At about what time did your master come home again?—On the Wednesday evening about eleven o'clock.

Did he give you any directions before he went to bed?—Yes.

What?—He told me to get up in the morning as soon as I could, and to clean his boots.

In what condition were they?—They were very dirty.

The next morning did you get up early?—He called me about half past six.

What did he say to you?—He asked me if I knew the Borough. I told him, yes.

Did he ask you as to any particular part of the Borough?—He asked me if I knew Snow's-fields, I told him no.

After this, did he and you go into the back room?—Yes.

What directions did he give you?—He told me to bring a basket in out of his room and put in the things out of the cupboard.

Did you and he put any things into the basket?—Yes.

Was there one basket or two?—Two baskets.

Were the things out of the cupboard put into those baskets?—Yes, they were.

Did he tell you who lived at Snow's-fields that they were going to?—Yes.

Who?—Petter.

After the things were put into the baskets, were either of the baskets put into any thing else?—One of them was.

What was that?—One of them was tied in a blue apron.

They were rush baskets?—Yes.

Whose blue apron was that?—Mrs. Brunt's.

What use had been made of that blue apron before?—It had been put up as a curtain in Ings's room.

Was the other basket tied in any thing?—No.

Did any thing happen directly after this?—Yes.

What?—We went into Brunt's room to look for something to tie the other basket in, and two officers came up.

Did they take your master into custody?—Yes.

Did they search the room and take the baskets?—Yes.

Among the persons you have spoken of, where did Tidd live?—In the Hole-in-the-wall-passage, Brook's-market.

Where did Adams live?—Next door to Tidd.

You have been at the lodgings of both?—Yes.

Joseph Hale cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Brunt was your master?—Yes.

Was he a master shoe-maker or a journeyman?—A journeyman.

In very poor circumstances?—No.

Had he any journeymen with him or under him?—No.

You and he did all the work he had to do?—Yes.

What was Tidd?—A shoe-maker.

Living very near you?—Yes.

How many children had your master?—One.

Had Tidd a wife and children?—He had a wife; I believe he had children.

Was he a poor man?—I do not know.

What was Mr. Adams?—A shoe-maker.

He was a shoe-maker too?—Yes, he was.

You have mentioned those meetings that took place from night to night; how many nights do you think they came there?—I cannot say how many nights.

I do not mean that you should be upon your oath to the number, but how many, as nearly as you can state confidently?—He had come nearly five weeks.

Ings had the lodgings nearly five weeks?—Yes.

Do you mean that there were meetings every night during that time?—I believe there were.

What number were there?—I cannot say, but the most I ever knew of were the Sunday morning.

That was not the time you went in?—No.

How many were there then?—I cannot say how many exactly, I think there were about twenty.

You think there were as many as that?—Yes.

Did you see them as they went up or together?—I saw them as they went up.

Did you know any of the other persons you have named, who, and in what situations they were?—Yes, I knew some of them.

Who were they?—Strange.

What was he?—He was in a boot-maker's shop.

Making or selling?—Selling in the shop.

What were the others?—I do not know any of the rest.

You have talked of one Mr. Edwards, was he there pretty often?—Yes, he was very often.

What was he?—I believe, an artist.

What do you mean by an artist?—Makes figures.

What, in the Crown's description is called a modeller?—Yes.

Do you know any thing more of him?—No.

He was there pretty constantly?—Yes.

Was he or Adams there the oftenest?—Edwards was there the oftenest.

How often do you think Adams was there, to your knowledge, in the whole?—I cannot say how often; he used very often to come upon business.

But to that room of Ings's?—I cannot say how often.

Edwards was there daily almost, I suppose?—He used to come almost every day.

What was Hall, do you know?—A tailor. I believe.

Where did he live?—I do not know.

A journeyman?—I believe he was.

All persons of like rank in life?—Yes.

How many persons do you think were there at any one time on the Wednesday?—I cannot say.

You spoke of nine being there, do you know of more being there at one time?—Not that I know of.

Were the rush baskets you have spoken of common rush baskets, such as people take to buy little things in and bring them back?—Yes.

And the whole materials you found there were packed into those rush baskets?—Yes.

Did they fill them, or did they lap over?—They filled them.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—They intend to produce them I understand.

Mr. Adolphus.—Yes, so I understand, my lord. However these two rush baskets contained them all, and one of them was covered with a lady's apron?—Yes.

You spoke of twenty branches of trees, are you sure you saw as many as twenty? We say currently twenty, might not there be only ten, or a dozen, or fifteen?—There were as nearly as I can guess about twenty.

You say they were branches of trees in a green raw state?—Yes.

You do not know how they came there; you did not see them brought in?—No.

There was only one left on the morning of the Wednesday?—No.

Did they keep a fire in the room?—I believe they did.

We know what a winter we have had; you went one evening to get out the table, was there a fire there then?—Yes.

There was a pot which had been used there?—Yes.

Whether those poles were used to light the fire or not, you cannot tell; but there was one left?—Yes, there was.

Thomas Smart sworn.

Mr. Adolphus.—That is your only name, is it?—Yes.

Mr. Adolphus.—He was called first by the name of John by my learned friend.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Your question is very natural after that certainly.

Thomas Smart examined by Mr. Littledale.

You are watchman in the parish of Saint George, Hanover-square?—Yes.

Do you recollect being on the watch on the 22nd of February last?—Yes.

Where do you watch?—On the south side of Grosvenor-square; my box nearly faces lord Harrowby's.

At what time in the evening did you go on your watch?—We go on at eight o'clock at that time of the year.

Do you recollect, soon after you went on the watch, any thing particular attracting your attention?—I saw four very suspicious men walking about the square; I thought they were after no good; two tall and two short, one was a black man or almost black.

What time was that?—Half-past eight; after I had called half-past eight; I thought they were very suspicious characters, and I looked at them.

Should you know them again?—I think I should not.

Did you watch them?—I did take particular notice of them; they walked very upright, and carried a stick; they were looking down the areas, and taking notice of the areas.

Was Charles Bissix a watchman on the watch?—Bissix is a watchman at the other corner; we join every half hour at the corner of South Audley-street.

Thomas Smart cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

It is no uncommon thing for you, as a watchman, to see people whom you think suspicious?—Very common.

Henry Gillan sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

Where do you live?—At 15, Mount-street, Grosvenor-square.

What are you?—Servant to Mr. Whittle, apothecary.

Do you ever use the Rising Sun public-house, in Charles-street?—Yes.

Where is Charles-street?—It runs into Grosvenor-square, and into Mount-street.

Is it in the street, or at the corner of the street?—At the corner of the Mews.

Do you remember being there on Tuesday night?—Yes.

What night was that?—The 22nd of February.

Did you see either of the prisoners there?—Yes, that short man with a brown coat on.

Mr. Bolland.—That is Brunt, my lord. Was he alone, or in company with any other person?—There was a tall man along with him.

Did they take any refreshment?—Yes, some bread and cheese, and some porter.

Did you play with them at any game?—Yes, the dominos lay on the table, and that man challenged me to play a game at dominos with him.

Did you play with him?—Yes, two games I played with him.

Did you leave the house first or they?—I did.

What time did you go away?—A little before ten.

Leaving them there?—Yes.

John Hector Morison sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are a journeyman cutler to Mr. Underwood, in Drury-lane?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Is it in Drury-lane, or in some court there?—In Drury-lane.

Mr. Attorney General.—Do you remember at any time about Christmas last, any man bringing you a sword?—Yes, on Christmas-eve.

He brought that to your master's shop?—Yes, he did; I was in the shop.

What was the man's appearance?—He was habited like a butcher.

For what purpose did he bring this sword into your master's shop?—He inquired of me if I ground swords, I said yes; he produced one from underneath his smock frock, without a scabbard.

Having produced it, did he leave it with you for the purpose of being ground?—Yes, he left it for the purpose of being ground and set, particularly at the point.

Did you ask him, or did he give you his name, at that time?—It is customary for us to ask the name of the person who leaves an article, and he said, put the name of Eames, as I understood, but I am rather hard of hearing, and it might be the name of Ings.

Did you grind it?—Yes.

Did he call for it again?—Yes, in about three days.

Did you see that person again?—He called about a fortnight after, with another sword.

What sort of a sword was that?—A very long one, much longer than the other, a sort of cavalry sword.

What did he bring that for?—He said, he wanted that ground in the same manner as the last. I did not inquire his name at that time, knowing him again.

Was that ground for him?—Yes.

Should you know that man again?—Yes.

Look and see whether he is there?—Yes, he is the person at the bar behind the first one, at the left hand side [pointing out Ings].

Do you think you should know the swords again?—Yes; there is only one I have seen, that is the same.

Mr. Attorney General.—By and by, my lord, we will shew it to the witness; we will not interrupt the case now. Was that shewn you by one of the Bow-street officers?—Yes; that was the one left at Christmas.

Edward Simpson sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.

Are you corporal major of the second regiment of Life-guards?—Yes.

Do you know a person of the name of Harrison?—Yes.

Was he in that regiment?—Yes, he was.

Is Harrison at the bar?—Yes, John Harrison [pointing him out].

When was he discharged from the life-guards?—In 1815, I believe.

Was it in 1815, or later?—In 1814, I believe.

That is six years ago?—Yes.

At that time he was in the regiment, was he in the King-street-barracks with you?—Yes, he was.

By being there, had he the opportunity of knowing the barracks?—Yes.

I believe one side of the barracks looks into Gloucester-mews, or did?—There were windows on that side.

Was there a window next Gloucester-mews from any loft of the barracks?—Yes, there were five windows.

In those lofts what was kept?—Hay and straw.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Were all those five windows in the loft, or only one of them?—Five windows in the loft.

Mr. Attorney General.—At the time Harrison was in the barracks, have you ever seen him in those lofts?—Yes, frequently.

You say the windows are now stopped up; when were they stopped up?—It was some days after the affair happened at Cato-street.

At the time of the affair in Cato-street those windows were in the loft?—Yes.

Edward Simpson cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

How many men are there in the barracks in King-street?—It is not a barrack for men, it is for horses only.

How many men are there in the barracks at Kensington?—I really cannot say the number.

I thought you might know as a soldier?—Nearly 300 I should suppose.

How many foot guards are there usually in town?—That I do not know.

Are there a thousand?—upon my word I cannot say.

You may know pretty nearly the number?—To say that exactly I cannot.

Do you know any thing of a man of the name of Adams?—No, I do not.

There are usually 300 men in the Knights-bridge barracks, you say?—Yes, I should think about that.

James Aldous sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

You are a pawnbroker in Berwick-street?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner Davidson, the black man?—Yes.

Do you know him from his having pledged things at your shop?—Yes.

Do you remember, on the 23rd of February last, his coming to your shop to take any thing out of pledge?—I do.

What was it that he wanted then out of pledge?—A blunderbuss.

Did he have it out?—Yes, he did.

Was that in the forenoon?—In the morning.

What kind of a blunderbuss was it?—Brass-barrelled.

Was it a large blunderbuss or a small one?—About this length (eighteen or twenty inches).

Thomas Hiden sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you a cow keeper?—I am not now.

Were you a cow keeper?—I have been.

Mr. Adolphus.—How do you spell your name?—H, i, d, e, n.

What were you in February last?—I sold milk. I kept a cow at that time.

Mr. Gurney.—Were you formerly a member of a shoe-maker's club?—I was.

At that club, have you met a man of the name of Wilson?—I have,

Mr. Gurney.—Let Wilson stand forward (Wilson stood forward.) A few days before the 23d of February last, did you see Wilson?—Yes, I did.

Do you mean Wilson the man at the bar?—I do.

Did he make any proposition to you?—He did.

What was that proposition?—He met me in the street as I was walking, and asked me if I would be one of a party to come forward to destroy his majesty's ministers.

Did he say where they were to be destroyed?—He did not: he said at a cabinet dinner; that they were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and all things were ready.

Did he say what sort of things they had got ready?—He said, they had some such things as I never saw, which he called by the name of hand-grenades.

What more did he say?—He said they depended upon me to be made one.

Did he mention the name of any of his associates?—He said Mr. Thistlewood would be glad to see me, if I would make one.

Did he say what use was to be made of the hand-grenades?—He told me they were obliged to be lit with fuses, and to be put in under the table.

What then?—And all that escaped the explosion was to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon.

Did he say any thing about fires?—He said they meant to light up some fires, and by so doing it would keep the town in a state of confusion for some days, and it would become a general thing.

Did he explain what he meant by lighting fires? What was to be fired?—He nominated some houses.

What places do you remember that he mentioned?—I remember lord Harrowby's to be one; lord Castlereagh's another; the duke of Wellington's—

Mr. Curwood.—Do you mean houses or persons?—I mean houses.

Mr. Gurney.—Were there any other buildings mentioned?—Lord Sidmouth's, and the bishop of London's, and some other that I do not remember. I heard those mentioned.

Do you remember any other buildings that he mentioned?—I do not.

Did you acquiesce, or what did you do?—I told him I should make one.

How many days, to the best of your recollection, was this before the discovery at Cato-street?—I believe four or five days before.

Before that, did you go to lord Harrowby's?—Yes, I did.

On what day did you go?—I am not quite certain.

Was that before the day on which the discovery was made at Cato-street?—It was.

Did you follow his lordship to the park?—I did.

Did you give him any information of what had been communicated to you?—I gave him a note with information.

On Wednesday the 23rd did you see Wilson again?—I did.

At about what time of the day?—I believe it was between four and five o'clock in the afternoon.

Where did you meet with him?—In Manchester-street, as I was going home.

By Manchester-square?—Yes.

You were going with some milk?—No, I was going home with one of my little girls in my hand.

What did he say?—He called me by the name of Hiden, and said I was the very man he wanted to see. I asked him what there was going to be, and he said there was going to be a cabinet dinner that night at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square.

Did he tell you where you were to come to?—I asked him where I was to meet them, and he told me I was to go up to Cato-street, to the public-house by the sign of the Horse and Groom, and there I was to go in; it is the corner of Cato-street; or otherwise I was to stop at the corner, till I was shoved into a stable close by.

Did you make any inquiries of him, as to their numbers?—I asked him what time I should meet them, and he said by a quarter before six, or six, I was to be there.

Did you ask him as to how many there were in it?—I asked him how many there were to be there, and he said about twenty or thirty.

Did he tell you whether there were to be any others in other places?—I asked him whether there were going to be any others in other places, and he said there was to be another party in the Borough, another in Gray's-inn-lane, one in Gee's-court, or otherwise in the city, I cannot be certain which.

Did he say any thing about Gee's-court, particularly?—He said that all Gee's-court were in it, but they would not act unless the English were in it.

What did he say about Gee's-court?—He said they were all in it, but would not act unless the English began it, for they had been deceived so often.

Did he inform you what people live in Gee's-court?—I understood they were Irish.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Do you know where Gee's-court is?—Yes, it goes out of Oxford-street, one end of it goes into Oxford-street and another end of it into Edward-street, or some street there: I know the part perfectly well.

Mr. Gurney.—Is it near the market?—Opposite St. George's market, the other side.

What did he say?—He told me not to be long; he said to me the first time, there was a gentleman's servant who had been supporting some of the party with some quantity of money; and if they would act upon the subject, he would give them a good deal more.

Did he mention any thing about any arms, any fire arms?—He said they had some arms; he asked me whether I had got a gun; I said yes, I had, but it was a rubbishing one.

Did he say any thing more about it?—I told him the lock of my gun was at the gunmakers to repair; he said they would provide me with a gun and something to work it with.

Did he tell you any thing about cannon?—He said there were two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, that they could get at very easily, by breaking in some small doors.

Did he mention any place in the city, at which they were to meet in the course of the night?—He said there were four pieces of cannon at some artillery ground, which they could easily get by killing a centinel.

After getting them, did he say where they should go to?—He said, that after doing the grand thing in Grosvenor-square, they were to retreat and meet somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house.

Did you and he then part?—He told me, I was to be sure to come to my time, or else if I was late, the grand thing would be done before I came.

Did you go to John-street that evening?—I did.

At what time?—I think nearly seven o'clock. I believe the entrance to Cato-street from John-street is under a little gateway at the corner of the Horse and Groom?—It is; the Horse and Groom is the corner house that joins Cato-street and John-street.

When you got to this gateway whom did you see?—I saw Wilson and Davidson.

By Davidson do you mean the black man?—The man of colour.

Is that the man at the bar?—It is.

You had seen him before, I believe?—Repeatedly.

Did Davidson speak to you?—He did.

What did he do?—He said, I was behind my time; I said yes, we served a family with milk, and I was obligated to go there first.

Did he ask you to do any thing?—He asked me if I would go in; I said I could not go in, for I was going for some cream; he said if I would go in Mr. Thistlewood was there.

You say you had known him before?—Yes, I had.

Had he ever mentioned Thistlewood's name to you before?—He had, several times, as he had called upon me, and I had seen him with two or three more friends.

You say Davidson asked you to go in, and you said you had something else to do; did he mention any thing about time?—I told him I must go and get the cream, and he told me I must take care to come to my time, if I could. I asked him what time they should leave there; he said about eight o'clock.

Did he tell you what to do if you should come after your time?—He told me if I was not there at the time they left Cato-street, I was to follow them down to Grosvenor-square, and the fourth house from the corner of Grosvenor-square there I should find them.

Did he mention on which side of the square?
—The bottom part of the square, the further side of the square, the bottom side next Charles-street.

Thomas Hiden cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

How many days before the 23rd of February was it that you first saw Wilson?—I saw him a long time before; seven or eight months.

How long before that had you this first conversation with him?—Four or five days.

Was that before the Sunday preceding that Wednesday on which this happened?—I am not certain of that.

Was that on the Sunday?—I cannot say; I am not certain; it was four or five days before.

Nothing depends upon it more than your endeavouring to fix the time; do you think it was before or after that?—I am not able to think; I am not certain.

You saw nothing further of him before the Sunday? You never conversed with him again till the 23rd?—No.

You never went by his invitation, nor saw any other person?—No, I did not.

You went very properly, very commendably, and gave information, such as you had, at lord Harrowby's house?—I did.

You did not see his lordship there, but followed his lordship, and communicated it to him?—Yes.

What day was that?—I am not able to say.

The 23rd was Wednesday; was it the Saturday, Sunday, or Monday, or Tuesday?—I do not know what day it was; I cannot state that exactly.

How long before you saw Wilson again in Manchester-street, Manchester-square, had you been at lord Harrowby's?—I had been at his lordship's house after the time that I saw him and had the conversation; between the time I saw him first, and the day I saw him in Manchester-street.

How many days before?—A day or two.

It might be as early as the Monday?—It might be a day or two before, but I cannot speak precisely to that.

All his communication was made to you, as you stood in the street?—The last communication was, as we walked up and down Manchester-street, and towards the barracks in King-street.

How long might you be occupied in that conversation?—Probably from half an hour to three quarters of an hour.

Between four and five o'clock were you out with your milk?—No, I was not.

Afterwards, when you got to Cato-street, you told them you must go and get cream, find it where you could; and they let you go?—Yes.

And you went?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—Will your lordship permit me to ask a question? Is that the letter you gave to lord Harrowby? [showing it to the witness.]
—Yes, it is.

It is addressed to lord Castlereagh?—Yes.

Mr. Adolphus.—How came you to direct your attention to lord Harrowby?—I could not see lord Castlereagh.

You had called?—I had not called, but had walked before the house.

And not seeing him, you went to lord Harrowby's?—Yes.

Foreman of the Jury.—Is that your own hand-writing?—Yes, it is.

Mr. Adolphus.—You have used the phrase his majesty's ministers: was that the phrase that was used by Wilson and you in conversation?—It was, to destroy his majesty's ministers.

That was the very word that was used?—Yes.

The Earl of Harrowby sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe your lordship resides in Grosvenor-square?—Yes.

On the South side near Charles-street?—A few doors from Charles-street, next door to the Archbishop of York.

I believe you are a privy councillor, and one of his majesty's ministers?—I am.

Your lordship is President of the Council, and one of the cabinet?—I am.

Do you remember in the month of February last intending to give a cabinet dinner?—Yes.

On what day was that dinner intended to have been given?—I think it was on Wednesday, the 23rd of February.

By a cabinet dinner, it is meant that the cabinet ministers alone meet at dinner?—At the cabinet dinners no persons but those who compose what is called the cabinet are invited, consisting of the principal officers.

Does your lordship recollect how many days before the 23rd of February, the cards of invitation were issued to the different ministers?—My servant may be able to speak to that more correctly than I can. I believe the invitations went out the latter end of the preceding week.

Will your lordship be good enough to enumerate the names of those noblemen and gentlemen who composed the cabinet, and who were invited upon that occasion?—My lord chancellor, the earl of Liverpool first lord of the Treasury, Mr. Vansittart chancellor of the Exchequer, the earl Bathurst, lord Sidmouth, lord Castlereagh.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—What office does earl Bathurst hold?—Secretary of State for the Colonial Department; lord Castlereagh secretary of state for the Foreign Department, lord Sidmouth secretary of state for the Home Department, the earl of Westmoreland lord Privy Seal, lord Melville first lord of the Admiralty, the duke of Wellington master general of the Ordnance, Mr. Canning first commissioner of the India Board, Mr. Robinson president of the Board of Trade, Mr. Bathurst chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the Mint, and the earl of Mulgrave.

Mr. Attorney General.—I would ask your lordship whether all those noblemen and gentlemen you have enumerated are privy councillors?—They are.

Are they employed by his majesty in the administration of the government?—They are employed in the different offices I have enumerated, and also from what is called the cabinet council.

Are they called his majesty's ministers?—In common parlance they are.

Do you remember, my lord, any day preceding that dinner, your lordship riding towards the park?—On the Tuesday.

The dinner being intended for the Wednesday?—Yes; on the Tuesday preceding that, I was riding in the park, without a servant; I think it might be before two o'clock; I was afterwards going to a council to be held at Carlton-palace.

Relate what occurred?—As I came near Grosvenor-gate, a person came up to me, and asked me if I was lord Harrowby; I said I was; he then told me that he wished much that a letter should be communicated to lord Castlereagh, which was of considerable importance, both to his lordship and to myself; that he was himself afraid of appearing—

Mr. Adolphus.—I beg your lordship's pardon, I apprehend this is not evidence.

Mr. Attorney General.—Did he give your lordship a letter upon that occasion?—He did.

Is that the letter? [handing it to his lordship.]—This is the letter he delivered to me, I have no doubt of it.

Did you afterwards give that letter to my lord Castlereagh, or send it to him?—When I came to Carlton-palace, I found lord Castlereagh was not there, and I forwarded it to him.

The man left you?—After some further conversation I asked the man, who had expressed his wish to have some further conversation with me, whether he had put his name and address to that letter; he told me he had not; I then said,

Did he in fact give you a card with his address?—He did.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Do you produce the card?—I had the card; I am not certain that I have it now; yes, this is it, [producing it.]

Mr. Attorney General.—Your lordship saw the last witness before he retired?—Yes, that was the man, his name was Hiden.

Did your lordship afterwards see that man again?—Yes, I did.

When did you see him again?—I saw him again, by appointment, on Wednesday morning, among the young plantations in the ring in Hyde-park.

I must not ask your lordship what conversation took place between you and him upon that occasion, but I would ask whether the dinner really took place at your lordship's house on the Wednesday?—The dinner did not take place.

That is, the noblemen and gentlemen did not come to your house to dinner; but were the preparations postponed, or did they go on the same as if the dinner was to take place?—

All the preparations went on as if the dinner was to take place, until I wrote a note from the earl of Liverpool's to my head servant, to say that they would not dine there.

At what hour was that?—I think between seven and eight; but my servant can speak to that better than I can.

Then the preparations went on till that time?—Yes, I should imagine till nearly eight o'clock; till that note was received.

At about what hour would the party have assembled if the dinner had taken place?—Between seven and half past seven.

The Earl of Harrowby cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

Will your lordship permit me to ask whether you had any knowledge of the matter previous to that communicated by that witness?—A previous general knowledge.

I believe there was a man of the name of Edwards had given information; does your lordship know a man of the name of Edwards?—No, I do not.

Your lordship had never seen him?—No, never.

How long previous to that had your lordship known of this?—I cannot say precisely.

A fortnight or a month?—I hardly know to what the question points: if you refer to a general knowledge of some plan being intended, we had had for some time reason to suspect such an intention, the precise period I cannot fix.

I do not ask to precise period, but as nearly as your lordship can fix it; a fortnight, or three weeks or a month?—I should say longer,

Two months?—I cannot say whether two months, but for some time we had had reason to suspect that some intention of a similar nature existed.

John Baker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are butler to lord Harrowby?—I am.

Do you remember a cabinet dinner being intended to be had at his house in the month of February last?—Yes.

On the 23rd I believe?—It was.

Do you know whether, in consequence of the late king's death, those dinners had been suspended for some time?—Yes, they had.

Do you recollect how long before the 23rd of February cards had been issued for the ministers?—Either the 18th or the 19th, I am not quite certain which; I think Saturday the 19th.

On the Wednesday when the dinner was to be had, were the preparations made for the dinner as usual?—Yes.

At what time did you first receive intimation that his majesty's ministers would not dine there that day?—About eight, or it might be ten minutes after eight.

Who lives next to lord Harrowby? does the Archbishop of York?—The Archbishop of York on one side.

Do you know whether his grace had a dinner that day? did you observe carriages there?—I observed carriages there.

About what hour?—About six or seven o'clock.

John Monument sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

What are you by trade?—A shoe-maker.

Where have you lately lived?—In Garden-court, Baldwin's-gardens.

Is that near Brook's-market?—It is.

You are now, I believe, a prisoner in the Tower?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner at the bar, Thistlewood?—Yes.

Do you remember meeting him at a person's of the name of Ford?—Yes.

How long is that ago?—It was a few days before the meeting in Finsbury-market.

Tell me, as nearly as you can tell, how far back?—From this time?

How long back before the 23rd of February?

Mr. Adolphus.—I have no objection to your giving the date of the Finsbury-meeting.

Mr. Solicitor General.—I do not know it.

Witness.—It might be about two months before the 23rd of February.

Did you see him again after that?—Yes, he called in about a fortnight or three weeks after that meeting.

Did he call alone, or was any person along with him?—The prisoner Brunt was along with him.

Tell us what Thistlewood said to you, when he called at your lodgings?—He said directly he came in (he had not been there above a minute or two) that he wished to speak to me privately, and I went outside the door with him; I am not certain that he used the word privately, but he wished to speak to me.

Was any other person in the room?—My brother and my mother.

Did you, in consequence of that intimation from Thistlewood, go out of the room with him?—Yes.

Did Brunt go with you or stay behind?—He staid behind.

Tell us what Thistlewood told you when you were out of the room.—Yes, as nearly as I can recollect. I think the first words he made use of were, "Great events are at hand, the people are every where anxious for a change." He said, he had been promised support by a great many men who had deceived him, but now he had got men who would stand by him; he then asked me whether I had any arms; I said no, I had not; he said every one ought to be armed now; he said all of them had got every one something; some had got a sabre, some had got a pike, and some a pistol.

Who were all of them?—I understood those men that belonged to him.

Those men to whom he had before alluded as standing by him?—Yes; he said I might buy a pistol for four or five shillings; I told him I had no money to buy pistols; I was too poor to do any thing of the kind; he then said he would see what could be done.

Was that all that passed with him at that interview?—Yes, all that I recollect.

Did Brunt call upon you again after that?—Yes.

How soon afterwards?—I suppose two or three days.

Did any thing material pass in conversation between you and Brunt at the time he so called the second time?—I do not recollect that there was; he said he was rather in a hurry; he had got several more people in our trade to call upon, and he had got two or three men waiting for him down stairs.

Do you remember Brunt calling upon you on Tuesday, the 22nd of February?—Yes, I do.

Was that the first time he had called after the last interview with him, to which you have just spoken?—Yes, I am pretty sure it was.

You do not recollect any previous call?—No, it was a long while between the two.

Was he alone, or accompanied by any person?—He was accompanied by the prisoner Tidd.

What conversation passed between you and Brunt at that meeting? Was any thing said why he had not called?—Yes, that was the first thing—I said I thought I had lost him, and asked him the reason that he staid away so long; and he said, the reason was, that the king's death had made an alteration in their plans necessary; then I asked him what plans they were; he said that I should know at the meeting that was to be the night after, better than he could tell me.

This was on the Tuesday?—Yes.

Did he say any thing as to where that meeting was to be?—Yes; I asked him where, he said Tyburn-turnpike.

Did he tell you any thing about what was to be said or done at Tyburn-turnpike?—No; I asked him how I was to know, by seeing the people about, who they were; and he turned round to Tidd, and asked him whether he should tell me the word.

What answer did Tidd make?—Yes, he said he supposed there was no danger.

Upon that what did Brunt say?—He said if I saw any people about, I was to go to them and say, b, u, t, and if they were friends they would answer t, o, n.

Did you agree to go?—He did not ask me positively whether I would go.

Was any thing more said at that meeting?—No; he said he should call on the following morning, and tell me more particulars.

Did they then leave you?—Yes.

The next day did Brunt call again?—Yes.

That was the Wednesday?—Yes.

At what time?—Between four and five o'clock in the afternoon.

Was he alone?—Yes.

Tell us what he said to you when he called on you alone?—He called me down stairs, and asked me whether I was ready to go with him; I said no, I had got some work to finish, that must be done before I could go.

When he called you down stairs, was any body in the room out of which he called you?—Yes, my brother.

When you said you were not ready, what did he say?—He said I ought to go with him; I told him that I could not go till the work was done; he asked me how long that would be; I told him not before six o'clock.

Upon your telling him that, what did he desire you to do?—He told me he could not wait for me, but I must go to the person whom he brought with him the day before, whose name he said was Tidd, he told me where he lived in the Hole-in-the-wall passage, Brook's Market.

Did he at that time tell you any thing more as to the plan?—No, nothing.

Did he go away upon having told you this?—Yes; after telling me not to be a minute after six o'clock when I went to Tidd's, for that Tidd had got some more men that he was to take with him to the meeting.

In consequence of this did you go to Tidd's house in the course of that afternoon?—In the course of the evening, about half-past six o'clock.

Did you find Tidd at home?—Yes.

What did he say to you?—He said, that several men that had promised to come had not been so good as their word, and that he should not wait longer than seven o'clock.

Did you wait till seven o'clock?—Yes.

Did any other persons arrive?—No.

When seven o'clock came, what did Tidd do?—He went to a corner of the room where there was a trunk, and took out a large pistol.

What did he do with it?—Put it into a belt that he had got round his body, he then took about six or eight pikes, about a foot long.

Iron pikes, or pike shafts?—Iron pikes.

Six or seven did you say?—I suppose there might be about as many as that.

What did he do with them?—They were wrapped in brown paper; and he took a staff about four feet long, with a hole at one end of it.

Was that hole calculated to receive the ends of the pikes?—Yes.

Did he take the pike heads with him?—Yes, he did.

You mentioned that a pistol was in a belt round his waist?—Yes.

Was that underneath his coat or over it?—Underneath his great coat.

So that on his coat being buttoned you could not perceive it?—No.

You went down stairs with him?—Yes.

Which way did you go?—Through Brook-street into Holborn.

And from Holborn where?—Straight on to the top of Holborn up Oxford-street.

Did you at that time know, or had you previous information as to the place you were going to?—No; I believe it was while I was in the room, I asked him where we were going to, and he said to a mews in John-street, Edgware-road.

In going along, did he tell you what you were to do, or had he told you before?—No. When we got into Holborn he gave me the pike staff; says he, "You take this."

Tell us what else he said as to what was to be done?—I asked him, as we were going along, where it was we were going to? He said I should know more about it when we got there; I still pressed him, I asked him whether we were going to the House of Commons.

What did he say?—He said no, there were too many soldiers about there: I then asked him where it was we were going to, and at last he said, "Grosvenor-square." I then asked him whether any body particular lived at Grosvenor-square, by their going there particularly; and he said there was a cabinet dinner there that evening.

Did he say at whose house it was to be?—No, he did not.

Did you ask him, or did he tell you, what was to be done there?—No, I did not ask him any more. Upon his saying that, I was fully convinced what was intended.

From Oxford-street, where did you go to?—We went to the top of Oxford-street, and turned to the Edgware-road.

Do you know Cato-street?—I did not know it before, I know it now.

Did you go there?—Yes.

When you got to Cato-street, where did you go.

When we got there, underneath the archway that leads to it, I saw two men whom Tidd seemed to know. He was a step or two before me, and spoke to them; we went, after stopping a few moments with them in the street, into a stable.

Did you go up the steps in the stable?—Yes.

About how many persons did you find in the stable and in the loft altogether?—I should suppose about four or five and twenty; but I had not been there above two or three minutes when some person asked how many there were, and proposed to count them; but Mr. Thistlewood said there was no occasion to count, for there were five and twenty.

When you got into the loft, and while you were there, was any thing said as to the plan they were going about?—There was a man that was sitting on one side of the bench (a carpenter's bench) a tallish thinish man with a brown great coat, with two belts on, and I think a sword by his side, and he was speaking of the impropriety of going with so small a number as five and twenty men to lord Harrowby's.

Upon his making that observation what was said or done by the other parties?—Mr. Thistlewood said the number was quite enough, for he only wanted fourteen men to go into the room; and supposing lord Harrowby had sixteen men servants, still that number was quite sufficient. The man in a brown great coat said, "After the business is done, and we come out, most likely there will be a crowd round the door, how are we to make our escape." Upon which Mr. Thistlewood said, "You know the largest body is already gone from here, this is the smallest part."

"The largest body is gone from here?"—I do not know whether he said "from here," but "the largest body is gone." Upon which, the prisoner Davidson spoke to this man, and said it was not right in him to throw cold water upon their proceedings; if he was afraid of his life, he might go, and they would do without him.

Did any thing further pass in the way of conversation?—Yes, the prisoner Brunt immediately said that sooner than they should give up the business they were going upon, he would go into the house by himself and blow them all up, if he perished along with them, and he said "for you know we have got that which can do it." I am not certain that those were the exact words, but that was the meaning of it. Upon which the man said, that though he did not think it altogether right to go himself, still as they were all for it, he would not be against it.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—That was the man in the brown great coat?—Yes: upon which he proposed that all the persons,

Mr. Attorney General.—Who proposed?—The man in the brown great coat; that all the persons in the room should put themselves under the orders of Mr. Thistlewood; upon which Mr. Thistlewood said that every one engaged in that business would have the same honour as himself, and he proposed that the fourteen men to go into the room should volunteer from among the persons then in the room.

Upon his proposing that fourteen persons should volunteer to go into the room, what did he say then?—He said that those fourteen that volunteered should range themselves on the other side of the room, towards that part where the firing afterwards came from, when the officers came.

There was a small room on that side?—Yes, there was.

Did they do so?—Yes. I do not know whether the whole fourteen, but I believe twelve or thirteen out of that number did so in the course of a few minutes.

Was any thing said as to what the rest were to do?—No. I heard nothing but the prisoner Tidd was coming out; he was one of the fourteen; he was coming out to me to say, "you may choose your situation," when Mr. Thistlewood put him back, and said, "you all know your places."

What took place upon that?—I do not remember whether any thing particular did; but afterwards Mr. Thistlewood was gone for a few moments, and he came up stairs and said they had received intelligence that the duke of Wellington and lord Sidmouth were arrived at lord Harrowby's. I do not recollect any thing else passing till the officers came up.

You were taken into custody in the room, I believe?—Yes, I was.

John Monument cross-examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

You say you had known Thistlewood: how long had you known him?—I never spoke to him before, till the time I saw him at Mr. Ford's at Lambeth.

That was when? how long before the meeting? do you recollect when about the meeting in Finsbury-market-place was?—No, I do not.

Was that before or since Christmas?—I think it was before Christmas.

Did you attend there?—Yes, I did; because Mr. Thistlewood asked me whether I should be there, when I was at Mr. Ford's.

Was Mr. Thistlewood at the Finsbury-market meeting?—I was too far off to see the persons that were. I cannot say whether he was or not.

What was the meeting there about?—was it about the transactions at Manchester, or not?—I think it was. I was there about an hour and a half. I was not near enough to hear what passed.

Was the business of the meeting to consider something about the transactions at Manchester?—I really cannot say.

You went to the Finsbury-market meeting, but did not take notice of what passed?—No, I did not take much notice. The day was very dirty, and I did not stop long.

There was no very particular acquaintance at that time between Thistlewood and you?—No.

How long had you known Brunt?—I never knew him till Mr. Thistlewood brought him to my house.

Did you know a gentleman of the name of Edwards at all?—No.

A long time passed between your seeing Brunt at one time, and his calling again on the 22nd of February?—Yes, a good while.

And all your former conversations had passed for nothing? in that time you thought no more of them?—I thought, not seeing me eager to follow their plans, they had left me.

So you said when they called again, "I thought I had lost you?"—Yes.

On the 22nd, however, you were to be trusted with the letters b, u, t, and some person was to give you t, o, n?—Yes.

And that was all that was confidentially reposed in you?—Yes.

You had no occasion to use those letters, I think?—No; because I went with Tidd.

When you went to the room in Cato-street there were twenty-five there?—Yes.

You must have been dreadfully crowded in that room?—There were three or four in the room below.

Even then you must have been dreadfully crowded?—No, they were almost all standing.

How high was the room? you are a short man?—Yes.

Do you think the ceiling was as high above your head, as that board over you?—Yes.

There was a carpenter's bench in the room, was not there?—Yes.

That took up a good deal of space?—Yes.

A man could not stand upon that?—No.

Was not the room entirely filled with you twenty, if there were twenty?—Not entirely filled.

Do you know the man in the brown coat, who he was?—No, I do not.

Have you since learnt that his name was Adams?—No, I know it was not him.

Some man in a brown coat, whom you do not know?—No.

What part was Adams playing there?—I do not remember him.

You do not remember his being there at all?—No.

You knew Adams?—No.

Did the man in the brown coat squint, or had he any thing particular about his eyes?—No; but I have seen the prisoner Adams at Hicks's hall, and again here, and I know that it is not him.

Do not you recollect Adams being there, and saying or doing any thing, for he is a very remarkable person?—No.

Did you go about the room, and see who were there?—No; I stood by the side of the bench.

Were there any men particularly tall?—I do not know.

Were there any men at all of Adams's size and height?—I cannot tell that.

Were you sitting or standing?—Standing generally; the man in the brown great coat was sitting on a little bench on the other side.

They were a good many of them, eating bread and cheese, were not they?—Yes; some of them were.

There was some bread and cheese produced, and they flew at it like famished men?—I did not see that.

They were eating bread and cheese, however?—Yes.

And they had some porter too?—Yes.

Cannot you recollect Adams being there?—No, I cannot.

Are you sure he was not there?—I am sure I cannot take upon myself to say that.

Have you any consciousness whatever of ever having seen him, until you saw him at Hicks's hall?—No; but the same observation may be made of many others.

Your observation is ingenious and just; you may have seen many persons and not have recognized them again?—Just so.

He is a man of remarkable appearance, with his eye and all?—Yes he is.

Do you know any of the other prisoners?

—I know the prisoner Davidson.

He is a man of colour?—Yes.

Do you know any other?—Thistlewood, Tidd, Brunt.

Those you know out of doors?—Yes.

And Davidson whom you know by his colour?—Yes.

The others made no impression upon you?

—No; but I recollect seeing the prisoner, Strange, in the room.

Why do you recollect him particularly?—Only that he was a short man, the same as myself, and standing by the side of me.

Have you told us all that passed there, according to your hearing and observation of it?—Yes, I have.

You can tell me nothing about Adams?—No.

Did you hear any person make any observation except the man in the brown coat?—No.

If any observation had been addressed like that by the man in the brown coat, should you have heard it?—I suppose I might.

You must?—Yes; perhaps I might.

How large is the room?—I cannot say.

It was a very small room; the twenty nearly filled it?—Not very small; I should say, there would not have been room for twenty more.

Would there have been room for ten more?—I think there might.

Was it as long as that box those gentlemen are sitting in?—Longer than that.

As long as that and the next?—I cannot say.

If any person had spoken with an audible voice addressing the whole, do you think you should have heard it?—I think I should.

You had totally lost sight of those people from the day of the Finsbury-meeting, to the 22nd of February?—Yes; I had, excepting when Mr. Brunt called upon me.

Was the conversation you had spoken of between the brown coated man and Mr. Thistlewood, and the others, so loud, that every person might have heard it?—I cannot say; but I was standing as near to that person with the brown coat as I am to you.

Was it so loud that every person within that distance must have heard it?—Yes; I suppose it was.

You come here in very honourable custody, I see, with greater attendants than you ever expected to have?—Yes.

Were you taken upon the spot or how?—Yes, I was taken in the room.

You surrendered, I suppose, when the officers came up?—When the soldiers came up.

You made no resistance?—No.

Had you any arms?—No; I had nothing about me; I was searched directly.

*John Monument re-examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.*

Were you one of the last that came into the room?—I cannot say how many came in after me.

Was the room nearly full when you came?—Yes.

How long had you been there before the officers came?—About a quarter of an hour before the officers came.

Did you know any of the persons in the room before you came there except Tidd, Brunt, and Thistlewood?—No; except the prisoner, Davidson, whom I had seen at one of two of the meetings.

The persons of all the rest in the room you were unacquainted with?—Yes.

Was it candle light?—Yes; there was a candle in the room.

Juryman.—Only one?—I am not certain about that; I know there was one; I cannot speak to others.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What was there upon the carpenter's bench?—There was a great quantity of swords and pistols, and two or three blunderbusses.

You spoke about Strange, that Strange stood by you; was Strange apprehended at the same time with you?—Yes.

You were both taken into custody together?—Yes.

How many were there in the room when the soldiers came in and took you into custody?—Four.

The soldiers took you all into custody?—Yes.

A gentleman has asked you about Edwards; do you remember when you were brought up at Whitehall, being handcuffed with Mr. Thistlewood?—I was.

Did Mr. Thistlewood say any thing to you about Edwards?—Yes; he said, when I was examined before the privy council, if I was asked who brought me to the meeting, I should state Mr. Edwards.

What did you reply to that?—I asked him how I could tell them such a falsehood, when he knew I had never seen the man.

What did he say in answer?—He laughed, and said that was of no consequence, for if I was asked what sort of a person he was, I was to say he was a man not much taller than I was, of a sallow complexion, and dressed in a brown great coat.

A Juryman (Mr. Goodchild).—My lord, I should be glad to ask that witness one question: whether, since his apprehension, he has had any conversation whatever with a man of the name of Adams?—No, I have not, except speaking a word or two to him, but none concerning this business.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Have you been kept separately confined?—Yes.

Did you ever see him, except when you were taken up as a witness to Hicks's hall, and when you were brought here to-day?—Never.

Thomas Monument sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you are brother to the last witness John Monument?—Yes, I am.

Do you remember your brother meeting Mr. Thistlewood at the house of a person of the name of Ford?—Yes, I heard him speak of it.

You were not there yourself, but heard him speak of it?—I was not there.

Do you remember Thistlewood, after you had had that conversation with your brother, calling upon your brother?—Yes, he did.

Do you know Brunt?—Yes, Thistlewood brought Brunt with him.

After they had come into the room, did they stay there for any considerable time?—No, I suppose not above five, or it might be ten minutes; I cannot say exactly to the time.

What did they do?—They did nothing; there was some conversation passed.

Did they go out of the room?—Yes, Thistlewood asked my brother if he might be permitted to speak with him.

Upon Thistlewood's saying that to your brother, did they go out of the room together?—Yes, they did.

How long did they remain out?—They remained out, I suppose, about two or three minutes.

Did they then return into the room?—Yes.

Did Thistlewood and Brunt go away together?—Yes, they did.

Do you remember, on the Tuesday before the Cato-street business, Brunt calling upon your brother?—Yes.

Did he call alone?—No, he brought a man of the name of Tidd with him.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Did he mention his name at the time, or did you know him before?—No.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was his name mentioned at the time?—Brunt mentioned his name.

Tell us what passed?—As nearly as I can recollect, when they came into the room my brother said to Brunt, "I thought I had lost you;" because we had not seen him for some time.

What did Brunt say upon that?—He said that the king's death had made some little alteration in their plans. My brother asked what those plans were? Brunt said they had different objects in view.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You heard this, did you?—Yes, I did.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What further was said?—Brunt asked my brother to meet him up at Tyburn-turnpike on the next evening, and he agreed to meet him; and Brunt said to Tidd "suppose we give them an outline of the plan." But I do not think Tidd made any answer to it. Brunt then told us we were to meet up at Tyburn-turnpike at six o'clock on the Wednesday evening. They gave us the pass word, which consisted of the letters b, u, t. He said if any one of their party was there, they would answer t, u, b. They then went away after that.

Did you promise to go?—Not exactly; they did not indeed press me; they spoke to my brother chiefly through all the business.

Did you in fact go yourself?—No, I did not.

What-time did your brother go out the next afternoon, the Wednesday?—It was near seven o'clock when he left home; Brunt called about five or nearly five for him to go with him, but we were busy finishing some work and he could not go with him at that time, and he then told him to call upon Tidd, who lived in Hole-in-the-wall passage.

About seven o'clock you say your brother went?—Yes, within a very trifle of seven.

You did not see him afterwards?—I never saw him afterwards.

Thomas Monument cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

All this conversation was directed to your brother John?—Yes; I was in the room when it passed; when he came first, he spoke to my brother.

Had you been long acquainted with Brunt before?—No; I never saw him till Thistlewood brought him that evening.

Which of the parties had you known before?—None.

Did you make any further queries of what was to be done?—No, I did not.

You did not suspect any thing wrong?—No, I did not.

What did you think they were going about?—That I cannot tell.

What did you suspect?—I could not tell; I supposed it was a meeting for some purpose, but for what purpose I could not tell.

You had not the curiosity to inquire?—No.

A club dinner, perhaps?—No, I did not think that.

A supper?—I did not know.

And you were determined not to ask?—I did not ask further than he mentioned.

Thomas Dwyer sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Where do you live?—No. 15, Gee's-court, Oxford-street.

Some time before the 23rd of February had you become acquainted with Davidson, the man of colour?—Yes.

Had you met him at different times?—I had seen him twice before the 23rd.

Upon either of these occasions did he introduce you to any body?—Yes.

To whom?—To Mr. Thistlewood.

Did Thistlewood and he and you go together to any house?—Yes.

What house?—A public-house at the end of Molineaux-street.

That is very near Cato-street, is it not?—This end of Cato-street.

How long was that before the 23rd, to the best of your recollection?—It was about the 9th, 10th, or 11th, either Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday.

Did Thistlewood have any conversation with you?—No, very trifling.

Tell us what it was he said?—He said nothing to me at that present time at all; he said he was in five or six different revolutions, that was all.

What else did he say?—Nothing more at that present time.

Any thing about Ireland?—He said Ireland was in a disturbed state at that time.

Are you an Irishman?—Yes.

Did he say any thing about your countrymen who were in London?—He said he had a good many of my countrymen.

Did you see Davidson the day before the people were taken up in Cato-street?—In the afternoon of the 22nd.

Did he make any appointment with you for the next morning?—No, not then, not for the 23rd.

The next morning, however, did you go any where?—No, I stopped at my own place.

After stopping, did any person call upon you?—Yes.

To what place did you go with that person?—Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane.

At what time of the day?—About a quarter or half-past nine, when I left my own place in the morning.

Who called upon you?—A man of the name of Harrison.

Did Davidson tell you the night before any thing he was going to do?—He told me he was going on sentry next morning.

A person called upon you and took you to Fox-court?—Yes.

Had that person any thing with him?—A bundle wrapped up in some paper.

Who was the person that took you to Fox-court?—A tall man of the name of Harrison.

When you got to Fox-court, to what part of the house did you go?—A two-pair back room.

How did you get into the room?—I turned round a short passage into a door.

Was the room door locked or open?—I think it was locked.

How did you get the key?—I think he knocked at the door of the two-pair front, and a woman gave him the key.

When you got into the room, did you find any thing there?—Nothing but an old chair.

Was there any cupboard in the room?—Yes.

Did you see any thing in that cupboard, or any thing taken out?—No, I sat on the chair.

Was there any thing afterwards taken out?—Yes.

What was it?—A ball wrapped up with rope yarn.

Did Harrison tell you what it was?—A grenade.

Did he tell you what use was to be made of it?—No, he did not then.

Did he afterwards while you were there?—No.

Did any other persons come in?—Yes.

Who came in?—Thistlewood, Davidson, and a few more.

What had Davidson with him?—He had a blunderbuss and a pair of pistols, and a bayonet in his side pocket.

Did any other persons come in?—Yes, there were one or two afterwards came in.

Do you remember the names of any more?—No, I do not know that I can name any others.

Will you look at the bar, and see whether you can name any other persons that were there?—Yes.

Which did you see there?—This gentleman next me [Brunt.]

After Davidson had shewn those pistols, what did you hear him say?—I do not know that he said any thing particular at that time: he said he had given twelve shillings for a pair of pistols.

Brunt said this?—No, not Brunt, but Davidson.

After Davidson had spoken of his pistols, and shewn them, and said he had given twelve shillings, did you hear Brunt say any thing?—He said he would go out and buy a pair.

Did any thing pass from any of them about the use to be made of that hand-grenade?—Yes.

Who was it, do you remember?—Mr. Thistlewood.

What did Thistlewood say?—He spoke to them all at large, and said some of them were to be thrown into the horse-barracks.

Some of those hand-grenades?—Yes, and some were to be thrown into lord Harrowby's, to set fire to it, to blow it up.

Did Thistlewood ask you any question?—Yes.

What did he ask you?—He asked me how many of my countrymen I could muster.

Did he say when he should want them?—Half-past eight the evening of the 23rd.

Did you tell him how many you could muster?—Yes.

How many did you tell him?—About six or seven and twenty, or five or six and twenty.

Did he tell you where to go to?—Yes.

Where?—He told me they were to assemble at the Horse and Groom, but I was to be at six o'clock at the Pomfret-castle, at the end of Barrat's-court.

Where is that?—It leads into Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square.

Is that a house frequented by Irishmen?—Yes, it is on Saturday nights: they go in to have a pint of porter or any thing of that kind.

Did he tell you to what place you were to go to do any thing?—Yes.

Where to?—He told me I was to take a few, the best of them, to go to the Foundling-hospital, knock at the porter's lodge, put a pistol to his breast, turn round the right hand, and there were five or six and twenty stand of arms at the next lodge.

What was to be done with them?—I was to seize them.

Did he tell you what was to be done at any other place?—At the same time another party would seize two pieces of cannon that were at the City Volunteers' riding-school in Gray's-inn-lane.

Did he say what was to be done at any other places?—He said there were more that would make a breach in Finsbury.

What more did he say?—Nothing particular more.

Did he mention any dinner that day? whether there was to be any dinner?—Yes, at lord Harrowby's.

A dinner of whom?—A cabinet dinner, or a cabinet council.

Did he say whether any thing was to be done there?—Yes, he said they were to attack at lord Harrowby's.

After this, did you see any bundle taken out of the cupboard?—Yes.

What was done with it?—It was planted on the floor, and a pint pot produced; that bundle contained powder.

Gunpowder?—Yes.

What was done with it?—There was a tin measure produced, and it was measured into some woollen bags.

How many bags do you think were filled?—I cannot say.

Were there few or several?—There were several of them.

Who did that?—Harrison.

After that did you hear Thistlewood talk to the short man in front? [Brunt.—No, he spoke generally to them all.

Did you hear any thing about any things being to be sent to any different places?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said there were a dozen pike handles to be taken to Mary-le-bone.

Any to any other place?—The remainder were to go, some to Finsbury, and some elsewhere.

Were you asked to take any any where?—Yes.

Did you agree to do it or refuse?—I refused.

Was any person who was there sent out with any of the things?—They were not in the room, I had not seen them, only what they said concerning them.

Did you see any bag?—Yes.

Did you see any thing put in it?—Yes, this powder that was measured and the grenades.

Did you hear any direction given to any person to take those things to any place?—The pike handles.

Did you see any pike handles?—No, I did not see them.

Were any directions given to any person to carry any thing to any place?—Yes.

To what place was that person told to go —

To the Horse and Groom at the end of Cato-street.

Who gave him directions?—Harrison.

Did Harrison go away too?—He went with the bag with those things.

Having before sent another person with some things?—He went out with an intention to get those handles, but where he went I do not know.

What did Harrison take with him?—This powder in the flannel.

Did he take the grenades away as well as the powder?—Yes, I think he did.

What were they put into?—Into a sack.

At about what time did you leave the room, to the best of your recollection?—I got home to my own place at twelve o'clock exactly.

Did you on that day go and give information of what you had seen and heard?—I told a gentleman.

Who was that gentleman?—Major James.

In consequence of what he said to you, did you go to the Secretary of State's?—Yes, I did.

At about what time were you at the Secretary of State's that day?—About one or half past.

Thomas Dwyer cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

What has been your situation in life?—A bricklayer by trade.

How long have you been acquainted with Davidson?—Since the 4th of February; that was the first time I ever saw him.

You say it was he who introduced you to Thistlewood?—Yes.

What day did he introduce you to Thistlewood?—About the 9th, I think in the following week, the 9th or 10th.

Had you known any of the party before?—Never in my life.

They never having known you before, nor you them, they immediately opened these plans to you?—No; they did not speak any thing respecting them; I never knew any thing of them till that present morning the 23rd.

On that morning, the 23rd, they let you into their secrets?—Yes.

None of them having known you before?—No, except Davidson; I saw him on the 4th of February.

And that was an accidental meeting?—It was indeed.

Can you possibly imagine what it was in your character that should have induced them to trust you so suddenly?—I cannot say, indeed; I do not know what their meaning was for it. I was well known in that neighbourhood, being in the habit of being amongst a deal of my countrymen.

And you were always known as a very honest, loyal man?—I should think so; I have been fifteen years in that parish.

With a good character?—Yes, I believe so.

And yet, all on a sudden, a band of traitors trusted you with their traitorous designs?—Yes, they did, so far as I have stated.

That did not very much astonish you?—In fact I did not know the rights of it; I had partly an idea of it.

You were asked how many men you could muster?—Yes.

Give us an idea what you were to do with them?—It would be very serious for me to inveigle the minds of a parcel of innocent men in such a concern; and it would be more than perhaps I could do.

But, however, you agreed to do it?—I agreed on that morning.

What were you to do?—I agreed to have five or six and twenty men there; they asked me how many I could muster: I was rather frightened, and I said so many.

You were frightened?—Yes, I was rather frightened while I was in the room.

You were to be at the Foundling hospital?—Yes.

And there you were to get some arms?—Yes.

What did you expect to do with them?—I do not know indeed.

You would rob any body you were set to rob?—I should suppose so, if I should take such advice.

You did agree to do it?—Yes, at that present time, but I had no intention; only speaking the word, I wanted to get out of the place. I had no intention of being an accomplice at all in their designs, only I wanted to get out of the place.

Do you happen to know a man of the name of Huckleston?—No.

Were you ever examined in a court before?—I was here once on the trial of a woman that robbed a man of 7*l*.

Was that the only occasion?—Yes.

You are quite sure you do not know a man of the name of Huckleston?—No, not to my knowledge. I am sure I do not of that name.

Where were you at the time of the rebellion in Ireland? in England or Ireland?—In Ireland. I was quite a boy at the time.

What sized boy?—Quite a youth.

How old were you?—I cannot say, indeed. I can just remember it.

George Caylack sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—At No. 2, Cato-street.

Do you remember on the afternoon of the 23rd of February last seeing any body in Cato-street that attracted your attention?—Yes.

Whom did you see?—Mr. Harrison.

Look round, and see whether you see him?—Yes, that is the man [pointing him out].

Had you known him before?—Yes, I had.

Where did you see him?—I saw him standing near the stable door in Cato-street with a candlestick in his hand, with a wooden bottom and an iron stick.

Did you speak to him?—Yes, I did.

What did you say to him?—Only asked him how he did, as I knew the man before. He said he was very well. He said he had taken two chambers there, and was going to do them up, to clean them up.

What time in the afternoon was this?—About five o'clock.

In the course of that evening did you see any other people going in and out of the stable?—Yes, a great many.

How many altogether?—I suppose from twenty to five and twenty that I saw go in and out.

Between what times in the evening?—Between five and seven.

Richard Munday sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—No. 3, Cato-street.

Do you recollect on the afternoon of the 23rd of February last seeing any people in Cato-street?—Yes.

At what time was it?—About half-past four in the afternoon I came from work, or about twenty minutes past four, hardly the half hour, I saw Davidson walking under the archway; I knew him by seeing him along with Mr. Firth. I had seen him along with Mr. Firth two or three times before, being in the habit of going to Mr. Firth to doctor his cows.

Did you see any thing further?—I saw Harrison about six o'clock open the cow-house door, and he shut it again; but in coming from my work I passed Davidson in the archway, and went and got my tea, and came back again, that might be I suppose near the half hour after five, it was not quite the half hour, but about twenty-five minutes, I went out to the chandler's shop to get some coffee, and what I wanted; and in coming back I went in and got my pint of beer at the public-house, and I saw Davidson go out and get a light from a woman at the public-house, and he had another candle in his hand, and opened the door to go in; in the way of his going in there was a kind of a bundle there, I supposed it to be a quatern loaf, but I cannot say whether it was or not; he had, as he stooped, two belts with two pistols in them, and a sword, which stuck out in this way (behind), under his great coat; I went in and mentioned it to my wife immediately, "In the name of God" —

Do not tell us what you said to your wife. Besides these two persons Davidson and Harrison, did you see any other persons?—There were several people two and three going out and in at different times; but there was a number in the place, I dare say I saw seven or eight; when the door was half opened in the place at a time.

What sort of a place was it?—It is a stable belonging to the general, and Firth was his servant.

General whom?—General Watson; one part of it is a chaise-house, and the other part a stable, where the horses used to stand; but Mr. Firth turned it into a cow-house, and kept five cows there.

Is there any loft?—Yes; a loft with two rooms out of it; one a room with a fire-place in it, and the other a dark bed-room.

This place had been vacant for some time before?—Yes; Firth had taken his cows out, I suppose as much as six or seven weeks; he had purchased a place in Iron-foundry-lane, and put his cows there.

Had you observed, in the course of that afternoon, whether any thing was fastened up against the window?—There was a kind of hop-sacking was fastened against the front window, going by, and likewise over the partition of the stable door, where the railing was, a kind of a coarse matting.

Did you see that matting put up?—Part of it was up, I saw at watering-time, three o'clock, when I came home to water.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Where was the matting?—On the inside, sacking or matting I call it the same; it was very coarse stuff.

Elisabeth Weston sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—At No. 1, Cato-street, Edgware-road.

Do you recollect, in the afternoon of the 23rd of February last, seeing any people in Cato-street?—About three in the afternoon I was standing at the door looking at my little boys that were playing in the street, and I saw a man come from underneath a gateway with a bag on his left shoulder, and a key in his right hand, and he unlocked the gates and went in at the stable door.

Did you observe some time afterwards any body?—About six o'clock in the evening I had occasion to go an errand; I took my little boy in my hand, and as I passed I saw a man of colour; I was frightened, knowing the stable to have been unoccupied for some time. I said, "Oh dear," and passed on. I have been very ill ever since that took place.

How soon did you return from your errand?—About ten minutes. I was going to the corner of Molineaux-street, in John-street.

After you returned from your errand, did any body knock at your door?—I saw Davidson standing by my door when I came back, standing in the same place where he was when I went.

Should you know him again?—Yes, I certainly should.

Look round and see whether you know him again?—Yes, that is the very man; after I had been in doors, and got my light, and by then I had set my tea-things, a knock came loudly at the door, I went to the door saying to my little boy, "Your father is coming;" but when I opened the door, this man came and asked me to give him a light if I pleased; I said "Yes, to be sure;" he had two candles in his right hand, and he gave me one of them, and I gave him a light, and he took his hat off his head and put over it, and I leant out of my door and saw him go into the stable door; it was a little way open and he went in: that is all I know about it.

*George Thomas Joseph Ruthven sworn.—
Examined by Mr. Bolland.*

You are a constable of the public-office, Bow-street?—I am.

Did you, in consequence of directions you had received, go on the 23rd of February into Cato-street, Edgware-road?—I did.

Alone or accompanied?—Accompanied.

By whom?—By John Wright; there were three I knew that would meet me there.

When you got there, how large was your party?—At last it amounted, I believe, to about twelve, somewhere about that number.

Where did you go?—I went into the stable, and saw a man with a blunderbuss or a gun on his shoulder, and a sword or cutlass by his side.

At what time was that?—About half past eight.

Was any other person in the stable that you observed?—I saw one, and I have some faint recollection, but I am not sure, that there might be another.

Did the whole party follow you into the stable?—I believe so.

What did you do on getting into the stable?—When I saw the man with a gun on his shoulder, I said to some of the party that were following me to secure him.

What did you yourself do?—I went up a ladder which I found there.

Was any thing said by either of your men in the stable, or any of the parties?—Not that I am aware of; for I think it could not be a second before I was up stairs.

Where did that ladder lead you to?—To a loft.

What did you observe on getting into the loft?—I observed several men, and heard the clattering of arms, swords, and pistols, that I saw.

Had any of your party got up with you?—I had calculated about three or four.

Who were they?—Ellis and Smithers, I am sure of.

How many persons might there be? You saw a number?—I am not quite sure; but I thought, from the transitory view I had, about four or five and twenty.

What is the size of that loft?—Fifteen feet five one way, and ten feet ten the other.

Is there any other room adjoining to it?—There are two.

Communicating by doors?—Yes.

When you had gained the loft what did you say?—"We are officers, seize their arms!"

That you said?—I said that myself.

"We are officers," and then turning to your men, "seize their arms?"—Yes, just so.

Did you see any person in the room whom you knew?—I did.

Who was that?—Thistlewood.

How long have you been acquainted with the person of Thistlewood?—I should think four or five years; I knew him from the time of the trials before.

Where was he?—He was standing on the right-hand side of the table, as we entered near to the door of a little room.

Did he keep that position or move?—Immediately on my saying that, he looked up, and seized a sword that was on the table, and drew back into the little room.

Was the sword drawn?—It was.

What description of sword was it?—It appeared to be a very long one, and rather bright.

With that he retired into the little room?—Yes, he did.

What took place?—He stood fencing to prevent any body coming to him.

Did any body approach him?—Smithers did.

Upon Smithers approaching him, what happened?—He thrust his arm forward and stabbed him.

Did Smithers fall?—He did.

Did you hear any thing said in the loft upon that?—Smithers, when he fell, said "Oh my God, I am done!" or, "Oh my God!"

What passed after that?—The lights were put out almost immediately, in a minute or two. Somebody said, from the corner of the room where Thistlewood stood, "Kill the b—rs, throw them down stairs!"

How many lights were burning when you went in?—I think there might be eight.

And they were put out?—They were.

You were then all in the dark?—Quite in the dark.

What did you do?—I heard a rush at the stairs, and I joined in the rush saying "Ah kill them," and got down. I heard it, for I could not see it.

You joined in their cry and rushed down?—I did.

Upon getting down what did you observe?—I did not observe any thing till I got into John-street, and there I met with the soldiers, and returned with them. There were a great many shots fired before I got down.

Where were those shots fired from?—That I cannot tell; it appeared to me that they were fired in the direction towards the stairs.

From what part of the room?—From the further part of the room.

How many shots?—I think in the whole there might be between twenty and thirty; but some of those shots I think were fired from the inside to the street, not all in that direction.

That is from the windows?—Yes; from the windows into the street.

You say you met the soldiers and returned?—I did.

What did you observe on your return?—I observed a man going from the door. I called out to seize him, and as I called out, he lifted up his arm to fire.

Which man have you ascertained that to be?—Tidd; That is the man [pointing him out]. I caught hold of his right arm, pulled him round, and fell with him on a dung heap.

Did you succeed in disarming him?—The soldiers came up instantly, and his pistol went off, he was secured.

Did you search him on his being secured?—I did.

What did you find upon him?—Round his waist I found a leathern belt.

Of what colour?—A sort of buff colour, such as they use for ladies shoes. In his pocket I found two ball cartridges.

Where was this that you searched him?—In the public-house called "the Horse and Groom."

Did you find any thing else upon him?—I do not recollect any thing else.

While you were in the public-house, was any other prisoner brought in?—Yes; a man of the name of Bradburn. The man who stands last there.

Did you search him?—Yes.

What did you find?—Round his waist a string four or five or six times round.

So as to answer for a belt?—It would do so.

Did you find any thing else upon him?—Yes, he had six ball cartridges, and three loose balls.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Were those ball cartridges for pistols or musquets?—I am not well versed enough to speak to that, my lord.

Mr. Bolland.—Were any others brought in?—There were.

Who were they?—Davidson and Wilson.

Did you search Davidson and Wilson?—I did not.

Did you see whether they were accoutred at all?—I did not.

Did you remain there, or return to the left?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Was he secured?—I do not know whether it is material, but when Davidson was brought in, he damned and swore against any man who would not die in liberty's cause, that he gloried in it.

Mr. Bolland.—Did he do any thing else?—He sung a song, "Scots wha' ha' wi' Wallace bled," part of it, he was restrained from singing the rest.

Did you then go back to the left?—I did.

Who was in possession of it?—Some soldiers, and some of the people of the office.

Did you find any persons there who were afterwards taken into custody?—I did.

Who were they?—There was Shaw, Strange, I think his name is.

Were there any others there?—There was Cooper there.

Was Monument there?—Monument was there.

Gilchrist?—Yes, and Gilchrist.

Upon getting into the room, did you observe any thing more particularly, of any arms, or any thing of that kind?—I saw arms in the room, and I told them to search the room, and whatever each found to keep in his own possession.

Did you find any thing?—Yes, two swords; a bag which I afterwards found to contain ten hand-grenades, I think it held them.

Were they all of the same size?—All these in the bag were of the same size, and there were two parcels wrapped up in brown paper, nothing but tow as it appeared to me, and tar or something of that kind.

In the shape of balls, or what shape?—They were wrapped up close together.

What was done with the other arms; did those persons so keep them, or deliver them up to you?—They kept them at the time; there was one much larger than the rest I have described.

One ball?—One grenade.

Had they fuses in them?—They had all those; one was as big as my hat nearly.

Who took that?—Nixon found it, and gave it to me at the time.

What was afterwards done with those things; were they taken to Bow-street?—They were.

And deposited there?—They were taken away again from Bow-street, but since deposited in the possession of an officer of Bow-street.

They are all here to day?—They are.

Before you went to the stable were you at the Horse and Groom?—I was.

Did any thing take place while you were there?—There were three or four men come in, four I believe at last mustered.

Do you know any of those men?—I did not know them at the time, but I recognized them afterwards.

Was Cooper one of those men?—Yes, he was, Gilchrist, behind, was another.

Did they bring any thing with them?—They brought a stick.

Which of them?—Cooper.

What sort of a stick?—A broom-stick or mop-stick.

What did he do with it?—It was left in the room when they went out.

Did he or any of the party return for that stick?—Gilchrist returned.

Did he succeed in getting it?—He did not, it had been removed.

By whom?—By the boy of the house, who observing that one end of it was cut—

Did you observe that?—I did.

Did you take possession of that stick?—I did, I have it now.

How was the stick cut?—Cut at the end about this depth down, as if to receive a socket of any thing. I likewise had a tuck stick brought me the next morning, and a dozen pieces of stick a sort of pike shaft.

Who brought those?—They were brought by a person called Flannagan, and another person. I have had them in my possession ever since.

George Thomas Joseph Rathbone cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

You say you have known Thistlewood ever since the former trial?—Yes.

Do you mean that in 1817, when doctor Watson was tried?—Yes, I do.

When had you seen him last before this transaction on the 23rd of February? Stop a moment before you look to your book, had he been out of sight for some time?—No, not a fortnight certainly.

Had he lately been imprisoned to your knowledge?—No, not that I know of.

I mean at Horsham?—I have heard of that.

Do you know how long he had been come back from Horsham?—No, I do not.

Had you seen him several times before the 23rd of February?—I had seen him more than five or six times within two or three weeks.

Perhaps you had some particular motive for looking after him at this time?—I had.

A motive connected with this event that took place afterwards?—Not that I am aware of.

I mean watching some proceedings, the end of which was this meeting in Cato-street?—Not that I am aware of, I was watching him for another purpose, as I believe.

Do you know a man of the name of Edwards?—I do not.

Is there an officer in your office that has a relation of that name?—We have I believe four or five Edwards's; but I am not aware what relations they have.

You have four or five Edwards's in your office, do I understand you rightly?—I think there are four.

I am not pinning you down to the number; but there are about that number, there are three or four?—I remember three perfectly, and I think there are four or five.

You were employed for some time before that to look after Thistlewood?—Yes.

Upon whose suggestion that was, except those who employed you at the office, perhaps you do not know?—I do not.

You have seen this person to whom I allude, named Edwards, since the 22nd of February?—I do not know the person to whom you allude.

*James Ellis sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.*

I believe you are conductor of the patrol at the Public-office, Bow-street?—I am a conductor.

Did you, on the 23rd of February last, go with the other officers to Cato-street?—I did.

About what time did you get to the stable?—I think about half past eight, as nearly as I can judge.

Did you go in after Ruthven?—Immediately after, as soon after as I could walk in.

Upon your going into the stable, did you observe any man in the stable?—I did; I observed two men.

Did you observe whether either of them had any belts?—The first man nearest to me had two white belts, that apparently went across his shoulders.

The one hanging over one shoulder and the other over the other?—Yes, cross belts.

Did you observe whether he had any thing in his hand?—Either in his hand, or by his right side, he had a carbine or short soldier's piece, something of that kind; and in his left hand, or by his left side, I cannot say exactly which, a long sword.

Did you observe his person?—I did on coming close to him; we were all crowded close at the time; I took hold of his collar and turned him round, and I observed he was a man of colour.

Where was the other person whom you saw?—The other person was between the foot of the ladder and the manger in the furthest stall; there were three stalls, and this was the stall nearest the ladder.

Did you follow Ruthven up the ladder?—I did, as close as I could venture.

As you were going up the ladder, did you hear any person say any thing from the stable?—I think it was before I got to the step of the ladder, I heard him say something giving notice; the last word was "men," but what the other words were I cannot say, but it was a notice to those above.

When you got into the room above, what did you find there?—Upon gaining the top of the ladder, I observed a number of men falling back behind a carpenter's bench that stood across the room close to the wall.

Did you hear any noise as you went into the room?—As I entered the room, I heard a noise similar to the rattling of swords, like two people fencing almost.

How many men appeared to you to be in the room?—From what I could judge, there appeared to be from twenty to five and twenty, I cannot speak with more certainty.

Did you observe Smithers?—On gaining the top of the ladder, there were four or five of the men, evidently, endeavouring to back into the little room at a distance of four or five feet from the ladder.

There were two rooms opening into the loft?—Yes, this was the further one.

Consequently the one looking into the street?—Yes it was. At the moment I gained the top of the ladder, Ruthven who was before me cried out loud, "we are officers, seize their arms," or "surrender your arms," I cannot be positive which.

This man backing as you say into the room, did you observe Smithers do any thing?—Not just at that moment: previous to that, Thistlewood—

You know Thistlewood?—I knew him the moment I saw him again. I did not know him before, but I am perfectly satisfied that is the man. He held his sword in his hand, and his hand shook at me: he stood in this manner: I held out my staff in my left hand, in this manner [describing it]: I might be then about five or six feet from him, five feet perhaps.

Upon your holding out your staff in that way, what did Thistlewood do?—He still menaced me with his sword; I instantly held up my pistol with my right hand, and desired him to desist, or I would instantly fire.

What happened upon that?—At that moment Smithers had gained the top of the ladder, and he rushed forward to the little room. Thistlewood, and the other men that were with him at that time, got back into the little room some feet, and upon Smithers just getting to the side of the door, as I may be here, Thistlewood rushed forward, and struck him with his sword near to the right breast.

Did Smithers fall upon that?—Upon that I saw Smithers' hands go up in this way, [describing it], and his head went back, and he said, "Oh, my God," and he fell.

He fell into your arms?—No, he staggered against me: upon seeing that, I immediately fired my pistol, but without effect; Smithers staggered against me at the moment I had fired, and fell back past me, more to my left.

He fell dead?—I believe he fell dead: whether he staggered against Ruthven or not I do not know: the last light I saw was the flash of my own pistol; the candles were put out at that moment.

You were forced down the ladder, I believe?—Yes, we were. I went into the door-way, and stood in the door-way for a second or two.

The door way, in Cato-street?—Yes.

Were any shots fired during that time?—Yes, many shots were fired; two or three of which passed me in the door-way.

Were any shots fired from any other part at that time?—I saw one shot fired by a tall man, he stood under the ladder, and fired up towards the manger.

Were any shots fired from the window of the little room?—Yes; while I was standing at the door there were.

Could you judge in what direction they were fired?—They were apparently fired towards the door.

Towards the door of the stable?—Yes.

Upon that did you pursue any body down Cato-street, towards Queen-street?—I heard a cry, and saw a man running with his belt on.

In the direction of Queen-street?—Yes.

John-street is on the left of Cato-street, and Queen-street on the right?—Yes, I pursued and took him about seventy or eighty yards from the stable door.

Who was that man you so pursued and took?—Davidson, the man of colour.

When you secured him had he arms?—He had a carbine, or a short piece of that kind, either slung to him, or in his hand, and in his left hand a long sword.

Do you believe that is the man whom you first saw when you went into the stable?—I do believe that is the man, but I am not positive; I have very little doubt in my own mind that it is the same.

I believe you afterwards assisted in securing some of the persons in the stable?—After delivering him to the custody of another person, I assisted in securing four of them in the loft.

Do you know who the four persons were?—I am not positive as to their persons; I recollect Monument to be one, but I am not positive to the other three.

James Ellis cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

What situation do you hold?—I am a conductor and a constable.

You had the conduct I suppose?—I had the conduct of a part, Mr. Ruthven was the principal officer.

Who had the warrant?—I had the warrant.

William Westcott sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You, I believe, are one of the conductors of the patrol of Bow-street?—I am.

Did you go with the other officers to Cato-street, Edgware-road, on the 23rd of February?—I did.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You are a constable also?—I am.

Mr. Gurney.—I believe at Bow-street you are all constables?—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You are all sworn in as such?—The biggest part of us are.

Mr. Gurney.—Are Ruthven, Smithers, Ellis, and yourself?—Yes.

And Nixon?—Yes.

Did Ruthven, and Ellis, and Smithers, go up the ladder into the loft?—They did.

Did you hear any disturbance going on in the loft; any firing?—Yes.

Did you remain in the stable?—I did.

While the others were going up, or when they were up, did you observe any person in the stable?—I did.

Who was that?—Ings; that is the man [pointing to him].

What did you do?—I took him by the collar.

You and he had a contest I believe?—Yes, we had against the wall.

Whilst you and he were in the contest, did you find the other officers coming down the ladder?—There was a terrible confusion in the loft; he went to put his hand to the right side, as I thought, to get something, and I hit him a blow on the side of his head; as I was getting out my handcuffs, they came down a number of them from the loft.

In what manner?—Some of them tumbling down, and others came down afterwards gently.

Did you observe any one of those whose face you knew?—I did.

Who was that?—Thistlewood.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Was there any light in the stable at that time?—There was.

Mr. Gurney.—Had you officers taken a light?—No, not at that time.

When Thistlewood came down the ladder, what did he do?—He turned round and presented a pistol to my head; I put up my hand in this kind of way to defend myself.

What did he do?—He fired at me.

How near to your head was it the pistol was fired?—Very near; there were three holes made in my hat [showing them]. I went to make a rush, and received a blow on the right side of my head, and I fell with it.

What was that blow from; was it given you by a weapon or a fist?—I do not know; but it beat the hat in.

When you were down, did you observe Thistlewood do any thing?—Yes, he made a cut at me with something like a sword, and went out at the stable door.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Leaving you in the stable?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—Did you attempt to follow him?—Yes; but he was out of sight before I could get at him.

Were you wounded at all?—Yes, in the hand with a ball, when I put up my hand to shield myself, the ball touched my hand and grazed it in this way.

Luke Nixon sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Are you one of the Bow-street officers?—Yes.

Did you go to Cato-street, on the 23rd of February last?—Yes.

When you first got into the stable, what did you see?—There was a ladder just by entering the front of the door, and I saw Ruthven, Ellis, and the deceased, and Gibbs; they went up and I followed them; against I got to the top the lights were all out, and I remained about half a minute or scarcely so much. Just as I got up, I saw Ellis fire a pistol, but I thought it was they had fired at him; it was into the little room he fired it.

As soon as the fire was returned, when Ellis fired the pistol, were you knocked down?—Another pistol or two were fired from this little room, but I could not see; I was only just at the head of the stairs, then there was a rush and I fell backwards, hit my leg against something, cut it about three inches, and my head went against the wall, and cut my hat. I fell down stairs, and then there came a rush of people down, and I think I saw one about two steps from the bottom. I saw him present a pistol towards Westcott.

Who presented that pistol?—I really believe it was Thistlewood: I really believe it was that man that sits down there, he presented it against Westcott; but his side face I could not distinctly see.

At that time had Westcott apprehended any body?—He had got Ings in custody when I went up stairs.

Did Ings get away from him?—He got away from him after they shot at him.

Did you pursue Ings?—Westcott said "Stop that fellow," and I pursued Ings.

Was he brought back again?—Yes; he was taken by Wright and Chapman, I believe; they had got him in custody.

VOL. XXXIII.

Some time afterwards, did you find any thing in the stable?—I went into the stable afterwards, and found a sword.

Any thing else?—Then I went up stairs again into the loft, and I found a bayonet; and then I saw Ruthven hunting about, and I followed him, and he found a bag and opened it, and I saw some balls about this size [producing one], there were a quantity of them, I cannot tell how many.

Did you find any thing besides those?—Afterwards, when I was going down stairs with those combustibles, there was another piece of stuff in a kind of a tin can wrapped round with paper; I shook it; I look upon it, it was seven or eight pounds or more than that.

You delivered it to Ruthven?—I did.

John Wright sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

You are a patrol at Bow-street?—Yes.

Were you one of the party of officers that went to Cato-street on the 23rd of February?—I was.

Where did you muster?—I went to the Horse and Groom, in company with Mr. Ruthven.

While you were in the Horse and Groom, did you see any of the prisoners come in?—Cooper and another came in, and had a pint of porter.

Had Cooper any thing, or did he leave any thing?—He brought in a stick, and left it behind him on the seat.

What sort of a stick was it?—A broomstick or mop handle.

Do you know whether Ruthven has it in his custody?—I saw it in his possession afterwards.

Did you accompany the party to the stable after that?—Yes.

What happened when you got into the stable?—After I had got about three or four stairs we were knocked back again; we were driven back again. I turned round, and observed a man in the further stall.

What sort of a man was he in person?—He had a great coat on; but I should not be able to swear to him.

What sort of a person was he?—A stoutish person.

Did you observe any thing on that man?—I observed he had something shining under his coat; I took it from him and found it to be a sword on one side, and a knife from the other side, a butcher's knife.

Where is that knife?—It is up stairs.

What sort of a handle had it?—A butcher's handle tied round with wax end.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Do you mean to produce the knife?

Mr. Bolland.—Yes, my lord. Did you take that man into custody, or did he escape?—At that moment I was knocked down and received a stab in my right side, and the man escaped.

3 G

Did that disable you from doing any more, or did you recover from it?—I got up and went out of the door, and shortly after the soldiers came down. On their coming down they stopped me; I told them I was an officer. Captain Fitzclarence went into the stable, and there were two persons brought out.

Who were they?—Wilson was one, and Bradburn, who stands on his right-hand side, another.

Did you search the person of Wilson?—I searched Wilson, and found some ball cartridges in his pocket, and I found a haversack on his side, suspended across his shoulders, which hung on the right-hand side of him.

Did you find any thing in that haversack?—There was a ball cartridge there, and a pair of scissors.

How many ball cartridges?—There might be about two dozen.

Did you find any thing else?—A gun flint or two.

William Charles Brooks sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Where were you stationed on the 23rd of February, in the evening?—I just turned into John-street, and was asking a coachman whether he had seen any men;

Never mind that, what passed at that moment?—Mr. Birnie came up to me and said "Run Brooks," and pointed over the way.

What did you see over the way?—I saw the prisoner Ings and a man before him with a cutlass drawn, but it was so dark I could not distinguish whether the other was one of our people or not; I learnt that afterwards.

In consequence of this what did you do?—I saw Ings with a pistol in his hand, presenting it to the other man; I said "you scoundrel," he turned sharp round, and said, "I will shoot you," presenting the pistol; I made a snatch at it, and he fired the pistol.

What is that you have in your hand?—A great coat; the shot passed through the collar of it, through this coat I have on now, and this waistcoat; bruised my shoulder, and went out at the back of my neck; there is a mark of it here [in the back of his neck].

After he had fired the pistol, what did he do?—I staggered into the road a little way, and he came into the road a little way, I suppose, in fear of my partner, and then went off towards the Edgware-road; he was not above ten yards; I pursued him, and just as he turned the corner, a very little way from the corner, two or three yards, he flung the pistol from him. I was never further from him than I am from that gentleman; I called out to stop him, because I thought I was going to fall.

Was he stopped?—Yes, he was, by Moay the watchman; Moay had hold of him about a second before I had.

Did you see Moay lay hold of him?—Yes, I did.

When you came up to him what did Ings say?—I said, "You rascal why did you fire at me, a man you never saw before?" he swore at me, and said, he meant to kill me, and he wished he had done it, as he knew he should be hung.

Ings.—Pray my lord, am I permitted to ask no questions?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You are not upon your trial at present.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Are you sure those you have repeated, are the expressions he made use of?—Yes, I am quite sure.

Ings.—It is false.

Mr. Solicitor General.—After he was taken, was he searched in your presence?—We took him down to Marybone watch-house. I said, "If you offer to put your hand into one of your pockets, I will knock you down," or "knock your brains out;" I did not know but that there might be something in his pocket; he said "You may as well as at another time."

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—This does not refer to the general matter; any thing about him is evidence in confirmation of that.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did you search him?—Yes, he had two haversacks, one slung over his shoulder, and another over his arm.

Had he a great coat over them?—Yes, so as to hide them.

What else did you find?—I found a belt buttoned round him, apparently to hold two pistols on each side.

Two brace?—To hold two pistols on each side; I put my hand into his right-hand pocket and pulled out a tin case nearly full of powder, and a letter belonging to some society: I thought it was the Free-masons' society.

Did you find any thing else?—No, I saw my partner take three slugs out of his other pocket.

Who is your partner?—Champion; and a knife case about that long.

About a foot long?—Nearly that; I took nothing else but a knife and a comb from him; he was confined, and I went back to the stable.

Giles Franklin Moay sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you are a watchman?—Yes.

What was your beat on Wednesday night, the 23rd of February?—In the Edgware-road.

Did you hear the discharge of any fire-arms?—Yes, I did.

Did you afterwards see any men together, one of them running?—When I first heard the firing, I came immediately down towards it.

Down John-street?—No, down Edgware-road, I saw a man immediately come out of John-street, and fire immediately. I cannot say whether a carbine or a pistol; then I saw Brooks stagger; it was very moon-light: then another came and called out stop thief: I took the road and met him.

Did you stop him?—Yes; I struck at him, and he caught my stick in his hand, and then we had a tussle; then I kept him till Brooks came down, and we found some slugs, six or seven, and some powder in a tin box, and a knife, sheath, and a belt, on each side to hold a pistol.

Joseph Champion sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are one of the Bow-street officers?—Yes.

Did you accompany them to Cato-street, on the night of the 23rd of February?—I did.

I will not take you over the whole story; but did you see any person you knew get through the stable and get away?—No, except Ings.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Did you know him before?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—Upon the other officers going up the ladder, did you hear Ings say any thing?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said “look out above there,” as a signal as I thought: he was standing with his back against the wall, just facing the ladder. These are the things I took out of his jacket pocket; this is the case of a knife, four pistol balls, and a key and a pistol.

Where did you take those from him?—In Marybone watch-house.

After the officers were driven down the ladder, did you see any person escaping?—I did not see any persons in the stable; there was a person got down into the rack.

Did you see any person make his escape?—I saw no other person but Thistlewood, that was in Cato-street.

Had he any thing in his hand?—A sword, which he waved once or twice opposite his person, though there was no person opposite to him.

Lieutenant Frederick Fitzclarence sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are a lieutenant in the Coldstream guards?—Yes.

Do you recollect, on the 23rd of February, going with a picquet to John-street?—I do.

You had been desired to attend by Mr. Birnie, the police magistrate?—I had.

About what hour was it when you got to John-street, do you recollect?—I should think near eight, between eight and a quarter past.

Some time after you had been in John-street, did you hear any thing that attracted your attention towards Cato-street?—Directly after I was in John-street, I heard a pistol shot, which appeared to come from Cato-street.

Did you upon that get the picquet to advance towards Cato-street?—I then brought the picquet forward double quick towards Cato-street.

We understand there is an arch over the entrance into Cato-street out of John-street?—Yes.

On entering that archway, what occurred?—I met an officer who halloed out, “soldiers, soldiers, the door way! the stable.” I ran towards the stable, and I was met on my right hand by one man, and on my left by another: the man at the stable door cut at me with a sword, and the one on my left presented something at me; the one in the door-way seeing a body of troops coming on (the picquet) ran into the stable.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Was that the man that cut at you?—Yes, my lord, we exchanged several cuts before he went in.

Mr. Attorney General.—What did the other man do upon that?—I could not see after he had done this, but the moment he presented a pistol, the other man cut at me; there was a scuffle at my right hand: I ran into the stable door.

There was a scuffle between Legg and the men?—I believe there was. I followed the prisoners in; I ran in, and came against somebody inside the stable: he gave himself up, saying, “do not hurt me, do not kill me, and I will tell you all.”

Do you know who that was?—I do not know, it was in the dark.

Was it one of the men that was secured?—Yes, it was; I gave him to some of my men, and ran into the stable.

I believe then you went to the up-stairs room?—No. I then ran up into one of the stalls, and secured another man: the soldiers took him away. I then called to a file of grenadiers, to follow me up the ladder: upon my going up stairs, there was a light appeared gradually coming up from the bottom: when I got up, I secured from three to five.

You do not know the number?—No; I do not know whether it was three, four, or five: I rather think it was four.

It was four, but it is not material?—I went down immediately after having secured them; directly after I got up, I fell against the body of poor Smithers.

He was lying dead?—Yes, close to the top of the ladder.

I believe, also, you saw arms in the loft above?—Several.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, I will not call any of the other soldiers; I do not feel it necessary to trouble your lordship with their evidence.

Samuel Hercules Tawnton sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you are a Bow-street officer?—Yes, I am.

Did you, on the morning of the 24th, go to Brunt's lodgings with a warrant?—Yes, I did.

When you went up stairs, did you first go into the front room, or into the back room?—Into the front room two pair of stairs.

Did you search those rooms?—I did.

I believe you found nothing material there?—No, nothing material.

After you had searched those rooms, did you go into the back room?—Yes.

What did you find there?—I found two rush baskets, one tied up in an apron, and the other not tied up.

Where was Brunt? had you any conversation with him?—He was in the front room while I searched the back room; it was an empty room.

Did you ask him about those baskets?—Yes, he said he knew nothing of them; he did not belong to that room; it was not his apartment.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Did he say he knew nothing of them?—That the room did not belong to him.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did you ask him as to the baskets?—Yes, I brought them in; he said he knew nothing of them.

And he also added that the room did not belong to him?—Yes, he did: there was a pike shaft found in the room, and an iron pot; that was all besides the baskets.

Were there any marks of pitch or tar on the iron pot?—Tar, I believe, there was at the bottom of it.

Did any conversation take place in his presence, as to whom the room belonged to? did the landlady come up?—When I found he denied the apartments, I sent for the landlady.

Mrs. Rogers.—Yes.

Did she come?—She did. I asked her who those apartments belonged to.

In Brunt's presence?—Yes; she said that her niece Eleanor Parker had let them to a man she did not know who, but in the presence of Brunt.

Whatever she said, she said in the presence of Brunt?—Yes.

What did Brunt say as to his knowing any thing of the man who had taken those apartments?—I asked Brunt who this man was? He said he had met him in a public-house.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—When you asked Mrs. Rogers to whom the back room belonged, what answer did she make?—She said she did not know the man; her niece had let it to a man when Brunt was in his company.

Mr. Solicitor General.—What did Brunt say to that?—He did not say any more than I have repeated: that it was a man at a public-house, but he did not know his name, for I asked him his name.

What did he say about a man at a public-house?—That it was a man at a public-house who was along with him, when the lodgings were taken.

Was that the answer he gave when the question was put, who had taken the room?—Yes.

After you had searched this place did you go to Tidd's?—Yes; I did immediately afterwards.

Where was that?—In Hole-in-the-wall passage, No. 5, near Gray's-inn-lane.

When you went to Tidd's, what did you find at Tidd's?—I found a very large box; a box full of ball cartridges.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Do you mean to say a box, or a very large box?—About two-feet long, and a foot and a half wide. I counted the cartridges, and they amounted to 965.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did you find any thing else at Tidd's?—Yes.

What?—Some grenades.

How many?—Ten; and a great quantity of powder.

Of gunpowder?—Yes.

Did you, besides the ball cartridges that you found in the box, find any other ball-cartridges there?—Yes, in a haversack.

How many?—A great many.

Can you tell us about how many?—434 balls in the haversack; 171 ball cartridges; 69 ball cartridges without powder, that is a ball in each cartridge; and about three pounds of gunpowder in a paper.

There was a coarse canvas cloth. Did you find any thing in that?—Ten grenades and eleven bags of powder.

Are those the same grenades you have just spoken of?—Yes.

What were the ten grenades in?—In a brown wrapper which was tied up; ten grenades and eleven bags of powder, one pound each.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—What sort of bags were those?—Flannel bags.

Were there any of the same description of bags that were empty?—There were ten flannel bags empty.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Were there any balls?—There was a small bag with a powder flask and 68 balls.

Musket balls?—Yes; 4 flints, and 27 pike handles.

Are all those things here?—They are all here.

You told us you took the two baskets you found at Brunt's?—Yes.

You afterwards, I presume, searched the baskets?—Yes.

Tell us what were the contents of those baskets?—Nine papers, I believe I mentioned before, with rope yarn and tar, and some steel filings. In another basket there were four grenades, three papers with rope yarn and tar, two bags of powder of one pound each.

The same description of bags as those you have just spoken of?—Yes, flannel bags, and five flannel bags empty, one paper with some powder in, one leather bag with 63 balls in it; that is all that was in the basket; there were also one iron pot and one pike handle.

These you took into your custody, and they are there?—They are.

Samuel Hercules Taunton cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

When was it you found all those things?—The 24th of February.

Was Brunt present when you found those things?—Yes, he was.

As to those found at Tidd's, Tidd had been away from the day before?—Yes.

Samuel Hercules Taunton re-examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

What time was it when you went to Tidd's?—I went to his lodgings after I had been to Brunt's, I believe it was about half after eight o'clock.

Daniel Bishop sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are an officer at Bow-street?—I am.

On the morning of Thursday, the 24th of February, did you, with other officers, go to apprehend Thistlewood?—I did, to No. 8, White-street, Little-Moorfields.

About what time?—Between ten and eleven in the morning.

What was the name of the person who lived in the house?—Harris.

After searching different rooms in the house, did you get a key and open the door of a room on the ground-floor?—I received a key from Mrs. Harris.

You had searched the up-stairs rooms first?—Yes.

Did you at last receive a key from Mrs. Harris, and open the door?—I opened the door facing Mrs. Harris's room on the ground-floor.

Upon opening the door, whom did you see in the room?—I saw Thistlewood put his head from under the clothes, he was in bed, the shutters were shut, but there were some small holes which admitted light enough for me to see who it was.

What did you do?—I had a pistol in one hand, and a staff in another; I told him my name was Bishop, of Bow-street, I had a warrant against him, and I threw myself on the bed.

What did he say?—Thistlewood said, "I shall make no resistance."

Did you afterwards search any of his clothes?—With the assistance of my brother officer, we searched him; he had then his breeches and stockings on in bed.

Were his coat and waistcoat lying by the bed side?—They were.

Did you search the waistcoat pocket?—Yes, I did.

What did you find in it?—I found three leaden balls, two flints, one ball cartridge, and one blank cartridge, likewise a small silk sash.

Did you find any thing in his coat pocket?—I saw Lavender take from his coat pocket a black cloth belt, with a place to put pistols and a sword in, in conveying the prisoner in the coach,

Mr. Gurney.—We need not go into that.

Daniel Bishop cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

Did Edwards go with you?—I do not think either of them did; we have several of that name at Bow-street.

I do not mean one of your officers, but another man of the name of Edwards?—I do not know any other.

You went in consequence of information?—Yes, which I received not ten minutes before; I did not know of it ten minutes before.

Did your informant go with you?—No, he did not; or I should not have gone to the other rooms first.

Stephen Lavender sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Produce the belt you found in Thistlewood's pocket? [The witness produced the same.]

There are places for two pistols?—Yes, there are. [George Thomas Joseph Ruthven, produced various articles.]

Mr. Solicitor General.—First produce these found at Cato-street?—This is the mop-stick that was left at the public-house [producing it], that is the belt taken off of Tidd [producing it], these are two of the swords I found in the room.

In what room?—The loft in Cato-street; this is the large grenade found in Cato-street, which was given to me by Nixon.

Mr. Solicitor General.—The arms till within the last twenty-four hours were loaded, the greater part of them?—They were unloaded yesterday.

Were they loaded with ball?—They were, and this is one of the hand-grenades; there were ten of them, one has been since taken away by order of colonel Congreve.

A Juryman [Mr. Goodchild].—It will be necessary, perhaps, my lord, to have one of those opened, as it is stated they contain powder?

Mr. Solicitor General.—One of them has been opened, gentlemen, and you will have evidence before you of what it contained.

Ruthven.—This is the string Bradburn had tied round him; these are two candlesticks; these are the six ball cartridges Bradburn had in his pocket.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—If you could keep by themselves the things found in Cato-street, it would be convenient. [The witness handed in several pistols, swords, and a knife.]

Mr. Solicitor General.—From whom was that knife taken?

Wright.—I took it from the stout man in the stable.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—I wish we could have put together the things that were found in the loft in Cato-street.

Rathven.—There is a rope ladder that was found in the loft.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Were there any more things in Cato-street?—Not that I am aware of; the soldiers had some.

Have you those which the soldiers had?—The soldiers had them themselves; they marked them, and will produce them, themselves.

Mr. Solicitor General.—It is not necessary for us to examine the soldiers; my learned friends do not desire that; take them from the soldiers.

Witness.—This is the pistol fired at serjeant Legg.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Then that is not found in the loft?—No, my lord.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was any thing more found in the loft?—Yes; these pikes and a pistol [producing them].

Where was this blunderbuss found?—In the loft.

Where were those pikes found?—In the loft.

Have you counted how many there are of them?—I have not in that parcel; there are six in one parcel.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Some of them are bayonets, and some are sharpened files; about one-third are files, and the rest are bayonets; the jury will have the kindness to look at the handles; there is a screw apparently made to screw into poles?

Witness.—This is the ball and powder taken out of the arms; this was taken in the loft [handing in a musket], these were taken in the loft [handing in a bayonet, another pikehead, half a dozen more pike heads, two pistols and swords].

Was this sword taken in the loft?—Yes, it was, and here is a belt formed for the purpose; that small pistol was found under a ladder in the stable.

Was that carbine found in the loft?—I am not quite sure as to that.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—It is not very material in the production of them, whether they were found in the loft or taken from the persons of the prisoners, in the loft.

Witness.—They were all taken in Cato-street.

Mr. Solicitor General.—You have given me what were found in the loft; will you give me all the things that were found in Cato-street, whether in the loft or on the persons of the prisoners?—Those pike staves were found in the loft over the stable; but Flannagan can speak to them. [One of the pikes was screwed into a handle.] That [a blunderbuss] was found in the stable.

Produce any that were found on the persons of the prisoners?—A small blunderbuss and a sword were found on Davidson.

And any thing more?—Not upon him; these were found and brought to the office, having been taken in the premises of a person of the name of George, who was apprehended [handing in a musket and other arms].

We have nothing to do with them; take them away.

This is the one that Muddock took from Wilson, that he fired at him as he went in.

[Three or four more pistols handed in.]

Will the soldiers, each, recognize those they took?—Yes.

From whom were those belts and bag taken?—Davidson; those two bags were taken from Ings, and that belt and the case containing some powder.

Now give us the knife? [It was produced.]

The handle of that is covered over with wax-end?—It is. This bag [producing it] was taken from Wilson, and that sword from Wilson. I beg pardon, the knife and the sword were taken from a man that got away that he cannot identify, the bag was taken from Wilson.

You have now produced all that was taken in Cato-street?—Yes, I have.

Now produce what was taken at Brunt's lodgings? [The witness produced two baskets and an iron pot, and took the articles out of one of the baskets.] That leather bag contains balls.

That is one of the flannel bags filled with powder?—Yes.

They are all about the same size?—They are much about; there is another one filled, and this empty.

Show some of the fire balls?—This is one, made of tow dipped in tar [producing it].

Show one the grenades?—This is one [producing it].

They are the same as the grenades taken at Cato-street?—Yes. Here is another basket not done up in a handkerchief, which seems to contain the same sort of things; these are all of a sort [producing them].

Fire balls?—Yes.

That is the iron pot of which you made mention?—Yes.

Is there any appearance of pitch and tar having been boiled in it?—Yes, there is.

Now produce those that were taken at Tidd's lodgings?

Tamton [producing them].—Here are 965 ball cartridges.

The box is quite full?—It is; there are five in each of these parcels.

They are done up in little parcels?—Yes; all in fives, with a ball in every one.

What is in that bag?

Rathven.—Those are the grenades.

Mr. Solicitor General (To Tamton.)—You examined that?—Yes; here are the bags, containing each a pound of gunpowder.

A Jurymen (Mr. Goodchild.)—You have weighed them?—I have.

Mr. Solicitor General.—That is all, I believe?—There are two dozen more of these [pike shafts].

That were taken at Tidd's?—Yes.

Are they of the same sort as those upon the table?—Exactly the same.

They appeared to have been recently cut?—Yes.

John Hector Morison called again.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

Look at that sword, do you know that?—Yes.

Is that the sword which you sharpened for Ings?—Yes, the first one.

Are you quite sure of that?—Yes; there is a mark on the blade by which I know it.

Serjeant Edward Hanson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you a serjeant in the Royal Artillery?—Yes.

Have you examined one of those grenades produced to you at Bow-street?—I have.

How is it composed?—The bottom of it is a tin case about three inches long, and then, projecting about a quarter of an inch, there is a tin tube brazed in. You see the outside of it with composition to fire off the powder.

This tin is a kind of carcass?—Yes; it contained three ounces and a half of gunpowder.

What is the priming in the tube?—It is a composition saltpetre, as far as I can ascertain, powder and brimstone.

Over the tin what is there?—It is pitched just at the end of the tin.

What is wrapped over it?—Rope-yarn entirely round it.

Is there any thing fastened in the rope-yarn?—Next to the tin there is a body of oakum about an inch thick, and it is cemented then with tar and rosin mixed up together to make it fast. It is very fast, and will not peel off.

Do you then find any pieces of iron?—There were twelve pieces of iron planted round one that I opened, in different directions regularly round.

What time would it take from the lighting of the fuse before the grenade would explode?—I cannot exactly say; I suppose about twenty or thirty seconds: the tube was something better than three inches:

In about half a minute?—Or scarcely so much.

If one of them were to explode in a room where there were a number of persons, what would be the consequence?—It would do a great deal of damage; it would be very destructive.

Those pieces of iron would fly about?—Yes.

Like so many bullets?—Yes.

Take that into your hands: does it appear to you to be similar to the one you opened?—Yes, the very model.

Take your knife and open that.—It will take a long while to open it.

A Jurymen (Mr. Aldersey).—The jury wish to have it opened.

Mr. Attorney General.—By all means, gentlemen. [One was taken to pieces in the presence of the Jury.]

Mr. Gurney.—What are those you have come to now?—Fire nails, cart nails.

A Jurymen (Mr. Aldersey).—It is what fastens on the tire of the cart wheels: some appear to be old and some new.

Witness.—This is an old black stocking.

Mr. Gurney.—All that tightness renders it the more effectual?—Yes, here is another stocking, and then we come to the tin, the carcass [the witness opened the tin case]. Here is the powder in it, and it is very good too.

A Jurymen (Mr. Aldersey).—Do you consider that good gunpowder by its granulations?—Yes, it is very good.

Mr. Gurney.—Take into your hand one of those we call fire-balls; have you examined them also?—Yes, I have.

What appears to be the composition of them?—It is oakum, tar, and stone-brimstone pounded; may be there is rosin.

A Jurymen (Mr. Aldersey).—There is no killicrankie and refuse of the rosin, is there?—Yes, there is.

Mr. Gurney.—If one of them was lighted, and thrown into a barrack or a building; would it set it on fire?—Yes, it would be sure to set it on fire: nothing could put it out as long as there was any of it left.

How long would it burn?—Three or four minutes.

It would set wood on fire?—Oh yes; if it fell on wood it would set it on fire.

And if it fell on straw, it would set that on fire more easily?—Certainly.

Mr. Attorney General.—That, my lord, is the case on the part of the Crown.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—Had it been permitted to me, consistently with my own sense of moral and professional duty, to have declined the arduous task which is now before me, I had not stood here to address you upon the present momentous occasion. But, perhaps it is one of the brightest attributes of our profession, and which we the members of that profession think redounds to our greatest credit, that we are not at liberty to refuse our assistance to persons in the situation of the unfortunate man at the bar. No man can feel more deeply impressed than I do, with a sense of the very great weight of the arduous task I have to perform. I feel that the unfortunate prisoner has a right to demand from me to do my duty, boldly and fearlessly, unawed by any consideration of the power of government, who are his prosecutors, and unseduced by the allurement of hope in conciliating their favour. I feel also that I have a sacred duty to discharge to my country, which is, to render my best assistance to the prisoner in the administration of the law, as relating to his case, and not—if I had even power or ingenuity enough to effect it—to attempt to pervert that law, or to defeat the purposes of justice. I also feel that I owe this to my own fair fame, which was my only inheritance, and is my best possession.

With those feelings pressing me down so as almost to unnerve me, I hope I may say that I look for assistance with humble confidence to that Power, which, however men may disregard in the times of prosperity or of levity, yet, in distress and in difficulty, and in the moments of trial, we all look to for consolation and support.

It is fit that upon an occasion of this sort, you should know something of the man who addresses you. And although I readily admit that for a man to speak publicly of himself is usually an arrogant vanity, yet, as I am anxious that those arguments which I may address to you, should at least have all the weight that they may intrinsically deserve, I am desirous you should know that I have no bias on my mind to impel me aside from the even path of my duty. For it is not to be denied, that this unfortunate transaction arises out of a state of things in our country, which we must all lament and deplore; and it is equally true, that men will have prejudices on certain points connected with this prosecution, it having relation to certain political transactions, upon which various and opposing feelings are widely diffused. For myself, though I cannot deny as an Englishman that I have feelings on certain points of government, yet I never enrolled myself with any political party. I never attended public political meetings in my life, so that I stand unwarped by party spirit. I am equally as free from bias on the other hand, for, with respect to government, I never received either in or out of my profession the slightest favour, and none have I reason to hope for or expect, so that, looking into my own breast, I have no motive there to influence me but that of doing my duty, and that I will endeavour fairly and honestly to perform.

The weight of this duty both to my learned friend and myself is not a little increased by the lateness of the moment at which we were called upon to execute it. Not until Thursday night was it that I received instructions in this case, or knew that I was to be called upon to defend the prisoner. In that short interval, I have had to prepare myself to meet the first talents at the bar, long and sedulously employed in considering and maturely adjusting every debateable point, aided with all the support that the wealth, the power, and the influence of government can give them: while, on the contrary, I have had scarcely a day's notice to argue before you whatever might arise out of this very important case.

With the attentive ear which (as it was my duty to do) I gave to Mr. Attorney-general in opening this case, I could not fail to observe, with some degree of surprise, that he did not state to you precisely what were the points you were called upon to decide. He indeed stated to you that this was a prosecution for high treason; but he gave you no precise statement of the exact issues you were to try. He dwelt much on that which I must and do admit, constituted great moral guilt on the part of the prisoner at the bar; but he did not state to you precisely what was the guilt he imputed to him by the present indictment. Now, there is unfortunately mixed up with this transaction a great deal which must necessarily make a deep impression on your minds;—there is a great deal of guilt, but take this with you at the same time, that there are other indictments upon which that guilt will probably be tried; and whatever your opinion may be of the moral guilt of the prisoner at the bar, if you, upon a review of the evidence, shall not be of opinion that he has committed the precise offence charged in this indictment, whatever your feeling of his moral guilt may be, it will be your bounded duty upon this indictment to pronounce a verdict of acquittal. It therefore has become my duty to state to you the precise issues which you have to try. It is not merely a question of high treason, but it is a question of a particular species of treason. And although the indictment was very long, and contained a statement of a great many facts, which in the language of the law are called overt acts, you are to understand they are only set forth as evidences to prove that simple fact in which the treason consists. They are given to you, to induce you to be satisfied of that short statement of guilt of which the substantive treason consists. The treason charged in this indictment, or rather the substantive treasons, are four. The first and third are upon a statute of the 36th year of the late king, for conspiring to depose his majesty from his imperial style and dignity. I do not know whether I use the precise language of the act of parliament, but in substance it is conspiring to depose his majesty. Second, for compassing and imagining the death of the king. Third, conspiring to levy war. Fourth, actual levying war. Two of these—compassing the death of the king, and the actual levying war, are treasons by the statute of Ed. III. The other two—conspiring to levy war, and depose his majesty, are made treason by the act of his late majesty's reign.

For now about four hundred years, Englishmen have always held in reverence, as a protection of their dearest rights, the statute of treasons of Edward the Third. There, among other treasons, it is stated that, whoever shall compass and imagine—to use the language of the statute—that is, contrive or intend—the death of the king, and by any overt or open act shall shew he had such intention, such inten-son, proved by some open deed, shall be considered as treason: and by that statute also, actual levying of war against his majesty is declared a treason. There have at times, in subsequent unhappy or turbulent reigns, started up a variety of statutes creative of new treasons, which have always withered away in the good times of our constitution. There is, however, one other statute now existing, which makes not merely the compassing of the death of the king treason, but the conspiring to depose him from his state and dignity, and the conspiring to levy war against his majesty. These, therefore, are the four distinct questions you have to try.—First: Has the person at the bar compassed or imagined the death of the king? Secondly: Has he conspired to depose him from his imperial state and dignity? Thirdly: Has he conspired to levy war against the king? Or, fourthly: Has he actually levied war against the king? And on those points or one of them, you must be satisfied in the affirmative, before you can find a verdict against the prisoner at the bar.

Before I proceed to comment upon the probability of the evidence, and the credit which you will give to it, I would beg leave to call your attention to the course which has been pursued by the learned counsel for the Crown. The great mass of their evidence, if taken to be perfectly true, appears to me to go to the fact that there was a conspiracy to destroy his majesty's ministers. And it seems to me that my learned friend the Attorney-general relies upon that fact, as sufficient evidence to prove one or other of these substantive treasons. It strikes me, however, on the contrary, that you may believe the whole of that statement, and still that it may not be evidence of any one of the substantive treasons charged in this indictment. It does not follow as a matter of course, that the removing the administration of the king is to be followed by either the death or the deposition of the monarch. Let us go by steps. There is continually in parliament a party, I may venture to affirm, who think that the existing administration of the day is not a good one. When I say the administration of the day, I do not mean to apply that observation to the ministers of the present day exclusively, for I will do them the justice to say, that every administration that has preceded them have always found a party that have thought them a bad one; and every administration which shall follow them, will no doubt find a party to think them equally bad. It is clear, however, that there is continually in the parliament itself a party endeavouring to remove the existing administration, and I will give them full credit for believing that it is from a conviction that if they were removed another would be found whose services would be more beneficial to the country. It follows, therefore, that the mere removal of the administration of the day is not considered as necessarily involving either the death or the deposition of the monarch; and the persons so desiring will not necessarily be involved in the crime of high treason. If the mere removal of the administration is not attended with those consequences does it the more follow, because that removal is to be effected by force or with violence? Men who are desperate, if they cannot accomplish that which they desire by fair means, sometimes resort to foul: I do not mean for a moment to palliate the guilt of assassination, but I contend that you are not to take it as a necessary consequence, that the removal, nay the death or destruction of the whole administration, involves in itself necessarily either the death or the deposition of the king. If you should be of opinion, that the assassination of ministers, horrid as it is, does not necessarily involve that consequence, then, I contend, the evidence given upon this occasion does not support the two first substantive treasons laid in this indictment.

There are two other treasons alleged in this indictment: the one is, conspiring to levy war against his majesty in his realm, and the other is the actually levying war. Now see whether the evidence affords you satisfactory proof either that there was a conspiracy to levy war, or that the act done amounted to an actual levying of war. In the detail which has been given of this transaction, more particularly the very long detail by the first witness Adams, and who in fact proved the whole case, my learned friend the Attorney-general found there was so much ridicule in his statements, or rather so much to be ridiculed in the transaction he related, that he felt the observations necessarily arising upon that man's tale would throw discredit upon the whole of his testimony, particularly when coupled with the infamy of his character. To obviate this, he said, I am obliged to call an accomplice, and by the law an accomplice is a competent witness; if an accomplice could not be called, there would be impunity for conspiracies, and all secret crimes. I never meant to deny that position of law, as stated by the learned Attorney-general, but I say the evidence of an accomplice always has been, and always must be, received with the greatest caution and jealousy; and if that caution and jealousy is to be applied in any case, it is more particularly to be applied in a case of high treason, where the law itself has thrown the strongest guard round the subject, and by positive enactment declared that he shall never be found guilty but on the oaths of two credible witnesses.

A very able writer, baron Montesquieu, has said, that where the laws of treason are undefined, there can be no liberty: tyranny must of necessity be the result. And that observation is equally true, if, where the laws of treason are well defined, juries do not most righteously and strenuously support that definition. You cannot do that if you suffer any feelings of moral guilt to influence your minds, to pronounce a verdict because you may think men guilty of very enormous offences, unless you also think them guilty of that precise specific crime with which they are charged.

In treasons such as here charged, an accomplice, says the learned Attorney General, is a necessary witness. It may be so, but though he is a necessary witness, he is not of necessity to be believed in all he says. The more atrocious the guilt in which he steeps himself, the less worthy is he of credit; and if a most atrociously wicked witness were to come forward to tell you a tale, not only improbable, but ridiculous in itself, I think you would act most unwisely, indeed, if, upon such an absurd tale told by such a witness, you were to take away the life of man; nay, you would be hardly warranted in plucking a feather from a sparrow's wing. I know it is no uncommon thing, that those who lend themselves to crime betray their companions in guilt, but there is something so odious in all treachery, that he who betrays associates even in guilt is regarded with an additional degree of abhorrence, and the mind recoils from him as a being unworthy of any credit, as one who, to public crime, adds the last sacrifice of breach of private confidence. And you will invariably find that the man who becomes the informer is the most worthless of the whole band: for bad as his companions may be, still there is some principle of honour, there are some remains of social duty, which keep them true to each other; but the last dregs of honour and feeling are drained from the heart of that man who adds to their common crime the infamy of becoming the seducer and betrayer of his companions. Hence it is, that, anxious to gratify his employers with important intelligence, all the design that he represents as originating from others, he himself is the man to seduce them into; and every one of his own base propositions he carries to his employers as the settled resolves of his companions. Although I am sorry to say I have not ample evidence, in this case, of the conduct of the spy, and informer, yet I do not know that I shall not be able to prove in evidence to you, that the man who was the informer of government, instead of giving information of that which the other men had been doing, was himself the man to goad and incite the unhappy prisoner to every act of violence and outrage: that when he (the witness) made a wild proposition which was rejected, that proposition he carried to his employers, not as a rejected proposition of his own, but as an adopted measure of his comrades, and of which he was merely the informant. Gentlemen, let no such man's evidence be trusted.

Now, bearing these observations in your mind, view the evidence as given by Adams to support the fact of a conspiracy to levy war: lay out of your consideration, for the moment, all that which relates solely to the assassination of his majesty's ministers; and consider the evidence as given by him, in support of the substantive allegation of treason, that being a conspiracy to levy war against his majesty in his realm. You have, to garnish the case lying before you, an affected display of rusty sabres, broken pistols, and a great many other things. You see the arms which lie before you, but recollect the purpose to which you are required to believe they were to be applied. Here is the whole arsenal of the conspirators: with this they were to do—what? to overthrow a mighty empire. You have here all the preparations: all the materials of the war are before you: and now, what is the statement of this man? As to the plan of operations to be pursued by these formidable conspirators, he says, that he attended various meetings from the 4th of February, I think, once and twice a day down to the 23rd of that month (one or two meetings more or less will not be material), in which was frequently debated the assassination of his majesty's ministers, and the destruction of the government. I was led to make the same inquiry upon the cross-examination, which was made, it appears, by one of their own body (Palin), and who seemed to me to speak with some degree of sense. He is represented as saying to them, "you have many great objects in view, but where are the men to come from?"—At one and the same time, his majesty's ministers were to be assassinated!—a detachment were to go and take possession of two cannon in Gray's-inn-lane! another detachment were to take possession of six cannon in the Artillery ground!—all the out-ports were to be taken possession of! Brighton was more particularly to be secured by a force!—the Mansion-house was to be taken as the seat of provisional government!—And what is the force to do all this?—An army that, counted to the utmost expectation, was forty men!—an arsenal of a few old sabres, pikes, and pistols!—an exchequer of six shillings and a reputed one-pound note! Who were the men to manage this machinery? with the exception of one (Thistlewood) a parcel of mechanics of the lowest orders in society! These were the men, and these were the means, to "twist this rooted empire from its base"—To depose a king living in the hearts, and guarded by millions of faithful subjects—To destroy a government protected by myriads of bayonets—To exhaust a treasury into which is flowing, not only the wealth of Britain, but the treasures of the East—This is a plan which you are required to believe was debated and adopted by men not declared lunatics. When an infamous witness tells you so incredible a story, can you or dare you take away the life of a man upon such testimony? If it were possible for you to do so, I should not hesitate to say, that I must believe your understandings as bewildered as is imputed to the prisoner at the bar and his associates.

Now, as to the other point, that of actual levying of war. With respect to levying of war, it is clear that every resistance of the civil power, or of the military power of the Crown is not a levying of war: what should be said to be a war or not I hardly know how to define. I had rather read it from the language of a very eminent writer: he says, that "it is a question of fact to be determined by a jury." Lord Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, speaking of this particular treason, says, "What shall be said to be a levying of war is a question of fact; for it is not every riotous or unlawful assembly of many persons to do an unlawful act, though, de facto, they commit the act they intend, that makes a levying of war, for then every riot would be treason, and all the acts against riotous and unlawful assemblies, as 13th Henry 4th cap. 7.: 2nd. Henry 5th cap. 8.: 8th. Henry 6th cap. 14., and many more had been vain and needless, but it must be such an assembly as carries with it speciem belli, the appearance of war." Now, did this assembly carry with it speciem belli, or the appearance of war? He goes on, "as if they ride or march verillis explicatis, with unfurled banners" (is this marching to attack the king's troops with unfurled banners?) "or if they be formed into companies or furnished with military officers," were these formed into companies, or furnished with military officers? The only military man among them appears to have been a disbanded soldier, and the only purpose to which he was to be applied was, to be the destruction of his majesty's ministers, which, I contend, was not a levying of war. Then he says, "or if they are armed with military weapons, as swords, guns, bills, halberds, pikes, and are so circumstanced that it may be reasonably concluded they are in a posture of war, which circumstances are so various, that it is hard to define them all particularly." Then, if it be hard to define all the circumstances of levying war, particularly being a matter of fact, can your own good sound understanding infer it from the facts in evidence before you? If you had been told a war had been levied against his majesty in this country, and the transactions in Cato-street had been narrated, would not you have treated the thing as absurd and ridiculous? Where is the war? in a little back court! Where was the battle fought? in a stable! Where were the traitors encamped? in a hay-loft! How were the traitors armed? with a few rusty swords, and broken implements of war. Putting it to your own common sense and understanding, can you upon your oaths say, that the prisoner at the bar is guilty of actually levying war against the king? You find that, in many of their meetings, these men who were levying war, as it is called, were afraid of the approach of the parish constables; that at one meeting in particular Thistlewood looked towards the door, and spoke low when he spoke of the west end job, as dreading the presence of the civil officer: on which one more bold than himself said, "we do not care for the traps," that is, for the parish constables, not for the king's troops: so that it is evident that these men were kept in awe by the dread of the mere civil force of the country.

If there is no levying of war, is there a conspiracy to effect that purpose? The only evidence you have of any such conspiracy comes out of the mouths of those three witnesses who are all implicated in guilt, and who, I say, are so far contaminated that they are not to be credited, because they all confess themselves guilty of a participation in a most horrid transaction, namely, a projected assassination of his majesty's ministers; the only evidence that relates to levying war comes out of their mouths, and even as they give the transaction, it is very doubtful whether any thing can be raised that might be considered as evincing an intent of levying war against the king, except indeed the proclamation which one of the witnesses says Thistlewood had penned. Why, if such a proclamation had been existing—if it had been to be found any where but in the wicked imagination of that witness, do you think it would not have been produced?—Would not the spy of government have secured a copy to confirm his tale? But what proclamation is it? Mark the absurdity of this supposed proclamation! "Your tyrants are destroyed; the friends of liberty are called upon to come forward; the provisional government is now sitting.—James Ings, secretary."—You are to take it upon the word of that man (Adams) that such a proclamation was framed. Do you suppose that Thistlewood is a man so absurd, that if he had entertained the designs they impute to him, he could have penned a proclamation of this sort? No, gentlemen, this witness some how or other thought it necessary to have a piece of evidence of that sort to support his absurd tale of consultations to levy war against the government; and this was the best piece of evidence that his stultified imagination could produce.—A provisional government!—Who was at the head of it?—Nobody! Who are the officers under it?—Nobody! How is it to be managed?—No one can tell! Where is the provisional government sitting?—You are left to find that out. All which the world is told is—that Mr. Ings, the pork-butcher, is the secretary of the new provisional government. Gentlemen, common sense must guide you in your deliberations upon these matters. You will not lay aside your knowledge of mankind, and believe a story entirely because it is sworn—still less will you believe it when it comes from such contaminated sources. You will apply your knowledge of life and human affairs, and if the story be told you, nay if it be sworn by a credible witness, if it is beyond all human credibility, you will spurn it with contempt, as a base design to impose upon your understandings, and mislead your better judgments. Does this absurd tale derive any additional credit from the ostentatious parade and display of rusty muskets, and broken sabres, and pike heads, and gunpowder? Why, notwithstanding this formidable materiel of war thus spread out to appal you, I will undertake to say, that there is not a populous alley in the city of London, that would not have furnished arms and men, that would have defeated the whole of this gang of conspirators, at least the whole that we have heard of in evidence, and terminated this dreaded civil war in less than half an hour. Then can you seriously believe that it was intended by these men to levy war against his majesty's government—whatever their intentions might have been against his majesty's ministers.

The subject resolves itself, at last, into these few short points. You will consider first, even should you suppose it to be true, that the assassination of his majesty's ministers was intended, whether that event of necessity implies that his majesty was also to be deposed, or put to death? If you do not think it follows of necessity (and there is not from the beginning to the end of this evidence a single word which points distinctly at the royal personage or his family, except I think that Thistlewood is stated once to have said, that the present family have reigned long enough; with the exception of this short piece of evidence, there is not one single word that has a hostile aspect to the royal family), whatever may be your feeling with respect to the projected assassination, if you think it does not necessarily involve the other point of the deposition of the king—however greatly you may abhor the men who could cherish so horrid a purpose in their minds, you ought not to find them guilty of treason, upon those two first counts, which charge their intent to be the death and deposition of the king. And if you think the story of the accomplice too ridiculous to be believed, or himself too infamous to merit credit at your hands, when he relates the supposed conspiracy to levy war, you must also find them not guilty upon the count which charges them with that substantive treason. And if, with respect to the remaining charge of actually levying war itself, you think that too absurd to be entertained for a moment, then you must acquit them of that also.

I do not know that I can say more, and I will not waste your time, and my own strength, already sufficiently exhausted, by two long days close attendance to the evidence of this unparalleled case, by using words unnecessarily; but let me implore you to do your duty strictly, according to the rigid rule of law: consider what is the law of the land, and step not aside either to the right hand or to the left; but mark only the issues and the treasons you have to try. I implore you to do it, not only for your own sakes, but for the sake of our common country; for, if ever juries suffer feelings of indignation to warp their opinions, and to induce them to find men guilty of charges which are not proved, because they feel or think them guilty of other charges which are not before them, there will be no safety hereafter for the life of man. If this prisoner has been guilty of other offences, there are other indictments against him upon which he must answer for those offences, and should the facts be there proved against him, the consequence will be, that he must suffer the penalty of his crime; but on this occasion do not find him guilty of high treason, because you may think him worthy of death for another deed. No, not even though that deed may be a plan of murder and assassination.

Mr. Gurney.—It is usual to state the sort of evidence which is intended to be called, that it may be seen whether it is receivable.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—That is the usual practice certainly.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen, I meant to state that I should call a witness to show the little credit due to these witnesses, who will state that a great many of the instruments and weapons now lying before you, were brought to the dépôt by Adams, the accomplice, who is called, and by Edwards, the accomplice, who is not called: that on the 23rd of February they were taken away by them, and afterwards brought back again by a boy from them, and placed where found. The inference I draw from this fact is, that it is a confirmation of what I stated to you before, that these men who are now the accusers, were themselves the fabricators of the plot, and these arms were so placed by them to confirm their intended testimony.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PRISONER.

Mary Barker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Are you a daughter of either of the prisoners at the bar?—Of Richard Tidd.

Did you live with your father?—Yes.

Do you remember at any time the police officers coming and finding any boxes and things there?—Yes.

What day was that?—On the 24th of February.

At what time in the morning did the officers come?—About half-past eight I suppose.

How long, at that time, had those things been in the house before the officers came?—About a quarter of an hour.

What did they take away?—I am sure I cannot say: I was in such a situation I cannot speak to it.

Was there a box?—Yes; there was.

What was in it?—I cannot say.

Did they take some things like these? [pike staves.]—Yes.

How long had they been in the house?—They were brought there that morning.

Do you know who it was that brought them?—No.

Was it any person in your father's employ, or that you knew of as being employed by him?—No.

He had been taken into custody, we understand, the night before?—Yes.

Had you seen him since he went out the night before?—No.

Do you know a person of the name of Adams?
—Yes.

Had you seen him at any time before at your father's?—Yes.

Do you know a person of the name of Edwards?—Yes.

Had you seen him there?—Yes.

Had Edwards been there before your father was taken up?—Yes.

Had he been there seldom or often?—Often.

If I understand you rightly, those things that were taken away by the officers, had not been in the house above half an hour, before they came and took them?—No.

Had you seen them there before the day when the officers came?—Yes; I had seen similar things before.

To the best observation you could make upon them, do you believe them to be the same things or different?—The same, I think.

Who took those things, which you say you think were the same, away?—Edwards took a part.

Who the other part?—I do not know.

When was it that Edwards took that part away?—On the Wednesday.

You say some other person took the others away?—Yes.

Did your father take any of them away?—No.

Who took the other part away?—I do not know.

What part did Edwards take, the box or the staves?—He did not take away any box.

The box was not taken?—No.

What was taken?—Some things that I have understood since were grenades, and likewise some powder.

Was the box there all the time?—No; the box was brought a day or two before the time my father was taken.

Do you know who brought that?—No.

Was it brought in the state in which it afterwards remained?—Yes, it never was uncorded.

You do not know who brought it?—No.

You have talked of things called grenades; were there any larger than others?—There was one larger than the others.

Who brought that?—Adams.

What was Edwards, do you know?—No; I did not know at the time he used to come to my father's; I have heard since he was a modeller.

Mr. Attorney General.—I have nothing to ask you.

Edward Huckleston sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Curwood.

Do you know a man of the name of Dwyer?—Yes.

Have you seen him here to-day?—No, I have not, for I have not long come.

How long have you known Dwyer?—For some years.

Have you known him intimately?—I have known him intimately, by using the same public-house as he does, and a few friends.

Do you know enough to say, whether he is fit to be believed upon his oath?—No; I do not think he is fit to be taken upon his oath.

Edward Huckleston cross-examined by
Mr. Attorney General.

You have known him by meeting him at the public-house?—Yes, at the public-house where I have supped.

That is your only knowledge of him?—I have seen him with a great deal of money; knowing that he seldom or ever did any work; he was a bricklayer's labourer, and seeing him always hulking about, and with such a quantity of money, I wanted to know how he came by it; I said I was poor, and he asked whether I had not got any money, and he told me if I would go with him he would put me in possession of many a bright pound. I went with him to Hyde-park, and he told me to keep within hearing, and he would soon shew me how he could go on, that he would watch a gentleman out, and to catch hold of him, and that he would say he was an unnatural gentleman, and that then I was to come up as an officer, and draw him towards a watch-house, but not to take him to a watch-house; I was struck with the idea, and shunned his company.

When was this?—About three months ago; and he has said he got seventy pounds at a time, by doing so, and he jawed me as being a coward: the next night I met with him, but I did not wish to have any thing to do with it; he said that he got 70*l*. of one gentleman in Saint James's-street, by only catching hold of him by the collar.

Where did you meet with him the next night?—At the Rodney's-head, in Chandler-street.

You have met him frequently since at the public-house?—Yes; but I never would have no more goings with him, for I told him of the dangerous consequence, his brother was transported from this same place for the same offence; and he said, aye his brother did not know how to general it as well as he did, his brother was transported with another young man for fourteen years, but he got away.

When did you mention this to a magistrate?—Why, I ought to have done it; but I was afraid, because there were a great many Irishmen round our place, and I was afraid I should fall a victim to them, and I thought I had better keep out of his way, and not go into his company any more.

But you were in his company afterwards?—No.

Not at all?—No, only meeting him in the street, and asking him how he did, and then going away.

You spoke to him?—Yes, just the time of the day, and so on.

What are you?—I was brought up a shoemaker, but I am articled to a cow-doctor.

Where do you live?—No. 15, Little Portland-street, Oxford-street.

How long have you been apprentice to the cow-doctor?—Why, ever since last June.

Who is the cow-doctor?—Edward Skillet.

Where does he live?—At No. 4, Newman-mews, he keeps that as an hospital for cows and horses.

As you were afraid to mention this to a magistrate, when was it first you summoned up courage to communicate it to any person?—The first person I communicated it to was my brother.

When was that?—About a week ago, when the list was in the paper, and I said that man I knew was a bad character, and with that they subpoenaed me here.

You did not even communicate it to your brother till a week ago?—No; but there were a great many of them in company, and a great many that used that house, and I was afraid, as my bread depends upon going round to the cow-keepers, doctoring, that I should get ill-treated.

So much afraid that you would not even mention it to your own brother, till a week ago?—No.

Are the same Irishmen living in the neighbourhood, as were at that time?—No, some of them are gone away, then I summoned up courage enough to mention it.

They did not go away, I suppose, till about a week ago?—They have gone away lately.

And that induced you to summon up courage to mention it to your brother?—Yes.

How long ago is it that this communication was made by Dwyer to you?—I may say, about two months ago, I cannot say within a week or two.

I thought you said three months?—It may be between two and three, I cannot say exact; I have other business to mind, instead of such business as that.

You have other business to attend to?—To get my living.

And this made so little impression upon you you cannot say whether it was two or three months ago?—No, I did not pen it down.

You did go with him to the park?—Yes; but when he told me, I was horror-struck, and got back: I thought the best way was to get back as soon as I could, lest my own character should be injured by it.

Where does your brother live?—No. 2, Bulstrode-mews, Mary-le-bone-lane.

Edward Huckleston, re-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

While the matter was a complaint of yourself, you mentioned it neither to magistrate, nor your brother, nor any body else?—No.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—I understood you to say, that he mentioned this matter to you first at the public-house?—Yes, he did.

Did you go with him that same day that he mentioned it, or another?—I went that same night with him up there.

Mr. Gurney.—Do not leave the court at present.

Joseph Doane sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Have you any public employment or situation?—I am called court reporter.

Do you prepare for the newspapers the accounts that are given of the movements and intended movements of the nobility?—Of the court.

Do you prepare them for one paper in particular, or send them to all the papers?—To six papers.

Is the New Times one of the six?—Yes.

The Morning Post, Chronicle, and so on?—Yes.

Do you send them to all the papers at the same time without partiality?—All alike.

There is an announcement in that day's New Times, the 22nd of February last, under the head of Court Intelligence: did you prepare that or how much of it?—As far as relates to the Royal Family, I did.

What is the next article to that?—"The Earl of Harrowby gives a grand cabinet dinner to-morrow at his house, in Grosvenor-square."

Did you prepare and send that?—I cannot speak to that at this great distance of time; but from the wording of it, it is my impression that I did not.

What is there in the wording of it that induces you to think you did not send it?—It says "grand."

Did you ever put such a word into that announcement at all?—No; because I know that the cabinet dinners are always the same.

There is no particular grandeur attributable to one as distinguished from another?—No.

Andrew Mitchell sworn.—Examined by Mr. Curwood.

Have you the manuscript of this article, "The Earl of Harrowby gives a grand cabinet dinner," and so on?—Yes.

Do you bring it from the New Times?—Yes, this is it. [producing it].

What are you?—I print for the New Times. Is that the original?—It is the original.

Mr. Curwood.—Let Mr. Doane look at it. (To Mr. Doane.) Is that your hand-writing?—No, mine is done by a manifold.

Mr. Curwood. (To Mitchell.)—How do you account for that?—This is the original manuscript we had: it did not come from Mr. Doane.

Had you any other manuscript but that?—I do not know whether Mr. Doane might send a duplicate, but that is what we printed from.

Mr. Gurney.—It is a series of fashionable annunciations. "Mr. Honeywood is arrived," and so on.

Mr. Curwood.—Mr. Doane, can you account for this?—No, I know nothing of it.

Mr. Curwood. (To Mitchell.)—From whom did you receive it?—From a person of the name of Lavenu, who is in the same way as Mr. Doane.

John Whitaker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

Have you searched in the newspapers published on the 22nd of February, for the article, "Lord Harrowby's dinner."—Yes, I have.

How many?—Eleven. I will mention them; The Times; the British Press;

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Was not Monday the day that was spoken to?

Mr. Gurney.—No, my lord, Tuesday.

Witness.—I searched from the 17th past that time all those days.

Mr. Adolphus.—Was there any such announcement in any of them, as that the earl of Harrowby was to give a grand dinner that day?

Mr. Attorney General.—It is not worth while objecting to this, but the proper evidence will be the papers themselves.

Mr. Adolphus.—Have you searched with a view to find this article?—I went to Peel's coffee-house for the purpose of seeing all the papers: the New Times alone had an account of the dinner to be given at lord Harrowby's on the 23rd, and that was in a paper on the 22nd.

Mr. Gurney.—We will call back Dwyer with your lordship's leave.

Thomas Dwyer called again.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

When you were here before, you were asked whether you knew any man of the name of Huckleston?—No, I do not.

Mr. Gurney.—Let that man stand forward. Do you know that man?—Yes, I have seen him, but I did not know his name was Huckleston.

Where have you seen him?—I have seen him in Oxford-road.

In a house, or in the street?—In the street.

Have you seen him in any house?—Not that I know of.

Did you ever propose to him to go out, and to charge a person with an unnatural crime, and to get money?—Never.

Do you swear that solemnly?—I do.

Did he ever go out with you to the park on such a purpose?—No, never with me in his life.

In January or February last, were you out of work? Out of your regular work?—Yes, I was.

Where did you go to work when you were out of your regular work?—I went to work at Mr. Elmore's.

Before you were at work at Mr. Elmore's, did you work at the parish mill?—Yes, I did.

A mill in your parish worked by men who come to claim assistance from the parish?—Yes.

Did you receive money from the parish while you were so working at the mill?—I received 3s. a day while I was at the mill.

How many days did you work at the mill?—Twice in different weeks.

Have you a wife and family?—A wife and three children.

Thomas Dwyer cross-examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

Upon your oath, when you were coming into that place this moment, did not you at the sight of this man say "Oh, Huckleston!" before you got into that box? What I am asking you is before my learned friend put the question to you; did you not say directly you saw him, before any question had been put to you "Oh, Huckleston!"—I did not.

Mr. Adolphus.—I was told you had.

Mr. Gurney.—I can vouch for it, that it was on my putting the question, he echoed my words.

Mr. Adolphus.—You say that now you see his face, you know him?—Yes.

What name did you know him by?—I did not know his name at all.

How often have you seen him?—Very often. He resorted at the end of James-street, and I lived in Gee's-court. There were a parcel of chaps that used to resort about that place, but he was never an associate of mine.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—James-street is near Gee's-court?—Yes, the next turning.

Mr. Adolphus.—Did you ever see him but in the street, upon your oath?—I have seen him at several places.

What places?—I have seen him in several parts of the street. I have seen him several times.

That is any thing but an answer to my question. Have you ever seen him any where but in the street?—Yes, I have.

Where?—I have seen him in Hyde-park.

Where else?—No where else that I know of.

In what public-house have you drank with him?—I never drank with him in a public-house. I used to resort to the Rodney's-head in Chandler-street, but I never knew him to resort there.

Have you been in the habit of resorting there lately?—No, only when I can afford a pint of beer sometimes.

That is the house you go to?—Not particularly.

Why do you fix upon the Rodney's-head?—Because it is a place that my countrymen in general resort to.

Were you in court when that man Huckleston was giving his evidence?—No, not that I know of.

Where were you fetched from now? Were you out of court, or in court?—I was out of this court? I was in the witnesses room.

Then did you not hear him give his evidence?—No.

Will you say, upon your oath, you have not repeatedly met him in a public-house?—I will.

That you have not what?—That I have not repeatedly met him in a public-house.

How many times do you call repeatedly?—I do not remember ever to have seen him in a public-house.

Will you swear you have not seen him in a public-house?—I know I have not for some time.

Then you have at some time?—I will not swear that I ever have.

Will you swear you have not seen him in a public-house?—It is hard for me to do that.

I think it is. Will you swear you never saw him in a public-house, as you swear to having seen him in several streets?—I do not know how I can do that.

Nor I. I ask you, will you swear you have not seen him at the Rodney's-head;—Yes; I have not seen him in the Rodney's-head.

That you never were with him at the Rodney's head?—It must have been some length of time ago if I ever did such a thing.

Will you swear you have not been with him there within these three months?—Yes, I will.

Within four, will you?—I cannot say; I cannot recollect that.

Was it before or after Christmas then?—I cannot say.

Do you mean to swear it was since Christmas or before Christmas, or three or four months?—Since Christmas.

Will you swear that before Christmas you were not with him at the Rodney's-head?—I do not recollect that I was.

Will you swear you were not?—No, I cannot swear that, because I do not bring my recollection to being at the Rodney's-head with him at any time before Christmas, nor after neither.

You will not swear you did not?—He may have been there and I not take notice of it. It is a house that is quite full on-Saturday and part of Sunday.

You are quite positive you never walked with him from that house to any other place?—I am positive.

On what occasion did you see him there?—On a Sunday.

What part of the day was it?—The forenoon, or it might be the afternoon, for aught I know.

How came you to fix on having seen him in the park?—He was a man I never associated with at all.

How came you to fix on Hyde-park?—I might meet a thousand there.

Therefore the more unlikely you should fix on any one; what made you fix upon him?—You asked me whether I saw him in any other place.

And therefore you fixed immediately on Hyde-park?—No, I did not.

Have you any particular reason for remembering having seen him in Hyde-park?—I have no particular reason, but seeing him the same as any other spectators that might be going through.

Did you ever see him in Saint James's-park?—No.

The Regent's-park?—No.

But you did in Hyde-park?—Yes.

How long ago was this?—I cannot tell you the time.

I do not ask you as to the third or fourth of any particular month, but how long ago?—It might be before Christmas, or it might be after.

It may be before the flood, or it may be after?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—It cannot be before the flood.

Mr. Adolphus.—Not in human possibility.

Witness.—A thousand might pass by, and I take no notice of them.

You saw him at some time or other in Hyde-park?—Yes.

He is a man you do not associate with, and yet you remember seeing him there?—Yes.

On what occasion was it you saw him there?—I do not know on what occasion.

Nothing passed between you?—No.

Was it in winter or in summer?—I do not know; you say it must be either before or after Christmas, but I did not take notice of the time; it is impossible for me to tell the time.

Was it in winter or summer?—It must have been the winter.

A Jurymen.—Are you a bricklayer, or a bricklayer's labourer?—A bricklayer by trade; the man I worked for, I have worked for twelve or thirteen years, Mr. Smith of Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square; I have worked twelve or fourteen years for him, 22, Mortimer-street Cavendish-square, and Mr. Elmore and other gentlemen, in Piccadilly, and other places I could mention.

Mr. Adolphus.—My lord, I hardly know how to frame the request I am going to make to your lordship, but there is one solemn duty I owe to the unhappy man at the bar—if it be consistent with your lordship's duty to grant the request, I know I shall not ask it in vain, and if your lordship refuses I shall willingly acquiesce—it is a request that I may now have till to-morrow to consider this important and multifarious case?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You wish to postpone your address to the Jury till to-morrow?

Mr. Adolphus.—Yes, my lord; I have no reason to ask it but from the total want of preparation in point of time.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—It must be the anxious wish of the Court that every assistance that can be rendered to a person standing in the situation in which the unfortunate man at the bar now stands should be afforded; whether if we were to hear you now we should be able to go through the whole case to-night, may be somewhat doubtful; my great difficulty is as it respects the convenience of the gentlemen of the jury, but we ought not to proceed with haste, where the life of an individual is concerned.

*A Jurymen. (Mr. Aldersey).—*We are of opinion that our convenience is not to be considered at all in comparison with what may be the issue of this trial.

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*Your expression is exactly that which I should expect from you. We have not yet arrived at the time at which in an ordinary case we ought to adjourn, but in the very peculiar case before us, and adverting to the fact mentioned by the counsel for the defendant, of the truth of which I cannot doubt, that it was not until a very late hour before this trial came on, that they received their instructions, perhaps the administration of justice may be better consulted, by allowing, at the request of Mr. Adolphus, that he may have time to consider his client's case.

*Mr. Aldersey.—*My lord, it is the wish of some of my co-jurors to have it ascertained whether Dwyer, whose credibility has been called in question, can be proved in any way to have mentioned it to major James, and the Secretary of State, what he states himself to have mentioned, how far he is or is not borne out in that.

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*The Attorney-general will have no opportunity of considering that.

*Mr. Gurney.—*It is open to the prisoner to give any contradiction.

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*Certainly, the prisoner may contradict that.

*Mr. Goodchild.—*Dwyer's evidence has been endeavoured to be shaken, and we wished to see whether there was any thing to corroborate him.

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*Perhaps we had better forbear mentioning that subject; there will be an opportunity for all parties to observe on it, and for you, gentlemen, ultimately to decide.

[Adjourned to to-morrow morning nine o'clock.]

WEDNESDAY, 19TH APRIL, 1820.

Arthur Thistlewood was set to the bar.

*Thistlewood.—*My lord, I should be glad of the indulgence this morning which you were so kind as to allow me yesterday?

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*Yes, certainly.

*Mr. Attorney General.—*In consequence of the wish expressed by the jury last night, that major James should be examined as a witness, I have procured the attendance of that gentleman in court, and he is now here. Your lordships know it is impossible for me on the part of the Crown to call him as a witness, his name not being in the list; but he is here ready to be examined, if the defendant's counsel wish it.

VOL. XXXIII.

*Mr. Adolphus.—*It is certainly no part of my case to call a witness who is in the knowledge of the Crown, and is not named in their list. I cannot examine a witness unless I am apprised of his knowing something of importance; I therefore feel that though the Attorney-general does not mean to put me into an awkward situation, yet, as lord Ellenborough said, if you take a witness in that way you must abide by his evidence, which I do not think I should act right in doing upon this occasion.

*Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—*It cannot be expected, under these terms, that you should call the witness: whether he ought to be called on either side is another matter.

*Mr. Attorney General.—*Neither my learned friend, nor the defendant, can think that I mean to place my learned friend in an unpleasant situation.

*Mr. Adolphus.—*Gentlemen of the Jury;—I have to request your attention to the humble effort it is my duty to make on behalf of the unhappy man at the bar, and I cannot do so without first expressing my thanks to his lordship and you, for the kind manner in which you acceded to my request, to allow me time to make such preparation as was necessary. Under any circumstances the situation in which I am is distressing enough, but that distress would have been infinitely aggravated, if I had had to address you with a body fatigued, and a mind jaded by the mass of matter laid before you—with thoughts necessarily wandering to the different parts of the case,—and without time to arrange and simplify, even in the moderate degree I have in the few hours stolen from sleep, those thoughts which it will be my duty to lay before you.

It has been said that this is an anxious and important inquiry; truly, if ever there was an occasion in which the mind of counsel for a prisoner might sink almost into abjectness, it is furnished by the case now before you and the situation I stand in. The prisoner is, of all the men I remember tried before a jury for the crime of high treason, the most unhappy, and I may say, without meaning to alter the case of guilt, if guilt shall appear against him, the most unfortunate. I have known many trials in the course of my life on these subjects, but never saw one where a prisoner was so absolutely denuded of all countenance and support—so much thrown on the mercy and charity of those who would undertake his case, as the prisoner on the present occasion. To say that the prisoner has against him all the weight of office, the force of talent, and the influence of renown, is to say nothing but that he is indicted for high treason at the suit of the Crown; for the Crown upon such, and upon every other case, has a right to the best services of its best servants, and it would be most unjust to complain of that which is merely incidental, and justly and properly so, to the situation in which he stands. But upon former occasions I have seen advocates of the highest celebrity, of the most established reputation, entering voluntarily into the cause of a prisoner; taking it for a long time beforehand, and methodizing and digesting every thing to be done; they have come to the combat prepared, in a considerable degree, to meet the talents, and to grapple with the case against which they were to be opposed.

Far different is the situation of this unhappy man, who, on the very eve of his trial, and then alone, obtained the feeble assistance I can give him. I never heard of his case till Thursday last; I was out of town on Friday, I had not my instructions till Saturday night, and I had to appear before you on Monday. I do not complain of this, but I deplore it—it is an unhappiness to which his deplorable case has subjected him, that the want of preparation and ability in me may prejudice him. Other prisoners in the same situation have been allied by party, connexion, or other means, with some considerable number of men of influence, weight, and reputation in the state. This poor man and his associates are deserted by every one; no voice is raised in their favour, no effort is made on their behalf; none has been attempted with my knowledge. I have not had the advice or assistance of any individual upon earth, save the solicitor, who has gratuitously undertaken his case; and so far from receiving any information to enable me to avoid difficulties, my information has been all comprised in the slight instructions this gentleman has collected, and thus I appear before you.

But there is another circumstance which presses still more heavily on the prisoner. In all the trials I remember on cases of this kind, and particularly the last I remember in this Court, the trials in 1794 and 1795, every prisoner who obtained his discharge from the accusation was set at liberty, and the inquiry ended with the question which was submitted to the jury. This man is so unhappily beset by the circumstances of his case that, if at your hands he receives an acquittal on this indictment, other indictments still await him;—an indictment for murder, an indictment for shooting under lord Ellenborough's act; and, in short, he is surrounded by all the perils that can involve any individual: indeed, it seems he is reduced to this melancholy choice, whether the office of the executioner shall end with the execution, or whether after that, his body shall be hacked to pieces, and disposed of at the mercy of the Crown, or be subjected to the knife of the surgeon.

If he be guilty, and I must presume there is ground for supposing he may be so, by the bills of indictment being found, he has no right to complain that the law is too hard; he must ascribe his desperate situation to his own fault; but, in the first place, I implore a total exclusion from your mind of every thought arising out of other charges, or other circumstances; that can affect you in the decision of this case; and I entreat that you will consider him as if he were like any other prisoner on trial, totally exonerated from other imputations, and subjected only to the inquiry which brings you together to-day. It is difficult I know, but I expect it from your conscience and your justice; the Attorney-general made the same request of you, it becomes his rank in life, and is the profession to do so; it becomes his character as a man, a Christian, and a Briton, to make that request, because it is not in his office, or his disposition, to run down as criminal any of the subjects of the Crown, but to hold them up fairly to their country answerable for their crimes, or entitled to acquittal, as they are guilty or not guilty: still there remains this behind—a matter that has been disclosed to the public for a long time, which has been talked of with unreserved reprobation and detestation, from every mouth, is not so easily dismissed from the most correct minds, but that some taint of prejudice may still remain, some opinion, some unconscious whispering in a man's ear, from the internal suggestion, that this is the man about whom so much has been said, and it cannot be said without his being guilty of something; in short, the opinions of private life steal into our breasts; and it becomes me, therefore, most earnestly to implore you to resist every such suggestion, to refuse your ear to every such insinuation, and to view this case, as I am sure you are disposed to view it—to make a great effort so to view it—I mean as if you had never heard the name of this man before, and as if you knew nothing of him, but that which has been disclosed in this cause, and on which you must decide and give your verdict.

I have observed to you, that this is a case of infinite importance. I say of infinite importance;—to the prisoner—my learned friend the Attorney-general has put it because his life is at stake, but under his particular circumstances of less importance in that view than ever a trial for high treason was to a man. But it is important, to the state, to the present generation, and to their posterity, that this case should be decided, not on impressions against an individual, but on the fair results of the evidence offered, and upon a fair examination of the parts of that evidence, according to the most severe test by which evidence can be tried. It is of importance to posterity; for assuming this prisoner to be a bad man, if as against a bad man certain evidence can be received, and can find its way into the minds of juries, so as to procure a conviction, no man knows against whom the same sort of evidence will not be next produced—no man knows whose life may not be sacrificed—no man knows whose fame may not be destroyed; and property taken away by evidence which ought never to have had the credit of a jury, or perhaps the sanction of any court. This is the important point, on which it behoves us to be particularly circumspect, when a bad man is before us. Such attempts are never made at first against those who have good characters, great friends, or the means of defending themselves; they are made on the poor and abject, and then as a precedent, it goes elsewhere to destroy others. This leads me to caution you; for it is not the value of this man's life (though God forbid I should undervalue human life), that stands upon this case, it is the value of the lives of others, and the safety of their posterity; it is the value of a precedent in a case of high treason, which is of more importance than any other case, it is of more importance for this reason, from the time that the kingly government began to be established on defined principles in this country, and to be curbed by regulations for the benefit of the subject, the law of treason has been guarded with particular vigilance by the legislature, and by the execution of that law with commendable anxiety by every jury who has sat on it; there never was any law so free from doubt or contradiction; there never were a set of records (taken all together and subject to exceptions only from the badness of certain times), so perfectly accordant; there never was a subject upon which so much vigilance, correct judgment, and care on the part of juries, have been exerted, as on that of treason. In truth, it is an awful case to discuss; in other cases the king is the prosecutor for the benefit of the public; but here the king in person, by his own officers, is arrayed against the subject; and it is therefore upon a jealous vigilance, lest the power and influence of the Crown—lest the natural love in every good subject, and his zeal and desire to preserve untouched the safety and the right prerogative of the Crown should be brought into play, to work oppression upon any individual so charged and inculpated; therefore, I say, this case is of peculiar importance, as all other trials for treason have been. It is necessary to observe a most steady and exact attention, and not to suffer prejudice to sway your minds, to receive one tittle of evidence that would not be admitted on every other occasion, and rather to lean to the side of the accused, if it comes to be a doubtful or measuring cast in your mind, than lean to the side of the prosecution, however you may be interested for the preservation of the throne, and for the prevention of all those attempts by which its authority may be impaired.

I have already stated to you, that this task of defending these prisoners has come to me as a forced duty in my profession; I have not sought it; I have not avoided it. I think that in a case like this, when an advocate is called on to exercise such talents as he has in the way of humanity towards unhappy persons like these—and I take it not on my own authority alone, but refer to that of others—I think it is his duty not to refuse the assistance required: I do not know that it is necessary, or always decent or right for advocates to press their own personal opinions or politics into a case; but as I am going into an investigation of some length, it is fit I should say, that in the course of my life, I never have been in thought or act, assenting to any of those principles or combinations, by which the established constitution in church and state could be brought into danger. I was born a subject of the late king, I lived contented with my fortune under him, I am a faithful subject of his successor, I do not see the necessity of these agitations, and have never lent myself to any of them: whether I had or not, in another case would not be of the smallest importance; but standing here as the voluntary advocate of these prisoners, it may be right to state, what I am not extolling in myself, but describing myself correctly, that it may not be supposed that party feeling leads to any one thing I am to say on the present occasion, but that it is in the performance of my duty only. But while I say that I feel that independently of the denial of any such political principles, I have a high principle to advance as a man and an advocate; and if there are one of two, which is the most I can suppose, who interest themselves for this unhappy man, I trust it will appear to them that no prejudice against his measures will relax my efforts, or cause me to neglect my duty in the smallest degree: he shall have a fair and legal defence—that it will be defective in ability, is his misfortune in the present case, mine permanently, and through my life.

The line of defence which I shall have to pursue on behalf of this unhappy man, is one more difficult than ever I knew to fall to the lot of an advocate; and I think I should be trifling with your good sense, and be deficient in the respect you must have obtained from every one in court, for the last two days for your attention, if I could suppose that it is in the power of man to make it appear that the prisoner at the bar is guiltless of all manner of crime. To have meditated assassination, under any circumstances,—to have caused, or been privy to causing, the death of an individual, coming to execute his duty,—these are crimes which admit of no palliation; they are crimes from which the blood recoils and the judgment revolts; they are crimes that would make it absurd to say, the individual tainted with them can be held up to you as innocent: But feeling a horror and detestation of such crimes, I deprecate the application of those feelings to the criminal, until he is justly tainted with the crimes which excite them. Our horror of crime must never extend to the party accused; every man must be reputed innocent till he is found guilty. I am only anxious, and am desirous you will take it with you, that you will not come to this conclusion, "because I believe a man in heart an assassin, and in act a murderer, I will pronounce him a traitor who meditated the dethroning of the king, the subversion of his government, and the levying war against him;" these are the charges against the prisoner, and unless they are proved by evidence, which weighs beyond a doubt in your minds, if they are not so proved that you can be as much satisfied as upon any point which is the subject of charge and of proof, then I say upon this indictment the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal, and in acquitting him you do honour to yourselves, and render an essential service to all posterity. Do not believe I want improperly to influence your minds, for I say without hesitation, let it operate against my client as it may, that if, in your opinion, the evidence be the contrary way, you would disgrace yourselves and injure the cause of posterity, if you refused to act upon it; but I must beg you will not suffer any thing but evidence to influence your minds in any degree; but attend to that and that alone, and give the prisoner all the benefit of an accurate sifting of it.

I had thought to make some observations on the law, but I think with the Attorney-general, that the law is so clear, that it wants little elucidation, and perhaps none but what will be safely trusted with, and will clearly and with the best authority come from the Court; but the indictment has been read to you, and as well as its length would permit, you have attended to it, and gone through the different charges. It is necessary that I should state to you, that there are four of what are called overt acts.

Mr. Attorney General.—Four substantive charges.

Mr. Adolphus.—I meant so. There are four counts: there are to each of the first three counts ten or eleven overt acts, all of which must be viewed by you as having relation to and tending to prove the original conception alleged to exist in the prisoner's mind. For example, it is said in the first count, that he conspired with others to depose the king from the style, honour, and kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm. Now, in support of that there are eleven overt acts stated: for example: that he did conspire with others to compose and prepare, and cause to be composed and prepared, with intent to publish the same, divers proclamations; and that he did various other acts in furtherance of this original intention of his: but you must be persuaded of one of the four original intentions, for without that, if all the overt acts could be proved over and over again, you cannot infer that such an intention must have existed, you must be satisfied that the intention previously existed, and that the acts were done in furtherance of that. If you should be convinced that the prisoner at the bar did intend with a certain force to go to the house of the earl of Harrowby, to murder the earl of Harrowby and all the other ministers assembled at dinner with him, that does not amount by itself to high treason, nor are you unless satisfied of it by the evidence, to infer that the former treasonable intent must have existed. It is not what you will suppose he meant to do, it is necessary that you should be convinced that the treasonable intent had been predetermined, and was existing in the mind, or else the overt acts prove nothing in an indictment for high treason, because they are separated and isolated facts, capable of punishment in another way. To kill a privy counsellor is not in itself high treason; it is mere felony by the statute of Henry 7th; and under other circumstances to assault them with intent to kill them is made felony by the statute of Anne; but to kill them is no where declared high treason, unless coupled with other intentions, and as an overt act tending to demonstrate such an intention existing in the mind.

I think it extremely necessary to put that point to you, because nothing is more difficult where men are unpractised in the separation of the different parts of law pleadings, than to bring their minds to the main subject, and to discern what are the circumstances which alone are to guide them in the consideration of the case: and, gentlemen, when I say this, I say it with the utmost confidence, that you have all the knowledge and understanding that are to be expected in your situation, and that could be found in a jury of the country: but the law is a science having its own technicalities, which, God knows, those who have been many years devoted to it do not always understand, but which those who have not been so devoted must have explained to them, before they can exercise their talents on the consideration of the case. With that caution, I leave the law upon this subject, premising that you must be satisfied of one of four things, either that the prisoner at the bar with others "did intend to deprive and depose the king of and from the style, honour, and kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm," or that he did intend to "excite insurrection, rebellion, and war against the king," or, as it is stated in the third count, that he did "compass, imagine, invent, devise, and intend to levy war against the king," or as it is stated in the fourth count, "that he did levy war against the king." Now, I do contend that there never was evidence tendered to make out so great a charge which had less application to that charge than the evidence submitted to you; and it will be my duty to go through some parts of the evidence, to examine it by degrees and with care, and I shall endeavour to impress on your minds the difficulties in bringing the evidence to bear on the particular subjects, how weak and defective it is, how incredible, let it be related by whom it may, unless well supported, and how particularly incredible coming out of the mouths that it does, mouths from which the life of man ought not to receive danger, and to which sufficient credit ought not to be given to put the meanest subject and in other respects the most guilty, into one moment's jeopardy of his life or liberty.

In proposing to call to you an accomplice as a witness, the learned Attorney-general made some observations upon the credit to be given to an accomplice, and upon the manner in which that accomplice must be supported in his testimony. This I think will be quite clear to you, that the whole case of the Crown as it is to taint or affect the prisoner with high treason, rests entirely upon an accomplice; for if you can dismiss from your minds the evidence of Adams, there is not a shadow of proof of high treason; there is not that which could convict him of any such crime, loosely and indefinitely as the other evidence has been pointed in support of the facts, or the presumed facts, deposed to by the first witness. I am quite sure that, in the time you have spent upon this long trial, you have sifted Adams's evidence in your minds, and that the result to your understandings must be, that if Adams is not believed, there is no case against the prisoner, and I think it cannot have escaped the observation of some of you, that if Adams is believed, there is hardly a man who can present himself in a court of justice who has not a right to command belief. If a man under such circumstances, telling an incredible story, can be believed, without support from other witnesses to set him up, then no witness can be rejected because his testimony is incredible.

It has been said on this trial, and said so too by the Attorney-general (take it with as much qualification as is necessary on such a subject) that an accomplice is not to be supported in every point; for if he were, there would be no necessity for his testimony, the other witnesses could prove the case without him, and the accomplice would be useless. I give the sense of the observation in an inferior mode of expression. That is true, as far as the necessity and nature of the case supposes it to be true. It is true that on some occasions such confirmation as will support the credibility of a witness as to loose collateral circumstances may be taken: but, if it may be taken, it must be taken I should say when all the support possible is given him—when no one is kept back that could support him—when nothing is omitted that might be done—and when care is taken to give him all possible credit, by shewing that they who produce him are not afraid of confronting him with others, for fear discord among them should produce disbelief. I say more, that those who expect to avail themselves of the evidence of an accomplice, are bound to give him all possible support, and subject him to all contradiction: he is a self-accusing guilty man; he is not entitled to confidence: and he puts himself on his trial by pointing out those who can support him. Those others are a sacred gage and pledge to his truth; or, they are like a subscribing witness to an instrument in writing, given for the benefit of all parties interested.

This point has been anxiously considered before, and I am going to read an observation of an eminent lawyer* on the subject. I do not name him for reasons which will occur to some who are present; but he expresses this matter so much better than I can, that I will put it to you as to the confirmation of accomplices—as a matter beyond all doubt for its clearness, ability, and justness. It was said on the occasion of a trial of a man for high treason at no very distant period, and I subscribe to it entirely: observations more philosophical and just could not be made as applicable to the human mind. Said that learned gentleman, “But it is said that he” (the witness) “is confirmed; and because he is confirmed in some facts, you are therefore to believe him in the rest.—This is a position which lawyers are in the habit of stating in a very unqualified manner; but, it is not a position which can be maintained to this extent, according to any principle of common sense. There is no man who tells a long and complicated story who may and must not of necessity be confirmed in many parts of it. The witness was a long time in giving his evidence, and of course stated many facts which no man denies, which have been in all the newspapers for weeks and for months past; and, because he is confirmed in certain particulars, you are therefore required to believe the whole of his story to be true. Is this a proposition to be insisted upon? Can it for a moment be maintained to this extent, and in this broad and unqualified way? But, gentlemen, every profession and science has its phrases; the necessary qualifications are by degrees lost sight of, and the worst errors are thus introduced. Let us then look at the mischief of this doctrine, and see the evils and injustice that have arisen out of it.—The notorious Titus Oates, the witness for the Crown in the trials founded upon the popish plot in the reign of Charles 2nd;—that most infamous and perjured wretch, who was afterwards convicted of perjury for his evidence upon those trials, and suffered the punishment of the law for his crime, was confirmed in his testimony in many most important particulars. Unfortunately, the juries, misled in those times of heat and party animosity, were prevailed upon to believe him, and many unhappy persons suffered in consequence the extreme punishment of the law; and murders were committed under the forms of justice, in consequence of the reliance placed upon the frail and fallacious testimony of a man of that description. You perceive, then, the danger of this doctrine; and that it is not because a man is confirmed in certain circumstances that you can safely believe him as to other facts where that confirmation is wanting. What is the character of falsehood? Who has lived in the world, and has at all examined the operations of the human heart and mind, who does not know that this is the usual and proper character of falsehood—that it does not wholly invent. Falsehood engrafts itself upon truth, and by that artifice misleads and deceives; truth is exaggerated; things that exist are discoloured or distorted:—these are the usual operations of falsehood—this is a part of its nature, its address, and dexterity. It arises, therefore, out of the very nature of perjury, that it must be confirmed to a certain extent." * On the present trial, I say, that if I had desired the best of my friends to assist my feeble powers, and enlarge my humble understanding by infusing into them just principles applicable to the consideration of this case, no friend that I have or ever had could have given me sentences so apposite—sentences that can be relied on for their accuracy of expression and justice of conception, so much as these. If you can retain them in your minds from the imperfect manner in which I have read them to you, for God's sake do, and let them be a shield for this man, against the attack made on him by a witness to whose testimony I say (not merely because it is my duty, but because it is my conviction) not one moment's credit ought to be given, nor one tittle of faith added, except in those particulars where he is explicitly confirmed. He may receive confirmation in many particulars, whereby, the common voice of common fame, every thing has been communicated to the public, and has given him the means of being assured of some confirmation so as to leave him free from hesitation in advancing those things, and to enable him to add whatever else he pleased, according to his original intention when he formed acquaintance with the unhappy man at the bar, or according to those suggestions, inspired in him by others under whom he acted.

* Mr. Sergeant Copley, at the time of this trial Solicitor-general.

Before I enter into a closer examination of the evidence, it is necessary to give an outline of the defence of the prisoner, to which I mean to apply my observations. I may not meet all the expectations of the prisoner, in the concessions I am going to make; but standing here to perform a duty, I can only perform it as my own heart and judgment dictate; I shall state correctly the view in which the defence strikes me, and you will see whether it supports a more rational story, or whether the incredible evidence you have heard forces you to believe the story told in spite of all the contradictions and absurdities which it contains, and to which it has been exposed. I say, I have no doubt, that the prisoner at the bar, and the party who were to move with him on the night of the 23rd of February, intended to murder all his majesty's ministers, at the house of lord Harrowby, in Grosvenor-square: to entertain a doubt of that, would be, as if, at this moment, looking on the smiling face of heaven, I were to endeavour to convince you that there is no such scene, and that there are no such things as the sun, light, or heat. I mean not to deny, that that party being interrupted in the progress of that crime, a man, of the name of Smithers, from some hand or other, met his death and was murdered—when I use the mitigated expression first, I mean it as not being satisfactorily proved, at least it will be for you or another jury, to consider hereafter, or whether it is proved that the prisoner committed it, or whether, under all the circumstances, it was murder; but taking it on the narrative, as it stands now communicated here by two police officers, I would say, Smithers met his death there and was murdered. Making, however, these concessions, and admitting the facts are as bad as an advocate can concede, I do contend, that this case does not amount to high treason: and that the charge of that crime stands untouched, and incapable of receiving light in the investigation, from the evidence offered by the Crown. I admit the prisoner had a view to the extent I have described in the first part of my address, namely, that from personal motives he was disposed to kill some of his majesty's ministers, and had no objection to consent to kill all the rest; so far I admit; but this will be evident to you, in the whole course of this transaction, that during the whole meditation of this crime, he was beset by a spy, and accompanied by an informer; and it is upon their evidence or their disclosure, that you are asked to convict him of high treason, that is, that the machinations of the spy, inciting him to crimes he was disposed to commit, is this day to be exhibited to you in a blended form by the informer; and the facts which prove that he concurred in one mode of crime, are to be used to convince you that he meditated another which never entered his heart, and of which there is not any evidence upon which a jury can rely, to pronounce a verdict of guilty. And, again and again (I am afraid of being tedious, but I cannot repeat it too often), I say, the concessions I have made ought not to affect the prisoner, on the present trial, let him receive judgment upon them in other cases when they come before a jury, but at present the charge of high treason is unsupported by the fact of murder intended or committed, it must be an intention to do one of the four things charged in this indictment, or it amounts to nothing.

I have already stated that if the evidence of Adams does not convict the prisoner, there is nothing to convict him: I say, if his evidence does not, because if his evidence were put out of the question, and the other witnesses stated that which they have stated, it would amount to little or nothing; Adams's evidence is received, and they are taken to support his evidence, and set it up as a whole, that the case may, in some sort, be taken to be proved against the prisoner; but if the evidence given by Adams is utterly unworthy of belief, then the separated parts proved by other witnesses will not, in themselves, jointly or severally amount to a charge of high treason against the prisoner, or make out that charge, so that a verdict of guilty ought to pass upon him; and with this it will be necessary to direct your attention to three particular points.

It is conceded by the Attorney-general, that an accomplice ought to be confirmed; I have taken the liberty to state my opinion, and that of one other person, to what extent that ought to go; and I shall beg you to examine in the first place, how far is Adams confirmed in the particular propositions relating to high treason, which he has advanced. In the next place, it will be your duty (you know your duty, but I merely suggest it as a thing that must be considered by yourselves to be your duty), to observe how much he is contradicted, and whether he is in any way contradicted by his own evidence, or the evidence of those who are called to support him; and lastly, it will be of importance to you to consider how he might have been confirmed, if there had not been some strong reason to withhold that confirmation. This is a most particular and important feature in the case, and to which I shall, in its turn, most seriously crave and direct your attention.

* 1 How. Mod. St. Tr. 513.

Robert Adams is introduced to you as the first witness in this cause. He states to you that he is a shoe-maker, and that (which he ought not to have stated without more feeling than he seemed to have), he once had the honour of serving his majesty, as a soldier, in the regiment of blues—that such a man should be found in the situation he describes, and that he should have gone to the extent he has without finding it necessary to repent, or to feel any compunctious visitings till the plot had failed for four days, is a circumstance creditable neither to his feelings as a subject, nor to his courage as a soldier; but, however, these are the circumstances in which he presents himself; he states to you that Brunt, one of the parties indicted here, had been an acquaintance of his of three years standing; that he made that acquaintance at Cambray, when he was working for the British army, in his trade of a shoe-maker; and when Brunt was there, merely as a follower of the army, then their acquaintance began, and was continued without any circumstances of particularity till they came together again, in the month, I think, of January last—and then the witness was introduced by Brunt, to the prisoner Thistlewood, and, perhaps, the most extraordinary thing took place that ever was heard of out of this cause; but it seems to have been the fashion in this cause, that the conspirator, at the head of the conspiracy, begins without reserve, and tells every one on the first meeting, what the nature and scope of his conspiracy is, that is, I am a man so determined on evil, and so careless of life and liberty, that I put myself into your hands; and if you have one grain of honesty you will report, and loyally inform against me. I condemn myself by my own words, and cannot blame you. That is stated of a man of Thistlewood's age, who has had experience in matters of this kind. Adams says Brunt and Thistlewood went plump into the matter; and let us see what they say, and what they put to this man; there is a complaint of the times, and we are to infer from the whole of the conversation, not from separated expressions here and there, what may have been the views of those who meditated to murder ministers. Suppose they thought they would arm themselves to make a good scene of plunder; that enhances their guilt, but it does not make them guilty of high treason. Brunt introduced him, by saying "this is the man I was speaking to you about;" then there was some talk about the witness being in the life-guards, and a good swordsman; Thistlewood said, "there was no person who was worth ten pound, who was worth any thing for the good of his country;" the simple possession of ten pounds was wealth enough to corrupt them. "The shopkeepers of London were a set of aristocrats altogether, and all working under one system of government," and then follows the first declaration of his wish—a declaration towards them, if any part of this man's evidence is to be believed, he should glory to see the day when all the shops should be shut up, and well plundered. This is as unlike deposing the king as any thing can be, but it does, if the evidence is to be believed, consort with the rest of the evidence, and with another part of it, that of providing the miserable resource of arms; they had a resource very useful for the plunder of shops, but absurd for the purpose of overturning a state, or of ruling a country; sufficient for the purpose pointed at, but quite insufficient for any other purpose. If there were ever in the prisoner's mind, an intention to plunder the shops, I lament that such a man could be found; but I am not here to pass sentence upon his morals, nor are you, but to examine whether he is guilty of the charge of intending to overturn the government; and unless you can be led to infer that murdering men we hate, and plundering shops, is levying war against the king, and intending to overturn the government, there is nothing in this charge, whatever there may be in any other, which it may be thought fit to bring.

But let us see if the witness is to be believed in any part; is there any thing that encourages the supposition that this was not all, but that there really was something ulterior? Why, you cannot have forgotten that at one meeting it was said, they declared they were so poor they could not wait any longer than next Wednesday. If poverty was the cause of their moving in one way or another, poverty had no allurements to excite them to action on that more than on any other day, because the day most convenient to overturn a government is the day when it must be overturned, but the day to plunder shops is when they who undertake it cannot find a day's meal, but by robbery, and when they must do it or starve; that therefore gives countenance to the probability, that some of the party had that design; whether they had or not I do not know, but there is some evidence pointing to it, and if that was the whole design, then there is an end of the charge of high treason.

The conversation afterwards became a little sportive; two public men were characterised in a particular way ; with that however I have nothing to do, because we are not here to assign character to any body but the prisoner, and the witnesses examined against him. This conversation, if I remember rightly, took place on the 19th of January, that is to say, one month and ten days before that was done which occasions your being assembled here to day. After that time, was the situation of the witness such as to make you believe, that he, a poor man, was applied to, not to overturn the state, but to take some measures to put a few pounds in his pocket?—He says three days after that, he was arrested for some small debt, and taken to the prison in White-cross-street, where he remained for seven days, until the 30th of January, and never came out. Is this a man who is to overturn the state, who cannot answer for his liberty a moment, or is he a person who would relieve himself from present want by embarking in some dangerous scheme to get a meal's victuals?

But, on the 3rd of February they met again, and Edwards* was of the party, and I beg you to observe, that Edwards, who does not appear to have been an accomplice, who is not in prison or in custody, is stated to have been of every party—he is in the list of witnesses for the Crown, but he has never been in the witness box before you ; however, upon this occasion the 3rd of February, nothing very material seems to have passed ; but they began then to to have a room in the same house where Brunt lived, taken for the apparent residence of Ings, but in which they had frequent meetings ; the witness says, that these meetings were held twice or thrice a day, he is present at those meetings, and we shall presently see what account he gives of his own presence ; but he having been a soldier of the king, and if a good soldier now enjoying a pension from the king, or some allowance, never thinks it his duty to disclose any one of all these councils to any person in existence. Why not gentlemen ? if it had been treason, if a man with the understanding of a soldier, had heard the absurd plot which I shall have to state to you hereafter, he would have recoiled from it with fear and abhorrence, and have given information to the constituted authorities ; he must have known no part of the plot could be accomplished, but that those who engaged in it would expose themselves to certain destruction ; but he knew as a thief that it was plausible, or that if he should afterwards fail of the desired plunder, he might come forward as king's evidence, and secure at least his own personal safety. I say it is impossible for this man to have believed the story he has invented and put before you ; but in another way it is possible he should have concurred in such a plot as I describe, and most probably he would do so as a medium between him and desperation, as a resource against starving.

Between the 3rd and the 19th, according to the witness (and it must have been near the 16th for this reason, that the funeral of the late king took place on that day) they had another conversation, and between the 3rd and the 19th this plot assumes a shape, in this witness's miserable representation, which is to bring it here as a case of treason. What passes then?—"I went up to the room" says this respectable witness, "the prisoner and Harrison were there in deep discourse, they told me the subject. Harrison said all the life-guards, and foot-guards, and "(let it not be forgotten all the Police too)" all the Police would be at the king's funeral, and this would be a favourable opportunity" to do what? to overturn the State? no, it is not in the first proposition at all "it would be a favourable opportunity to kick up a row, and see what would be done." Kick up a row! the very phrase explains the whole design! that all the troops should be at the funeral was impossible, but all the police officers would ; a few troops or police officers would put down their attempt, but, as the troops would not probably act without the presence of the police, if they kicked up a row, they could see what was to be done, that is, to what extent they could commit depredation. Thus far the evidence has been consistent, for there has not been a word about overturning the State, and it was only in this conversation on the 16th of February, that this matter began to be talked of, and this is the way in which it is first mentioned. "Thistlewood (says the witness) approved of the plan," and without any introduction of the matter, by any thing said in the course of the conference, bolts upon this subject, "if they could take the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six in the Artillery-ground, they would have possession of London." The possession of London! I should have thought that any man with a military education—I should have thought that any man who had seen the march of a single regiment, would have said at once, there is nothing less probable, than that you would have taken possession of any one parish in London—of any one populous street in London—all that which is here proposed, and all that which is afterwards proposed, would not give secure possession of Oxford-street. Of Oxford-street! it would not give the possession of a street of half its importance, because there are avenues that would require the guard of four or five hundred men, and much more artillery than these conspirators proposed to have, but "if they could get the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six in the Artillery-ground, they would have possession of London before the morning, and if once it was begun, and the fact was communicated to the army"—what would happen do you think?—poor men "they would be at his majesty's funeral, and they would be too much fatigued to do any thing," so that twenty-five men were to hold London with eight pieces of cannon, because the soldiers would be tired with sitting up a single night, and could not come to rescue the metropolis and the kingdom from a handful of desperate ruffians.

* Concerning this person, See the Debates in the House of Commons, 1 Hans. Parl. Deb. N. S.; pp. 54, 242.

Is it to be endured, that a man shall come with these crude and rash inventions to swear away the lives of eleven men, upon testimony which would, in another place, weigh nothing in proving a milk-score or a washerwoman's bill? Can such idle dreams and dotages be received in a court of criminal judicature, or should they not rather be dismissed with the scorn and contempt so eminently their due? But when I make this exclamation, I am only at the beginning of the subject; he adds, "by persevering after they had got the cannon, they might prevent any communication from London to Windsor"—they were to possess all London, and all the road to Windsor, and all the avenues by these notable twenty-five men, and eight pieces of cannon—this is Thistlewood's plan, and against it the soldier did not say a word in the way of remonstrance; but it seems that remonstrance came from a man who was not a soldier; he used a little common sense, and stated obvious difficulties, although Harrison and Adams, with all their military experience, said nothing against the plan.

The conspirators who could devise such a plot, might well be considered as mad; but at least they had method in their madness—they were to do a great deal, they were to secure London against the troops, command the road between London and Windsor, and to cause a diversion and take possession of the telegraph at Woolwich, for fear some information should be conveyed to the ports. Thus were roads to be commanded in this direction; important diversions operated in that; telegraphs secured over the water; a metropolis like London secured, and an army paralyzed, by a band of five-and-twenty paupers, who, in addition to their other wonder-working faculties, must have possessed the gift of ubiquity. Must we not wonder how such things could enter into any human mind? Is it possible to suppose that a man, unless he were too insane to come before a jury for trial, could have been the father of these plans? That a wicked man may have invented them, I can well understand; but that any seven or eight men, two of them soldiers, should have met to act on so ridiculous a proposal, exceeds all human credulity. If this can be credited, there is nothing in oriental fiction—nothing in ancient or modern poetry—nothing in the legends of the fathers, or the lives of the saints, but may be received as history and credited as truth.

But Thistlewood has not yet done: inspired with the presumed success of his first operations, he observes, that "that will be the time to form a provisional government." You see their military exploits are nothing in comparison with their profound political schemes:

VOL. XXXII.

When they should have gained possession of London, these obscure beggars, these wretched paupers, who had not a man of any consideration, fortune, or figure, to support them, are to form a provisional government. That phrase is essentially necessary; that constitutes the chief point of their guilt. If you disbelieve that, gentlemen, whatever you may think of them in other respects, the present case vanishes, like the fabric of a fairy vision, into thin air. The forming a provisional government—that pretty phrase which has been transposed into a hand bill—is to make out the guilt of these men. A little before the late king is buried a thought comes up, that this would be the time to form a provisional government—to form it, and out of what materials? It is not pretended by any body at present—it may be hereafter, if you believe the witness—that any man of rank, wealth, or consequence, had anything to do with this. Believe him to-day and you will not want that afterwards: but these illiterate beggarly wretches, who could not agree with each other about three or four lines to be written on a piece of cartridge paper, one began it, then another, and at last disagreed about it, were to form a provisional government. "The provisional government" then, says Thistlewood, "is to be formed when we have got possession of these cannon, and when we have commanded the road to Windsor, and impaired or possessed the telegraph at Woolwich; and there is every chance of not being interrupted by the soldiers, because they will be too tired." Mr. Adams and Mr. Harrison in their military education never heard of a bivouac or a night march; they believed the soldiers could not have made a forced march of twenty miles; that no means could have been invented to bring them by water or in carriages to quell a revolution, undertaken by twenty-five bold men, who had possession of eight cannon, without a horse to assist them.

What was next to be done? business multiplies upon us fast; we have done a pretty good stroke of work already; but another thing must be effected, we must get possession of several out-ports, Dover, Brighton, Ramsgate, and Margate, and prevent any persons from leaving England without a licence. Very fine indeed! I wonder they omitted Harwich, and others, which might have been of use; but, however, Dover, Brighton, Ramsgate, and Margate, are the ports which are to be secured; and all this was to be accomplished on the night of the king's funeral. I do not know how many men were to be detached on this exploit; it was, however, to be done, and Brighton in particular must be taken possession of, because it brings the mind of the witness happily, and forms his tongue most naturally, to some intention about the present possessor of the crown. Long may he continue to wear it. Brighton was to be taken possession of, why?—not because the king was there; you know the king was labouring under as severe an indisposition as nature can endure, and bulletins of his state were issued every day; and therefore he was not likely to be at Brighton for some time: that every newspaper would shew. His majesty is now happily recovered from that indisposition, and, in common with every good subject, I pray to God that it may be long, very long, before he experiences the recurrence of that, or feels any other calamity. I pray too that the sceptre of these realms may ever continue in his illustrious house. But these sapient politicians and bold conspirators, it seems, have decreed otherwise. The king was not likely to be at Brighton, nor at the funeral; but now comes the real aim: all before has been shot in the air—"He could not be allowed to wear the crown." These twenty-five men, with the eight pieces of cannon, could not allow him to wear the crown, "the present family had inherited it long enough. There has been no change in the succession for the last hundred years, and we think they have inherited it long enough, and there cannot be any use in his wearing the crown:" and these sage politicians, as it is represented to you, decree the deposition of the present king, and fulfil the first count of the indictment. There, gentlemen, is the secret unravelled; these are the words of the wise; these the edicts of the powerful. Here is a kingdom to be overturned in an instant; the soldiers are to be absent; and these men are to meet with others, and agree to move eight pieces of artillery, without a horse that would grace a hackney coach, to subdue the greatest metropolis in the European world; without any more force than that already described, they are to possess the greatest public road in the kingdom; they are to incapacitate a large body of troops from marching twenty miles, secure the telegraphs and sea-ports, without any other means than their own will. Such is the plot as it has been represented to you by this shameless fabricator of incredible falsehoods, and by him alone is the first count of the indictment supported. There is not a soldier who could have lent himself to it for a moment, and I should have thought, if I had not seen the witness in the box, that it exceeded any confidence a man could possess to have dared to state it.

3 K

But it was also stated (because now the other parts of the plot begin to emerge) that two or three had drawn out a plan to assassinate the cabinet ministers at their first dinner. Now that is a curious phrase; it goes through the whole of this narrative, and it was known the cabinet dinners had been suspended during the period which followed the death of his late majesty, and during the illness of his present majesty; and now, mark how this tale of this wretched witness breaks itself to pieces directly it comes to be touched. The ministers were to be assassinated at a cabinet dinner, and that was to be before the 16th of February: there was no talk of a cabinet dinner before that, and yet the explosion was to take place on the 16th, and the government destroyed, although there was to be neither meeting of ministers nor cabinet dinner at the time they were plotting it: these falsehoods astonish one by their absurdity, they are gross, open, and palpable; too flagrant for detection, too gross for exaggeration.

It seems at this time there were other meetings at Fox-court, and particularly on Saturday the 19th, and on Sunday the 20th; and at the meeting on the 19th, nothing occurred but this remarkable observation, that "they must do something on the following Wednesday." His late majesty had been buried, the troops had not been absent or so conducted themselves that the conspirators could surprise and overturn the government, that plot had gone to nothing, and now their attention was to be called to something else; but now they are scattered in their views, and fall back on their original scheme of plunder; the announcement of the cabinet dinner in the New Times had not come to their knowledge, but something must be done on Wednesday next (and Edwards was there), because they were all so poor they could wait no longer. If there is any truth in this, it still resolves itself into my original proposition, that poverty was their goad, and plunder their aim, but nothing which could be called a political motive, or be put in question as endangering the government at all. Then it is said, "if nothing takes place between this and Wednesday, we will go to work; we are all so poor that we can wait no longer," and then a committee was proposed, and we shall see the next day the sittings of this committee, and the propositions made at it.—"On Sunday morning, about eleven o'clock," Adams says, "I entered the room. Owing to the thickness of the snow I could hardly see. I afterwards saw Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Harrison, Hall, Davidson, Harris, Cook, Tidd, Bradburn, Edwards, and Wilson. I found the business had not been entered into, Thistlewood proposed that a committee should be formed, and Tidd should take the chair." Tidd, therefore, I suppose, as a rehearsal of some intended scene in the provisional government, is duly installed with a pike in his hand; and now let us hear what he proceeds to do. Thistlewood was on his left, Brunt was on his right. Thistlewood said to the committee, "I presume"—for certainly they had had no time to talk of it before all this had been done, without the least knowledge or suggestion on any one's part: you have heard the plot detailed by this witness, but Thistlewood says this according to his fiction,—"I presume you know what we meet here for." Upon my word, it was no small presumption, for no man could possibly know, "he turned to the door, and said, I mean the west-end job." Now this is the first time the west-end job comes under our notice. Brunt never speaks without an oath, therefore, to make him natural, it comes out thus.—Brunt said, "Damn my eyes, mention it out; and Brunt was called to order by the chair." There is regularity; there is decency and propriety! Thistlewood then said, "Gentlemen, as we find there is no probability of the ministers dining all together, we will come to a determination to take them separately at their own houses. We shall not have so good an opportunity as if they dined all together; so that we must take two or three at a time," that is Mr. Thistlewood's proposal, as the witness states it.—"I suppose we can have forty men for the west-end job; so I propose, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and six cannon from the Artillery-ground shall be taken, and that Cook shall command them;" here we have the old plan brought forward again of the eight pieces of artillery.—The main body being gone to the west-end job, the artillery is to be taken by the residue, which is to be formed out of a number which never has exceeded twenty-five. The first witness swears he never saw at Fox-court more than fifteen; the doubt between him and another witness at Cato-street is, whether there were twenty or twenty-five, but these were to be manufactured into forty men for the west-end job, and the others were to take the cannon and to seize the Mansion-house.—The Mansion-house!—twenty-five men would have been completely lost in the passages: they might as well have gone to take the Tower of Babel. But the Mansion-house is not all; they are to proceed to the Bank, and make an attempt upon that; and Palin by himself, uninterrupted, and carrying his satchel of combustibles at his back, is to set fire to buildings in different parts of the town; the provisional government is to be installed at the Mansion-house—nobody to instal it—the Bank is to be attacked, and Palin, in the mean time, is to be wandering about, setting fire to houses for his amusement, and for the perfection of the plan. This is proposed: what becomes of it in debate? Thistlewood said "there would be time between that and Wednesday to improve the plan," and he dropped the subject for the present, as Brunt had a proposition to make about assassinating the ministers. Thistlewood afterwards says "he will not drop his plan," and after some little obstruction and difficulty, he has it put to the question, and it is carried without opposition. A glorious beginning at least in the provisional government—there is no opposition—it is carried nem. con. "Brunt then proposed, that they should divide themselves into separate lots, and go forward to assassinate the ministers separately, unless they had a cabinet dinner."—This is Sunday.—"Out of each party one should be chosen by lot to assassinate the person designated, and whoever the lot fell upon was to do it, or be murdered himself." Now how was that to be done, or who was to be the spare assassin, who was to kill his accomplice?—I cannot tell, but this is one of the many fictions you have to swallow, if you can give credit to this man's testimony. But on that, the witness began to fight the old soldier; he saw difficulty in it, and, speaking for the first time, he said, "may not a man fail, and is he to be run through if he fails from unavoidable circumstances?" "No," said Thistlewood, "not unless it is through cowardice." To what court-martial the failing assassin was to be subjected does not appear, but the whole comes over you like the dream of delirium, or the illusions of frenzy; and you are to believe it, however repugnant to credibility, because this witness states it on his oath. Then Brunt's motion was put and carried. In a few minutes in came Palin, Potter, and Strange; Thistlewood communicated to them the plans, and they agreed to them; but Palin seems to have been a politician of a higher class than the rest, for he, in a very parliamentary form, "rose to say a few words," and he said, "agreeing as I do in the plans proposed, there is one thing I want to know, there are so many things you have proposed to do at one time, that it would be of the greatest benefit to us if it could be done; you talk of taking forty or fifty men to this west-end job, you doubtless know better than I do what force you are able to bring, but before I go round to the friends I can bring, I wish to know, am I at liberty to tell them what has been resolved on in the whole, or in part, or am I not?" Then Thistlewood gives this answer, an answer which is usually given somewhere else, importing confidence in ministers; Thistlewood said, "Mr. Palin undoubtedly knows what men he has to depend upon, and he will know how far he ought to trust them." An answer prodigiously wise and sententious, for it tells him nothing one way or the other.

Now you will see the importance of what Palin has said; it is demonstration of the weakness of their resources, and the impossibility of their having entertained the design charged. He expressed himself doubtfully of the plan, on the ground of their weakness and inability to execute it; he doubted the existence of resources; yet no satisfaction was given to him; there was no pretence of an ulterior force; he obtained only a general answer. "Mr. Palin, undoubtedly, knows what men he has to depend upon; and he will know how far he ought to trust them." On their separation on the Sunday, what was to be done? Palin the engineer, was to go and see what could be effected; he was to view a building in the neighbourhood, which appears to be Furnival's-inn, and it was said, "if that building could be set on fire it would be a good job." Palin, afterwards said, "it could be easily done:" if the test of fiction is to be in this case what it is in every other, some remote pointing to possibility, but a total want of rational application to probability, this would be sufficient to stamp this as a gross and flagrant falsehood. Of all the buildings in that neighbourhood, Furnival's-inn is the one that presents the least facilities for being fired; it is a new building with party walls, according to the Building Act no doubt, and built so as to prevent the communication of fire, and to make it far from easy to set the whole pile in flames; if they had pointed to other places where some of us live, the buildings are older and the communications more free; but Furnival's-inn is the least probable of all the inns of court I know. If they had gone a door or two on either side nearest to Leather-lane, they would have found buildings of wood, which if they had applied a match to, would have raised an inextinguishable conflagration. Perhaps old Furnival's-inn was in his mind, and this favoured his fiction: but if any man were to say the new building is easy to fire, he must be such an idiot and driveller as hardly exists on the face of the earth. A man in prison inventing something he is to tell the Privy council and a Court, may strike on such a subject as this; he states it in examination before the Privy council, and he must be taken as he is found; for those employed by the Crown would not suggest what would make his story probable, they bring him before the jury, with all the credit they can give him, but with no assistance beyond that—for they would disgrace themselves if they did give it; and from the Attorney-general to the clerk of the Solicitor to the Treasury, there is not one I am sure but would disdain putting his hand to such a thing. Therefore, having once said that that new building is to be the object of attack, and that Palin and another man approved of the plan, he comes to tell you so to day, that is, to swear to a fiction he has fabricated, in hopes that you will believe from him that which is impossible. Any man opening his eyes, and seeing the inn guarded by a gate, protected by a porter, and difficult of access, would say, that never could be the place chosen; it being entire within itself, without communication with any thing else, and leading to nothing which can much attract or engage the attention of the public. I apprehend that that inn being on fire from one end to the other, would create less sensation than a chandler's shop would at Charing-cross, because the streets diverge from that neighbourhood in so many directions, and the population there is so much more crowded together than in the part of the metropolis where the supposed fire was to be made. In the analysis of this man's evidence, you see the grossness of fiction, and the fondness of delusion: he hopes to gain reward or save his life; and he states what first comes forward, to prove a plot, which (if it existed) a wise government might have overlooked, a strong one might have despised.

We come now to the business of the Exchequer. It is represented by some one, that if men are to be collected to do all this hard work they should eat a little bit, upon which Brunt says, "Damn my eyes;" and I must request your attention to the expression, from what was said in evidence, and by the Attorney-general, in his opening. I beg pardon if I shock your ears by the repetition of these execrations, promising it is not a needless repetition; but Brunt introduces his speech, as usual, by these words; and he says, "he has been out of work a great while; but he has got a one pound note, and will spend it all in treating his men"—the magnificent Mr. Brunt treating his men with a one pound note. Supposing Brunt did execute the generous intention, that would give you an insight into the secret; for if he gave them only a slice of cheese and bread, and porter, or gin, the fund would be exhausted on forty men, and there is an end of the Exchequer and the revolutionists—for the most money produced was on one occasion six shillings, on another a shilling, on another seven-pence; this was all the treasure that astonished the eyes of the gazers, and a one pound note was talked of, that they might see on some future occasion if he possessed it, or rather if this man is to be believed; for I ask again, is it credible, that twenty-five men, from the dregs of society, could be allured by sharing in one pound to overturn a state? or whether it is not probable they had some other view? or whether it was any thing more than the hope of such plunder as confusion and uncertainty might assist them in obtaining, when they had done something which would create a very considerable alarm.

I have endeavoured, in the hours I have stolen from my rest, to direct your attention to the material parts of the evidence. I do not affect to go through all parts of it; I endeavour not to omit any thing against the prisoner, and I make such observations on it, as I think it bears. The task of reciting it at large belongs to my lord; I know how it will be done, and need not dwell upon the subject. There was a meeting on the 21st. The plot is ripening, and something is to be effected. On the 21st something is said that might throw a little doubt upon the proceedings of these gentlemen; namely a communication from the landlord of the White-hart, that Bow-street and the Secretary of State's office had got notice of their plans; but it frightened them not a whit; they are as brave as ever. Whether there had been communications to Bow-street, and the Secretary of State's office, we might have had the means of knowing; but we have not; that there had been some communications, we know, from lord Harrowby, but to what extent we do not know, because one witness has not appeared. But communications had been made (as I have no doubt this witness well knew, at the time) to the Secretary of State, and to Bow-street, and therefore, something must be done to force the plan forward a little, and we shall see what it is.—Upon the next day after the papers had been examined, and no man had reason to believe there was a cabinet dinner fixed—who do you think announces that there is one? Mr. Edwards—who produces the only paper which contains it? Mr. Edwards—he points out the only paper which contains the intelligence and the paper is bought; and as you have heard in the evidence and cannot disbelieve, that intelligence—fabricated to deceive the conductor of the paper and to become the stumbling block of these people—that falsehood is put into the New Times, which the Court reporter did not know of or communicate, which appeared in no other paper, but which most miraculously crept into the New Times, and that under circumstances to make it quite clear that the Court reporter had not given it, because he says the term grand could not be applied by him, that one cabinet dinner is not more grand than another, and therefore it would mean nothing. Then you see how the matter had been fabricated, and for what purpose:—then comes this glorious news; as it may be deemed, to these men, announced by Edwards, and proved by the production of the New Times. What is the first thing that passes upon it? and from this time I shall discharge Brunt's imputed execrations from your attention. The Attorney-general, believing his instructions, made an animated observation upon the impiety as well as the obduracy of a man, who could state his belief in God, in consequence of his prayer having been granted, in the appointment of this dinner. To be sure if the thing were true, it stamps an iniquity and infamy beyond example; but you will see it is impossible. Brunt is reported to have said "Now I will be damned if I do not believe in God;" in the mouth of this fiction-making witness, Brunt said this, "I have often prayed that there may be an opportunity when these thieves may all be got together, and now God has answered my prayer." What is this? I did not believe in God when I prayed to him, but now I do believe in him. I blaspheme his holy name, and the best of his attributes. I, Brunt, had never believed in God till this moment, but now I will begin to believe in God; but I have prayed to a God in whom I did not believe, to grant me an opportunity of murdering a certain number of his creatures, most favoured, in point of wealth, fortune, talents, and circumstances, and now that prayer is granted, I shall begin to believe—and I, who prayed when I did not believe, confirm my faith, by blasphemies and execrations. These are the fictions of a gross, rank, ignorant conspirator, who thinks that every thing he swears will be believed; but his inventions are below human ingenuity, and almost defy the grasp of human investigation; if we examine them we are almost prompted to believe them, because they are impossible; as a person once said, "I believe because it is impossible," that is, because no man would invent that which is so incredible. Now, I put it to you, that unless, upon a trial of life and death, you would adopt what was sportively said, in a philosophical argument, you cannot believe this; for if this witness is contradicted out of his own mouth, and states that which is incredible, from that moment, his evidence is tainted with the disbelief in your mind, his credit is perforated by his own act, the tide rushes in, it sinks to the bottom, and can no longer form either a vessel or a buoy; it is gone for ever.

But I must proceed with my observations on this statement, now we have got through Mr. Brunt's exclamation on which the Attorney-general made his observations: then a committee was to sit directly, "and I" says the witness "was put into the chair; Thistlewood wanted to propose a fresh plan respecting the assassination, because now the ministers are caught in a purse-net—fourteen or sixteen of them—a good haul—and therefore, it is necessary to form a new plan, but" says the Chairman (the witness), "I interrupted Mr. Thistlewood in this, referring to what I said yesterday," that is, to what had been said about information being given at Bow-street and the Secretary of State's. Upon that there was a confusion and violence, and I beg you to carry your attention to that, because I shall have to advert to it hereafter. Harrison said, "If any man should do any thing to throw cold water on the business, he would run him through the body." What, after such threats as this, could attach this man to his associates? he had time, he had means, and yet he mentioned this to no one, and the next day he was baited like a bull or a bear, but he remains firm, he does not desert them, but however he was deposed from his kingly dignity, and Tidd was put in the chair; then Thistlewood wanted to proceed, Palin stopped him from further explanation, and they moved, that a watch should be set at lord Harrowby's house, and accordingly a watch was set. Now, this is the truth not to be doubted, and this is one of the extraneous truths proved, to which I shall direct your attention—a watch was set at lord Harrowby's house, as part of the plan which I say most undoubtedly did exist, of assassinating his majesty's ministers; whether there would be any material impediment or obstruction to that, that watch was set to ascertain, and Davidson was the man who occasionally watched; this is confirmed to an extent I cannot deny, and I shall observe upon that by and by, because it never shall be my wish to press any observations on the jury, without treating that which could be said on the other side as fairly as I can. This meeting is on the 22nd, and the watch was then proposed; it was to be set at six o'clock, and to be relieved every three hours, up to twelve; there was no great sagacity in the measure, but such as it was it was pursued.

Then they go on to the proposal of the plan, by which the ministers were to be assassinated; I shall only refer to it briefly, because, though I do not wish to urge newspaper knowledge more than is necessary, still it is impossible you should not have minutely informed yourselves of the means by which it was proposed to carry the murder into execution, and the narrative of the witness in the box agrees with it, to the minutest particulars. Thistlewood.

was to knock at the door, and obtain admittance, on the pretence of having a letter—the servants were then to be secured—the conspirators were to rush up stairs, and the parties were to be murdered—these (with a little additional figuring which comes out then, or a little after, about the butcher who was to take off heads and hands, as his share of the plunder) are all the particulars of the plan, and all which he has stated without a variance from what was given in the newspapers derived from his own information and that of others.

After having murdered so many of the ministers, what are they to do next?—they fall back, so barren is their invention, upon their old plan: Gray's-inn-lane and the Artillery-ground are to occupy them all, they are to get eight cannon without horses, by merely touching them with their fingers I suppose; and again the unseen, unknown, unnamed, provisional government is to be installed at the Mansion-house; what is to be its operation no man has said, what it is to govern or whom, whether it is to depose the lord mayor, or any other king, is not disclosed; but the whole plan is a provisional government. Unless there is magic in words—unless you suppose that the pronouncing of them will “raise spirits from the vasty deep”—I am as ignorant what is meant by them as I was when the Attorney-general began. I did not know what they were aiming at; nor has any one person yet thrown the least light on the subject. These men were to be engaged in feats of arms, or scenes of plunder, and that there was any other person connected with them you have not heard as yet. Shall I say why?—if they had said so, as was done upon a former occasion, upon a trial where the name of Thistlewood was mentioned, some of these persons might come here as witnesses, and say, we never knew nor heard of, nor consented, to any such thing; nor do we believe there was a plan to make us a provisional government. And then the credit of the witness would be broken to pieces on another point, in addition to the many I have already mentioned.

But let us see, further, what these redoubtable conspirators are about, according to this man. One generally supposes that a printing-press is one of the engines without which a revolution cannot move for a moment. Have they any press?—No; not the means of printing a solitary placard; but Thistlewood is to write in such a hand as he can (and I wish you could have seen his writing) on three pieces of cartridge paper, certain magical words sure to effect a revolution in the country: “Your tyrants are destroyed—the friends of liberty are called upon to come forward—the provisional government is now sitting.” Your tyrants are destroyed? surely they do not mean that his majesty's ministers are the tyrants of the country; if they do, with all my heart they are destroyed, and there is no view to any other tyrant to be destroyed. If they say it means the ministers, there is an end of the treason; because, in point of fact, there is nothing done but to murder those worthy persons. It is a wicked murder, but not high treason. If the meaning of the words is his majesty's ministers are destroyed, there is an end of the undertaking; and it is only required that the friends of liberty should come forward, not stating what they are to do; and that a provisional government is sitting, not stating where.—The gross folly of this would exceed all human belief, if stated by the most respectable person. If a dying martyr said it with his last breath, it would stagger credulity; but how much more, when it comes from a man tainted with falsehood in every part of his evidence.

Upon the walls of the buildings in flames were these papers to be placed, to the end that the people might see them by the light. These invitations are to be put on the walls of the houses on fire, to be consumed or crushed, and this is to be the mighty engine to levy the whole mass of the friends of liberty. The conspirators having no communication with any body,—being incapable of disclosing their intentions beyond the spot where they instituted them,—the friends of liberty, whoever they may be, were, as they passed the fire, to be called on by this paper to come forward—for a provisional government (we do not know how composed) is sitting, we do not know where. Is it possible to sacrifice the life of men upon such fictions as these? Is it possible that a jury of the country can take the lives of eleven men, on the deposition of such a witness, swearing to such egregious falsehoods as no man can believe?—fictions which are incapable of being brought into contact with common sense; and which no man who can count five, can be supposed to have suggested or have countenanced? We get rid then of those three placards which are to be the means of raising the friends of liberty; and all this is to be done before there is time to go to the Mansion-house, because, if you set a house on fire in Holborn, and go to Gray's-inn-lane to fetch cannon, the placard will be gone, and there will be no finger-post to point out where the provisional government is sitting; whether in a garret in Crown-street, or at the Mansion-house, no man could see from this bill; and yet you are to believe this was a plan for overturning his majesty's government—for levying war against the king—and for deposing him from his regal Crown and dignity as the sovereign of these realms.

I am tired of repeating the incredibility of this story, and I proceed reluctantly to a further statement; I do not intend to pursue this man's evidence, in his walk from the room in Fox-court, to Cato-street; but before we go let me remark on one thing stated by Ings, the butcher. I wish some part of the exhibition, made here yesterday, were here to day. I have formed a conception,—begging, that if it is unfounded, you will dismiss it from your minds, and not let my client be prejudiced by a mistaken impression of mine,—but Ings is represented to have equipped himself with a belt and two bags, the belt containing several pistols; he having a sword, and the two bags being also about him. And you are taught to believe by this witness, that a human head was to be put into each of them. If there is in the mind of man, any thing sufficiently atrocious, to have crowned and confirmed assassination and murder, by a display so barbarous, I lament, and am truly heart-stricken by it. When I have heard and read, as I did many years ago, of those exhibitions in France, to which the Attorney-general adverted, I was then at the age of twenty or thereabouts, and even in that gay inconsiderate period of life, every nerve in my frame thrilled, every drop of my blood ran cold with horror, when I read of human heads paraded about the streets of Paris, and of the cruel insults offered the royal family, by exposing to them, through the grates of their prison, the bleeding remains of those whom they had most loved. God knows I felt comforted by an honest assurance, that while British sentiment remained, such scenes never could take place here. No man would dare to publish himself as the perpetrator of such acts; but to day, to grace this cause, and to make additional impressions to the disadvantage of the prisoners, it is to be imputed to Ings, that he had this unnatural and incredible atrocity in his thoughts.

Now, I come to the observation I meant to make; it may be unimportant and unfounded—but if I remember rightly, the bags brought before the Court, taken from the person of Ings, were such, as no man who had exercised the trade of a butcher, could have proposed to put a human head into—they were not large enough to contain it. I am told I am mistaken; I thought it was so, and I am only convinced of the contrary, because one of my learned friends obligingly corrects me, wishing that I should not persist in an error. But be the possibility as it may, do not for God's sake let us be deceived by these ignorant fictions—fictions, abusive of the nature and quality of Englishmen—fictions, which unless we give up all sense of national character, to favour the tale of such a witness as Adams, cannot gain belief in our minds. But examine your own thoughts, gentlemen, take the declarations of all these men, from the beginning to the end of their supposed plot—their declarations of poverty—their expressions, that they were so poor, that they could not stay beyond Wednesday—that they shall not fear the traps, those are the police officers,—and then see whether it was the lord chancellor's head, or lord Harrowby's plate, that was to go into those bags,—that a needy man, in the perilous situation in which Ings was placed, should encumber himself with two unprofitable heads, is altogether incredible. The intention was, to strike the ministers from the face of the earth; but Ings would not have loaded himself with their heads, when salvers and goblets, and beakers and spoons, were within his reach, and would have enriched him:

plunder was his object; for Ings is the most clamorous about poverty; and Ings, therefore, is much more to be supposed to intend to steal the plate he should find, than to encumber himself with human heads, of no use, but to raise all mankind against him, and with a hand, the hand of lord Castlereagh, which was to be put in pickle, and shewn on some future occasion, whether for money, or as a trophy, does not appear.

I have said I will not accompany this man in his walk from Fox-court to Cato-street, the circumstances he discloses there are of little value in this cause; but when you come to Cato-street every moment assumes some importance. He goes in, and tells you that there were numerically (he does not say as he computes or believes), but numerically there were twenty people in the house besides himself, and he separates them exactly, eighteen in the room, and two below stairs. He tells you there was one candle, and one candle alone; that that candle (for he mentioned it in the singular number always) was put out on one occasion, and he cannot tell who did it. That when the Bow-street officers came up, they used these expressions, which I took down:—Two stood at the door and said, "Here's a pretty nest of you. Gentlemen, we have got a warrant to apprehend you, and we hope you will go peaceably." To these very phrases and sentences he swears most distinctly. It will be my duty hereafter, when I state where he is confirmed and where contradicted, to beg your attention to these circumstances, because they are pregnant with strong contradictions, and add to my belief that he was not present at the place: What was the whole exploit as to him?—a thrust with a sword was made, and he was very near the officer, but he escaped immediately, and walked away as unconcerned as if nothing had happened: those were his very words. If he was present then he was known to the officers who came there, and who favoured his escape. If he was not present, he is stating from public report what he has sworn to, helping it out by such additional circumstances as at his leisure he could devise.

With your experience in courts, some of you may have been astonished that my learned friend cross-examined this witness so shortly; that he did not go more into the circumstances; and that he did not endeavour to get from him contradictions upon particular points, where it might be expected he should betray himself into contradictions. Gentlemen, I had the honour to submit to you that every science has its own particular technical points, and my learned friend never shewed himself a more consummate master of his profession than in the brief examination of that man. To have examined him again and again, would only have produced the repetition of the fiction you saw so much of, under the examination of my two learned friends the Solicitor-general and Mr. Gurney. You saw how accurately he had conned his story; how ready he was to prevent their running a-head, when they were proposing fit and regular questions according to their experience and judgment—he checked the counsel: “I am not come to that part of the story yet,” or, “I have something else to say before I come to that;” and not once but repeatedly,—conduct very natural in a man who, during the term of his imprisonment, had planned and chalked down, and devised, and designed, every thing that he could say; who could not be put out of his way as to a single word by any proposition, and who would not suffer his story to be mutilated, whatever the necessity and desire to do so might have been, and however fit it might have been to put his narrative otherwise. “No—I have not come to that part of the story yet;” and then he goes on with words and phrases preconceived for the purpose, and gives you his lesson as if he had learnt it from a book. Then, if my learned coadjutor had wasted his excellent talents in cross-examination, what would have been the result?—he would have said twice that which he had said once. Witnesses like this are not overcome by cross-examination, but by an examination of their manner in giving their evidence, by investigating the improbability of their story, and by seeing how much of it must be mere matter of invention; therefore nothing came out in cross-examination except this—and most important it is—that when pressed upon that part of the subject, and with allusion to a phrase which the Attorney-general had imported into his speech from the greatest poet in our language, whether he had any “compunctious visitings,” he swore—believe it if you can—that conscience alone!—no fear for his safety—no hope of a better state in this world, by reward or punishment—but his heart-stricken-conscience alone—induced him to be quiet from the murder of Smithers on Wednesday night, till his own being taken quite quietly on Friday; and then on Saturday he plumes his wings and goes before the privy council to disburthen his soul, and make atonement for his offence. I have been much in courts where informers have been called on to disclose what they knew of a matter; and I remember a very wise and able magistrate of Middlesex, who filled the chair of that sessions for twenty-six years, who, when an informer answered that he brought the prosecution forward for the love of public justice, always said, “Sir, the moment you say that, you become incredible; and there is no believing a word from your mouth.” Now, can you believe this man’s story? He has been attacked as by a lion and a bull dog, put out of the chair, treated with indignity. He sees a murder committed, walks away as unconcerned as if nothing had happened. His conscience strikes him, though his pride was not hurt. He rests on the stings of conscience four days, and then he unburthens himself. One would suppose that you had not hearts, that you were not conscious of your own feelings, or else a man would not have the audacity to stand up before you, a discerning jury of the country, and state that which the children of a nursery would reject as unfit for belief.

I have now done with his examination; but, before I proceed further in this most arduous case, let me set myself right in one particular. Have any of my expressions induced you to think I have treated the case with levity?—if they have, absolve me from such an imputation. I never meant to do it. Men of right minds cannot treat lightly matters of this grave importance. I cannot hear without shuddering—I cannot believe without amazement—without indignation—without all the feelings of abhorrence that can enter the mind—that the person who has for so many years presided with unexampled industry, ability, and integrity in the highest and most important court of this country for the decision of questions of property, was in one moment to be a senseless corpse; that the victor of Waterloo, the pride and glory of the British name—he who exalted to its highest pitch the renown of our national valour, and became at the same time the avenger and liberator of Europe, was to have fallen under the hands of vulgar assassins, and to have perished in an inglorious broil.

Gentlemen, I omit to name other intended victims for other reasons. I do not brag of my private or occasional acquaintance with any body, but I may have a slight acquaintance with some of them: take your measure from these two individuals alone, and say that they are connected with all the wealth and wisdom and learning and talents which were to be present at that cabinet dinner, and I am sure that the stoutest heart must recoil with fear and melt with compassion, at the mere mention of such a horrible batchery. And if you can suppose that I have treated it in any degree with levity, it has been from the inadvertence of the tongue, and not the corruption of the heart. I never intended it; and if I have done it, I entreat you to replace me in your moderate and favourable regard, to view it with the kindness which I ought to claim as an Englishman.

I proceed to the task of examining in what degree the witness is supported; and for that purpose I beg to bring back your minds to the passage I read from the book, and beg you to see how far this witness, telling a tale stigmatized with appearances of falsehood from the beginning to the end, is supported so as to gain your unlimited credit. He is supported in propositions of very little importance in this way by Mary Rogers, mistress of the house in Fox-court—I do not go through all their names:—there was a servant from the house who proved nothing, but that she had shewn the lodgings to somebody in January; but Mrs. Rogers proved that the lodgings were taken for long—no furniture sent in, and sometimes chairs were taken from another room, and once a table: so far he is confirmed—the apprentice, Joseph Hale, confirms him to an extent nearly similar; I shall observe where they contradicted him. Now, with respect to this there is no dispute. Joseph Hale supports him in saying, that during the latter days of the occupation of that room, before the explosion in Cato-street, numbers of persons used to resort there; that is the confirmation he has generally given with respect to that matter. Lord Harrowby and his servant confirm the intention of having this cabinet dinner on Wednesday, the 23rd of February; of that there cannot be a doubt, nor is it part of my case that that was not intended to be the day of the murder—it is unimportant as it relates to the treason; but lord Harrowby confirms another witness, Hiden, who did communicate to his lordship, in the Park, in the manner afterwards disclosed to the public, the danger to which he was exposed, and stated the reasons for doing so. There are three witnesses called (I do not cavil at the wisdom which presides on this occasion) to prove what would not have been disputed, namely, that the room in Cato-street was taken, and that Davidson was seen about it from time to time, that serves for a parade to support the witness, it seems to say, you must believe this man—here are our three witnesses who swear they saw these persons at the room before the explosion, and that they were carrying things in. But this does not weigh one feather in the cause, it is utterly unimportant, and these are all the confirmations in direct terms. How is there collateral confirmation? I put out of the question here that which affords no confirmation of the witness, because the witness has stated none of the facts; I do not mean that you should forget Mr. Underwood's man, who sharpened the sword for Ings, or the pawn-broker from whom the blunderbuss was redeemed—no doubt, if ministers were to be murdered, it was convenient the persons who did it should be armed, and therefore, it is not necessary to observe upon that: that the sword must be ground, and that the blunderbuss must be redeemed, is consistent with the plan of murder, without adding any thing beyond—and it does not confirm that witness, because he stated no one of the facts, except that Harrison, like every other cavalry soldier, knew how the barracks in Portman-street were situated.

Now, what other confirmation arises from the evidence of other men who have been brought forward, as connected with the cause? The Attorney-general has most justly said, "Although I dwell so much on the evidence of accomplices," applying that to the witness Adams, and to another of the name of Monument, "yet there are witnesses whom I shall call; namely, Hiden, and an Irishman, Dwyer, who are not accomplices, and require no confirmation;" that is true; and if their evidence collaterally and independently could be implicitly believed, it goes to support the facts, though it is not directly given in confirmation of the facts advanced by the principal witness; but undoubtedly they do aid your belief of that which the principal witness has stated.

Let us examine Hiden's statement. He says, that "a long time ago, during the life of his late majesty, he met with Wilson, one of the conspirators upon this indictment, and that he had no acquaintance with any of them but him," and I believe never saw any one of them but him. He says, "I was formerly a member of a shoemaker's club; I knew Wilson. A few days before the 23rd of February, I saw him. He proposed, if I would be one of a party to destroy his majesty's ministers," and, most curiously, he says he used these very words "at a cabinet dinner,—they were waiting for one, and all things were ready; they had such things as I never saw, and which they called hand-grenades. They depended on me to be one, and he said, Mr. Thistlewood would be glad to see me:—they were to be put under the table, and they who escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon:—they were to light up some fires, which were to keep the town in confusion several days, and then it would become a general thing." That was his conversation with Wilson:—then he says a thing which does him great honour, that he stated to lord Harrowby the danger in which he was, but he did not state any general revolution, or any ulterior design. He went first to lord Castlereagh, who seems to have been an object of particular spleen, and then he went to the most obvious of the cabinet ministers, and made a communication to him, which was to have the effect of preventing this plot taking place. On the 23rd he says he saw Wilson again, between four and five in the afternoon; he had never been at the place; he had taken no measures, but he saw Wilson again on the 23rd, between four and five in the afternoon, he met him in Manchester-street; Wilson said "I was the very man he wanted to see, there was to be that night a cabinet dinner at Grosvenor-square; I was to go to the Horse and Groom in Cato-street, or to stop at the corner till I should be shewn into a stable close by." It was to be by six, or a quarter before; he said there would be between twenty and thirty; this then was the whole force to murder the ministers, and this is the force by means of which it is to be imputed that they were to effect a revolution in the country; this is matter of mere speculation in the mind of this person, and of him alone, for no man else concurred in it, or supported it. He said "there were to be a party in the Borough, another in Gray's-inn-lane, another in Gee's-court, or the city," that is somewhere at the further end of Oxford-road, or somewhere beyond Temple-bar. He said "all Gee's-court were in it, but would not act till the English began, because they had been deceived so often. I understood the inhabitants to be chiefly Irish." This is the conversation which he represents to have taken place with Wilson, only not acted or concurred in by others; and whether Wilson was the deceiver or the deceived, that was his conversation; but how truly it could be the intention of a man's mind to carry this plan into effect, it is for you to say.

Hidden says, "I told him I cannot go with you now, because I am ordered to carry some cream to a customer of mine;" and supposing it might put six-pence in the pocket of this man, or one shilling or half a crown, the whole of the plot vanished before him, and he goes to buy his cream, and leaves the plot to succeed or fail as it may, giving himself no further trouble about it, for he is unconnected and unconcerned with it, not going again to lord Harrowby, and saying, "My lord, be on your guard, the peril I announced is imminent; I know it, for I have met the man who communicated it to me." Not a word of all this, he is so fearless of danger that he goes to buy his cream—he will not sacrifice a six-pence; he knows no such thing is intended as a revolution, and therefore he pursues his quiet occupation of purchasing cream, and gives himself no further trouble about it. This is not the way a plot to overturn government should be proved—a talk with another man in the street, who is too idle to give up six-pence; that is not the manner in which revolutions are effected, and states brought into danger. That is all that is material in this man's conversation. I do not say (and I will not lay myself open to observation, by seeming to suppress what I shall be supposed to fear), that this is not matter to enter into your consideration: but so far from proving the case or supporting the witness Adams—unless you believe Adams—it does not weigh a feather in the scale; and that you cannot believe him, I have laboured for a long time to shew, for which I ought to pray your patience; but it has been in vain, if I have not made some impression on your minds tending to convince you his evidence is not to be relied on, but that he must be dismissed from your consideration.

Then we get another witness of the name of Monument, a person present at the time of the final explosion in Cato-street. He, it seems, comes newly into the affair; he has never been at any of the consultations; therefore, with respect to them, which are the material points where confirmation is wanted, the witness Adams is not confirmed in the slightest degree. They call the man, Monument, who was not present at any former meeting, to state what happened at Cato-street; and he declares most positively that he has no recollection or consciousness of having seen so remarkable a man as Adams there: he does not remember, nor has he any belief in it; he tells you something most important to notice hereafter, but I think he does not say any one word tending to show that any thing entered into the contemplation of the parties beyond the murder of the ministers at their cabinet dinner; and perhaps creating some confusion afterwards, of which they might take advantage in the way of a general scramble, rockless of life, so that they got some share of property.

That is the evidence of Monument; and there the case would be left, but for the very extraordinary and very incredible testimony of Dwyer, given as it is, and under all its circumstances. This Mr. Dwyer is a very honest bricklayer, who has worked (according to his own account, and we cannot contradict him at present) for one master for thirteen years, who lives in Gee's-court, and is supposed to have some influence there; he says he was invited to engage them to rise in insurrection, and he promised to do it from fear, but at the same time his conscience told him that it was a bad thing, and he told the person he was speaking to (I believe Thistlewood) that it was a very hard thing for him to inveigle the minds of innocent men. Why, if it was a hard thing to inveigle the minds of innocent men, the man whose perceptions of right and wrong went that extent would see it was of vast importance to prevent the consequence, and he should have been one of those who gave information on the subject, but he does not in any degree state himself to have given such information till after the 23rd of February—on the 23rd February—

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Within an hour.

Mr. Adolphus.—I thank your lordship for suggesting it;—he disclosed it to major James within an hour after the communication was made to him, namely, on the 23rd of February, and major James advised him to go to the Secretary of State. I forget whether he went or not. If there were no persons behind in this—if there were no emissaries to give accounts that would serve certain purposes, and swear to them afterwards—this man's evidence would be of more importance than it is; but as it is, I submit to you, that impeached as his credit is by the evidence brought forward with respect to him; impeached as it is by all the circumstances of incredibility attending him, it does not deserve belief in support of the proposition of a plot to overturn the government.

Let us see what the evidence is as it is taken down for me. "I became acquainted with Davidson some time before the 23rd of February. I had seen him twice; he introduced me to Thistlewood about the 9th of February. Thistlewood said nothing to me particular—that he had been in five or six revolutions" (I do not know what they call revolutions now-a-days, gentlemen, nor where he found them) "but however he said 'that Ireland was in a disturbed state.'" Now I should have thought Dwyer with his Gee-court acquaintance must have known that as well as himself, "that he had a good many of my countrymen. In the afternoon of the 22nd, I saw Davidson, who said he was going on sentry."—These communications had been going on from the 9th till the 23rd.—"On the morning of the 23rd, Harrison called on me, and took me to Fowcourt," there, he says, he had a bundle wrapped up in a paper. "We went to a two-pair back room, in which there was nothing but an old chair. Thistlewood, Davidson, and a few more came in; Davidson had a blunderbuss, a pair of pistols, and a bayonet in his side pocket; there were one or two others came in, Brunt is one of them. When Davidson produced the pistols, he said he had given twelve shillings for them, and Brunt said he would go and buy a pair. Thistlewood spoke to them all at large, and said some of the hand-grenades were to be thrown into the horse-barracks: "there we come to something of a contradiction, upon which I shall observe by-and-by. "Thistlewood asked me, how many of my countrymen I could muster for half past eight o'clock that evening, and I said about twenty-six or twenty-seven. I was to be at the Pomfret-castle, at half past six, in Wigmore-street, and I was to take a few of the best of them to the Foundling, and knock at the Porter's-lodge, and put a pistol to his breast, and to turn round on the right hand, and there were twenty-five or twenty-six stand of arms." Now that is a new plot which Dwyer imports into the case, and not one tittle of this has been communicated to any of the parties on any former occasion. They were to make a breach, to get cannon in Gray's-inn-lane and Finsbury. "Thistlewood mentioned the cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's. I saw a bundle taken out of the cupboard, it contained gunpowder; a tin measure was taken out, and it was measured out in bags by Harrison; it was said a dozen pike-handles were to be taken to Mary-le-bone, the remainder were to go some to Finsbury, and some elsewhere."

In all this, there is an appearance of riot, and an intention to do something or other beyond the murder of ministers; but I deny that there is any one disclosure of any intention to carry the matter further than the assassination and plunder of the moment—of any intention to overturn the government and effect a revolution, and there is not a tittle of mention of a provisional government.

With respect to other circumstances, which cannot lie or deceive you, namely, the arms and ammunition found—this, I believe, as far as my judgment informs me, is all the confirmation the first witness has received. Unimportant as this confirmation is to the proof of a design and intention to depose the king, let us see whether in any part Adams's evidence is supported, and I think you will find it falls to the ground like the card-house of a baby, directly the finger of a human being is applied to it;—there is not a thing that can stand on this testimony, and there is this curious circumstance attending it, which would alone destroy that which is much better combined than this, which is, that no two of the witnesses ever saw one another. Hiden never saw Adams, never saw Monument, never saw Dwyer; so with the others, they never saw one another; and which is most curious and most extraordinary, the man of all work, Mr. Adams, never states he saw any of the other three; they avoided each other in order to support each other; and you are to take it, that they support each other because no two of them speak to the same facts. Dwyer says, on the morning while the pikes were in agitation and the cartridges about, he was in the room at Fox-court. Adams says the same thing, and yet they did not see one another. Adams says, that upon that morning, and during the same transaction, flinting the pistols, I think, preparing the ammunition, and so on, he was there, and most extraordinary it would be that these two should never meet. Hiden is never met with or seen, nor his existence known of by Adams; and no man ever sees Dwyer, or knows of him, except a single individual person. Monument is never seen by either witness; and Monument, like Wilson, is so cold about the plot, that when he has a pair of shoes to mend for a customer, he says, I shall get a shilling by the job, and I will have nothing to do with the plot, and he declines the interview on that ground; and these are the mighty plotters who support each other on this formidable conspiracy, and on whose united credit you are to believe this story.

I say, upon this mean and empty plot, so void of judgment and common sense, so incapable of effecting any danger to the state, so certain to effect that which was just meditated—the murder of the party of persons intended, that it is a plot beneath the attention of government; and instead of an indictment for high treason, a common process to convict them of murder would have been sufficient. I submit that it is a plot not worth mentioning—that a wise government might well have overlooked, and a strong government have despised, even if they believed it to the extent they have been able to state. An act of assassination, which would plunge the whole nation in tears and misery, is the operation of a single individual, however incapable of good, however unimportant in the ranks of society, and nothing can be done too effectually to guard against such an operation, by any means that can be devised or applied; but in comparison with an act of high treason, it is, to use the words of a late inestimable writer, "the chirping of the grasshopper in the field, while the stately ox feeds on, regardless or unconscious of the noise"—so might a wise and strong government,—I do not mean to impeach either quality in our government,—so might they have treated this miserable plot, and not have brought forward this apparatus, to convict as traitors, a dozen miserable beggars, irritated by hopeless misery, and impatient through extreme poverty. Such are the elements upon which artful wickedness can work; and such are the victims which resolute villainy can expect to sacrifice. But, I beseech you to remember, that if you find these men guilty on the evidence of Adams, there is a premium for perjury, and an end of all security.

But referring to Adams, I have explained in what points I consider him to have been confirmed and supported. Now, let us see in what he is materially contradicted, and when I say materially contradicted, do not let me be taken to overstate the matter. Witnesses have been called to prove, from small circumstances, that this man must be telling the truth; if, from any of these small circumstances, you conclude he is telling the truth, then I submit with confidence, that the value of one contradiction by his associated witnesses, surpasses ten thousand such confirmations. When I say associated witnesses, I do not mean associated in the crime, but in the cause; I say that the evidence of all these to a hundred points, does not weigh so much as their contradiction as to one.

Now he describes that two or three meetings a day, of considerable numbers — the greatest fifteen, and in many instances eight, nine, or ten—took place in the lodgings; is he confirmed in that? the buildings in town will tell you how frail the buildings are in Fox-court, but the landlady knows and hears nothing of these frequent meetings except one on a Sunday. There are meetings to which I beg your attention, at one of which all was tumult and confusion; at another men flew at him, one like a bull-dog and the other like a lion, yet the landlady and the apprentice were in a state of unconsciousness of such tumult and confusion. The landlady and her niece, one being at home attending to the concerns of her family, and the other occasionally out on business, so that she knew less of the matter; but the landlady who was almost always at home, and the apprentice were called, not one of them giving the least countenance to these meetings, at which alone, if you believe Adams, the plot was disclosed, and if you do not believe him, the plot flies into the air with the mere effusion of your disbelief.

I beg your attention particularly to his statement as to Cato-street, and I hope it exists in your memory. At Cato-street he states there were twenty persons exactly, and divides them by eighteen and two: Monument says with equal positiveness, that there were twenty-five, and he says Thistlewood being called upon to enumerate the strength and dispose of it, distinctly stated, we are twenty-one here, and those below four. A witness who pretends to be confirmed, should be confirmed in all his circumstances: now in these two he is rather contradicted than confirmed. But he says, at Cato-street there was one candle only, and it is important to say so. Now here are the two officers, and one of them, Ellis, declares he saw eight candles all alight, and that they were put out at the time the pistol flashed: this is a point of contradiction, upon which there cannot be a mistake; because if there were but one or two, that is a fact easy to be ascertained; if the witness had said there were four or five candles, or more or less, I should not have addressed you upon that part of the testimony as being contradicted, but I do say that here it is materially, effectually, grossly contradicted.

But we advance to another contradiction, much higher; he says (and he makes a speech for him), that the first officer who made his appearance, that is, Ruthven, said, "Here is a pretty nest of you! Gentlemen (for he used that expression I remember very well), gentlemen, we have a warrant against you, and so surrender your arms." What do Ellis and Ruthven say, was their expression when they came into the room?—Did he say, here is a pretty nest of you? no, no such expression; that, like all the rest of the garnish and ornament of this story, is a pleasant fiction of the witness Adams.—Did he say, gentlemen, we have a warrant against you, therefore surrender your arms? no, the words which both the officers stated, and they agree in them exactly, are these,—“We are officers, seize their arms!” Now, the distinction I take is this, with respect to this contradiction; he would know in prison, that the officers had said something, and he would invent that which would do most service to the cause; therefore he invents the circumstance of their declaring they had a warrant—therefore he invents the expression, here is a pretty nest of you, therefore he invents that—which both the officers knew to be false, and contradict it accordingly. If the officers had said, we used a great number of expressions, we said there is a pretty nest of you, and so on, and he only repeated part of the words, it would not have been an impeachment of his testimony; but if a man adds the whole matter, the whole pungent matter, you may be sure it is a fabrication; and if the witness who stands before you, lays his hand upon the Gospel, and invokes God to help him as he speaks the truth, does not respect the Gospel or God, and does not speak to the truth, it is impossible you should give him credit in any degree, much more that you should on his testimony deprive such a number of your fellow-creatures of their lives.

But besides being contradicted by others, he contradicts himself. Always bear in mind, gentlemen, that he has been in prison, and therefore he cannot have assisted his memory, however he may have exercised his invention: He stated that upon two occasions of long continued meetings in Fox-court, Strange was present—Strange is put to the bar, and the witness is asked does he know him, and he says no. He is put to the bar with two others, with whom he is not acquainted; this man, who was twice with him in Fox-court, in the day time, he does not know! If he had remembered ten out of the eleven, there would be no danger in saying this man was Strange; but being one in three, he could not invent. This is a trying, a strong, circumstance. If he has deposed the truth as to the meetings, he must have known Strange as well as he knew the others; but he does not know Strange, and unless some better reason can be given for that than I can devise, a witness, whose whole evidence is composed of such absurd improbabilities, and who comes to disclose his own went of certainty, cannot be believed by you in any particular.

I have stated to you, and I have made it my theme all through this address, that Adams has not been confirmed to the extent he might have been, with respect to that which is alone material for you to inquire into, namely, the treasonable combination of these parties. I have looked, according to my instructions, to the list of witnesses for the Crown, I find the name of one Edwards, living at 166, Fleet-street, lately abiding in Ranelagh-place, not a prisoner—not taken up upon this charge—not tainted as an accomplice by government—no treason that we have known of against him—a man cognizant of all the facts—a man present at all the conversations—a man who pointed out the New-Times news paper, and saw and knew and guided every thing, and yet that man is not called—the spy is not called to support the informer, because the contrivance would have been made evident by his cross-examination, and therefore that man, like another spy, is kept back from examination; because one spy, who in another case, where Thistlewood was a party, and had been previously examined, was, by the eloquence and ability of counsel, and by his own infamy, blown out of court;* when such a man as that, who could have told you all the facts, who made the fuses himself, who was so active, so ministerial in every part of the transactions, is made to abstain from giving the support of his testimony to these plots, said to have been agitated, matured, and contrived in his presence, what are we to say, but that the plot has no foundation in reality?—and if all the circumstances could be investigated, it would prove that the treasonable part is altogether the brewing of a spy and an informer, to implicate in a charge of high treason, a man who had gone far enough toward losing his own life, but not to the length of that greatest of crimes. The manifest aim and contrivance had been to foment, and afterwards disclose to public view, a secret conspiracy, to which they had afterwards added fictitious circumstances amounting to high treason, for purposes to which government, if rightly constituted, would not lend itself, but which bad men are wicked enough to mature and to perfect, by appealing to the fears they have excited, and giving the best appearance they can to their false information.

The Attorney-general addressed himself to you in this way; what is to be said in answer to this case? Is it to be said, that because the plot which will be described to you is an improbable one as to its success, therefore, you are to believe such a plot did not exist? Will you disbelieve it on that ground? Gentlemen, I think very humbly of myself, and I should think that the most inexperienced advocate at the bar would not have the rashness to advance such an argument. It is not because it is improbable that the plot is to be disbelieved; if so, history would be at an end. Need I illustrate this statement, by adverting to a most familiar instance, the earl of Essex's* plot, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, a nobleman of his rank, in a moment of moody displeasure against his gracious sovereign, whose power and wisdom he well knew, and to whom he had been infinitely obliged, suddenly and furiously rushed into the streets of London, and excited the citizens to follow him and take the state by storm; the madness that inspired him, if it was stated as a reason for not believing it, would blot from history one of its indisputable authentic pages. The earl entertained vain expectations; he put them in action by a very foolish course of proceeding, and he met the fate which such circumstances always must lead to. He was tried and executed for high treason: I do not disbelieve his plot; nor should I disbelieve the plot stated to day, if it was disclosed on certain testimony, and had been so communicated as to encourage belief in the facts. It would be in vain to reason against the facts, because they are improbable; if we admit them as facts, all reasoning about their probability is at an end, and we can only lament that men should form bad hopes upon such miserable foundations. I do not ask you to disbelieve this plot because it is improbable, but I ask you to disbelieve the witness because he has sworn to an improbable plot, unsupported by facts, and himself not corroborated by witnesses who might have been adduced. It is therefore that I bring to the test the possibility of this plot, and think I do not go too far when I say it is impossible you should believe it. Each man, and every individual feels for himself the particular emotions of fear and anger, which particular circumstances excite. I am not imputing to any man a base and unmanly fear—but when the table was strewn with pikes and fire-arms, and a thousand ball-cartridges, as the word escaped from persons near me, so it might have come to you, how should I like one of these pikes thrust at me; but who is there among us, inept and foolish enough to believe, that such an arsenal, backed by such a park of artillery, without a single pair of horses which would grace a hackney-coach to move it, could have been used for the purpose charged in the indictment? Such weapons and contrivances are the natural adjuncts of men who mean to begin in murder and end in plunder; but it is absurd to suppose they could contribute to the downfall of the state and the subversion of the empire. One of the party, when he was taken, had two dozen cartridges upon him: now, divide 1,200 by 24, and I think you have arms for exactly fifty men. These are the means to overturn the state; but where are the fifty men, and where are the guns for these fifty men?—two or three

* The witness Castle, on the trial of James Watson the Elder, in the preceding Volume.

* Vide 1 How. State Trials, p. 1333.

wretched swords, and two or three miserable muskets, less than would be fit to protect a band of street robbers. In times when gentlemen carried swords and pistols with them, they would not have enabled a gang of highwaymen to execute one night's adventure.

This is the test of improbability and of impossibility, to which I bring the evidence of the wretched witness, on whom this whole case rests; and when I come to state my defence, see whether that does not, in every particular, and in every part of it, range itself under the evidence, and prove most distinctly what I have stated to you. With respect to a great part of this ammunition, let it not be forgotten, that the night before the transaction at Cato-street it was taken away; and that a very short time indeed before the officers came to search the box which contained it, it was, by some ingenious person, not friendly to the prisoners, placed in Tidd's lodgings, as the means of conviction and the source of condemnation. There is no doubt these unhappy men have been most malignantly tampered with; they were first exasperated to a design of limited evil, it was afterwards aggravated so as to favour the plans of those who wished to give it the character of high treason, and then they were betrayed.

You have been told, that the name of Thistlewood cannot be unknown to you. You know perfectly well, that the unhappy man at the bar was only three years ago a supposed culprit in the same degree as now, and was tried and acquitted; he afterwards suffered an imprisonment; and only in June last was liberated from Horsham gaol, where he had been confined for sending a challenge to lord Sidmouth, one of his majesty's ministers, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. This man, coming with a rancorous mind and a bad temper out of a prison, to which he had been sent on the prosecution of that noble viscount, is the very element which an artful man would work upon, in suggesting a plan for murdering his majesty's ministers. Immediately after, on the 16th of August, comes the fatal narrative of that transaction at Manchester, to which I do not mean to give a name; but you all know, who have read or conversed on the subject, how much that transaction agitated every mind, and how free and strong were the opinions which many men expressed upon it: here came the means by which to bring together every feeling and motive of a dissatisfied person to point out (and it was done in many cheap papers) the ministers as the cause of all the evil, and as men placed above the law, and therefore devoted to vindictive punishment, without recourse to the law; and can we suppose this was all written and said in vain, that no minds would be found weak enough to believe in it, no tempers sufficiently inflammable to act upon it? This is the real origin of the transaction; here you have the proposition of the plot exactly as detailed—a rash set of men who are called radicals, and who thought good would result from it, meditated to effect that horrible design (which was less extensively attempted in the assassination of Mr. Percival) to massacre all the ministers. Now, Gentlemen, take this with you; does it or does it not agree with every thing that you have heard?—here is Mr. Thistlewood inflamed with personal anger against one of his majesty's ministers, but most probably against more;—here are others swayed by the hopes of undefined good, if they could get rid of these persons, and imbued with an opinion, that in their instance, assassination is only an irregular act of national justice: I say, these men so instigated, were likely to be allured by a proposal to kill as many of the ministers as they could at one blow:—first, they hope for a cabinet dinner—that does not take place, then do they devise means for an insurrection? no, nothing like it—but to separate themselves into small divisions, and murder each minister at his private house: then comes the convenient and never to be forgotten announcement in the New Times, placed there to betray them, and to that they addict themselves, and by that they are to be sacrificed.—Ings is represented to be the foremost man, in the project of murder; but let us see whether to the very last the revenge of the Manchester transaction was not chiefly, if not alone, in the minds of those people? you will see, that by a speech imputed to Ings, he said at one of the meetings, “I shall go forward into the room, and say, Well, my lords, we have men as good as the Manchester Yeomanry; enter citizens and do your duty;” in all this is there any declaration that the king has reigned long enough, we are tired of his family? is there the least talk of an attack on Carlton-house, or of besetting his majesty, in his walks or rides, in going to parliament, or in coming from it?—no not a word of it—no talk of making away with any one of the royal family, from the eldest to the youngest, from the highest to the lowest—no, but the proposition is, that the matter was to begin with the massacre of ministers, whom they hated, and whom, instigated by the vilest of men, they thought they had a right to hate. Having effected that which they considered an important public service, by that massacre, it became necessary to consider, what they should do next; except the private enrichment that might follow from the conflagration of houses, and the plunder, there is nothing in the plot to which the least probability can be ascribed. When I speak of the burning of houses to effect robberies, some of you can perhaps remember when that plan was carried to a considerable extent; it was in the days of my youth, when a timber yard in Long-lane, was burnt, for the sake of plundering a pawnbroker's close by; the same means might present themselves to those who are clamorous about their poverty, who begin by saying the shopkeepers of London are all aristocrats, and are all working under one system of government, and there is not a man worth ten pounds, who is of any service to the state; and that they themselves are so poor, that in three days crime must be perpetrated, or they must be starved. These are the men upon whom, from these circumstances, some spy, setting on some informer, collects facts and declarations out of which he may fabricate the story brought before you to-day.

I shall not take up your time by adverting to the contradiction or the explanation afforded by the witnesses I was instructed to examine. The credit of Dwyer is in your hands; you have heard what a man whom I called has said about him. My clients are too poor to get together the necessary witnesses—they are too poor to support their wives and children while they are in prison; they come therefore naked amidst all these perils. If you believe Dwyer, I am far from thinking he makes out a conclusive case; but I think, considering the improbability of his story, and the nature of his character, it is for you to reject his evidence, more particularly from his never being congregated with any persons who have given evidence.

One person has been tendered to me as a witness whom you inquired after, and I might examine. I have already had to advert to what there is of technicality in our profession, and if there is one rule more inviolable than another, it is this, that we never do call or examine a witness, who has not previously disclosed what he can state; because if we were to do so, no man knows to what purpose he might be calling witnesses—no man knows to what effect they might be examined. I do not fear calling the witness, but a point of honest prudence, by which I am obliged to square and govern myself, makes me observe those rules, from which I could not depart without incurring more censure than any man could wish.

I believe I have gone through all that is necessary to be said on the present occasion; perhaps I have taken up an unwarrantable portion of your time. I feel in my own breast much reason to lament that I cannot have done justice to the subject: I am not guilty of a vain expression of mock modesty, nor do I pretend a diffidence which I do not feel; but when I observe to you, that one of the best scholars and lawyers at the bar, a man of eminent rank and in great practice, thought it necessary to declare on a former occasion, that he had spent a whole month in anxious reading, to qualify himself for the discussion of one day, you will hardly think I am guilty of any dereliction of proper firmness when I say, I fear and tremble at what I have done, in my endeavours to save the life of this unfortunate man and his associates. I have had but a few hours to consider the case at all; and it was only after four o'clock this morning that I could qualify myself to come before you, imperfectly as I have done to-day. But on this occasion, where I feel doubt and anxiety, and tremulous apprehension, I throw myself on you,—the protectors of the public, the shield of the accused,—if you can have such implicit confidence in the witnesses on the part of the Crown, as to give credit to all they have said, pronounce your judgment; as it becomes me, I shall submit with perfect and unrepining acquiescence. But if, from the observations I have made, or those which your own minds have supplied, you doubt the evidence, then, fearless of the consequences, and in the proud discharge of your own dignified duties, act according to your conscience, and acquit your souls between God and your country, by declaring that the man at the bar is not guilty—or to use a better phrase, that the charge is not proved to your satisfaction.

I am aware that with all my labour, I must have left many things imperfect through my own feebleness; I therefore betake myself to the refuge of the feeble, to prayer; and I pray the God of our ancestors, the God “by whom kings reign, and princes decree judgment,” to amplify your minds, and to touch your hearts, to enable you to arrive at that decision which justice requires; always remembering, that justice is most lovely and most venerable, when tempered with mercy. I know that if the impression of the present case call for the exercise of the more stern and manly qualities, you will do what justice requires; but if topics of compassion, of doubt, and of hesitation, suggest themselves, let the prisoner have the benefit of them;—and whether the prisoner's life shall be lengthened to the term originally assigned by Providence, or terminated on any other charge with the expiration of the coming week, he will have to bless you, and posterity also will bless you, for they will feel that they may rely with security on the justice of a British jury.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Arthur Thistlewood, if you wish to offer any thing from yourself to the gentlemen of the jury, in addition to what has been addressed to them by your learned counsel, you are at liberty to do so, and this is the proper time.

Thistlewood.—I should wish two witnesses to be examined who are now in Court, against the testimony of Dwyer, a man of the name of Edmond Ward, to swear he had extorted money from him.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—You must not state that; the time for giving evidence is passed; the evidence was gone through last night; but at the request of your learned counsel the Court was adjourned till to-day, it would be breaking through all the rules of proceeding to allow any such evidence now to be given; if you wish to address any observations to the jury now is your time.

Thistlewood.—I am quite satisfied, my lord.

REPLY.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—In rising to address you in support of this prosecution, I have a most painful and anxious task to perform. As the servant of the public, I am bound to discharge the duty which I owe to the country to the utmost of my ability and power, and I feel anxious, therefore, that nothing on my part should be omitted that may be necessary for the purpose of presenting this case in its true colours before you. On the other hand, however, I feel equally solicitous that in what I am about to state I may not misrepresent a single fact, or press a single argument against the prisoner further than the justice of the case may absolutely require. And I beg leave to join with my learned friend who has just addressed you, in praying that you will dismiss from your minds all prejudices and previous impressions unfavourable to the prisoner;—that you will forget, as far as it is possible, all that you may have heard upon the subject of this prosecution, every thing that is not established by proof,—and that you will confine your attention solely and undividedly to the evidence which you have heard from the witnesses who have been sworn in the cause. But I feel that in this request I am urging that which is unnecessary and superfluous; I am addressing an English jury, sworn to administer justice impartially between the public and the prisoner; and I ought therefore to apologize for intimating a doubt that, in the discharge of so important a duty, you can suffer your attention to be diverted for a single moment from that evidence by which the fate of the prisoner must alone be determined,

The situation in which the prisoner now stands affords an admirable illustration of the excellence of that system of laws under which we have the happiness to live; a striking proof of their being built upon the firmest principles of justice and freedom. It is admitted that he had projected the assassination of all the principal ministers of the Crown. It not only is proved in evidence, but it is distinctly admitted by the counsel for the prisoner, that such was the intention which he had harboured in his mind, and which he had actually prepared to carry into execution; you have it proved, that by the prisoner's own hand, that unfortunate man whose name has been mentioned in the course of these proceedings, met his death. Yet while that passion and prejudice which these circumstances were calculated to excite in the public mind existed in its first violence, he was not, and could not be put upon his trial for the offence with which he is charged: he was entitled to such an interval as might afford an opportunity for that feeling to subside, so far as it was capable of subsiding. He was further entitled, before he could be put upon his trial, to that which is never allowed in any other criminal charge affecting a man's life, to have delivered to him all the particulars of the accusation which he was to be called upon to answer, not yesterday or the day before, but nearly three weeks I believe from the present time, in order that, consulting with his counsel, he might have full opportunity to avail himself of any objections in point of law, which he might have to urge against the sufficiency of the charge. In addition to this, he has been allowed that important privilege which is conferred only upon persons under the heavy accusation preferred against the prisoner,—he has had a list of all the jurors who could by possibility be called to sit upon this trial. He has had an opportunity of rejecting arbitrarily to the number of thirty-five, any who might be called to constitute the jury in which he is so much interested; and it may therefore be considered that you, who are now to decide upon his fate, are a jury of his own selecting. In addition to all this, and which you will find most material in the progress of this inquiry, he has had a list of every witness who could be called on the part of the Crown. That list has been furnished to him, in order that he might have an opportunity of inquiring into the previous character, the previous history and conduct of every witness who might be called against him, in order that he might have an opportunity of being prepared with evidence to impeach the character of such as would admit of impeachment. Such, too, gentlemen, is the benevolence of the English law, that he has been allowed to apply to the Court, to appoint such counsel as he might think proper to select, for conducting his defence. It is therefore too much to say, as has been urged by the counsel for the prisoner, that a person standing in his situation has to combat with peculiar disadvantages and difficulties, since in no other situation would he as a prisoner have experienced advantages or benefits comparable to those afforded on this occasion, in order to enable him, according to the facts of the case, to prepare for his defence, against that most serious and solemn charge now preferred against him,—a charge of conspiring to overturn that constitution and that system of government, under which he is entitled to such inestimable privileges; and that, with a view of establishing some other form of government, in which the establishment of advantages of a similar character and description could never reasonably be expected.

This is the charge preferred against the prisoner at the bar; and when I mention the grave and serious character of the accusation, I merely repeat the language of my learned friend, and with the same view, namely, to call upon you to be careful that you do not, on light and general evidence, find the prisoner guilty of so grievous a crime; that you will bestow upon this inquiry that anxious and careful attention which its importance demands; and that you will not deliver a verdict of guilty against him, unless you are satisfied of his guilt on the clearest evidence. At the same time, however, if that is the impression which shall ultimately be made on your minds by the evidence, then, fearless of consequences, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, without bias and without favour, you will, I am persuaded, firmly and faithfully discharge your duty to your country in the judgment which you shall pronounce.

With respect to what has been said upon the law of the subject, it cannot I think be necessary for me to trouble you with any observations. The charge preferred against the prisoner at the bar has nothing in it that is technical—nothing that is difficult of apprehension. It is in its character and description the plainest that can possibly be conceived. He is charged with having conspired to overturn the government of the country, and with having among other means endeavoured to accomplish that object by the assassination of his majesty's ministers. If you find that he is guilty of having so conspired—if you find that he has been concerned in taking measures for the attainment of that end, then in point of law he is guilty of the crime which is imputed to him upon this record; and therefore, saying nothing more upon the law, but directing your attention simply to the facts, you are apprised of the substance of the charge, and it will be for you to say whether it is made out to your satisfaction in the evidence which has been offered in support of the accusation.

There are some facts admitted on the other side, of a most striking and extraordinary character. It is admitted that the plot which I have stated was formed for the assassination of his majesty's ministers, not for the assassination of two or three individuals among them, against whom the prisoner at the bar might be supposed to entertain some personal enmity, but the project was, at one blow, to destroy all the confidential servants of the government. This has been admitted in the most unequivocal language, in the broadest and most distinct terms, by the counsel for the prisoner. The object which the parties to this project had in view, was, as we state, and have proved in evidence on the part of the prosecution, to overturn the government of the country; and the object that is suggested and supposed on the other side, but which is not attempted to be proved, is, that this plan was formed merely with a view of plunder, and for the purpose of creating confusion, of which plunder alone was to be the object. I remember, however, that my learned friend, the counsel for the prisoner, who now sits near me, in the course of his address to you yesterday, stated that the whole of this criminal design arose out of political motives and political views. If this attempt to assassinate his majesty's ministers did then arise out of political motives and political views, what ground is there for that fanciful speculation of the gentleman who has just spoken, that the object of it was to create confusion, not with a view to revolutionary projects, but solely for the purpose of plunder? And when my learned friend is speaking of the visionary project attributed to the prisoner at the bar; when he talks of its extravagance—how improbable it is in all its parts—and what strong evidence you ought to require before you can bring your minds to believe it, I ask with confidence, whether the suggestion which he has made as to the object which these parties had in view in the assassination of his majesty's ministers, namely, that it was solely with a view to confusion and plunder—whether, I say, that is not in a tenfold degree more improbable, more absurd, more extravagant than that which I have stated as the motive, and which we have proved by the numerous witnesses called on the part of the prosecution?

I shall now beg leave to direct your attention to the evidence. I will not wander out of it to make a single observation that it does not fairly warrant, nay, require from the counsel for the prosecution. My learned friend who has just addressed you, states that this case, as far as the treason is concerned, rests solely upon the testimony of Adams: I beg leave entirely to dissent from this statement of my learned friend. I trust I shall satisfy you when I come to direct your attention more particularly to the evidence, that this is a mere gratuitous and unsupported assertion on the part of my learned friend. At present, therefore, I state that it does not depend by any means upon the evidence of Adams alone; on the contrary, there is in this cause, even if you were to blot the evidence of Adams from your notes, sufficient evidence from the uncontroverted facts proved by witnesses, not impeached or impeachable, to justify and require you to come to the conclusion that the prisoner is guilty of the offence with which he is charged.

But as so much has been said upon the testimony of Adams, give me leave for a moment to call your attention to the situation in which he stands, and to those rules and principles not merely of law but of common sense and reason, which ought to be used in the estimate of the credit due to his testimony. When a person comes forward in the situation of an accomplice, for the purpose of giving evidence against his associates, it is admitted that his testimony ought to be received. If the evidence of a person in this situation were to be always rejected, or, if it were to be disregarded by juries in the practical exercise of their duty, the consequences would be most injurious to the interests and safety of society. For what is the principal defence against dark and dangerous conspiracies of this nature?—The jealousy which men entertain of their associates, and the dread they feel of being betrayed by them. But once establish as a principle that the evidence of an accomplice is to be disregarded, and you lose the strongest and most effectual check against the enterprises of wicked and desperate men. They will carry on their designs without fear and without restraint, when they know that they are secure against the consequences of the cowardice or treachery of their associates in guilt. It would be impossible, therefore, without leading to the most dangerous consequences, to exclude the testimony of a person in this situation: but when a witness comes before a jury who are to decide upon his evidence, whether he be an accomplice or stand in a less unfavourable light, you are still to consider from all the circumstances in the case what degree of credit is due to his testimony: For I know of no rule of law that applies to an accomplice that does not apply to every other witness who comes into a court of justice. That you will and ought to examine his evidence with more care and jealousy I am ready to admit. But still the question comes at last to this: What is the degree of credit to which, under all circumstances, he appears to be entitled? Let us then consider for a moment, and see what are the tests by which the evidence of a person standing in this situation is to be tried. It is of course most material to inquire into his previous character. If a man whose former life has been correct, lapses in a single instance into crime, and afterwards repenting of his conduct, or alarmed at the danger to which he has brought himself, becomes a witness for the Crown—his previous character is a most important subject of consideration and inquiry.—If you find that to have been base and infamous, you will of course add that circumstance as an ingredient against him, and will be disposed to place less reliance on his testimony. Again, you will ask yourselves what interest the witness has in the story which he is telling. I can understand that if an accomplice in coming into a court of justice is trying to redeem himself by laying the whole weight of criminality on others, that his evidence in this respect should be listened to with great suspicion and caution: but when you find the effect of his evidence is to criminate himself as much as his associates, you will ask what motive he can have to enhance the crime, and to alter its character; and thus to add to his other offences the deep and infamous sin of perjury. Applying this test to the evidence of Adams, I ask what motive can be assigned that should induce him to give a false account of this transaction.

There is another test to which I also request your attention, because it is of infinite importance in this cause. If he is telling a story in which he knows he may be contradicted—if he states that, which if untrue may be proved to be false by witnesses in the power of the prisoner, you will be disposed to place the more reliance upon his testimony, particularly if those witnesses who might be called are not called to contradict him. Lastly, you will inquire to what extent and in what particulars his evidence is confirmed by testimony, from pure and unsuspected sources. And here I beg leave to observe that I agree in the doctrine laid down by the counsel for the prisoner, that confirmation in light, trivial and collateral circumstances, may not materially support the general testimony of the witness; but if you shall find that confirmation extending itself throughout the whole of his narrative—if you shall find the witness confirmed wherever, from the nature of the case, it is possible he could be confirmed, you will then be disposed to rely upon his veracity. When he is speaking of facts in the knowledge only of himself and his associates, and in which therefore there is no possibility that he could be supported, I think then when I come to direct your attention more particularly to the evidence of Adams and to the tests to which I have adverted, you will be satisfied of the truth of his statement.

First, with respect to his previous character. I have already mentioned that many days (I believe nearly three weeks) before the trial, a list of the witnesses to be called on the part of the prosecution was delivered to the prisoner. I have stated the grounds of this regulation, namely, to afford the prisoner a full opportunity of inquiring into the character of those persons who were to give evidence on the part of the Crown, and that he might be prepared with witnesses, if the facts would admit it, to expose and impeach their lives and conduct. The name of Adams was of course in that list. He had been long known to Brunt, one of the prisoners; he seems to have been acquainted with him when in France; therefore, if there was any thing to impeach his former character, that impeachment might be established by evidence, because Brunt had the means of knowing it. With all these opportunities and advantages, then, has the prisoner been able to adduce any evidence for the purpose of shewing a single blot or blemish in the previous history and character of this individual? You will remember, perhaps, that an attempt was made to insinuate that he had left this country, and withdrawn himself to France, in consequence of some misconduct towards his employer. Upon further inquiry, however, it turned out, that there was not the slightest ground for such a suggestion; and if he had in any way misconducted himself, that individual might have been called to give evidence of the fact, and his absence is a circumstance absolutely decisive in favour of the witness. It appears, that Adams, was by trade a shoe-maker. He had been formerly in the army, and he went therefore to France, for the purpose of obtaining employment in his business, among the English officers at that time stationed at Cambray. The witness, therefore, comes into court free from every previous imputation or stain upon his character; not only has no evidence been adduced against him, but it is perfectly clear, from the facts which I have adverted, that his character and conduct had been such, that no such evidence could have been adduced.

I have already observed—and I beg now to remind you of the observation—that in considering what degree of reliance you can place upon his testimony, you will further inquire what interest he has in the result of this trial. He was one of the persons engaged in the conspiracy; he was apprehended for the offence, and when apprehended, he was admitted as a witness for the Crown. You all know that a person so circumstanced, must, of course understand, that if he conducts himself with propriety, and tells the truth, he will receive a pardon from the Crown. I would ask you then, what motive he can possibly have to relate the case otherwise, than as it really occurred? What reason can there be why he should charge himself and his associates, with a crime of a different description, and of a blacker die than that in which they were really engaged? And will you suppose that a man without motive, without any reason that has been suggested or even hinted at by the counsel for the prisoner, would add the guilt of perjury to his other crimes, and that too for the purpose of consigning so many of his fellow-creatures to a disgraceful and ignominious death? Is it possible that you can conceive any individual, without at least some motive of interest to himself, guilty of such base and complicated wickedness? Will you not, therefore, require some very clear, distinct, and satisfactory evidence, to lead you to the conclusion of his having falsified the facts of the case, when he can derive no possible advantage from such conduct, and no motive can be assigned for so base and infamous a proceeding?

But there is another observation, which I beg leave to press strongly upon your attention. The witness has told you, that at the various meetings to which he has spoken, different individuals from time to time attended who were the associates of the prisoner at the bar: he has mentioned, among others, a person of the name of Hall, who is at this moment within the reach of the prisoner; he has mentioned a person of the name of Potter, the friend of Brunt (for you recollect upon the morning after Brunt's return, when he was engaged in securing the baskets of ammunition, his apprentice Hale, was desired to carry them to Potter's house, in Snow's-fields); the witness has told you, that both Hall and Potter were at the last meeting in Fox-court; he has told you that Palin was at this meeting, another of the prisoner's associates, and Harris also has been mentioned, in whose house the prisoner was apprehended. All and each of those persons might have been called for the purpose of proving that Adams had given a false account of what passed at these meetings. If his account were really untrue, as the counsel on the other side have supposed, is it possible to give any satisfactory answer to this observation? Does it not carry conviction to your minds? Does it not prove to demonstration, that the account given by Adams, as to what passed at those meetings, is, in every particular correct? If Hall were not present, he might, as stated by Adams, have been called to prove the falsehood of the charge. If, on the contrary, he did attend, he might have been called to prove, that the account which Adams has given of what passed upon the occasion was false; the same with respect to Palin; the same with respect to Potter; the same with respect to Harris. My learned friend has not ventured to touch upon this circumstance, because his excellent judgment assured him it was a fact so unmanageable and decisive, that it was impossible to give to it even a plausible explanation or answer.

Having then stated in what manner Adams might have been contradicted, if the story which he has related were untrue, let me now direct your attention to the manner in which his evidence has been confirmed,—not as has been suggested, merely in trivial matters, or from doubtful sources; but in the most important particulars, and from the most unsuspected and unquestionable testimony, the whole forming a body of corroborative evidence, so strong and irresistible, that no person who does not wilfully shut his eyes, and blind his understanding, to the force of truth, can, for a moment, entertain a doubt, as to the conclusion to which it inevitably leads.

You will remember that one of the first witnesses called after Adams, was a person of the name of Hale. He was apprentice to Brunt, connected with one of the prisoners, a witness above all suspicion. No questions were put to him on cross-examination, tending to raise a doubt as to the truth of his story; nothing was thrown out for the purpose of leading you to suppose, that there was any impeachment of his character. Now, I beg leave to request your attention—and long and painful as this inquiry has been, I am sure you will give it to me—while I recall to your recollection those marked circumstances of confirmation, arising in the first instance out of the testimony of Hale. He has told you that the room was hired by Ings and Brunt; that they looked at it together; and that Brunt said to Ings, "it will do, go and give her a shilling." Brunt, therefore, was concerned in hiring the room. But where there is guilt, concealment is generally attempted. What was the account Brunt gave to Mrs. Rogers? It appears she entertained some suspicion of Ings. She asked Brunt who he was. He replied "that he was a butcher by trade." "I know nothing of him," he said, "except seeing him accidentally at a public-house." He gives the same account in the presence of the Bow-street officer, Taunton. Is this then correct or false? Does it not appear, by the testimony of Hale, that for good or for evil he was at the very time he was giving this account, most intimately and closely connected with Ings? He tells you again, that after the room was taken, these parties continued to meet there night after night, for the period of five weeks. He names the particular individuals who were in the habit of attending. Now is it supposed, by my learned friend, that this is inconsistent with the evidence of Mrs. Rogers? When the question was put to Mrs. Rogers, she said, "I saw Davidson and some other men once. I cannot say that they met often." But she immediately afterwards explained the reason of this. She said "she could give no account of it, because she was seldom at home." Here then is Hale, an unsuspected witness, the apprentice of one of the parties, stating upon his oath, that these meetings were held every night, and attended by the prisoners. Does not this then confirm, in a most important point, the evidence of Adams? For what purpose did they meet? Was there any object of business or amusement in which they were engaged, to account for this circumstance? Has any attempt been made to explain it by evidence, or even by statement? Up to this moment has any motive, consistent with the innocence of the prisoners, been assigned for these meetings? It was an unfurnished room, containing nothing but a single chair, Ings having stated at the time when he hired it, that he should bring in furniture, but which he never attempted to do. I repeat it then, do not these circumstances spoken to by Hale, confirm in the strongest manner the testimony of Adams?

Mark another fact. Adams tells you, that arms were from time to time collected in this room, and afterwards carried to the dépôt; he particularly speaks to a number of pike-staves brought there for the purpose of having ferrules put on them. This is the account given by Adams; and here I beg you will recollect that Adams is in custody, and has had no opportunity of communicating with Hale. He is at large, no charge has been preferred, or was ever thought of being preferred against him. He tells you, that one day the door being accidentally open, he observed a number of these pike-staves, to the amount of about twenty in the corner of the room. How does he describe their appearance? They were like branches recently cut from trees.—You have seen them corresponding with the description which he has given. Hale confirms Adams; and the fact is established, that this was one of the places made use of for collecting arms. There is another circumstance connected with these pike-staves, to which I beg to direct your attention. It was stated by Adams, that Bradburn was employed to put on the ferrules, and that it was done in the room. What in this respect is the testimony of Hale? He says, "about the time I observed the pike-staves, I heard a hammering and sawing repeatedly in the evening." Could Adams have anticipated this? These circumstances, at first view apparently trifling, become of infinite importance, in considering the credit due to the narrative of Adams; for it is impossible that they could have been invented or arranged for the occasion.

But there are other circumstances of a character still more marked and decisive. You remember that Adams stated, that on the Saturday, these parties had become impatient. It had been originally intended to make an attack upon the house of one of the ministers, when the cabinet were all assembled at dinner. The death of the king had interrupted these entertainments. There was no opportunity of carrying the project into effect; and Brunt afterwards stated, in the presence of one of the witnesses (Monument), that the death of the king had altered their plans. Now, to advert to the testimony of Adams. On the Saturday, having become impatient, the prisoner said, "we must have a meeting to-morrow; we must form a committee, and consider what can be done." This was immediately previous to the 23rd of February. You are told by Adams, that a committee was accordingly formed on the Sunday morning; that it consisted of more than the usual number of persons, and sat for a considerable time in deliberation upon the project which they had in view. What is the evidence of Hale? He also tells you that there was a meeting on the Sunday morning, and that it was of a different character from the previous meetings. It was attended by a larger number of persons, and they appeared to be more closely engaged in consultation together. I do not read the evidence as I go along; I wish as much as possible to relieve you from unnecessary repetition; but if you will hear and attend to these observations, and bear them in mind when the evidence is recapitulated by the learned judge, I will pledge myself, that you will not, in any instance, find them built upon any misrepresentation or mis-statement. Should, however, any error occur, I am persuaded, that you, the prisoner at the bar, and all who hear me, will be satisfied, that in a case of this description, it must, on my part be wholly unintentional.

Nothing further occurs in the testimony of Hale, until the day when the project was to be executed. Adams tells you, that about four or five o'clock on that day, he was in Brunt's room; that Strange and another man, whom he did not know, came in and fitted flints into five or six pistols; and that Brunt being apprehensive that they were overlooked by persons on the opposite side of the way, desired them to go immediately into the back room. Hale states the same facts almost in the same terms. In this particular also he confirms the testimony that has been given by Adams.

It is suggested to me that something occurred—but perhaps I am a little out of course in adverting to it now—in the adjoining room when Dwyer was there; and that it was contended by the counsel for the prisoners, that Adams did not agree with Dwyer in his account of that part of the transaction. But you will recollect that Adams told you he did not go to the room on the 23rd of February, till late in the day, till three or four o'clock in the afternoon, and you remember Dwyer quitted the room by one, so that it was impossible that what was said in the presence of Dwyer could have been heard by Adams.

But to revert to the evidence of Hale, you will no doubt recollect another remarkable circumstance of confirmation to which I am about to direct your attention. Thistlewood was desirous of preparing a proclamation not a proclamation to be posted, as my learned friend supposes on the houses that were to be set on fire, but to be put up near the fires, in order that it might be read by the people. He asked for paper; no paper adapted to the purpose could be procured; something was said about procuring such paper as is usually employed for newspapers, but Adams tells you he suggested that cartridge paper would answer better. Money was accordingly given by Thistlewood to procure it, and Brunt went out and directed his apprentice to buy six sheets. This was stated by Adams. He has had no opportunity of speaking with Hale upon the subject; he has had no means of arranging his evidence in concert with him; but this is the account which he gives: The paper was purchased, and the proclamation written. Hale in his evidence tells you that Brunt came out and desired him to purchase some cartridge paper, and that he accordingly bought six sheets, which were taken into the room, as Adams had stated. In this important circumstance then Adams is confirmed by Hale, as far as it is possible that he could be confirmed; for Hale was not admitted into the room, and of course can give no account of the purpose to which this paper was applied.

Let us look at the case a little further. The parties set out for the place of rendezvous, and Brunt among the rest is stated by Adams to have been in Cato-street, and to have been an active participator in every thing that occurred at that spot. He was not apprehended at the time, having succeeded in effecting his escape. What then is the account given by Hale?—He says his master returned home about nine o'clock in the evening, confused and fatigued; his coat splashed, his boots covered with mud. Immediately upon his arrival, addressing his wife, he said, "it was all over; a number of officers had come—that he had saved his life, and that was all." Does not this then most evidently point to the transaction in Cato-street? Does it not confirm, beyond the possibility of doubt, the testimony of Adams as to Brunt having been one of those who were engaged in that transaction?

There is a remarkable circumstance to which I now wish to beg your attention, because it relates to the ulterior projects which the parties had in view. You will remember Adams stated that the plan they had formed was, to strike a grand blow, by attacking the ministers as they were assembled in Grosvenor-square; but this was only a part of their criminal design. There was another body, not consisting of the same individuals as the counsel for the prisoner has supposed, but of the friends of Paine, as to whom he had asked Thistlewood at one of the meetings whether he might not communicate to them the particulars of the plot. There was also a third party under the direction of Cook, destined to another enterprise; for the twenty-five persons assembled in Cato-street formed only a small part of the numbers engaged in this conspiracy.

Having recalled these circumstances to your attention, let me remind you of what was said by Brunt. A person came in, evidently one of those who had been in Cato-street; Brunt, after some conversation, suddenly exclaimed "It is not all over yet; let us go and see what they are about;" and they immediately went out together. Brunt remained absent till near eleven o'clock. For what purpose do you suppose they went out?—the object is evident; it was intended that other operations should take place in different parts of the metropolis, and finding they were defeated at the west end of the town, Brunt exclaimed, "It is not all over yet," and went to inquire into the result of the other movements. This closed the proceedings of that day, confirming, from first to last, the testimony of Adams. What further takes place? He had desired his apprentice to clean his boots early in the morning, apprehensive that they might excite attention; he rose early himself, and went into the back room—into that room with which, when Taunton came up, he said he had nothing to do. He there opened a cupboard, and took out the remains of the ammunition and other articles which were there deposited—and grenades (not hand-grenades to be used at Lord Harrowby's, for those were carried to Cato-street), fire balls, and cartridges for the artillery, made in flannel bags. These were taken out of the cupboard and put into two baskets: one of them he covered with an apron of his wife's, which had been used as a blind in that very room with which he affected to have no concern. In a few moments afterwards, Taunton the officer came up, he seized the baskets, and addressing himself to Brunt, asked what was in them: he said they were not his, he knew nothing about them; upon which he was immediately taken into custody. Upon these facts it would be idle to make any comment. They are decisive as to the guilt of the parties; and confirm in the strongest manner the testimony of Adams.

Passing from the evidence of Hale, let me direct your attention to another fact. You all remember what was stated by Adams, that the arms were brought successively to the room in Fox-court, and that they were carried from thence to a place that was called the dépôt, at Tidd's house; and that Thistlewood, the prisoner, was always anxious for their removal. You find Taunton the officer, immediately after he had searched the premises in Fox-court, proceeding to Tidd's house. He there found the arms that have been produced to you, weapons of every description, not calculated merely for an attack upon a single house in which sixteen or seventeen persons were assembled, but evidently and demonstrably intended, from the nature and size of the preparations, for some more extensive purpose. A trunk is found, containing 1,200 ball cartridges. Hand-grenades, fire-balls, cartridges for the artillery, are also discovered. But my learned friend has called a witness, for the purpose of endeavouring to explain these circumstances,—the daughter of Tidd, who, of course, would be disposed to give the most favourable explanation for her father. But what is the amount of her evidence? She tells you that the trunk containing the ball cartridges had been carried to the apartment, three or four days before the 23rd of February. It had been decided, that the project should be carried into effect on the Wednesday; and the box, with the cartridges, was evidently sent to the dépôt with that view. It remained there ready for use during the whole time, and was left untouched in consequence of the failure of the plan, till the officer Taunton took it into his possession. But it is said by the witness, that some person took away a part of the arms on the 23rd, and returned them on the following morning. If this be true, it corresponds exactly with the facts of the case. When the prisoners determined to carry their enterprise into effect on the Wednesday, of course the persons engaged in it armed themselves from the magazine at Tidd's, and after the attempt had been defeated, they were then naturally carried back to the place from whence they had been taken. The evidence of this young woman then, so far from impeaching the case on the part of the prosecution, tends most directly and distinctly to confirm it. Her account coincides with the particulars stated by Adams, and proves most clearly that the story he has told is, in these particulars, correct.

I hope I am not fatiguing your patience with this detail; but when the life of a man is at stake, I am sure you will readily devote to me all that attention which may be necessary to the investigation of the truth. You will, I am persuaded, submit without reluctance to the sacrifice, from a sense of the importance of that duty which is cast upon you: I beg then to request your attention to another striking circumstance. You will recollect, that some conversation took place in the room with respect to a communication made by Hobbs, the landlord of the White-hart public-house. Adams has stated to you, that in consequence of that communication much agitation prevailed in the meeting, and that Brunt proposed a particular measure of precaution, to which I shall presently advert. I beg leave previously, however, to observe, that if the fact as to the communication made by Hobbs were untrue, Hobbs himself might have been called by the prisoner for the purpose of contradicting the testimony of Adams. There was ample time to have obtained his attendance; a whole day elapsed after Adams had been examined. Hobbs is easily accessible, and might have been called; but he does not make his appearance. Can you therefore doubt the truth of this part of the evidence of Adams; and that it is as correct as his statement of the other facts to which I have called your attention? But to return to the course of observation which I was pursuing:—In consequence of the apprehension and alarm which seemed to prevail in the meeting, Brunt proposed, by way of security, to set a watch upon Lord Harrowby's house. This proposition originated with Brunt; it was immediately adopted, and Davidson with another person was directed to commence the watch on Tuesday evening, at six o'clock; they were to be relieved at nine by two others who were to continue at their station till twelve. The whole of this arrangement was purely accidental: observe, then, in how extraordinary a manner this part of the narrative of Adams is confirmed. We called the watchman, who said, "I observed some persons looking about the square that evening, and among them a black man, or man of colour, who attracted my particular attention." But the confirmation is still more striking. Adams has told you that he and Brunt relieved Davidson and his companion, and that they went into a public-house, at the corner of the Mews in Charles-street, where a young man challenged Brunt to play at dominos. Enquiry was made in the neighbourhood, for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of this statement, and it turned out to be perfectly correct. Gillan, the witness whom you have heard, was the person to whom Adams alluded. He recollected the person of Brunt, and confirmed, in every particular, the testimony of Adams. In every step that we take, you perceive in how remarkable a manner his evidence corresponds with the accounts given from quarters where no suspicion can by possibility attach.

Another witness, to whose evidence I beg leave to request your particular attention is Monument. He is undoubtedly, to a considerable extent, implicated in the guilt of the prisoners. It is supposed, or suggested, by my learned friend, that the assassination of his majesty's ministers was to be effected solely with a view to plunder. Was it so? Attend to the language of Thistlewood upon his first visit to Monument: "Great events," he observes, "are at hand. The people are every where anxious for a change. I have been deceived," he proceeds to say, "by many persons, but I have now got some men who will stand by me." Is it possible to misunderstand this language? What was the change that he contemplated? What are the great events to which he referred? Murdering the ministers for the purpose of plundering London! Is it possible to suppose that this could have been the design, or that any man could have entertained a thought of commencing a system of plunder, by so extraordinary and atrocious an enterprise? In what way would the murder of his majesty's ministers have facilitated this object? When he says, "great events are at hand—the people are every where anxious for a change—I have been deceived by many people, but I have now got some men who will stand by me;" what could he possibly be understood to mean, but that he was engaged in some political and revolutionary enterprise of a dangerous nature, and had got men who would stand by and co-operate with him in:

his endeavours to carry it into effect? And so it was evidently understood by Monument.

It is impossible not to call to one's recollection in this inquiry, the former station in life of the prisoner Thistlewood. He has been an officer, I believe, in his majesty's service; he has moved in the situation and rank of a gentleman; and yet you find him with his previous habits descending so low as to become the intimate companion and associate of journey-men mechanics, and of others in the humblest condition of society, associating with them daily, holding consultations with them in a small unfurnished back-room, in an obscure court, inhabited by the most obscure individuals. Is there not some extraordinary mystery in this association? Would he have stooped to this indignity, unless he had had some great object in view, which he was desirous of accomplishing, and which he could only accomplish by their means? Is not this conduct on the part of the prisoner a circumstance that must weigh greatly in your deliberations upon this case, and the nature of the enterprise in which he was engaged?

But to return to the evidence of Monument. He proceeds to Cato-street, and upon his arrival there the whole plan is developed to him. But it is suggested by the counsel for the prisoner, that as far as relates to Cato-street, there is some discrepancy between the evidence of Adams and Monument. The former stated the number in the room to be twenty; and when Monument was there Thistlewood observed, that the number was twenty-five. But how does this upon a little inquiry turn out? When Adams arrived, all the party had not assembled; Tidd and Monument, and probably some others, came in afterwards; and it is further to be observed, that the men were not actually counted, there being nothing but the mere declaration of Thistlewood that they amounted to twenty-five. These then are the supposed contradictions, which, for want of better matter, are relied upon for the purpose of endeavouring to persuade you that the evidence of Adams, or Monument, or of both of them, is not worthy of credit.

Some other differences of a trivial nature have also been insisted upon, between the account given by Adams and the statement of the officers, as to what passed after the latter had arrived at the stable. But can you suppose for a moment, from this circumstance, that Adams was not present at that meeting? Who does not know, that in a scene of confusion of this description, when the mind is agitated, and every thing is in a state of disorder and tumult, the account given by those who are present; and eye-witnesses of the facts, will always be at variance in some particulars from each other? One man recollects one circumstance, and another person will observe and recollect another; and it is a common observation in courts of justice,—and I refer to it, because observations would not be repeated until they become trite and hacknied, unless they were founded in truth,—that when two men describe the same transaction, if they describe it precisely in the same way, it leads to a suspicion of their veracity, and of previous arrangement and concert; for it is inconsistent with the nature of the human mind, that they should, in a confused and complicated transaction, agree in all the minute particulars of their story. And I therefore repeat, that not the slightest inference can be raised in favour of the prisoner from any supposed difference between the statement of the officers and that of Adams, as to what took place at the moment of ascending the ladder. Ruthven, the first who mounted the ladder, did not hear any person call out from below; Adams, on the contrary, said, somebody called out, "Look above there," as the officers approached; Ruthven did not remember this, nor Ellis—therefore my learned friend says, there is some contradiction, and you ought not to believe that Adams was present. But you will recollect, that Westcoatt said he heard these expressions used; and I mention this circumstance to confirm my position, and to show, that honest men, acting with the best possible intentions, when giving an account of the same transaction, will often, in many particulars, differ from each other. Ruthven tells you that he called out, "Seize their arms, we are officers!" now whether he said any thing about a warrant or not, I will not take upon myself to assert; but another officer says, the word warrant was used. Really, when such circumstances are relied on by my learned friend, you must, out of respect to his judgment and talents, feel that he is under the necessity of resorting to them, and of catching even at straws, because he has nothing more substantial upon which to rest his defence.

I beg leave now to advert to a witness of considerable importance in this case, I mean Dwyer. Some attempt has been made to impeach his credit. Dwyer told you, he had lived thirteen years with the same master, Mr. Smith. That account is not contradicted. A person of whom you knew nothing, of whose credit you have no means of judging, comes here for the purpose of telling you, that the conduct of Dwyer, upon some former occasion, about two months ago, was infamous; and that therefore he would not believe him upon his oath. Dwyer denies the fact alleged against him. Who is this witness that presents himself before you? A labouring mechanic: we know nothing further of him. Can any reason be assigned, why you should place more reliance upon his testimony than on Dwyer himself, who has lived and worked for thirteen years with the same master. But observe the conduct of this witness, who comes to impeach the credit of another. He tells you that a base and infamous proposition was made to him by Dwyer, and he acceded to it. It is true, that according to his own statement he afterwards withdrew, but he still continued to keep company and associate with Dwyer. Such is the account which the witness gives of his own character and conduct. Would an honest man, entitled to credit in a court of justice, have acted as he describes himself to have acted upon this occasion? and when a man thus stigmatizes himself, what reliance can you place on his testimony, when he is called for the purpose of blackening the character of another? He tells you further, that he made no charge before a magistrate, but continued to associate with this individual as before. But there is another important fact, which speaks for itself, and cannot deceive you, and which is directly at variance with the account given by this witness. He says, Dwyer was very flush of money; he was throwing about his notes; and that circumstance led to the proposition to which I have adverted. So far from this being the case, you remember that Dwyer is a married man, with a family of three children, and was obliged to apply for assistance to the parish of Mary-le-bone, and that they put him to work at the mill where they employ persons in that situation. This was at the very period when the witness says he was so flush of money, about two months ago. Such is the nature and the value of the attack that has been made upon the testimony of Dwyer.

Now let us consider what is the story which Dwyer relates, who must, I am persuaded, notwithstanding the attempt made by the other side, stand in your judgment as an unimpeachable witness. He tells you Davidson came to him, and said "that he had some proposition to communicate; that it must be communicated on the Tuesday evening, but that he could not call, because he was going to stand sentry." What a remarkable circumstance is this, coming out too by mere accident. Where was Davidson going? He was going to watch at lord Harrowby's on the Tuesday, of which Dwyer could have had no knowledge. But to pursue the account given by Dwyer; he says that Harrison in consequence of this interview called upon him, and on the Wednesday morning for the first time introduced him to Fox-court. While he was there some of the other parties came in, Thistlewood among the rest, and the particulars of this scheme were unfolded to him. He was requested to join in the enterprise. He was supposed to possess considerable influence over many of his countrymen living in Gee's-court and the neighbourhood of that place. They endeavoured, therefore, to press him into their service; they stood in need of assistance, and seemed to have thought that at this late hour, when the scheme was ripe for execution, there was not much risk in making such a communication. At all events, when men are embarked in desperate designs of this nature, something must be put to hazard, something must be trusted to their agents and instruments; they must put themselves in some degree in the power of others, and rely upon their generosity or fidelity: and this is generally done in the last stage of preparation, from a hope that before any thing can escape or be revealed, the object itself may be accomplished. The outline of the plan, therefore, precisely as stated by Adams in his evidence, was communicated to Dwyer. He tells you, that the ministers were to be assassinated by one party, another party was to set fire to the metropolis at various points, and a third body was to take possession of the artillery. These particulars were stated to him by Harrison and the other persons assembled in Fox-court. Mark the other circumstances of the case. Does not the preparation accord with this? Do not the materials that were at that interview exhibited to him, support the rest of the statement? For what purpose were the fire-balls prepared? For what purpose were the hand-grenades provided? But above all, for what purpose were the flannel bags of gunpowder to be used? evidently for the artillery, for which they were intended as cartridges. We have heard much from the counsel for the prisoner about the wildness and extravagance of this scheme; and I do think it was most wild, extravagant, and visionary. But assume only one fact, one opinion that prevailed in the mind of the prisoner, and it ceases at once to have that character. The prisoner had conceived that the great mass of the people of this country, and particularly of the metropolis, were disaffected to the government; that they were tired of the constitution, and of that system of laws under which the nation had so long flourished; that the people, to use his own language, were every where anxious for a change; and that they would be ready at once to join in overturning the constitution, and establishing a new scheme of government. He hoped, therefore, that by striking a great and stunning blow, in the assassination of the ministers of the Crown, by causing fires to be lighted in different parts of the metropolis, and creating that confusion and terror which would necessarily result from these extraordinary events, every tie would be loosened, obedience and order would cease, the spirit of hatred and disaffection to the government would every where display itself, and that the whole physical force of the metropolis might be brought into action, and employed to subvert the laws and constitution of the empire. This was the nature and character of the design; not so wild and visionary as my learned friend supposes, if the prisoner was correct in the estimate which he had formed of the opinions and feelings of the great bulk of the people. But in this I trust and know that he was mistaken; for whatever discontent and dissatisfaction may prevail from temporary and accidental causes, whatever may be the violence of party feelings and party animosity, I never can believe that the people of this country are not sincerely and warmly attached to the constitution of their forefathers, and to that admirable and equal system of laws, by which their property, their lives, and liberties are so vigilantly protected.

Had an explosion taken place, and many persons, which is by no means impossible, joined in it, destruction and devastation to a great extent might certainly have been produced; but I never can believe that it would have been attended with any real danger to this constitution and empire. But such was not the opinion that prevailed in the mind of the prisoner; far other were his notions; he considered that the great mass of the people was tainted with revolutionary principles, and that if the functions of government could but for a moment be suspended, the whole of their power would be brought into action, and the destruction of the present system would be accomplished. I do not, therefore, feel the weight of that part of my learned friend's argument, in which he would lead you to believe, that the plan could not have been entertained by the prisoner, because it was wild and visionary: this would be to belie all history, and to betray a deplorable ignorance of the human character, and of the heart and mind of man. My learned friend has himself recalled to your recollection an instance, not of a person comparatively in a humble station of life, but of an individual of high rank, of great fortune, of considerable talent and experience in the affairs of the world, the earl of Essex, engaging in a scheme much more extravagant, much more visionary and frantic, than that imputed to the prisoner at the bar; and for which his life was sacrificed to the violated laws of his country. Nay, looking around at what is now passing before us in other parts of this empire, I would ask, whether the schemes entertained and pursued by those to whom I am alluding, are not to the full as wild and visionary as those ascribed to the prisoner and his associates. And within our own time I remember an unhappy person standing in the same situation as the prisoner at the bar, an officer of high rank in his majesty's service, of great and distinguished bravery, of acknowledged talent and experience,—I allude to colonel Despard*—charged with a treasonable conspiracy, which, in its object and the means by which it was to be accomplished, was infinitely more wild, extravagant, and frantic, than the atrocious scheme which you are now considering: and yet no doubt has ever been entertained by any reasonable man of the truth of that plot, or of the propriety and justice of the verdict pronounced against him. And, therefore, without contrasting the absurdity of my learned friend's supposition, that this was a scheme of assassination merely with a view to plunder,—without contrasting this supposition with the revolutionary project spoken to by the witnesses, and which is supposed to be so wild and irrational,—but taking the question plainly and simply, the extravagance of the project affords no reasonable argument against the guilt of the prisoner. The only question will be, has the fact been proved? is the case established in evidence? does the proof satisfy your minds, not whether the project itself was absurd and senseless, not whether it was such a scheme as reasonable men would have entertained, but whether it was in reality formed?

I have been insensibly led from the observations I was making on the testimony of Dwyer. Immediately after the communication was made to him, he left the house; this was about one o'clock. He tells you he was glad to get away; while he was deliberating with himself what course he should pursue, he accidentally met major James, and told him all that had passed. Major James sent him to the Secretary of State. In all this he might have been contradicted, if what he has stated was untrue; for major James was present, and might have been called on the part of the prisoner. What is there then to lead you to doubt the evidence of Dwyer? to lead you to believe that he is a man capable of coming into court and, disregarding the sacred obligation of his oath, and every other feeling that sways the heart of man, to invent and fabricate a story, which is to consign to an ignominious death, the prisoner at the bar and his associates. Before you can come to this conclusion, you must, without evidence, believe him the most base, infamous, and merciless of mankind.

Then, when my learned friend says, this case rests so entirely on the testimony of Adams, that if you get rid of that, you have nothing else upon which to come to the conclusion of guilt against the prisoner, he has either forgotten, or intentionally passed over, the testimony of Dwyer, and which confirms in the strongest manner the leading particulars of the plan, as communicated by Adams.

It is further objected, that none of these witnesses were together, they were never present at the same time. I thank my learned friend for the observation:—if they were not present at the same time, if they had no connexion with each other;—if Adams and Dwyer were present at different periods, when different communications were made;—the correspondence between their evidence is more remarkable, and the more convincing. It shews there is no concert between them. They tell that of which they were themselves witnesses; and what passed at one period was in exact unison and correspondence with what took place at another.

There is another witness, a person of the name of Hiden, whom my learned friends on the other side have not attempted in the slightest degree to impeach, either by evidence or by cross-examination, and whose conduct has throughout been perfectly correct. The same communication was made to Hiden which was afterwards made to Dwyer. The precise day of the communication he did not recollect. He was struck with horror at the proposal, and communicated it to lord Harrowby. So anxious was he to give the information, that he intercepted lord Harrowby as he was coming out of the Park, and delivered to him a letter addressed to Lord Castlereagh, containing the intelligence which he had received. My learned friend was desirous to throw this back to a distant period. The witness did not recollect the precise day, whether it was one, or two, or three days, before the intended meeting; he had not taken pains to prepare his evidence for the occasion. Lord Harrowby is called; he tells you it was on the Tuesday, about two o'clock, some hours after the affair had been decided upon in Fox-court, in consequence of the production of the newspaper.

Now that I have mentioned the newspaper, I must observe, that my learned friend supposed this account of the intended dinner to be all a fabrication; that Edwards was the author and inventor of it, for the purpose of involving the prisoner and his associates in the guilt of high treason. I am sure every thing that rests merely upon assertion, every thing that is not proved in the cause, all that is surmised about spies, and other topics of a similar nature, resting upon no proof, will be rejected from your consideration; but was it, as my learned friend has hinted, an ideal dinner? The cards had been sent out on the Friday, or Saturday, and it was announced in the usual way in one of the ministerial papers. But some doubt was entertained upon this point; a gentleman was called, representing himself to be the court reporter; he said, the communication did not proceed from him; but a person from the New Times office, in which paper the article appeared, produced the manuscript, which contained several other announcements of a similar nature, and they were all proved to be in the hand-writing of another court reporter of the name of Lavenu. Such are the extraordinary surmises and suspicions, which have been introduced into this case. It was supposed, that no dinner was intended; that the whole was a fiction; that some person behind the scenes, who possessed great influence over the prisoner, and could move him like a puppet, had for his own purposes inserted this article in the paper; but when the affair comes to be investigated, the cloud is at once dispelled. The fact is, that a proper and decent interval having elapsed since the funeral of the king, the cabinet dinners were resumed, the cards were issued, and on the Tuesday it appeared in the usual form in the newspaper.

But to return to the evidence of Hiden. He says that Wilson, one of the prisoners, communicated to him all the particulars of the plot, and his statement corresponds precisely with the account given by Adams, by Dwyer, and by Monument; that four parties were to be formed; that the town was to be set on fire in various places; that attacks were to be made in different quarters; and that for that purpose, the cannon were to be seized, and all this was to be consequent on the attack at Lord Harrowby's. Wilson further stated, that Gee's-court where Dwyer lived were all in it, for Dwyer had given them reason to suppose he would embark in the transaction. He tells you that he felt it necessary to do so, for his own personal security. This is at once a confirmation of the truth of the statements both of Dwyer and Hiden. They have had no communication together; Dwyer had given the prisoners reason to suppose they would be joined by the people at Gee's-court; and Wilson communicated that circumstance to Hiden, which confirms, in a remarkable manner, the evidence of Dwyer.

Now, gentlemen, I will ask you with confidence, what becomes of the observation that this case rests entirely on the testimony of Adams? Am I not justified in saying, that if Adams were the most infamous of witnesses, and you were even to blot his evidence from your notes, there is abundantly sufficient to bring home the case to the prisoner at the bar?

Passing from this evidence, let us come to the events of Cato-street,—to facts which cannot be contradicted or disputed, which speak for themselves, and speak so strongly, that my learned friends have been compelled to admit that there was at least an intention to assassinate his majesty's ministers. But, I conceive that if you shall be of opinion that such an intention was entertained,—an intention to assassinate not merely this or that individual in the government, but by one great and sweeping blow to destroy the whole cabinet,—this will go a great way indeed to satisfy you, that there were further objects in contemplation; because I cannot suppose that from any motives of enmity or revenge directed against individuals of whom the prisoners could have no personal knowledge, they would have embarked in a design so dangerous and so wicked. If they formed the design of murdering the ministers of the Crown, it is impossible to suppose that this was intended to be effected with any other than an insurrectionary view. I think, therefore, that in this concession extorted from my learned friends by the force of the evidence, they have abandoned the case of the prisoner; for, with all their ingenuity, they could not even shape a plausible case in support of their supposition that such a blow could have been intended with any other view than to form the basis of an insurrection, in which it was hoped and expected that the great body of the people would instantly join. As to the trifling means of the parties, that consideration, in the view I have taken of the case, is no objection against the reality of the design. All that they conceived to be necessary for the attainment of their object was to strike one great blow,—to exhibit an appearance of force; and they confidently expected this would be followed by a general revolt they might lead and conduct at their pleasure.

Without entering into details of what took place in Cato-street, I beg leave to direct your attention for a moment to the nature of the preparations. If the conspiracy was merely with a view to plunder, why prepare materials for loading cannon?—why prepare so large a quantity of ammunition? My learned friend has attempted some explanation of the motives of that part of the design which related to the setting fire to the metropolis. If he thought such explanation necessary, and endeavoured to show how it agreed with the supposed design of plunder, it was equally incumbent on him to give a similar explanation as to the other circumstances of preparation made by the prisoners: but he has not attempted to do this. And, in truth, the materials collected were inconsistent with any other view of the case than that which I have stated; and they confirm beyond the possibility of doubt the story told by Adams, Monument, and Hiden; the latter of whom was so anxious immediately to give information, for the purpose of counteracting this most infamous plot.

But it is objected that we have not called other witnesses who might have been produced—that there is a person of the name of Edwards whom we have not examined. The fact is, we have called two persons who were engaged in the conspiracy with the prisoners; and if we had called others, it would only have had the effect of leading to a still more copious torrent of invective from the other side. We have called two witnesses, and we have confirmed their testimony beyond the possibility of dispute. But when my learned friends say we have not called certain other persons to support the case of the prosecution, how much more strongly does the observation apply against the prisoner who has witnesses in his power to produce, his own friends and associates—Potter, Palin, Harris, and Hall, and others who were present on the same occasion, who have been mentioned, and who might have been called to show that the account given by the witnesses for the Crown is false and fabricated; and yet not one of them has appeared to contradict the statement made on the part of the prosecution.

But this plot, it is contended, had no political object in view. Observe the language and conduct of the prisoner. The numbers at Cato-street were not so many as he expected;—they amounted only to twenty-five. He was alarmed;—he was apprehensive they might desert him. He endeavoured to inspire them with confidence. He warned them of the danger of retreating.—It would prove, he said, another Despard's job. Why that allusion, but because his enterprise was of a similar character?—Can it be explained on any other principle? Does it not show what was passing in his mind at the time, and evince the true nature of the enterprise more satisfactorily than evidence of any other description? But to pursue this still further:—Davidson is apprehended, and immediately exclaims, "let those be damned who will not die in liberty's cause;" and he sings a line of the admirable ballad of the poet Burns, 'Scots wha' ha' with Wallace bled.' Does not this speak for itself, in terms too distinct to be misunderstood? Does it not unfold his heart and mind to our observation, and show what was passing there at the time; what was the object of the criminal enterprise in which he had embarked; what it was for which he was then a prisoner?—Assassination to be followed by plunder?—No, but assassination to be followed by revolution, and the establishment of that which he miscalled liberty. And here it is impossible not to deplore the self-delusion of these misguided men who, engaged in an atrocious design against the laws and constitution of their country, and which was to commence by the sacrifice of some of the best blood of the nation, by the murder, among others, of that distinguished individual who had led our armies to victory, and exalted among the nations of the earth the name and character of Englishmen, could suppose that they were treading in the steps of the great Scottish chieftain, who, with the spirit and the energies of a real patriot, laboured to free his country from a foreign yoke; and with inadequate means and resources, but animated by an unconquerable spirit, kept at bay the power of England, performing deeds of the most heroic valour, till he fell at last a victim to the basest and most degrading treachery.

I have gone through this cause. I feel myself exhausted, and I am afraid I have worn out your patience. My omissions will be supplied by my lord. Let no suggestions made by my learned friend operate on your minds, except so far as those suggestions arise out of, and are supported by the evidence. It is easy to scatter insinuations, and to impute blame; but you, I am sure, will not consider accusation, still less dark and indistinct surmises, as proof. You are told that the prisoner is contending with the power of the Crown, but he is contending before a British jury, who, if they were to incline to either side, it would be in favour of the accused: and I am sure, knowing as I do those who are associated with me upon this occasion, there is no wish or disposition, on the part of the prosecution, to press against the prisoner any point beyond what justice requires. We have no other duty, and can have no other desire than to lay the case fairly before you. It will be for you, then, receiving the law from his lordship, who is bound by the same obligation as yourselves, to say whether, upon the evidence which has been laid before you, you are satisfied that the prisoner is guilty of the crime with which he is charged. Every assistance which extensive talent and long experience, and knowledge of the law could afford to a person in his situation, he has received. Nothing has been wanting to his defence.

Before I conclude, I beg leave to repeat what has been said by my learned friend, the counsel for the prisoner, that if you entertain a reasonable doubt on the subject of his guilt, it will be your duty to acquit him: but, on the other hand, as the guardians of the public peace, acting under the sacred obligation of the oath which you have taken, if you are satisfied that the case is proved against him, you will discharge your duty, without looking to the consequences, with that firmness, impartiality, and integrity which have ever been the distinguishing characteristics of an English jury.

SUMMING-UP.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—This is an indictment against Arthur Thistlewood, the prisoner now at the bar, and several other persons, who, in the progress of this trial, have also appeared at the bar in order that they might be identified by some of the witnesses, charging them with the crime of high treason. That crime has been truly stated to you to be the greatest known to the law: it is so, because it comprises not only individual and private evil as most others, but a great and extensive public evil also. A charge so serious, requires at the hands of an English jury, and will, I am sure, from what I have already seen, receive from you the most grave and mature consideration.

The charge upon the record is divided into several heads:—the first is, that of compassing and imagining to depose the king—the second, that of compassing and imagining to put the king to death—the third, that of compassing and imagining to levy war against the king, in order to compel him to change his measures and councils—and the fourth, that of actually levying war against the king. Two of these charges, namely, the compassing and imagining the death of his majesty, and the actually levying war against him, were declared to be treasons by a statute passed as long ago as the reign of king Edward the third. In the construction of that ancient statute it had been held, not only in many cases passing in judgment in our Courts, but also by the opinion delivered to us by grave and learned writers upon the law on that subject, that all conspiracies and attempts to depose his majesty, and all conspiracies and attempts to levy war against him, were overt acts of a treasonable intention to take away his life, because, as experience shews us, the death of the sovereign generally follows his deposition. In order, however, to remove any mistake that persons might fall into, a statute was passed in the reign of his late majesty, similar in substance, and nearly so in language, to several statutes which had been formerly passed, but which operated for a season only, by which the compassing or imagining to depose his majesty, or the compassing and imagining to levy war against him, or to compel him to change his measures and councils, were each declared to be a substantive treason. And as the evidence in this case points more directly to the compassing to depose and to levy war against him, than to the actual intention to take away his life, the most simple way of presenting this case to you, is, to direct your minds to those parts of this indictment, which charge the compassing and imagining to depose the king, and to levy war against the king in order to compel him to change his measures and councils.

You will observe, that the substance of the charge is made to consist in the intention—in the compassing, imagining, and intending, and not in the actual deposition of his majesty, or in the actual levying war;—such intention, however, must be manifested and followed up by certain acts of the parties, which acts must be (as they are in this case) stated on the record, and proved to the satisfaction of the jury, as evidencing the traitorous intention.

Now the acts charged on the indictment are, as applied to each count, the same;—they are first, the meeting, conspiring, and consulting amongst themselves to destroy the government of this realm as by law established—meetings and consultations to levy war against the king, to subvert the constitution and government as by law established—meeting and conspiring to assassinate and murder divers of the privy council of the king—maliciously and traitorously providing large quantities of arms and weapons, in order to arm themselves and others, for the purpose of raising and levying war against the king—meeting and conspiring to seize divers cannon, warlike weapons, arms, and ammunition, in order to arm themselves and others, for the purpose of raising and levying war against the king—meeting and conspiring to burn and destroy divers houses and buildings in and near London, and divers barracks used for the reception and residence of the soldiers, troops, and forces of the king, and to prepare combustibles for the purpose of burning and destroying the said houses, buildings, and barracks—and further, the actual assembling in arms with intent to assassinate, kill, and murder divers of the privy council of the king employed in the administration of the affairs and government of this kingdom, and to levy war against the king.

These, gentlemen, are the facts charged in the indictment as (in technical language) the overt acts, that is, as the evidence of the intention, and the steps and measures adopted in order to carry that intention into effect; to these acts therefore the evidence that has been laid before you has been directed, and if these acts are proved to your satisfaction, or any important part of them, it will then be for you to consider, whether the criminal and traitorous intention charged—to depose the king, or to levy war against him—is satisfactorily proved, and if so, as each is treason, it is not material to distinguish between them.

You have heard in this evidence, of a very extraordinary (I may say for the present) project, alleged to have been entertained by this person now at the bar, and others associating with him; a project, as it is said, to take away the lives of all the persons most confidentially employed in the administration of the government of this realm by his majesty, when they should be assembled at a dinner, and that some of the conspirators were to proceed at the same time, and others immediately afterwards, to set on fire buildings in various parts of the town, to seize some pieces of artillery, to take possession of the Mansion-house, and to declare that a new government was established; thereby to overthrow the existing government and the subsisting order of things, and to substitute something else in its place. This is the general nature of the project imputed to the prisoner at the bar; it is important for you to consider whether that project is to your satisfaction proved. The question is, not whether it was likely to be successful, but whether it was intended by these persons, and whether steps were taken to carry it into effect. The improbability of the success of such a scheme is fit matter for your consideration in weighing the evidence that is laid before you, in order to prove that the scheme did exist; but your inquiry is, did that scheme exist or did it not? and is it proved to your satisfaction by the evidence that has been laid before you.

A very large body of evidence has been laid before you, in order to prove, that such a project, however wild and visionary, was in fact contrived, and that steps were taken by the prisoner and others to carry it into effect. Some witnesses have given you minute details of various conversations taking place at various times; and in weighing the effect of that testimony, it seems to me that you will do well to consider, rather the general substance and import, than the precise accuracy of every particular expression that may have fallen from any one witness: a long detail will hardly ever be free from some occasional error or mistake; the question properly, is not whether there be any trifling error or mistake, but whether the substance and body of the testimony laid before you be or be not in your judgment true.

Some of the persons who have been called before you to give evidence upon this occasion are truly represented to be persons who acknowledge themselves to be accomplices in this most traitorous design — that observation, however, does not apply to all who have given evidence; and much observation has been made upon the credit that ought to be given to persons in that situation. Upon that subject I will only say, that by the law of this, and I believe of every other country, accomplices are witnesses competent to be heard: the credit that is to be given to them, is matter, in this country, for the consideration of gentlemen in your situation; and that credit must depend, in a great degree, on the probability of the story they tell, or on the confirmation that may be given to them from other and pure sources, so far as what they say is capable of confirmation, and upon the absence of that contradiction which may be adduced if the story related be not true.—There is no rule of law which says that the testimony of accomplices must be credited;—there is no rule of law, or of practice, that has said it must be rejected:—to say it must be, would offer the greatest possible latitude to crimes; because, as was truly observed by one of the learned counsel for the prosecution, if bad men once are given to understand they are in no danger of being brought to justice from disclosures made by those who participate in their crime, they will trust to this and proceed in their wicked designs; whereas we know bad men entertain great distrust of each other, which often prevents the perpetration of those offences which cannot be committed without the concurrence of several persons.

Having made these general observations in order to direct your attention, in the best way that I am able, to the evidence that has been laid before you, I will now, as it is some hours since the evidence was distinctly heard by you, proceed to read a great part, if not the whole evidence; so much as occurs to me as necessary to submit to your consideration, and more if you desire it.

The first witness called was Robert Adams, on whom so much remark has been made by the learned counsel on one side and the other. According to his account, he must be considered as an accomplice in the treasonable conspiracy, if any treasonable conspiracy existed, because he acknowledges that he attended many meetings, and was one of those who were assembled to carry it into effect. The account he gives of himself is, that he is a shoemaker; that he formerly belonged to the royal regiment of Horse Guards; that he has left that service eighteen years; that he first became acquainted with Brunt, one of the persons indicted, about the year 1816, at Cambray, in France; that his first introduction to the prisoner Thistlewood, was on the 13th of January, at his own lodgings in Stanhope-street, Clare-market. He says, "I was introduced by Brunt, who, in going into the room, said to Thistlewood, this is the man I was speaking to you about; Thistlewood said, 'You were once in the Life-guards,' I said no, I had belonged to the Blues; he said, 'I suppose you are a good soldier,' I replied that I could use a sword to defend myself, but I was not so clever as I had been, not having been in the habit of using arms for some time." Then he says that Mr. Thistlewood began to allude to the genteel people of the country, endeavouring to make them appear mean and contemptible; saying, that there was not one of them who was worth so small a sum as ten pounds, that was worth any thing for the good of his country: as to the shopkeepers of London, he said they were a set of aristocrats, and were all working under one system of government; that he should glory to see the day that all the shops were shut up and plundered; that Mr. Hunt was a damned coward and no friend to the people, and he had no doubt acted as a spy for government; that Mr. Cobbett, with all his writings, was of no good to the country, and he had no doubt that he too was a spy as well as Mr. Hunt. He

to keep company and associate with Dwyer. Such is the account which the witness gives of his own character and conduct. Would an honest man, entitled to credit in a court of justice, have acted as he describes himself to have acted upon this occasion? and when a man thus stigmatizes himself, what reliance can you place on his testimony, when he is called for the purpose of blackening the character of another? He tells you further, that he made no charge before a magistrate, but continued to associate with this individual as before. But there is another important fact, which speaks for itself, and cannot deceive you, and which is directly at variance with the account given by this witness. He says, Dwyer was very flush of money; he was throwing about his notes; and that circumstance led to the proposition to which I have adverted. So far from this being the case, you remember that Dwyer is a married man, with a family of three children, and was obliged to apply for assistance to the parish of Mary-le-bone, and that they put him to work at the mill where they employ persons in that situation. This was at the very period when the witness says he was so flush of money, about two months ago. Such is the nature and the value of the attack that has been made upon the testimony of Dwyer.

Now let us consider what is the story which Dwyer relates, who must, I am persuaded, notwithstanding the attempt made by the other side, stand in your judgment as an unimpeachable witness. He tells you Davidson came to him, and said "that he had some proposition to communicate; that it must be communicated on the Tuesday evening, but that he could not call, because he was going to stand sentry." What a remarkable circumstance is this, coming out too by mere accident. Where was Davidson going? He was going to watch at lord Harrowby's on the Tuesday, of which Dwyer could have had no knowledge. But to pursue the account given by Dwyer; he says that Harrison in consequence of this interview called upon him, and on the Wednesday morning for the first time introduced him to Fox-court. While he was there some of the other parties came in, Thistlewood among the rest, and the particulars of this scheme were unfolded to him. He was requested to join in the enterprise. He was supposed to possess considerable influence over many of his countrymen living in Gee's-court and the neighbourhood of that place. They endeavoured, therefore, to press him into their service; they stood in need of assistance, and seemed to have thought that at this late hour, when the scheme was ripe for execution, there was not much risk in making such a communication. At all events, when men are embarked in desperate designs of this nature, something must be put to hazard, something must be trusted to their agents and instruments; they must put themselves in some degree in the power of others, and rely upon their generosity or fidelity: and this is generally done in the last stage of preparation, from a hope that before any thing can escape or be revealed, the object itself may be accomplished. The outline of the plan, therefore, precisely as stated by Adams in his evidence, was communicated to Dwyer. He tells you, that the ministers were to be assassinated by one party, another party was to set fire to the metropolis at various points, and a third body was to take possession of the artillery. These particulars were stated to him by Harrison and the other persons assembled in Fox-court. Mark the other circumstances of the case. Does not the preparation accord with this? Do not the materials that were at that interview exhibited to him, support the rest of the statement? For what purpose were the fire-balls prepared? For what purpose were the hand-grenades provided? But above all, for what purpose were the flannel bags of gun-powder to be used? evidently for the artillery, for which they were intended as cartridges. We have heard much from the counsel for the prisoner about the wildness and extravagance of this scheme; and I do think it was most wild, extravagant, and visionary. But assume only one fact, one opinion that prevailed in the mind of the prisoner, and it ceases at once to have that character. The prisoner had conceived that the great mass of the people of this country, and particularly of the metropolis, were disaffected to the government; that they were tired of the constitution, and of that system of laws under which the nation had so long flourished; that the people, to use his own language, were every where anxious for a change; and that they would be ready at once to join in overturning the constitution, and establishing a new scheme of government. He hoped, therefore, that by striking a great and stunning blow, in the assassination of the ministers of the Crown, by causing fires to be lighted in different parts of the metropolis, and creating that confusion and terror which would necessarily result from these extraordinary events, every tie would be loosened, obedience and order would cease, the spirit of hatred and disaffection to the government would every where display itself, and that the whole physical force of the metropolis might be brought into action, and employed to subvert the laws and constitution of the empire. This was the nature and character of the design; not so wild and visionary as my learned friend supposes, if the prisoner was correct in the estimate which he had formed of the opinions and feelings of the great bulk of the people. But in this I trust and know that he was mistaken; for whatever discontent and dissatisfaction may prevail from temporary and accidental causes, whatever may be the violence of party feelings and party animosity, I never can believe that the people of this country are not sincerely and warmly attached to the constitution of their forefathers, and to that admirable and equal system of laws, by which their property, their lives, and liberties are so vigilantly protected.

Had an explosion taken place, and many persons, which is by no means impossible, joined in it, destruction and devastation to a great extent might certainly have been produced; but I never can believe that it would have been attended with any real danger to this constitution and empire. But such was not the opinion that prevailed in the mind of the prisoner; far other were his notions; he considered that the great mass of the people was tainted with revolutionary principles, and that if the functions of government could but for a moment be suspended, the whole of their power would be brought into action, and the destruction of the present system would be accomplished. I do not, therefore, feel the weight of that part of my learned friend's argument, in which he would lead you to believe, that the plan could not have been entertained by the prisoner, because it was wild and visionary: this would be to belie all history, and to betray a deplorable ignorance of the human character, and of the heart and mind of man. My learned friend has himself recalled to your recollection an instance, not of a person comparatively in a humble station of life, but of an individual of high rank, of great fortune, of considerable talent and experience in the affairs of the world, the earl of Essex, engaging in a scheme much more extravagant, much more visionary and frantic, than that imputed to the prisoner at the bar; and for which his life was sacrificed to the violated laws of his country. Nay, looking around at what is now passing before us in other parts of this empire, I would ask, whether the schemes entertained and pursued by those to whom I am alluding, are not to the full as wild and visionary as those ascribed to the prisoner and his associates. And within our own time I remember an unhappy person standing in the same situation as the prisoner at the bar, an officer of high rank in his majesty's service, of great and distinguished bravery, of acknowledged talent and experience,—I allude to colonel Despard*—charged with a treasonable conspiracy, which, in its object and the means by which it was to be accomplished, was infinitely more wild, extravagant, and frantic, than the atrocious scheme which you are now considering: and yet no doubt has ever been entertained by any reasonable man of the truth of that plot, or of the propriety and justice of the verdict pronounced against him. And, therefore, without contrasting the absurdity of my learned friend's supposition, that this was a scheme of assassination merely with a view to plunder,—without contrasting this supposition with the revolutionary project spoken to by the witnesses, and which is supposed to be so wild and irrational,—but taking the question plainly and simply, the extravagance of the project affords no reasonable argument against the guilt of the prisoner. The only question will be, has the fact been proved? is the case established in evidence? does the proof satisfy your minds, not whether the project itself was absurd and senseless, not whether it was such a scheme as reasonable men would have entertained, but whether it was in reality formed?

I have been insensibly led from the observations I was making on the testimony of Dwyer. Immediately after the communication was made to him, he left the house; this was about one o'clock. He tells you he was glad to get away; while he was deliberating with himself what course he should pursue, he accidentally met major James, and told him all that had passed. Major James sent him to the Secretary of State. In all this he might have been contradicted, if what he has stated was untrue; for major James was present, and might have been called on the part of the prisoner. What is there then to lead you to doubt the evidence of Dwyer? to lead you to believe that he is a man capable of coming into court and, disregarding the sacred obligation of his oath, and every other feeling that sways the heart of man, to invent and fabricate a story, which is to consign to an ignominious death, the prisoner at the bar and his associates. Before you can come to this conclusion, you must, without evidence, believe him the most base, infamous, and merciless of mankind.

Then, when my learned friend says, this case rests so entirely on the testimony of Adams, that if you get rid of that, you have nothing else upon which to come to the conclusion of guilt against the prisoner, he has either forgotten, or intentionally passed over, the testimony of Dwyer, and which confirms in the strongest manner the leading particulars of the plan, as communicated by Adams.

It is further objected, that none of these witnesses were together, they were never present at the same time. I thank my learned friend for the observation:—if they were not present at the same time, if they had no connexion with each other;—if Adams and Dwyer were present at different periods, when different communications were made;—the correspondence between their evidence is more remarkable, and the more convincing. It shews there is no concert between them. They tell that of which they were themselves witnesses; and what passed at one period was in exact unison and correspondence with what took place at another.

There is another witness, a person of the name of Hiden, whom my learned friends on the other side have not attempted in the slightest degree to impeach, either by evidence or by cross-examination, and whose conduct has throughout been perfectly correct. The same communication was made to Hiden which was afterwards made to Dwyer. The precise day of the communication he did not recollect. He was struck with horror at the proposal, and communicated it to lord Harrowby. So anxious was he to give the information, that he intercepted lord Harrowby as he was coming out of the Park, and delivered to him a letter addressed to Lord Castlereagh, containing the intelligence which he had received. My learned friend was desirous to throw this back to a distant period. The witness did not recollect the precise day, whether it was one, or two, or three days, before the intended meeting; he had not taken pains to prepare his evidence for the occasion. Lord Harrowby is called; he tells you it was on the Tuesday, about two o'clock, some hours after the affair had been decided upon in Fox-court, in consequence of the production of the newspaper.

Now that I have mentioned the newspaper, I must observe, that my learned friend supposed this account of the intended dinner to be all a fabrication; that Edwards was the author and inventor of it, for the purpose of involving the prisoner and his associates in the guilt of high treason. I am sure every thing that rests merely upon assertion, every thing that is not proved in the cause, all that is surmised about spies, and other topics of a similar nature, resting upon no proof, will be rejected from your consideration; but was it, as my learned friend has hinted, an ideal dinner? The cards had been sent out on the Friday, or Saturday, and it was announced in the usual way in one of the ministerial papers. But some doubt was entertained upon this point; a gentleman was called, representing himself to be the court reporter; he said, the communication did not proceed from him; but a person from the New Times office, in which paper the article appeared, produced the manuscript, which contained several other announcements of a similar nature, and they were all proved to be in the hand-writing of another court reporter of the name of Lavenu. Such are the extraordinary surmises and suspicions, which have been introduced into this case. It was supposed, that no dinner was intended; that the whole was a fiction; that some person behind the scenes, who possessed great influence over the prisoner, and could move him like a puppet, had for his own purposes inserted this article in the paper; but when the affair comes to be investigated, the cloud is at once dispelled. The fact is, that a proper and decent interval having elapsed since the funeral of the king, the cabinet dinners were resumed, the cards were issued, and on the Tuesday it appeared in the usual form in the newspaper.

But to return to the evidence of Hiden. He says that Wilson, one of the prisoners, communicated to him all the particulars of the plot, and his statement corresponds precisely with the account given by Adams, by Dwyer, and by Monument; that four parties were to be formed; that the town was to be set on fire in various places; that attacks were to be made in different quarters; and that for that purpose, the cannon were to be seized, and all this was to be consequent on the attack at Lord Harrowby's. Wilson further stated, that Gee's-court where Dwyer lived were all in it, for Dwyer had given them reason to suppose he would embark in the transaction. He tells you that he felt it necessary to do so, for his own personal security. This is at once a confirmation of the truth of the statements both of Dwyer and Hiden. They have had no communication together; Dwyer had given the prisoners reason to suppose they would be joined by the people at Gee's-court; and Wilson communicated that circumstance to Hiden, which confirms, in a remarkable manner, the evidence of Dwyer.

Now, gentlemen, I will ask you with confidence, what becomes of the observation that this case rests entirely on the testimony of Adams? Am I not justified in saying, that if Adams were the most infamous of witnesses, and you were even to blot his evidence from your notes, there is abundantly sufficient to bring home the case to the prisoner at the bar?

Passing from this evidence, let us come to the events of Cato-street,—to facts which cannot be contradicted or disputed, which speak for themselves, and speak so strongly, that my learned friends have been compelled to admit that there was at least an intention to assassinate his majesty's ministers. But, I conceive that if you shall be of opinion that such an intention was entertained,—an intention to assassinate not merely this or that individual in the government, but by one great and sweeping blow to destroy the whole cabinet,—this will go a great way indeed to satisfy you, that there were further objects in contemplation; because I cannot suppose that from any motives of enmity or revenge directed against individuals of whom the prisoners could have no personal knowledge, they would have embarked in a design so dangerous and so wicked. If they formed the design of murdering the ministers of the Crown, it is impossible to suppose that this was intended to be effected with any other than an insurrectionary view. I think, therefore, that in this concession extorted from my learned friends by the force of the evidence, they have abandoned the case of the prisoner; for, with all their ingenuity, they could not even shape a plausible case in support of their supposition that such a blow could have been intended with any other view than to form the basis of an insurrection, in which it was hoped and expected that the great body of the people would instantly join. As to the trifling means of the parties, that consideration, in the view I have taken of the case, is no objection against the reality of the design. All that they conceived to be necessary for the attainment of their object was to strike one great blow,—to exhibit an appearance of force; and they confidently expected this would be followed by a general revolt they might lead and conduct at their pleasure.

Without entering into details of what took place in Cato-street, I beg leave to direct your attention for a moment to the nature of the preparations. If the conspiracy was merely with a view to plunder, why prepare materials for loading cannon?—why prepare so large a quantity of ammunition? My learned friend has attempted some explanation of the motives of that part of the design which related to the setting fire to the metropolis. If he thought such explanation necessary, and endeavoured to show how it agreed with the supposed design of plunder, it was equally incumbent on him to give a similar explanation as to the other circumstances of preparation made by the prisoners: but he has not attempted to do this. And, in truth, the materials collected were inconsistent with any other view of the case than that which I have stated; and they confirm beyond the possibility of doubt the story told by Adams, Monument, and Hiden; the latter of whom was so anxious immediately to give information, for the purpose of counteracting this most infamous plot.

But it is objected that we have not called other witnesses who might have been produced—that there is a person of the name of Edwards whom we have not examined. The fact is, we have called two persons who were engaged in the conspiracy with the prisoners; and if we had called others, it would only have had the effect of leading to a still more copious torrent of invective from the other side. We have called two witnesses, and we have confirmed their testimony beyond the possibility of dispute. But when my learned friends say we have not called certain other persons to support the case of the prosecution, how much more strongly does the observation apply against the prisoner who has witnesses in his power to produce, his own friends and associates—Potter, Palin, Harris, and Hall, and others who were present on the same occasion, who have been mentioned, and who might have been called to show that the account given by the witnesses for the Crown is false and fabricated; and yet not one of them has appeared to contradict the statement made on the part of the prosecution.

But this plot, it is contended, had no political object in view. Observe the language and conduct of the prisoner. The numbers at Cato-street were not so many as he expected;—they amounted only to twenty-five. He was alarmed;—he was apprehensive they might desert him. He endeavoured to inspire them with confidence. He warned them of the danger of retreating.—It would prove, he said, another Despard's job. Why that allusion, but because his enterprise was of a similar character?—Can it be explained on any other principle? Does it not show what was passing in his mind at the time, and evince the true nature of the enterprise more satisfactorily than evidence of any other description? But to pursue this still further:—Davidson is apprehended, and immediately exclaims, "let those be damned who will not die in liberty's cause;" and he sings a line of the admirable ballad of the poet Burns, 'Scots wha' ha' with Wallace bled.' Does not this speak for itself, in terms too distinct to be misunderstood? Does it not unfold his heart and mind to our observation, and show what was passing there at the time; what was the object of the criminal enterprise in which he had embarked; what it was for which he was then a prisoner?—Assassination to be followed by plunder?—No, but assassination to be followed by revolution, and the establishment of that which he miscalled liberty. And here it is impossible not to deplore the self-delusion of these misguided men who, engaged in an atrocious design against the laws and constitution of their country, and which was to commence by the sacrifice of some of the best blood of the nation, by the murder, among others, of that distinguished individual who had led our armies to victory, and exalted among the nations of the earth the name and character of Englishmen, could suppose that they were treading in the steps of the great Scottish chieftain, who, with the spirit and the energies of a real patriot, laboured to free his country from a foreign yoke; and with inadequate means and resources, but animated by an unconquerable spirit, kept at bay the power of England, performing deeds of the most heroic valour, till he fell at last a victim to the basest and most degrading treachery.

I have gone through this cause. I feel myself exhausted, and I am afraid I have worn out your patience. My omissions will be supplied by my lord. Let no suggestions made by my learned friend operate on your minds, except so far as those suggestions arise out of, and are supported by the evidence. It is easy to scatter insinuations, and to impute blame; but you, I am sure, will not consider accusation, still less dark and indistinct surmises, as proof. You are told that the prisoner is contending with the power of the Crown, but he is contending before a British jury, who, if they were to incline to either side, it would be in favour of the accused: and I am sure, knowing as I do those who are associated with me upon this occasion, there is no wish or disposition, on the part of the prosecution, to press against the prisoner any point beyond what justice requires. We have no other duty, and can have no other desire than to lay the case fairly before you. It will be for you, then, receiving the law from his lordship, who is bound by the same obligation as yourselves, to say whether, upon the evidence which has been laid before you, you are satisfied that the prisoner is guilty of the crime with which he is charged. Every assistance which extensive talent and long experience, and knowledge of the law could afford to a person in his situation, he has received. Nothing has been wanting to his defence.

Before I conclude, I beg leave to repeat what has been said by my learned friend, the counsel for the prisoner, that if you entertain a reasonable doubt on the subject of his guilt, it will be your duty to acquit him: but, on the other hand, as the guardians of the public peace, acting under the sacred obligation of the oath which you have taken, if you are satisfied that the case is proved against him, you will discharge your duty, without looking to the consequences, with that firmness, impartiality, and integrity which have ever been the distinguishing characteristics of an English jury.

SUMMING-UP.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—This is an indictment against Arthur Thistlewood, the prisoner now at the bar, and several other persons, who, in the progress of this trial, have also appeared at the bar in order that they might be identified by some of the witnesses, charging them with the crime of high treason. That crime has been truly stated to you to be the greatest known to the law: it is so, because it comprises not only individual and private evil as most others, but a great and extensive public evil also. A charge so serious, requires at the hands of an English jury, and will, I am sure, from what I have already seen, receive from you the most grave and mature consideration.

The charge upon the record is divided into several heads:—the first is, that of compassing and imagining to depose the king—the second, that of compassing and imagining to put the king to death—the third, that of compassing and imagining to levy war against the king, in order to compel him to change his measures and councils—and the fourth, that of actually levying war against the king. Two of these charges, namely, the compassing and imagining the death of his majesty, and the actually levying war against him, were declared to be treasons by a statute passed as long ago as the reign of king Edward the third. In the construction of that ancient statute it had been held, not only in many cases passing in judgment in our Courts, but also by the opinion delivered to us by grave and learned writers upon the law on that subject, that all conspiracies and attempts to depose his majesty, and all conspiracies and attempts to levy war against him, were overt acts of a treasonable intention to take away his life, because, as experience shews us, the death of the sovereign generally follows his deposition. In order, however, to remove any mistake that persons might fall into, a statute was passed in the reign of his late majesty, similar in substance, and nearly so in language, to several statutes which had been formerly passed, but which operated for a season only, by which the compassing or imagining to depose his majesty, or the compassing and imagining to levy war against him, or to compel him to change his measures and councils, were each declared to be a substantive treason. And as the evidence in this case points more directly to the compassing to depose and to levy war against him, than to the actual intention to take away his life, the most simple way of presenting this case to you, is, to direct your minds to those parts of this indictment, which charge the compassing and imagining to depose the king, and to levy war against the king in order to compel him to change his measures and councils.

You will observe, that the substance of the charge is made to consist in the intention—in the compassing, imagining, and intending, and not in the actual deposition of his majesty, or in the actual levying war;—such intention, however, must be manifested and followed up by certain acts of the parties, which acts must be (as they are in this case) stated on the record, and proved to the satisfaction of the jury, as evidencing the traitorous intention.

Now the acts charged on the indictment are, as applied to each count, the same;—they are first, the meeting, conspiring, and consulting amongst themselves to destroy the government of this realm as by law established—meetings and consultations to levy war against the king, to subvert the constitution and government as by law established—meeting and conspiring to assassinate and murder divers of the privy council of the king—maliciously and traitorously providing large quantities of arms and weapons, in order to arm themselves and others, for the purpose of raising and levying war against the king—meeting and conspiring to seize divers cannon, warlike weapons, arms, and ammunition, in order to arm themselves and others, for the purpose of raising and levying war against the king—meeting and conspiring to burn and destroy divers houses and buildings in and near London, and divers barracks used for the reception and residence of the soldiers, troops, and forces of the king, and to prepare combustibles for the purpose of burning and destroying the said houses, buildings, and barracks—and further, the actual assembling in arms with intent to assassinate, kill, and murder divers of the privy council of the king employed in the administration of the affairs and government of this kingdom, and to levy war against the king.

These, gentlemen, are the facts charged in the indictment as (in technical language) the overt acts, that is, as the evidence of the intention, and the steps and measures adopted in order to carry that intention into effect; to these acts therefore the evidence that has been laid before you has been directed, and if these acts are proved to your satisfaction, or any important part of them, it will then be for you to consider, whether the criminal and traitorous intention charged—to depose the king, or to levy war against him—is satisfactorily proved, and if so, as each is treason, it is not material to distinguish between them.

You have heard in this evidence, of a very extraordinary (I may say for the present) project, alleged to have been entertained by this person now at the bar, and others associating with him; a project, as it is said, to take away the lives of all the persons most confidentially employed in the administration of the government of this realm by his majesty, when they should be assembled at a dinner, and that some of the conspirators were to proceed at the same time, and others immediately afterwards, to set on fire buildings in various parts of the town, to seize some pieces of artillery, to take possession of the Mansion-house, and to declare that a new government was established; thereby to overthrow the existing government and the subsisting order of things, and to substitute something else in its place. This is the general nature of the project imputed to the prisoner at the bar; it is important for you to consider whether that project is to your satisfaction proved. The question is, not whether it was likely to be successful, but whether it was intended by these persons, and whether steps were taken to carry it into effect. The improbability of the success of such a scheme is fit matter for your consideration in weighing the evidence that is laid before you, in order to prove that the scheme did exist; but your inquiry is, did that scheme exist or did it not? and is it proved to your satisfaction by the evidence that has been laid before you.

A very large body of evidence has been laid before you, in order to prove, that such a project, however wild and visionary, was in fact contrived, and that steps were taken by the prisoner and others to carry it into effect. Some witnesses have given you minute details of various conversations taking place at various times; and in weighing the effect of that testimony, it seems to me that you will do well to consider, rather the general substance and import, than the precise accuracy of every particular expression that may have fallen from any one witness: a long detail will hardly ever be free from some occasional error or mistake; the question properly, is not whether there be any trifling error or mistake, but whether the substance and body of the testimony laid before you be or be not in your judgment true.

Some of the persons who have been called before you to give evidence upon this occasion are truly represented to be persons who acknowledge themselves to be accomplices in this most traitorous design — that observation, however, does not apply to all who have given evidence; and much observation has been made upon the credit that ought to be given to persons in that situation. Upon that subject I will only say, that by the law of this, and I believe of every other country, accomplices are witnesses competent to be heard: the credit that is to be given to them, is matter, in this country, for the consideration of gentlemen in your situation; and that credit must depend, in a great degree, on the probability of the story they tell, or on the confirmation that may be given to them from other and pure sources, so far as what they say is capable of confirmation, and upon the absence of that contradiction which may be adduced if the story related be not true.—There is no rule of law which says that the testimony of accomplices must be credited;—there is no rule of law, or of practice, that has said it must be rejected:—to say it must be, would offer the greatest possible latitude to crimes; because, as was truly observed by one of the learned counsel for the prosecution, if bad men once are given to understand they are in no danger of being brought to justice from disclosures made by those who participate in their crime, they will trust to this and proceed in their wicked designs; whereas we know bad men entertain great distrust of each other, which often prevents the perpetration of those offences which cannot be committed without the concurrence of several persons.

Having made these general observations in order to direct your attention, in the best way that I am able, to the evidence that has been laid before you, I will now, as it is some hours since the evidence was distinctly heard by you, proceed to read a great part, if not the whole evidence; so much as occurs to me as necessary to submit to your consideration, and more if you desire it.

The first witness called was Robert Adams, on whom so much remark has been made by the learned counsel on one side and the other. According to his account, he must be considered as an accomplice in the treasonable conspiracy, if any treasonable conspiracy existed, because he acknowledges that he attended many meetings, and was one of those who were assembled to carry it into effect. The account he gives of himself is, that he is a shoemaker; that he formerly belonged to the royal regiment of Horse Guards; that he has left that service eighteen years; that he first became acquainted with Brunt, one of the persons indicted, about the year 1816, at Cambray, in France; that his first introduction to the prisoner Thistlewood, was on the 13th of January, at his own lodgings in Stanhope-street, Clare-market. He says, "I was introduced by Brunt, who, in going into the room, said to Thistlewood, this is the man I was speaking to you about; Thistlewood said, 'You were once in the Life-guards,' I said no, I had belonged to the Blues; he said, 'I suppose you are a good soldier,' I replied that I could use a sword to defend myself, but I was not so clever as I had been, not having been in the habit of using arms for some time." Then he says that Mr. Thistlewood began to allude to the genteel people of the country, endeavouring to make them appear mean and contemptible; saying, that there was not one of them who was worth so small a sum as ten pounds, that was worth any thing for the good of his country: as to the shopkeepers of London, he said they were a set of aristocrats, and were all working under one system of government; that he should glory to see the day that all the shops were shut up and plundered; that Mr. Hunt was a damned coward and no friend to the people, and he had no doubt acted as a spy for government; that Mr. Cobbett, with all his writings, was of no good to the country, and he had no doubt that he too was a spy as well as Mr. Hunt. He believes that finished the discourse. He says, he was afterwards confined for debt in White-cross-street prison; that he saw Mr. Thistlewood one Sunday at the White Hart in Brook's-market, a house kept by a person of the name of Hobbs; besides Thistlewood, Ings, Brunt, and a person of the name of Hall (who is not one of those indicted) were there, and Tidd, who is one of the persons indicted, came in; "we met in a room in the back yard." The witness says, that he came out of prison on the 30th of January, that on the 31st he saw Thistlewood the prisoner in a back room on the same floor where Brunt lived, which is in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane; Brunt, Ings, and Hall who is not indicted, and Davidson who is, were present; nothing particular took place on that night; that he met them again on the Wednesday evening; Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, and a person of the name of Edwards, who is not indicted, were present; nothing particular passed on that occasion, only that he saw a number of pike staves; Thistlewood was anxious to have them ferruled, and expressed himself rather surprised that Bradburn, who is one of the persons indicted, was not come; and Davidson in particular, expressed himself dissatisfied; he said that Bradburn had been supplied with money to buy ferrules for those staves, and he was dissatisfied that they were not done: he says, "the staves were quite green, and appeared as if they had just been cut." The staves have been produced to you, and from the appearance of them you will probably be able to judge, whether at that time they would or would not have the appearance described.

He does not know that any thing else passed at that meeting; but the meetings continued to be held twice a day in that room, up to the 23rd of February: he says that he heard Brunt say that he had hired a room for Ings; there was no furniture in the room. He says, "One evening afterwards, about ten days before the funeral of his late majesty, I went up into the room. Thistlewood and Harrison were sitting before the fire; they made room for me, and I sat down between them. Harrison told Thistlewood he had met one of the life-guards, who told him that as many of the horse and foot as could be spared would be at his majesty's funeral; that this would be a favourable opportunity to kick up a row, and see what they could do that night, which quite met with the prisoner's approbation, and he thought it would be a good opportunity, and he had no doubt if they could take the two pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane, and the six pieces from the artillery ground, they would, before morning, be able to put themselves in possession of London: that if any communication went to Windsor, the troops would be so tired, when they got to London, they would be able to do nothing. The prisoner said, he thought it might be so arranged, that they could prevent any orderly leaving London for Windsor; that it would also be necessary to get possession of the telegraph over the water, to prevent any intelligence being conveyed to Woolwich; that by this time they should be able to form a provisional government, who were to send to the sea ports to prevent any gentleman from leaving this country without a passport from this provisional government. He spoke of Dover, Brighton, Ramsgate, and Margate, especially of Brighton, not that he thought the new king would be able to be there or even at the funeral of his father, on account of his then illness. He said it was of no use for the new king, speaking of his present majesty by that name, to think of wearing the Crown; that the present family had inherited the Crown long enough. Brunt and Ings afterwards came into the room, and Thistlewood communicated to them what had been said. Brunt and Ings heard him, but positively declared that there was nothing short of the assassination which they had in view would satisfy them." From this it must be inferred, if what this witness says is true, that the conversation between these persons was about assassination; and it is further to be observed, that if what this witness states is true, it is clear that that had been talked of at a former meeting. He says, Brunt had told me there were two or three of them who had drawn out the plan with a view to assassinate the ministers at the first cabinet dinner which they had: they scarcely ever met but this was the subject of conversation. "On Saturday, the 19th of February," he says, "I went again to the room in Fox-court, about eleven or twelve o'clock in the forenoon; I saw Thistlewood, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, Brunt, and Hall there, on my going into the room; they were all set round the room in a deep study; in about a minute they all got up, turned round, and said, well then it is agreed,—we are come to the determination that if nothing occurs between this and Wednesday night, on the next Wednesday night we will go to work: it was said they were all so poor they could wait no longer. Thistlewood proposed that the committee should meet next morning at nine o'clock, to draw out a plan to go by, and he said to Brunt, you had better go round this afternoon and acquaint what men you can bring forward, in order to bring them to the committee room to-morrow-morning. Brunt said he had some work to do, and he thought he should not have time, but he would get up in the morning and acquaint a few; but that they did not want a great many to be in the room. Brunt was about to leave the room when the prisoner called to him, and said, it would be highly necessary that all who attended the committee the next morning should bring arms with them in case any officers should come up, and Brunt said, if any officer was to come into the room he would run him through." Then he proceeds to say, "On Sunday morning I went a little after eleven; it was so dark, from the fog and the snow, that I did not see who was there till Tidd spoke to me; there were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Davidson, Harrison, Cook, Bradburn, Edwards, Wilson, and myself there. I found they had not entered on the business upon which they had met. The prisoner, on looking at the number of heads, said, I think it is time to begin the business; counting the heads, and seeing twelve, he said I think that is quite enough to form a committee. Tidd was proposed to take the chair, by Thistlewood. Tidd took the chair, and sat down with a pike in his hand. Thistlewood was on his right, and Brunt on his left hand. Thistlewood began, and said, gentlemen, I presume you all know what you are met here for, and turning to the door, said, the west-end job. Brunt said, mention their names, what signifies; but was called to order by the chairman. Thistlewood said, gentlemen, we are come to this determination, as we are all of us tired of waiting so long, to do this job. As we find there is no probability of the ministers meeting all together between this and Wednesday night, we are come to a determination to take them separately, at their own houses; we shall not have an opportunity of destroying so many as if they were to dine all together, if we take them separately; but we must content ourselves with getting two or three, or four, as we can get them. I suppose it will take as many as forty or fifty men to do the west-end job; and I propose, at the same time, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground, shall be taken. Cook proposed to take the lead, and to take the command at the taking of those cannon: he proposed, after these were taken, to take the Mansion-house as a seat for the provisional government." He says, then they were to make an attempt upon the Bank of England: he says, Cook proposed further, that Palin should be the man intrusted to set fire to the buildings in different parts of London. This was all that passed on that subject; but Thistlewood said there was time enough, between that and Wednesday night, to settle and improve it; but he would drop the subject for the present, as Brunt had a proposition to make: upon this, he says, "Brunt came forward to state his plan; but Thistlewood said, 'Stop, my proposition had better be first put from the chair;' it was put from the chair, and carried unanimously. Brunt now came forward and proposed that they should assassinate as many of the ministers as they could, on Wednesday night, if no opportunity of their dining together occurred before that time: then he further proposed, that the men who should go for the assassination of the ministers should be divided into separate lots, and that one man was to be selected out of each lot to give the blow, and whatever man it fell upon should be bound to do it or be murdered himself. Upon this I asked Brunt if he supposed it was not possible for a man to attempt such a thing and fail in it, and if he did fail, should he be run through upon the spot? He said no, certainly not, unless there was the least sign of cowardice: if he failed in doing it, and was thought a good man, he should not be run through. Brunt here ended his discourse. It was put by the chairman in the same manner as Thistlewood's measure, and agreed to. About two minutes afterwards, before any thing else occurred, Palin, Potter, and Strange came in." Palin and Potter are not persons indicted, nor is Cook, who is one of the persons spoken of by this witness as being present. Cook, Potter, Palin, and Hall, four persons now named, are not included in the indictment. Strange came in also. "They were asked to sit down, and Thistlewood told them of plans that had been proposed: they agreed to them the same as the rest had done. After this Palin got up and said, that agreeing as he did to the plans which had been proposed, there was one thing which he wanted to know: there were many objects proposed, and to carry all at one time, if it could be done, would be a great acquisition. "You talk," he says, "of taking from forty to fifty men to the west-end job; now, I want to know where the men are to come from that are to take these cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and those at the Artillery-ground: no doubt you know better than me what strength you have got." He says, "I cannot say at present what number I can bring forward. I want to know also," said he, "in calling upon the men I intend to go to, if I can tell them, in fact, what is to be done." The Witness says, "Upon this the chairman said, that no doubt Mr. Palin knew the men he had to depend upon. It was agreed that Palin should make such communications as he might think prudent, and Palin was satisfied. There was nothing transacted regularly in the chair after that; but they began to think of going home to get their dinners, in order, in the afternoon, to go to their men;" and the prisoner said to Brunt, "Oh, well thought of; now, Mr. Palin is here, I would advise you to take him to the spot close by, and see whether it is practicable or not." That was, to go to the new Furnival's-inn-building, in Holborn, to see whether it was practicable to fire it; they went, and returned in about ten minutes, when Palin said it was a very easy job, and it would make a damned good fire; then they began to depart.

Now much observation was made to you upon the utter incredibility of this, because, being a new building, it could not easily be set on fire; according to the appearance in the street it is so, but whether it is completed or not inside I do not know. This, however, is most important; it was observed that if it was untrue Palin is a competent witness, and the prisoner might have called him; and Cook is another who has not been indicted: both of whom are competent witnesses for the prisoner. Neither of them could the Crown compel to give evidence, but they might be called by the prisoner, because they would not then be called to criminate themselves; and they might have denied, if consistently with truth they could have denied, any conversation like that which this man speaks to. He says, "The prisoner said, before they left the room, he thought it would be necessary to get the men together and give them a treat. Brunt turned round, and said with an oath, although he had not got much work, he had a pound note which he would apply to that purpose; and the prisoner then inquired whether they might be taken to the White Hart; that was a place where they had formerly met, but Brunt said he did not much like to go there after what had been said; he said his own room would do, if he could send his boy and apprentice out of the way. Thistlewood then talked of his own house, but on giving it a second thought, he said that will not do, as an officer lives opposite, and if he should perceive men coming backwards and forwards it would give suspicion." He says, "I believe that finishes the Sunday-morning business." He says, "On the Sunday evening I went to the White Hart, and had some conversation with Hobbs. On Monday morning I went again to the room about ten o'clock; Thistlewood, Brunt, Harrison, Hall, and Ings were there, and others I do not recollect. I said, I had something to communicate to them, and told them that Hobbs, the landlord of the White Hart, had told me that two officers had been there, and that they asked whether there was not a radical meeting at his house; from which he inferred that there was information given at Lord Sidmouth's office, that there was a meeting of that description held there. "Upon this Harrison" (to use the expression of the witness) "turned round to me like a bull dog, and said, Adams, you have acted wrong, for if you had heard any thing it was your business to come to me or Mr. Thistlewood. I said I did not conceive that I had any right to withhold it from any one; that I thought it my duty to communicate it to all, as it concerned all. They swore at me again, and said I had no business to communicate it to any, but to them." He says, "I argued with them that I had acted right in communicating to them what I had heard. They then proposed breaking up to call upon their men, and also to attend at a meeting called the Marylebone Union: before we parted, I was appointed to come again to Brunt's room, that evening, to tell any person who came, that there was no meeting" they having determined to go themselves, according to the testimony of the witness, to the Union Club. He says, "I went to Brunt's room, and Potter soon joined me. We went to the White Hart, and Palin and Bradburn came there to us. On the Tuesday morning," he says, "I went to the room again: there were then present, Brunt, Thistlewood, Ings, Hall, Davidson, Harrison, Wilson, Palin, Potter, and Bradburn. While there, Edwards came in and went up to Thistlewood and told him there was to be a cabinet dinner next night. Thistlewood said I don't think that is true. A newspaper was sent for, and read by Thistlewood, it contained an account that the cabinet were to dine at Earl Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square, on Wednesday evening." Then he relates that very terrible expression used by Brunt, which I need not repeat to you. He says, "Thistlewood proposed then that a committee should sit directly to form a fresh plan regarding the assassination. I interrupted him, and called to their recollection what Hobbs had said to me: upon this Harrison walked backwards and forwards, and said if any man attempted to throw cold water on the concern, he would run that man through with a sword. I was put out of the chair and Tidd was put in. Thistlewood wanted to proceed in the business, when Palin said, stop, I want to be satisfied about what happened yesterday before we proceed any further. Upon this" he says, "after some ceremony, Brunt proposed that there should be a watch put upon the earl of Harrowby's that night." They seem to have considered that if they kept watch there, and saw no police officers or military, or any preparations to prevent their design, they might fairly conclude their design was unknown, if what the witness says is correct. Then he says, "The prisoner, Thistlewood, said he hoped every body would be satisfied if no police officers or soldiers went into the house; and that they would do what they had talked of to-morrow evening; the plan of the Sunday-morning was altered as respected the assassination. Thistlewood then proposed that there should be forty men allowed, and more if they could be got; he said there would be fourteen or sixteen of the ministers which would be a rare haul to murder them all. I propose, he said, going to the door with a note to present to earl Harrowby: when the door is opened, for the men to rush in and seize the servants, and present a pistol to them, and directly threaten them with death if they offer to make the least resistance or noise. This being done, a party were to rush forwards to take the command of the staircase; two men were to be placed at the stairs leading to the upper part of the house, one was to have fire-arms, to be protected by another with a hand-grenade in his hand; a couple of men were to take the head of the stairs leading to the lower part of the house, they were to be armed the same as the others at the upper stairs; if any servants attempted to make any retreat from the lower part of the house, or from the upper part of the house, these men with the hand-grenades were to clap fire to them and fling them in amongst them; two men at the same time were to be placed at the area, one with a blunderbuss, and another with hand-grenade; if any body attempted to make their retreat from the lower part of the house that way, they were to have a hand-grenade thrown in amongst them there; at the same time all these objects were to be accomplished by securing the house, those men who were to go in for the assassination were to rush in directly after, where their lordships were, and to murder all they found in the room good or bad; he said if there were any good ones they would murder them for keeping bad company. Then the witness says, "Ings" who is represented to be a butcher, "volunteered to enter the room first with a brace of pistols, a cutlass, and his knife in his pocket, with a determination, after the two swordsmen, that were appointed to follow him, had despatched them, to cut every head off that was in the room, and the heads of lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth he would bring away in a bag, he would provide for the purpose two bags."—A circumstance worthy of your notice, because you will bear in mind that there were two empty bags found on the person of Ings when he was taken into custody. He says "he said he intended, when he got into the room, to say—'well, my lords, I have got as good men here as the Manchester Yeomanry, enter citizens, and do your duty.' Upon this word of command from Ings the two swordsmen were to enter, to be followed by the rest of the men with pikes, pistols, cutlasses, or whatever it might be, and to fall to work immediately in murdering them as fast as they could;" he says, "Harrison, who has been a soldier, and I, myself, were picked out, being the only men amongst them used to the sword, and men of the greatest strength and power. Harrison had been a soldier in the life-guards. On Harrison being proposed to go into the room, Thistlewood asked me if I would go in;" he says "I considered my life in danger" (there had been considerable threatening language if he is to be believed), "and I agreed to go." After the execution was done in the house, they were to leave the house as quickly as possible: Harrison was the man that was appointed to go to King-street Horse-barracks, and to take one of those fire-balls and throw it amongst straw to set fire to the premises; after they left Grosvenor-square, Harrison, Wilson, and the rest of the party were to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane to the City Light-Horse barracks, for the purpose of meeting a party of men that were intended to be planted there, and in case those men found themselves not sufficiently strong to take the two pieces of cannon at the Light-Horse barracks, they were to wait their arrival and would assist them; they were to proceed from thence to the Artillery-ground, where Cook was to be appointed; in order to lend him a hand in case he had found himself not sufficiently strong to take the six cannon there. Cook was to wait there for the arrival of Thistlewood if he did not like to proceed; he was to bring the cannon from the ground into the street, and to load them in order to be ready to fire on any persons that might interrupt him: but if he found his strength sufficient to enable him to proceed, he was to advance from there to the Mansion-house, if he found himself capable of advancing to the Mansion-house he was to divide the six cannon into two divisions, and take three on one side and three on the other; then he was to demand the Mansion-house, and on a refusal he was to fire at it on both sides, it was thought on doing that they would soon give it up—the provisional government was to sit there: after the Mansion-house was taken the Bank of England was to be the next place to be attacked, they were to plunder it of all they could get, but not to destroy the books if they could help it, for they thought by keeping possession of the books, that would enable them to see further into the villainy that had, he said, been practised in the country for some years past; the regulation of the further proceedings was to be left till Wednesday; Palin's plan was determined on, but the time was not then settled. After the chair was left, Harrison proposed that there should be a counter-sign to be communicated to all their friends, the countersign was Button; the man that came up was to say, b, u, t, the other man was to say, t, o, n, these put together were to produce Button, this was a token by which they were to know each other. He says, "it was proposed that a man should stand at the end of Oxford-road to communicate to any man that came up to him the room where they were to meet the next night. In the afternoon I went to the house again; in going up stairs, I perceived a strange smell, on going in I found Edwards, Ings, and Hall there; Edwards was making fuses to put to the hand-grenades; Ings was dipping some rope yarn, picked for the purpose, into stuff to make, what they termed, illumination balls for Palin; Hall was dipping those into an iron pot and putting sheets of paper on the floor to receive these, after they came from the pot they were wrapped up in it to prevent their sticking to the hands. I stopped only a few minutes. On the same Tuesday evening, I went again, and then found two strange men I had never seen—one I found to be Harris, but I do not know the name of the other; Brunt and Thistlewood were there, Davidson went to keep watch at six o'clock; Tidd and Brunt went off to relieve him at nine o'clock, they started about half past eight, but Brunt returned in about five minutes, as Tidd had met with a man who was likely to be of great consequence and could not go. On looking round the room he asked me to go; as we went we met Edwards, I asked him if any thing particular had been seen, he said, whatever had been seen he should communicate to Mr. Thistlewood; Brunt and I went to Grosvenor-square, we saw Davidson in the square and another man that I did not know." He says, "I told Brunt I was tired, and we went to a public-house at the corner of the mews where we had some porter, and where Brunt played at dominos with a young man, and we staid there till eleven o'clock, and then we went out and walked till twelve o'clock, and then we went home. On Wednesday, the next day, I went again to Fox-court and I found Brunt in his own room; Strange came in alone, and soon after two more persons; I turned my head and saw some pistols upon the drawers, Strange and the men that came in tried the flints; Brunt then invited them into the back room; on going there, I saw several cutlasses, a blunderbuss, the pistols were brought in and the strangers began to put flints into them; they had not been long there before Thistlewood, Ings, and Hall came in; Thistlewood looked round and said, 'well, my lads, this now looks something like, as if there was something going to be done.' I complained of being in low spirits, and Brunt sent out for some gin and some beer; while the beer was being fetched, Thistlewood said he wanted some paper to write some bills on, such as newspapers were printed on, I said, I thought cartridge paper would do as well, and he, that is Thistlewood, then said who will fetch it? Brunt said my boy, or apprentice, shall fetch it; Thistlewood gave Brunt a shilling to send for the paper, half a dozen sheets were brought and Thistlewood sat down at a table to write three bills to stick up against the buildings that might be set on fire," the words, as the witness recollects them, were these: "Your tyrants are destroyed, the friends of liberty are called upon to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting. James Ings, Secretary, 23rd February, 1820. In writing the last bill, I perceived Mr. Thistlewood to be extremely agitated, so much so that he could hardly write, he said he was very tired, and did not know what was the matter with him, but he could not write any more; he then proposed that Hall should take the pen, but Hall objected, another person, a stranger, afterwards took the pen and sat down to write what Thistlewood dictated to him:" what became of the papers he does not know.

The witness was then questioned as to what was contained in that paper; some doubt being entertained on the part of the judges whether it was proper evidence to be received under the particular circumstance of not having been seen in the hands of the prisoner, the Solicitor-general said, very properly, he should not press the contents of that paper, and therefore we have no account of it. The witness says, "while this paper was writing, Ings was preparing himself in the manner he was to enter the room at lord Harrowby's; he put a black belt round his waist for a brace of pistols, and another black belt across his shoulder; after this there was a bag hung to each shoulder, in the form of a soldier's haversack; he then placed a brace of pistols one on each side, and a cutlass; he viewed himself, and said with an oath, I am not complete now, I have forgot my steel and pulled out a large knife, and brandished it about as if he were in the act of cutting off the heads he intended. He said he intended to cut off two, and bring them away, together with one hand of my lord Castlereagh, which might at a future day be thought a good deal of;—these expressions he had used many times." The witness described the knife; it was a large-bladed knife from ten to twelve inches long; the handle was bound with wax-end. Such a knife you will bear in mind was afterwards seized in the stable from one of the persons there who appears to have been Ings. He says, "while this was passing, the others were arming themselves. The first persons who left the room went about four or five. Palin came in about an hour before I left, and Thistlewood and Brunt on some business left the room, and then Palin said, gentlemen, I hope all that have met here this afternoon, are well acquainted with what you are going upon; in the first place you ought to think within yourselves, whether you are going to do your country a service or not; you ought to think whether this assassination will be countenanced by your country. If you conceive that the assassination will be countenanced by your country, and that the people of the country, after you have done it, will turn of your side; every man that flinches from his duty, or turns out a coward, ought to be run through: unless you come to this determination it is impossible to do any good." He says, "then a man, whose name I do not know, interrupted him. Thistlewood and Brunt had not then come in; the tall man said, you seem to speak as if every man were in possession of what we are going upon; if we turn out with a view to serve our country, I am not afraid of my life, and he who is afraid of his life, ought to have nothing to do with an affair like this. Brunt came in after this, and perceiving an alteration in the countenance of the meeting, he wished to know the cause; he was told there were some in the room who wished to know further of the plan. Upon this Brunt said, this is not the place to tell them that; they should go with him to the room in Edgware road, and there every one should be apprized of what they intended to do." He says, "I left the room first, and Strange and three or four others, that I do not know, went out afterwards. It was agreed they should walk two and two, in order to avoid suspicion." Then he gives an account of his going up Holborn, and that he was tapped on the shoulder. He says, "in this room there was a cupboard, in which there were swords, hand-grenades, and flannel bags for cartridges for the cannon—all the ammunition was not at Brunt's, but what they called the dépôt, which was at Tidd's house, who lived in the next room to myself. When I set off from Brunt's, I had a blunderbuss under my great coat, and Brunt gave me a broomstick, which was prepared to receive a bayonet, to carry. Among other arms at the dépôt were some pikes, some of them old files, and some of them old bayonet points; he says, that a man came up and told him to slacken his pace, as Brunt was gone back for something; he did so. and went on to the end of Oxford-street; it seems he did not know this room in Cato-street, he was tired of staying, and was on his way back and he met Brunt, then he returned back with Brunt and went along the Edgware-road with him until they met Thistlewood, who took them to Cato-street: he says, "when I got to the stable-door Harrison came up and told me to go in, and I did so, I then saw Davidson sitting down and Wilson standing as if they were doing something to the pikes; I cannot say the number of persons there then; but at the conclusion there were, according to Thistlewood's account, eighteen above and two below; there was a carpenter's bench with arms of different descriptions on it, and there was a chest by the window where I placed myself; when I went in they were handling the different things, Tidd came in and proposed going to the square to see whether the ministers were getting together; Thistlewood was absent for some time, and when he came back I heard, below stairs, a great deal of talking, in consequence of that I went down where I found Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, and Wilson; on seeing me they said the carriages are getting there as fast as they can, no less than six or seven are already there: Brunt turned round and said, what a haul we shall have among them. After this I went up stairs, Thistlewood was much agitated, and Tidd came in very little afterwards. Ings turned round and said, do not think of dropping it now; if you do, I shall hang myself; it was said Tidd would not come; Thistlewood said he would forfeit his existence if Tidd did not come; afterwards he came. Thistlewood hoped they would not give up what they had begun; if they did, it would turn out another Despard's job;" alluding to the case of a person of that name, of which you have heard; he says, "Thistlewood then began to count the number of men that were there, and said altogether there were twenty, and that that was plenty; he said fourteen would be sufficient to go into the room, and the other six would be sufficient to take care of the servants; on this, fourteen men were picked out, and Brunt produced a bottle of gin which was handed round. Thistlewood said the number is sufficient; supposing lord Harrowby should have sixteen servants, they are not prepared, we are. We can do what we have to do in ten minutes. Almost directly afterwards we heard a noise at the bottom of the ladder leading up to the loft." He says, "Thistlewood upon this took the candle, and looked towards the bottom of the bench." He says, "He turned round and put the candle at the bottom of the bench quite confused; at this instant the officers ascended the ladder, and took command of the room; two stood at the top of the ladder and presented two pistols, and said,—Holloa! is any body in the room? here is a pretty nest of you. We have got a warrant to arrest you all, and as such we hope you will go peaceably—One of the officers who was then upon the ladder said, Make way, let me come forward—a group then got into the inner room, and I saw an arm rush suddenly forward, and at the same time I saw a pistol fired; as soon as the pistol was fired, the candle was put out, and it was impossible for me to see what passed. On this it was given out that one of the officers was murdered, and I got away and went home. I was apprehended on the Friday following, and have been in custody ever since." He was desired to look at the persons at the bar, many of whom he recognised. The person of Strange he did not recollect; whether any alteration of dress prevented it, I am not able to say. An observation has been made upon what the witness says were the words used by the officers, namely, "we have got a warrant to arrest you, and we hope you will go peaceably;" and it is said, that the officers did not say that they said that they had a warrant, but they observed that they were officers, and desired that the arms might be seized, or that they should surrender; the expressions have certainly much the same import, but which is the correct one it is impossible to say.

The witness was then cross-examined, and was asked what had carried him to this meeting; and he made use of an expression which was very improper, and ought not to have been used in this place, he answered, "My legs." He says further, "I went there under the pretension of assassinating his majesty's ministers to every outward appearance, but my inward intention was entirely against it. I had attended many meetings at which this plan was debated, and was chairman of one. Fear," he says "kept me to it. After leaving the army I went to Cambray, to follow my trade as a shoemaker, and there became acquainted with Tidd. I carried between thirty and forty pounds with me, it was my own. Brunt introduced me to Thistlewood, for the purpose of assassinating the ministers;—this was proposed to me by Brunt, before I ever saw Thistlewood; and I consented to be introduced to Thistlewood for that purpose. The first account I ever gave of what had passed was on the Saturday after; I did not give it under any understanding that I was to become a witness—my conscience accused me, I had acted wrong, and I made a vow that if God would spare me, I would make a disclosure of all I knew." Then he is asked, whether it was not because he would not like to be hanged that he disclosed this? to which his answer is, "I do not know who would." He says, "I had some of these feelings before I entered the room in Cato-street; but after I entered the room, and after the murder of Smithers was committed, I was worse." Now, gentlemen, you will judge whether the picture which this witness exhibits of himself, is not the natural picture of the mind of a bad man engaged, as he was, in a very wicked design, fearful of his own accomplices, afraid to go on, and afraid to recede, equally apprehensive of both, irresolute and undetermined whether he should make any disclosure till he was in custody; at which time it was necessary instantly to make a disclosure, which he says he did, without any promise of any reward.

He says, "The greatest number of persons that I ever saw assembled together was on the 20th of February, in the morning; there were about fifteen, all poor men for what I know." The prisoner, he says, gave money to Hall to fetch the newspaper. "The largest sum of money I ever saw was six shillings produced by Thistlewood to Brunt. I do not know where the men were to come from that were to do all this mischief." Then he was asked, you provided powder for the cannon, but you had no balls. Upon which he says, it was proposed to take a sledge hammer along with them, and knock off the tops of the iron railings, and that they would do greater mischief than cannon-ball.—He says that the prisoner said this. He says, "I do not know what is become of Edwards; I have not seen him since the 22nd of February. I have seen him as active as the rest of them." Then some questions were put to him as if importing that his was the hand that held the sword by which Smithers died. He says, "I was at the end of the room, under the Bench next Cato-street, four or five feet off; I saw the arm that extended from the door."

Upon re-examination he says, "The army was at Cambray when I was there, and I was carrying on my trade with the English soldiers there."

This, gentlemen, is the whole of the testimony given to you by this witness, Adams; and if this be true in substance and general effect, it does prove, not merely an intention to assassinate the several persons engaged in the government of the country, but shews also that that was only a part of a further and more extensive plan;—of a plan to seize the cannon, take possession of the Mansion-house, and establish a provisional government there, upon the vain expectation that if once such a blow could be struck, there were many people in the metropolis ready to join the standard of rebellion;—this hope will, I trust, always be disappointed, whoever shall at any time entertain it;—it however seems to have been entertained, if we are to believe this witness. It is observed, that he mentions, several times, a person of the name of Edwards, whose name is in the list of witnesses: why he is not called it is not for me to say; those who conduct the prosecution probably have their reasons for not laying before you further or other evidence than they have laid before you. Whether he is willing to be examined we do not know; probably he is; can you then conclude because he is not examined, that all that is said by Adams is untrue? It is for you to judge. The observation on the absence of witnesses, I am sorry to say, presses with greater force on the prisoner; because there are three or four persons present at conversations mentioned by this witness, either of whom would be a competent witness to contradict Adams. With respect to the character of Adams, except so far as he implicates himself—except by his own account, no other objection is made to him—no witness is called to say any thing against him, either as to his former life or conversation; nothing appears against him before you, except the part he took in this transaction.

Another witness who speaks to the designs of these persons is Hiden, who certainly is of a very different character and description from the witness Adams; he is not to be considered as an accomplice, nay, according to the account he has given,—the truth of which it seems is admitted,—there is no doubt he does not labour under any imputation; because he disclosed what he knew early enough to have prevented the accomplishment of the object.

I will now read to you the evidence of Thomas Hiden. He says, "I have been a cow-keeper, I had seen Wilson formerly at a shoemaker's club; a few days before the 22nd of February I met him in the street, and he asked me if I would be one of a party to destroy his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner; that all things were ready—that they had such things as hand-grenades. He said they depended on my being made one of them, and that Mr. Thistlewood would be glad to see me; he told me the hand-grenades were to be lighted with fuses, and to be put under the table, and all that escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon." Then he says, "Wilson told him that they were to light up some fires by way of keeping the town in confusion for a few days; and it would become a general thing." He mentioned several houses, as some that they meant to set fire to. He says, "I told him that I would do it. I believe this was four or five days before the discovery at Cato-street. I went to lord Harrowby's the day before the discovery; I followed his lordship to the Park and gave him a note with information. I saw Wilson again, between four and five in the afternoon, in Manchester-street, Manchester-square; he called me, and told me there was to be a cabinet dinner that night at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square. He told me I was to go up to Cato-street, to a public-house by the sign of the Horse and Groom, and there I was to go in—it is the corner of Cato-street—or I was to stop at the corner till I was shoved into a stable close by; I asked at what time, and he said by six o'clock. I asked him how many there were to be there, and he said about twenty or thirty. I asked him whether there were going to be any others in other places? and he said there was to be another party in the Borough; another in Gray's-inn-lane; one in Gee's-court, or in the city; I cannot be certain which. He said that all Gee's-court were in it, but they would not act unless the English were in it first; because they had been deceived so often. I understood they were Irish people who lived in Gee's-court; it is in Oxford-street, opposite St. George's-market. He said, a gentleman's servant had been supporting some of the party, and would give them more money if they would act upon the subject. He asked me if I had a gun, and I told him I had a rubbishing one; that the lock was at a gun-smith's to repair: he said they would provide me with a gun and something to work it with." Then he goes on to say, "Wilson further told me there were two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane that they could get at very easily by breaking in some small doors; that there were four pieces of cannon at some Artillery-ground, which they could easily get by killing a sentinel." He says, "After doing the grand thing in the Square, Wilson said they were to retreat and meet somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house: he told me to be sure and come to my time, or else the grand thing would be done before I came." Upon this he says, "I went to John-street about seven o'clock; when I got to the gateway into Cato-street, at the corner of the Horse and Groom, I saw Wilson, and Davidson the man of colour. Davidson said, I was behind my time: he asked me if I would go in, that Mr. Thistlewood was there. I told him I could not go in, as I had to go for some cream. I asked him what time they should leave there; he said about eight o'clock. He told me if I was not there before they were gone, I was to follow them to Grosvenor-square, and I should find them at the fourth house from the corner of Grosvenor-square, on the bottom side next Church-street."

On his cross-examination, he says it was four or five days before the 23rd of February, that he had this first conversation with Wilson: he had known him seven or eight months before. He says he cannot say from his memory on what day he gave the note to lord Harrowby. He says, "When Wilson told me of the plan, it was as we walked up and down Manchester-street." Then a letter is shewn to the witness, addressed to lord Castlereagh, which he says is his writing; it is the letter he gave to lord Harrowby, as he could not see lord Castlereagh to whom it was addressed, informing him of a plot to destroy his majesty's ministers.

Now, gentlemen, this witness, Hiden, you see, is entirely free from all impeachment either by any testimony against him, or his own conduct; and his own conduct, so far from impeaching him, is highly creditable. He says Wilson informed him of taking these cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, going to the Artillery-ground, and then to the Mansion-house, mentioning those matters shorter than Adams did. Whatever is said by any one person upon the subject of a conspiracy in which they are satisfactorily shewn to have been all engaged, is to be received not only against the person who utters it, but against all who have been concerned in it; you will consider, therefore, the effect of this evidence, and whether this is not a strong confirmation of the more detailed story that has been given by Adams.

The next witness called to give an account of their designs, is Monument, who is certainly an accomplice, not of so long standing as Adams, but he must be taken to have consented to the scheme so far as related to the assassination of his majesty's ministers. He says, "I am a shoemaker, and lived in Garden-court, Baldwin's-gardens, near Brook's-market. I am now a prisoner in the Tower. I remember meeting Thistlewood, at a person's of the name of Ford, a few days before the meeting in Finsbury-market; that is about two months before the 23rd of February; he afterwards called on me with Brunt; and he said, after a few minutes, that he wished to speak to me, and I went outside the door with him, and he said to me great events are at hand, the people are every where anxious for a change; I have been promised support by a great many men who have deceived me, but now I have got men who will stand by me. He then asked me whether I had any arms; I said no, I had not. He said every man ought to be armed now: he said all of them had got some arms; some had got a sabre, some had got a pike, and some a pistol: he said I might buy a pistol for four or five shillings; I told him I had no money to buy pistols, I was too poor to do any thing of the kind: he said he would see what could be done; he says about two or three days after this Brunt called on him, but nothing particular passed. Brunt said, he was rather in a hurry. Then he says, on Tuesday, the 22nd of February, Brunt called again, accompanied by Tidd, he told me, in explaining the cause of his absence, that the king's death had made an alteration in their plan necessary: what they were I should know at the meeting that was to be held the night after, at Tyburn-turnpike; that if I saw any people about them, I was to go to them and say b, u, t, and if they were friends they would answer, t, o, n, that he should call on me the following morning and tell me more particulars. The next day, Wednesday, Brunt called again, between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, and asked me whether I was ready to go with him; I told him my work would not be done before six o'clock: he then said, I must go to the person whom he had brought with him the day before, whose name was Tidd, and that he lived in Hole-in-the-wall Passage, Brook's-market. I went there, about half past six o'clock, and found Tidd at home: he said that several men that had promised to come, had not been so good as their word, and that he should not wait longer than seven o'clock. At seven o'clock he went to a corner of the room, and took out of a trunk a large pistol, and put it in a belt he had round his body: he then took about six or eight pikes, about a foot long, which he wrapped in brown paper; and he took a staff about four feet long, with a hole in one end of it. We went through Brook-street into Holborn, from thence up Oxford-street. While I was in the room, I asked him where we were going to: he said to a room in the mews, in John-street, Edgware-road. As we were going along he gave me the pike-staff: I asked him whether we were going to the House of Commons: he said no, there were too many soldiers about there. I then asked him where it was we were going to, and at last he said Grosvenor-square; that there was a cabinet dinner there that evening; he did not say at whose house. We went on to Cato-street, in the Edgware-road; when we got there, underneath the archway leading to it, I saw two men whom Tidd seemed to know; he was a little before, and spoke to them. After stopping with them a few moments in the street, we went into the stable; we went up the steps, where we found, I think, about twenty-four or twenty-five men; but I had not been there above two or three minutes, when some person asked how many there were, and proposed to count them; but Mr. Thistlewood said, there was no occasion, for there were five-and-twenty. There was a tall thin man, with a brown great coat, sitting on one side of a carpenter's bench, with two belts on, and I think a sword by his side, who was speaking of the impropriety of going with so small a number as five-and-twenty men to lord Harrowby's. Upon this Thistlewood, the prisoner, said, the number was quite enough, for he only wanted fourteen men to go into the room, and supposing lord Harrowby had sixteen men servants, still that number was sufficient. The man in the brown coat said, after the business is done, and we come out, most likely there will be a crowd round the door, how are we to make our escape? Upon which Thistlewood said, you know the largest body is already gone, this is the smallest part; upon which Davidson said to this man it was not right in him to throw cold water upon their proceedings; if he was afraid of his life he might go, and they would do without him. Brunt said, sooner than they would give up the business he would go into the house alone and blow them up, if he perished along with them; and he said, for you know, we have got that which can do it, or words to that effect. Then the man in the brown coat said, that though he did not think it right to go himself, still as they were all for it, he would not be against it; and he proposed that all the men in the room should put themselves under the orders of Mr. Thistlewood upon which Mr. Thistlewood said, that every one engaged in that business would have the same honour as himself; and he proposed that the fourteen men who should volunteer to go into the room, should range themselves on the other side of the room, where the firing afterwards came from when the officers came;—about twelve or thirteen did so in the course of a few minutes. Tidd, who was one of the fourteen, was coming out to me to say I might choose my situation, when Mr. Thistlewood put him back, and said, you all know your places. After this Thistlewood was absent for a few moments; when he returned, he said they had received intelligence that the duke of Wellington and lord Sidmouth were arrived at lord Harrowby's." That is all he recollects until the officers came up, and he was taken into custody.

Upon cross-examination he says. "I never spoke to Thistlewood till I saw him at Mr. Ford's, at Lambeth. I attended the meeting at Finsbury-market, but did not take much notice of what passed. I had no particular acquaintance with the prisoner at that time. I never knew Brunt till Thistlewood brought him to my house. I do not know Edwards at all. Three or four men were in the stable below, and the room was pretty full; the man in the brown coat was not Adams; I have seen Adams at Hicks's-hall and here. I have no recollection at all of seeing him before that. I remember seeing Strange in the room; he is rather short, and was standing by the side of me. I can tell nothing about Adams; I did not hear any person make any observation except the man in the brown coat. I was taken into custody in the room. I made no resistance. I had no arms."

Upon re-examination he says, "The room was nearly full when I came; I had been there about a quarter of an hour before the officers came. I knew no one there except Tidd, Brunt, Thistlewood, and Davidson." You recollect Adams said there was great uneasiness at this meeting, on account of Tidd not arriving till a late hour; Monument confirms him by stating that he and Tidd did not leave Tidd's house till seven o'clock. He says, "There was a candle in the room, I cannot say if there was more than one. There was a great quantity of swords and pistols, and two or three blunderbusses upon the carpenter's bench. Strange was apprehended at the same time with me; there were four in the room when the soldiers came in and took us all into custody." Then he is examined further about Edwards, and he says, "I was with Mr. Thistlewood at Whitehall, being hand-cuffed to him. He told me when I was examined before the privy council, I should say Mr. Edwards brought me to the meeting. I asked how I could tell such a falsehood, when he knew I had never seen the man; he laughed and said, that was of no consequence, for if I was asked what sort of a person he was, I was to say he was a man not much taller than I was, of a sallow complexion and dressed in a brown coat." It seems that Thistlewood then gave him a description of Edwards. This Edwards, gentlemen, attended at several of the meetings, but it does not appear that he was the proposer of any of the plans that were agitated. Then, in answer to a very proper question put by one of you, gentlemen, he says, "I have not, since my apprehension, had any conversation whatever with a man of the name of Adams, except speaking a word or two to him, but none concerning this business. We have been separately confined, and I never saw him except when I was taken up as a witness to Hicks's-hall, and when I was brought up here to-day." They were both in custody, and kept separate, I suppose. This man also gives you an account that the scheme was not confined to the dreadful crime of assassination, but was to extend further; the commencement of the conversation with Thistlewood shews it,—“Great events are at hand; the people are every where anxious for a change; I have been promised support by a great many men who have deceived me; but now I have got men who will stand by me.”

This is the testimony of that witness. His brother Thomas, is afterwards called, but I shall not mention his testimony to you at present; but proceed to that of Dwyer, who speaks further to the designs of these persons. Thomas Dwyer, of No. 15, Gee's-court, Oxford-street, says, “before the 23rd of February, I became acquainted with Davidson, I saw him twice; on one of those occasions I became acquainted with Thistlewood; we went together to a public-house, at the end of Molineaux-street, near Cato-street; that was about the 9th, 10th, or 11th of February, either Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday; he said nothing particular to me at that time, he said he was in five or six different revolutions, and that Ireland was in a disturbed state at that time; I am an Irishman, and he said he had a good many of my countrymen. I saw Davidson on the afternoon of the 22nd of February; the next morning a person called on me and I went with him to Fox-court Gray's-inn-lane; he had a bundle wrapped up in paper; at Fox-court we went into the back room: I think he got the key from a woman in the front room, there was an old chair in the room;” he says afterwards, “some balls wrapped up with rope yarn were taken out of a cupboard, Harrison said it was a grenade. Thistlewood, Davidson, and a few more came in subsequently; Davidson had a blunderbuss, a pair of pistols, and a bayonet in his side pocket; one or two more came in afterwards, among whom was Brunt. After Davidson had shewn the pistols, he said that he had given twelve shillings for them, Brunt said that he would go out and buy a pair; Thistlewood said that some of the grenades were to be thrown into the Horse-barracks, and some more of them into lord Harrowby's to set fire to the house and blow it up; Thistlewood asked me how many of my countrymen I could muster for half-past eight that evening, I told him six or seven and twenty, he told me they were to assemble at the Horse and Groom, but I was to be at six o'clock at the Pomfret-castle, at the end of Barratt's-court, leading into Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square; that is a house frequented by Irishmen; I was to take a few of the best of them and go to the Foundling-hospital, knock at the Porter's-lodge, put a pistol to his breast, turn down round the right hand and there were five or six and twenty stand of arms at the next lodge; I was to seize them. At the same time another party were to seize two pieces of cannon that were at the City Volunteers' Riding-school, in Gray's-inn-lane; he said that there were men that would make a breach in Finsbury, he said that there was to be a cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's that day, and that they were to make an attack upon them there; after this I saw a bundle taken out of the cupboard, it was planted on the floor and a pint pot produced, the bundle contained gunpowder, which was measured with a tin measure into several woollen bags: Harrison did this. After that Thistlewood said there was a dozen of pike handles to be taken to Mary-le-bone; the remainder were to go to Finsbury; I was asked to take some but I refused, I had not seen them; I saw the bag of powder that was measured and the grenades were put in it; Harrison directed a person to go to the Horse and Groom in Cato-street with the pike handles; Harrison went away with those things in the bag, the powder in the flannel bags and I think the grenades also. He says, “I got home again about twelve o'clock, I told major James that day, and in consequence of what he said to me I went to the Secretary of State's about one or half past one.”

Upon cross-examination, he says, “I am a bricklayer by trade. Davidson introduced me to Thistlewood first on the 4th of February, I knew none of the party before, they never having known me before or I them, they opened to me their secrets; I do not know what there was in my character to induce them to trust me, except that I had been in that parish for fifteen years. When I was asked how many men I could get, I said it was a hard thing to inveigle a parcel of innocent men, and I did not know that I could get them, but I agreed to bring the men.” He says, “I was rather frightened while I was in the room. I was ordered to go to the Foundling Hospital for some arms, but I did not intend to do so, I wanted to get out of the place; I do not know a man of the name of Hucklestone. I was once in this Court on the trial of a woman who had robbed a man of 7l. but on no other occasion; I was in Ireland at the time of the rebellion, I was then quite a boy.” This is the whole of his evidence; if you think his evidence to be correct, here again Thistlewood announces his further plan about seizing the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane and Finsbury, and the general scheme, and he discovered a great part of those arms, afterwards produced on the table before you. According to the witness's account, he was asked by Harrison to go to this meeting at Fox-court, not knowing what was proposed; when he came there, he agreed to do it, though he had no intention to do so, but he did agree. A witness is called afterwards to impeach his testimony. There are four witnesses to explain to you the designs of these persons, two of them are accomplices, and, in general, none but accomplices, will be intimately acquainted with such dark designs; two others cannot be considered accomplices, but they must be men whom the others supposed to be fit and ready to join in their project, and to whom, therefore, they made a communication, if that communication was made with so little reserve, as it seems to have been done; but still, if you believe the witnesses, the communication was made, and, therefore, they thought they were talking to men who were ready to join them.

A great many other witnesses have been called, to confirm the testimony given by these, but if these witnesses, without further examination of other persons, or any further testimony produced before you, shall be considered as having related the truth, the treason is undoubtedly proved; for their testimony has proved the meetings, consultations, and preparations of arms and ammunition for the avowed purpose of assassinating the king's ministers, and to bring about a change in the government of this country; nothing less than that can be the fair import of any of the discussions deposed to by any one of these four witnesses.

However, by the way of confirmation, they call Eleanor Walker, a servant to Henry Rogers, at No. 4, Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane, who proves that Brunt hired a lodging for Ings, which Adams told you was the case.

Then Mrs. Rogers says Brunt took the room for Ings; he said he hoped he would pay though he knew nothing of him, except seeing him at a public-house. Now, that certainly is not correct, because, according to all the testimony, it is clear he had seen and known Ings, if not before that room was taken for him, yet he saw him afterwards.

Then another more important witness is called, who is an apprentice of Brunt: he says, "I remember a person taking the back room two pair of stairs, in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane; that person was Ings; Brunt and he looked at the room together. When they came out of the room, I heard Brunt say to Ings, it will do, go down, and give them a shilling. After that Ings used to come to the room; he left the key of the room always at Brunt's when he went out: every evening a number of visitors used to come to them, among them constantly were Thistlewood, Tidd, Bradburn, Edwards, Hall, Potter, Strange, Adams, and Davidson, the man of colour; and more used to come whose names I do not know:" he says, "I saw no furniture, they used to take chairs out of Brunt's room to sit on; they used to call Thistlewood sometimes T. and sometimes Arthur: when the door has been open, I have seen long poles like rough branches of trees; about twenty of them were in the room:" he says, "I have heard hammering and sawing. Brunt," he says, "was taken up on Thursday the 24th of February. On the Sunday morning before that, there was a meeting of a larger number than I had seen come before;" all those he before named were there; "after the meeting broke up, Strange remained in my master's room; there was a meeting on the Monday evening, and on Tuesday several persons were in and out in the course of that day. On Wednesday, some came into the workshop,"—that would be the workshop of his master—"they had got some pistols, and were putting new flints into them; there were five or six pistols. One of the men said, there were people overlooking them, and Brunt told them to go into the back room. Strange and a man whom I did not know were putting in the flints,"—that is a circumstance mentioned to you by Adams, their beginning to put these flints in, and retiring into the back room.—"In the course of the afternoon, Thistlewood asked me for a piece of writing-paper, and took it into the back-room, after that my master came out, and ordered me to get six sheets of cartridge paper, and gave me six pence. I went and bought it, and gave it to my master, who took it into the back-room."—Adams tells you there was this conversation, and money was given in order to procure cartridge-paper for writing these bills upon.—He says, "this was between four and five o'clock in the afternoon; my master went away about six; a man went away with him who was a stranger. I handed a table from my mistress's room into the back-room on that day;"—which it seems had never been done before, and why that should be done on that day, except for the purpose of writing, is not disclosed;—"when my mistress was going to tea, we wanted the table; I knocked at the door of the back room to get it; a man of the name of Potter opened it, and gave it to me; by the opening of the door, I could see who were in the room: I saw four or five persons in the room: I saw Tidd after my master was gone: at between seven and eight o'clock Mrs. Brunt called him, and he came into her room; she took him to the cupboard, and shewed him a pike head and a sword, and asked him what she should do with them; he took them out of the room, and, I believe, into the back room. Tidd soon after went away, and left word that, if any body called soon, they were to make haste and follow to the White Hart public-house. Potter and some others came, and went on there. My master came home about nine o'clock the same night, his dress was dirty, and he seemed confused; he said to his wife, it is all up, and that where he had been a great many officers came in, that he had saved his life, and that was all." He says, "Just at this part of his conversation, another man came in, and shook hands with Brunt, and asked him if he knew who had informed; the man said, No: he said he had had a dreadful blow on the side, and was knocked down. Brunt said, there is something more to be done, and he and the man went out together." An observation has been made on that expression, "there is something more to be done yet," as if Brunt knew that this scheme of assassination was not the only thing to be done; you will judge whether that expression has that import. Then he says, "after they were gone, Mrs. Brunt and I went into the back room, where was found one of the poles I had seen before, and in the cupboard were several rolls of brown paper with tar in them, some paper twisted up, and some things as big as my two fists, and strings rolled round them, and an iron pot that Brunt had had for some time before. At eleven o'clock my master again returned home; and said he should want me to get up as early in the morning as I could, to clean his boots; they were very dirty; he called me next morning at half past six, and asked me if I knew the Borough, which I did, but not Snow's-fields; then we went into the back room, where I took two baskets by his direction, and we put the things out of the cupboard into them; he told me they were going to Potter's in Snow's-fields; one of the baskets was tied in a blue apron, which had been put up as a curtain in that room that he called Ings's room:" then he says, "I went into Brunt's room to look for something to tie the other basket in, and two officers came up and took my master into custody; they searched the room and took the baskets. Tidd lived in Hole-in-the-wall Passage, Brook's-market, and Adams next door to him. I have been at the lodgings of both."

On cross-examination, he says "Brunt was a journeyman shoemaker, but not in very poor circumstances, he had one child; Tidd was a shoemaker living near us, he has a wife, and I believe children; I don't know if he is a poor man; Adams is a shoemaker also; Ings had the lodgings nearly five weeks. I believe there were meetings every night during that time, the greatest number I remember was on the Sunday morning: about twenty men were there then. I know some of the people I have named; Strange is a bootmaker's shopman; Edwards, who was there very often, is a modeller, he was there oftener than Adams; Hall is a journeyman tailor, and the whole were of that rank in life; the baskets spoken of were rush baskets, and the materials filled them; there were about twenty branches of trees in a green raw state; I don't know how they came there, there was but one left on the Wednesday morning; there used to be a fire in the room, I do not know if they burnt the poles, but there was one left." This witness, you see, proves beyond all question that this room was taken by Brunt for Ings, and that it was frequented in the evenings and on some mornings by the persons Adams spoke of, and there were hand-grenades, pikes, and fire-arms seen by him.

The next witness is Thomas Smart, who is a watchman in the parish of Saint George, Hanover-square. He says, he was on the watch on the south side of Grosvenor-square, the 22nd of February last, his box nearly facing lord Harrowby's; he went on at eight o'clock; soon after he went on he saw four suspicious-looking men walking about the square, two tall, and two short, one was a black man, or nearly so, "it was after I called half-past eight; I took particular notice of them, they were looking down the areas, and taking notice of the areas." This was intended to confirm what Adams said, that Davidson was on the watch that night. Henry Gillan says, he was at a public-house in Charles-street, Grosvenor-square, at the corner of the Mews, on Tuesday, the 22nd of February; he says, "I saw the short man with a brown coat (Brunt); there was a tall man along with him, they had bread and cheese and porter; we played at dominos. I went away before ten and left them there:" that is another circumstance to confirm what Adams said, that he and Brunt went that evening on the watch, and that they were at this house where they had bread and cheese, and Brunt played at dominos.

Then John Hector Morison is examined, who is a journeyman cutler to Mr. Underwood in Drury-lane, he recollects a sword being brought to him on Christmas Eve by a man dressed like a butcher (he points out Ings to be the man), he had the sword under his smock frock without a scabbard; he desired to have it well ground with a fine point, he said his name was Eames, or Ings, the sword was ground and he took it away in two or three days: a few days after, he brought another for the same purpose, it was a particularly long one; one of the swords afterwards seized, at or near Cato-street, is afterwards identified by him.

Edward Simpson is called, who is corporal-major of the second regiment of life-guards, and knew the prisoner Harrison, who was discharged out of that corps about six years ago. "Harrison knew the King-street barracks, five windows of which looked into Gloucester Mews, but they were stopped up a few days after the affair in Cato-street." That is only to shew that Harrison, the person who was afterwards to proceed to the barracks to throw the fire balls in, might reasonably be selected for that purpose, as having been stationed there.

John Aldous is called. He says he "is a pawnbroker in Berwick-street; he knows the prisoner Davidson from having pledged things at his shop; on the 23rd of February he came there, and took a brass-barrelled blunderbuss out of pawn."

Then my lord Harrowby was called; who tells you that Hiden did come to him in the Park, and did deliver to him a letter directed to lord Castlereagh; that he afterwards appointed to meet him in Hyde-park, and did meet him there. He says, that he himself is one of his majesty's privy council, and is the president of the council; and he did intend to give a cabinet dinner on the 23rd of February. At the cabinet dinners no persons but those who compose what is called the cabinet are invited; the cabinet consisting of the principal officers of state. The invitations were sent out in the latter end of the preceding week. Then he gives you the names of the persons who compose the cabinet, and who were invited upon that occasion; namely, my lord Chancellor; the earl of Liverpool, first lord of the Treasury; Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the Exchequer; the earl of Bathurst, secretary of State for the Colonial Department; lord Castlereagh, secretary of State for the Foreign Department; lord Sidmouth, secretary of State for the Home Department; the earl of Westmoreland, lord Privy Seal; lord Melville, first lord of the Admiralty; the duke of Wellington, master general of the Ordnance; Mr. Canning, first commissioner of the India Board; Mr. Robinson, president of the Board of Trade; Mr. Bathurst, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the Mint; and the earl of Mulgrave; all of whom, he says, are privy councillors, and persons employed in the most important offices in the administration of the executive government. He says, they are in common parlance called his majesty's ministers. He says, "On the Tuesday before the Wednesday of the intended dinner, I was riding in the Park, about two o'clock, preparatory to my attending a council at Carlton palace. I had no servant with me. A person addressed me near Grosvenor-gate, and said he had a letter addressed to lord Castlereagh, which he was desirous to convey to him: it was of considerable importance, and concerned both that noble lord and myself. The letter produced is the letter. The man (who was the last witness), at my desire gave me his address on this card," which his lordship produced. "He met me by appointment on Wednesday morning in the ring amongst the young plantations in Hyde-park. After this was communicated to me, I did not inform my servants that the dinner was not to take place, but I directed that the preparations should go on as if the dinner was to take place, until I wrote a note from the earl of Liverpool's, to my head servant, to say, that the cabinet would not dine there, but that the preparation should be going on as if it was intended they should; the party would have assembled if the dinner had taken place, between seven and half-past seven." He says further, that he had some previous general knowledge, and had some reason to expect, for some time past, that there was some intention of this kind, he does not know, nor has ever seen Edwards, upon whom so much observation has been made.

Then John Baker, the butler, is called; he merely remembers a cabinet dinner being intended to be had at lord Harrowby's house on the 23rd of February last; the cabinet dinners had been suspended for some time. Cards of invitation were issued to the ministers on the 18th or 19th, that is, the Friday or the Saturday; he says preparations were made for dinner on the Wednesday, as usual, and he did not receive the intimation that his majesty's ministers would not dine there that day, until eight or ten minutes after eight o'clock. Then he mentions a circumstance which serves to account for what has been said, that they supposed the company had arrived, for he says the archbishop of York lives near to lord Harrowby, and there were carriages at his grace's door about six or seven o'clock: so that persons who were watching at a distance might suppose that these carriages were stopping at lord Harrowby's; perhaps you may think that may satisfactorily account for what was said at Cato-street, that some of the ministers were come.

Thomas Monument says, that he is the brother of the witness, John Monument, and he confirms his brother as far as his knowledge extends. He says, that Thistlewood called upon his brother; he brought Brunt with him; after they had come into the room they staid five or ten minutes, when they went out together and remained about two or three minutes, and then returned: Thistlewood and Brunt went away again. He says, "on the Tuesday before this affair, Tidd and Brunt called on my brother; my brother said, why Brunt I thought I had lost you, as it is so long since I saw you. Brunt said that the king's death had made a little alteration in their plans; my brother asked what those plans were, and Brunt said they had different objects in view. Brunt then asked my brother to meet him at Tyburn-turnpike on the next evening; my brother agreed; Brunt said to Tidd, suppose we give them an outline of the plan. Tidd made no answer. Brunt then told us to be at Tyburn-turnpike at six o'clock on the Wednesday evening; they gave us the pass-word—b, u, t,—and if any of their party were there they would answer t, o, n. I did not promise to go; they did not press me to go, and I did not go. Brunt called about five for my brother, but we were busy, and my brother could not go at that time. Brunt then told him to call upon Tidd, who lives in the Hole-in-the-wall passage, I did not see my brother after."

This, gentlemen, is the evidence that has been laid before you, as confirmatory of the account given you by the witnesses, Adams, Hiden, Monument, and Dwyer: many of the facts sworn by Adams are sworn to by others; the communications made as to the treasonable purpose are such as no person not engaged in it could be likely to be acquainted with.

Then they proceed to call some persons who prove Harrison was seen at this building at Cato-street, that he said he had taken it, and was going to clear it out and obtained some candles; and then they call the several police officers and an officer in the army, lieutenant Fitzclarence, to give an account of the arrest and apprehension of several of the persons there assembled, and the seizures there made of arms and other things.

It does not appear, to me, necessary to go through, in detail, the testimony of these witnesses, because it is not material for you to consider by what particular individual a pistol was presented: it is important to observe that when the officers came to this place to apprehend the persons, many of them made a most desperate resistance; that is a circumstance deserving your consideration; but a minute detail of what this or that individual did, does not appear necessary to be given to you now, though it was necessary it should be laid before you in the first instance, by the examination of the witnesses. You find them in a stable: a man was seen on the spot, from whom a sword was taken, and a butcher's knife; that knife is the knife supposed to have been taken by Ings; it answers the description given of that knife. Wright was not able to secure Ings, and cannot say he was the person. It is further proved, however, that when Ings was apprehended, he was found to have a haversack slung to each shoulder, a belt buckled round him, and some cartridges, and a knife case. The circumstance of his having these two bags, is observed upon by the counsel for the prisoner, and it is suggested they are more fit for plunder than for such an abominable purpose as Adams described: it is not very material what purpose they were taken for, because he might not choose to say then that he meant to take the plate, and might say he took the bags for another purpose; but the fact of his having the bags is worthy of your attention as confirming Adams.

You next have the account, by Taunton, of the apprehension of Brunt at his lodgings, and of the contents of the two baskets that were found, and it is important for you to attend to that. Taunton says, "I found Brunt in a front room up two pair of stairs, I searched the room and found nothing material: in the back room I found two baskets, one tied up in an apron. Brunt was then in the front room; I asked him as to the baskets, and he said he knew nothing about them." He chooses, therefore, to give an untrue account in that respect, for it is clear, by the testimony of the apprentice, that he did know about them, "he said the room did not belong to him: there was a pike staff in the room, and an iron pot with marks of tar at the bottom of it. When I found he denied the apartments I sent for the landlady, Mrs. Rogers, and asked her who those apartments belonged to? She said, that her niece, Eleanor Walker, had let them to a man she did not know, in the presence of Brunt. I asked Brunt who this man was; he said he had met him in a public house, what his name was he did not know. From this place I went to Tidd's in Hole-in-the-wall passage, near Gray's-inn-lane, where I found a very large box full of ball cartridges, 965, and a great quantity of gunpowder, and in a haversack there were 434 balls, 171 ball cartridges, and 69 ball cartridges without powder, with a ball in each cartridge, about three pounds of gunpowder in a paper, a coarse canvas bag with ten hand-grenades, and eleven flannel bags of powder, one pound each, ten flannel bags empty, a small bag with a powder flask and sixty-eight balls, four flints and twenty-seven pike handles." These are the things found at Tidd's, which Adams tells you was the depot. Then the baskets found at Brunt's, Taunton says, contained nine papers with rope yarn and tar, and some steel filings, four grenades, three papers with rope yarn and tar, two flannel bags of powder, one pound each, one paper with some powder in it, one leather bag with sixty-three balls in it.

On cross-examination, he says "I found all these things on the 24th of February: Brunt was present when I found them. I went to Tidd's about half-past eight o'clock in the morning." Then another officer is called, and the several things found in Cato-street, and upon the persons who were apprehended there, are produced before you. You saw them, a considerable number of large hand-grenades, several pike-heads, carbines, muskets, pistols, blunderbusses, sticks, and many other things which I need not enumerate.

Then Morison is called, who says "this is the first sword I sharpened for Ings, I know it by a mark on the blade."

Then Edward Hanson, a Serjeant in the Royal Artillery, was called, who took to pieces one of those things, which they call hand-grenades, and explained to you its nature and effect, and described it, as it undoubtedly is, as a very destructive instrument. This one had twelve pieces of iron in different parts of it, it was intended this should burst, and its contents fly about in all directions, to the great annoyance and probable destruction of the persons near.

This closed the evidence on the part of the Crown.

On the part of the prisoner, they called Mary Barker, a daughter of Tidd, to whom no questions were put in cross-examination, from a very commendable delicacy, as it appeared to me, on account of her near relationship to one of the prisoners; but you will judge whether her testimony does not confirm that of the witnesses for the Crown. She says, on the 24th of February, the police officers came to her father's, and found a box and other things; it was about half-past eight in the morning; they took away some pike-staves; they had been brought that morning; but she does not know by whom; whether she was present to see them or not, she does not recollect.—"I know Adams, I had seen him at my father's before; I know Edwards, I had seen him there often. The things were brought that morning. I had seen similar things there before that time; I should have judged them to be the same. Edwards had taken a part of them away; I do not know who took the rest: Edwards took part away on Wednesday; my father took none away. Edwards did not take any box: the box was brought a day or two before my father was taken." There was a box which you will recollect Taunton proved he found there, containing this great quantity of cartridges, powder, and things of that kind: she says, "I do not know who brought the box." According, therefore, to the testimony of this young woman, this box had been at that house some days before the night when they were apprehended, and things similar to those lying before her, she had seen at a former time at that house; that certainly seems rather to confirm than contradict the testimony of the witnesses for the Crown.

Then, by way of beating down the credit of the witness Dwyer, they call a person named Edward Huckleston; he says he has known Dwyer for some years intimately, and he says, "I do not think he is fit to be believed on his oath." Upon his cross-examination, he says, "I have seen him have money, and, knowing that he was but a bricklayer, and had little or no work, I was surprised. I was in distress; he told me he would put me in the way to make plenty of money if I would go with him. I agreed; and he proposed that we should charge some gentleman with an unnatural offence; that he was to go up first, and then that I was to join him. I left him, quite shocked at the idea. This was about three months ago. He said he had got 70*l*. at a time from one gentleman in St. James's-street, by only catching him by the collar, and accusing him. I met him next night at the Rodney's-head, and he called me a coward. I told him of the danger, and reminded him that his brother had been transported for the same thing. He said his brother did not know so well how to manage as he did:" he says, "from that time I have avoided him. I am a shoemaker, but am now articulated to a cow-doctor, in Newman-mews. I first communicated this to my brother about a week ago. I did not mention it before, lest I might be ill-treated, as I had to go so much about among the cow-keepers. Some of the Irishmen have gone away now, and that induced me to summon up courage to mention it to my brother. When Dwyer made this proposal to me, it was two or three months ago; I did go part of the way with him, but when he told me, I was horror-struck, and got back as soon as I could."

Then Dwyer is called up again, who says that all Huckleston has said is untrue: he says,—"I have seen the man, but did not know his name was Huckleston. I have met him in Oxford-road, not in a public-house. I never proposed to him to charge any person with an unnatural offence. In February last, I worked in the parish mill, at Mary-le-bone, and got three shillings a day: I worked there twice in different weeks; I have a wife and children."

On his cross-examination, he says, he did not recognize the last witness on his coming into Court, and say, "Oh, Huckleston;" and it seems that that was a mistake on the part of the learned counsel who examined him; he says, "I did not know his name at all. I have seen him very often; he resorted to the end of James-street, and I lived in Gee's-court. I never went to a public-house with him. I resorted to the Rodney's-head; if I have seen him at the Rodney's-head, it must be some time ago. I have not repeatedly met him in a public-house. I don't know that I can swear I never saw him at a public-house. I will swear I have not been with him at the Rodney's-head within these three months. I am a bricklayer by trade. I have worked for a Mr. Smith who lives at No. 22, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square, for thirteen years." You have, therefore, this witness Huckleston called, you see, to represent to you that Dwyer is not a man entitled to your credit; all that is said by him is contradicted: which of them tells the truth it is for you to say. You are not merely to reject the testimony of one person because another comes forward and says something derogatory of him. You are to consider which of the two is the person most entitled to your credit. Dwyer, if he has told us the truth, did make a communication. Huckleston admits, though this abominable scheme was communicated to him, he never went to a magistrate; but then, he says he was apprehensive of being ill-treated, because there were many Irish in the neighbourhood.

On the part of the prisoner, they next called Joseph Doane, who says he is called court reporter; he communicates to six newspapers what passes at the court properly so called, which he picks up from time to time as he can. He is shewn the New Times of the 22nd of February, containing an announcement of this dinner; he says he cannot speak to whether he wrote that at this distance of time, but from the wording of it, he rather thinks he did not prepare the notice of that cabinet dinner, because it contains the word "grand," which he would not have put in, as he knows the cabinet dinners are always the same.

Then they call Andrew Mitchell, the printer of the New Times; he produces the manuscript of that article; he says, it did not come from Mr. Doane. "I received it from Mr. Lavenue, and this was the manuscript that was used upon this occasion."

John Whitaker, who has searched several papers, says that the New Times is the only paper which contained an account of the dinner to be given at lord Harrowby's, and that was in a paper of the 22nd February. How that announcement or advertisement or whatever it may be, found its way into the newspaper, we do not know, and it would be in vain, perhaps, in this, as in many other cases, to endeavour to discover by what accident or means a matter of this nature finds its way into a newspaper. What inference is to be drawn from this testimony you must judge for yourselves. I confess it does not, in my mind, lead to any satisfactory conclusion one way or the other. The dinner undoubtedly was intended; that is stated by lord Harrowby and his servant; whether any body had heard of that dinner, and so thought fit to add it to other articles of the same description, or how it got into the paper, we do not know.

This is the whole of the evidence that has been laid before you, on the part of the defendant. There are no witnesses called to impeach Adams, Monument, or Hiden. The impeachment of Adams and Monument must rest therefore on the part they acknowledge themselves to have taken in this transaction; and it is for you to judge whether their statement is true. If you are to believe one of these persons, you will consider whether it does not necessarily follow that what the others have told you is substantiated, because Hiden's account, though more cautious, is to the same import and effect as the others. You have had exhibited here before you upon the table, and proved to have been found, a quantity of arms, and other things to the extent that has been mentioned. It seems almost to be conceded, upon the evidence that has been laid before you, that the conspiracy to assassinate the king's ministers at that dinner was so substantiated by proof, that it could not be expected you should withhold your credit from it. If you are to believe that there was that wicked scheme and project intended, you will further consider whether it is reasonable to suppose that that was all that was intended; you will consider what the probability is. These persons are many of them unconnected, in most respects, with each other, certainly unconnected with the persons who conduct the affairs of his majesty's government; therefore you will consider whether it is not more natural to suppose that those who meditated this assassination, meditated it as part of a plan of a general simultaneous insurrection, which they hoped would result from it, than to suppose that they meditated this and this alone—whether it was intended to gratify their thirst for human blood, or whether it was a part of an ulterior plan. Upon that question it is fit you should attend to the great quantity, as well as to the nature of the weapons, and instruments of destruction which have been produced before you, which certainly are more in number than could be required or used for the purpose merely of that abominable visit and attempt that was to be made in the house of lord Harrowby. The hand-grenades are of a description to be used there: the fire balls do not seem at all applicable. When you find all these materials collected together in the custody of some of these persons, some at one place, and some at another, you will take the whole into your serious consideration. If, upon the whole of this evidence, you shall feel satisfied that a conspiracy to levy war against his majesty, or to depose him, is made out by the evidence laid before you—if your consciences are satisfied of that, you will discharge the painful duty imposed upon you by pronouncing the prisoner guilty. If, upon a due examination of all the circumstances, attending to the observations of the very eloquent counsel who have addressed you on the part of the prisoners, your minds shall not be satisfied that they did entertain this criminal project which has been mentioned to you, you then will discharge a more pleasant duty, and acquit the prisoner. You will consider the case, and, I have no doubt, your verdict will do justice between the public and the prisoner.

Foreman of the Jury.—My lord, can we have a copy of the indictment?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Certainly. [It was handed to the Jury].

The Jury withdrew at a quarter before five, and in five minutes returned into court to request a copy of the act of parliament of the 36th Geo. 3rd.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Gentlemen, the act of parliament shall be put into your hands as you desire, but before I do so it is fit I should mention to you, that by its terms it is made to continue during the natural life of our late most gracious sovereign, and until the end of the next session of parliament after a demise of the Crown; it had not, therefore, expired before the present indictment, but by a later act* it is made perpetual. I need not give you that, because this had not expired.

A Jurymen.—If your lordship will read it, it will be sufficient.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Certainly. The act begins by reciting—“We, your majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons of Great Britain, in this present parliament assembled, duly considering the daring outrages offered to your majesty's most sacred person, in your passage to and from your parliament at the opening of this present session; and also the continued attempts of evil and wicked disposed persons to disturb the tranquillity of this your majesty's kingdom, particularly by the multitude of seditious pamphlets and speeches daily printed, published, and dispersed, with unremitted industry, and with a transcendent boldness, in contempt of your majesty's royal person and dignity, and tending to the overthrow of the laws, government, and happy constitution of these realms, have judged that it is become necessary to provide a further remedy against all such treasonable and seditious practices and attempts. We, therefore, calling to mind the good and wholesome provisions which have at different times been made, by the wisdom of parliament, for the averting such dangers, and more especially for the security and preservation of the persons of the sovereigns of these realms, do most humbly beseech your majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that if any person or persons whatsoever, after the day of the passing of this act, during the natural life of our most gracious sovereign lord the king (whom Almighty God preserve and bless with a long and prosperous reign) and until the end of the next session of parliament, after a demise of the Crown, shall, within the realm or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim, or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of the same, our sovereign lord the king, his heirs and successors—" Now, gentlemen, comes the part which forms the subject of one of the counts of the indictment: "—or to depose him or them from the style, honour, or kingly name of the imperial Crown of this realm, or of any other of his majesty's dominions or countries, or to levy war against his majesty, his heirs or successors, within this realm, in order, by force or constraint, to compel him or them to change his or their measures or counsels," which is another, "or in order to put any force or constraint upon, or to intimidate or overawe both houses, or either house of parliament, or to remove or stir any foreigner or stranger, with force, to invade this realm, or any other of his majesty's dominions or countries, under the obedience of his majesty, his heirs and successors; and such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices or intentions, or any of them shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by any overt act or deed, being legally convicted thereof, upon the oaths of two lawful and credible witnesses upon trial, or otherwise convicted or attainted by due course of law; then every such person and persons, so as aforesaid offending, shall be deemed declared and adjudged to be a traitor, and traitors, and shall suffer pains of death, and also loss and forfeit, as in cases of high treason."

* Stat. 57 Geo. 3rd c. 6.

If you require any further explanation I will give it to you; but it seemed, I thought, to be taken for granted by the counsel on one side and the other, that the project, if proved, was a treasonable conspiracy to depose the king, or to levy war against the king. If they had succeeded so far as to establish a provisional government, the royal functions would have ceased. Any attempt by numbers, and by force, to compel his majesty to alter his measures and counsels, is most undoubtedly a levying of war within this act. An actual rising or insurrection for the redress of any supposed public grievance was always considered as an actual levying of war, under the old statute of Edward the 3rd.

The Jury again retired, and in a quarter of an hour returned into court, finding the prisoner GUILTY on the third and fourth counts.

Clerk of Arraignment.—Shall I call the prisoner for judgment, my lord?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—No, not now.

Mr. Attorney General.—It will be necessary that the jury should be summoned for Friday morning, as I fear there may have been some misunderstanding.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Send notice to the jury to attend again on Friday morning: the officer shall go round as far as he can.

Foreman of the Jury.—Will your lordship have the goodness to discharge us from attending the ensuing trials?

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—On consulting with the other judges, we are of opinion, you may be excused from serving on the next trial; we cannot say your attendance shall be excused on future trials.

A Jurymen (Mr. Goodchild).—We have had a very arduous duty to perform, and we shall hardly have time to recover ourselves.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—We hope something more will be done for you; but you will not be wanted before next Monday, at all events: further than that I cannot say.

Mr. Goodchild.—We do not press it further than that, my lord.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—Let it be announced that these trials will be resumed on Friday morning.*

* See the following Cases,

703. The whole Proceedings on the Trial of JAMES INGS, for High Treason, before the Court holden under a Special Commission, for the Trial of certain Offences therein mentioned, on the 21st and 22nd days of April: 1 GEO. IV. A. D. 1820.*

SESSIONS HOUSE, OLD BAILEY,

FRIDAY, APRIL 21st, 1820.

Present

The Right Hon. Lord Chief Justice Dallas.

The Right Hon. Lord Chief Baron [Richards].

The Hon. Mr. Justice Richardson.

The Common Sergeant.

And others his Majesty's Justices, &c.

JAMES INGS was set to the bar; and John Thomas Brunt, Richard Tidd, William Davidson, James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper, were placed at the bar behind.

The Jury panel was called over, commencing with No. 108.

Charles Farmer, hardwareman, sworn.

Christopher Denton, ship-builder, challenged by the prisoner.

William James Farmer, baker, challenged by the prisoner.

David Newman, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

George Smith, japanner, sworn.

George Thorp, clockcase-maker, challenged by the Crown.

Henry Seaborn, cooper, excused on account of illness.

Francis Sherborn, esq. and farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

Edward Simpson, shipwright, challenged by the prisoner.

William Davies, shopkeeper challenged by the Crown.

Richard Franks, esq. and silk-mercer, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Langley, ship-chandler, challenged by the Crown.

George Priest, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Wilson, gentleman and merchant, challenged by the prisoner.

William Moore, bricklayer, sworn.

Michael Atkins, esq. challenged by the Crown.

James Ede, farmer, sworn.

Alfred Bason, esq. and porter-dealer, challenged by the Crown.

George Taylor, bricklayer, challenged by the prisoner.

John Woodward, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

* See the preceding and following Cases.

Edward Chenill, jeweller, challenged by the prisoner.

John Magne, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

David Pain, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Richard Tucker, cheesemonger, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Beachamp, farmer, sworn.

Robert Ceeley, rigger, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Fagg, esq. and coachmaster, challenged by the Crown.

Matthew Belcher, vintner, challenged by the Crown.

Benjamin Watson, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

George Burrows, silversmith, fined for non-attendance, fine afterwards remitted on his appearance, and swearing he had been prevented being in time by indisposition.

Edward Ellis, gentleman and stock-broker, challenged by the prisoner.

Benjamin Blyth, organ-builder, sworn.

William Clave, feather-dresser, challenged by the prisoner.

John Jackson, glass-cutter, challenged by the prisoner.

John Beck, gentleman and seedman, sworn.

Edwin Booth, esq. and distiller, challenged by the prisoner.

Charles Benham, market-gardener, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Robins, silversmith, challenged by the Crown.

John Ray, gentleman, excused on account of the indisposition of a child in a dangerous state.

Francis Dorvill, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

William Percy, plasterer, sworn.

John George Hobden, face-cutter, challenged by the prisoner.

Archibald Ritchey, stone-mason, challenged by the Crown.

John King, gentleman, challenged by the Crown.

Charles Allen Fremott, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Benjamin Rogers, farmer, sworn.

Richard Laycock, esq. and cow-keeper, fined for non-attendance.

George Fox, sawyer, challenged by the Crown.

William Acock, plumber, challenged by the Crown.

Edward Guel, carpenter, challenged by the Crown.

George Golding, surveyor, challenged by the prisoner.

Robert Roberts, oilman, challenged by the Crown.

William Bousd, founder, challenged by the Crown.

Charles Page, esq. and merchant, challenged by the prisoner.

William Cole, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

John Lewis, watchmaker, challenged by the Crown.

Edward Flower, esq. schoolmaster, challenged by the prisoner.

John Bala, gentleman and tallow-chandler, challenged by the Crown.

John Young, gentleman and scalemaker, sworn.

Stafford Price, gentleman, and currier, challenged by the prisoner.

James Cary, joiner, sworn.

William Edgcombe, joiner, sworn.

THE JURY.

Charles Farmer,
George Smith,
William Moore,
James Ede,
Thomas Beachamp,
Benjamin Blyth,

John Beck,
William Percy,
Benjamin Rogers,
John Young,
James Cary,
William Edgcomb.

The Jury were charged with the prisoner in the usual form.

THE Indictment was opened by Mr. Bolland.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Gentlemen of the jury;—It is my duty to state this case on the part of the prosecution, and I am sure, knowing whom I now have the honour of addressing, that it is unnecessary for me to request your serious and patient attention to the particulars which I am about to detail; you must feel that you owe it to yourselves; you must feel that you owe it to the public justice of the country; you must feel in a particular manner that you owe it to the prisoner himself who now stands before you for his deliverance.

Gentlemen, there is a circumstance to which in justice to the prisoner, it is my duty to advert. I should not have alluded to it if it must not of necessity have already come to your knowledge—I mean the conviction that has already taken place. I entreat and conjure you that you will not suffer that conviction at all to operate upon your minds, to the prejudice of the prisoner who now stands before you. You are to decide upon this case according to the impression which the evidence shall make upon your own minds; and you are not to be influenced by an impression which evidence that has already been heard may have made upon the minds of other men. You are to come to the consideration of this question totally divested of all previous prejudices and impressions, and you are to decide this case impartially, according to the evidence as it shall be given upon oath before you against the prisoner at the bar.

With respect to the law, as applicable to this subject, it will not be necessary for me to trouble you with a single observation. No doubt can be entertained upon it. No question has hitherto been raised in the course of these inquiries with respect to the law. The charge against the prisoner at the bar, divested of every thing that is technical, is shortly and simply this; that he has conspired with other men, whose names will be mentioned in the course of these proceedings, to overturn by force and violence the laws and constitution of the country. This, though stated in technical language upon the record, is the substance of the charge against the prisoner at the bar. The object at which the parties aimed was to be effected by means of an extensive plan of assassination; it was to be effected also by other means to which I shall presently have occasion to direct your attention.

In this stage of the prosecution, all that I have to do is, in a plain and simple manner, carefully abstaining from all exaggeration, to state to you the facts that will be detailed in evidence in support of this charge. I shall state them as I now know they will be proved, without distorting a single fact or circumstance to the prejudice of the prisoner at the bar. We are all interested in the fair and impartial administration of justice; no motives arising out of any particular circumstances can possibly operate upon the mind of a person standing in the situation in which I am now placed to lead him to forget his duty. The fair, impartial, and upright administration of justice is that upon which we justly pride ourselves; it is the best gift we enjoy under the laws and constitution of our country.

The prisoner at the bar, with a person of the name of Thistlewood, a person of the name of Davidson, another of the name of Brunt, a person of the name of Wilson, and several others who will be mentioned in the course of this inquiry, held, in the early part of the year, secret meetings and consultations at a place known by the name or sign of the White Hart, in Brook's-market. Those consultations were held in a back room in a yard belonging to that public-house. I shall not trouble you by stating what took place at those meetings, because, after they had been held in that place for a short period of time, for some reason to which it is unnecessary that I should direct your attention, they left that place, and held their meetings in another situation to which I am now about to advert.

One of the prisoners, a man of the name of Brunt, who is a shoemaker by trade, lived in a place called Fox-court, in Gray's-inn-lane; he occupied two apartments in the front of the house; there was in the back of the house, upon the same floor, another unfurnished room, and that room was hired for the purpose of continuing those meetings which had been formerly held at the White Hart. The prisoner at the bar and Brunt, in conjunction, hired the apartment. This took place about the middle of the month of January, and from that period to Wednesday the 23rd of February, to which your attention will often be called in the course of this inquiry, those meetings were held always once, and frequently twice a day, by the persons whom I have mentioned, all of them, except Thistlewood, being in humble situations of life, journeymen mechanics—Thistlewood himself was in a more elevated situation, having formerly, I believe, held a commission in his majesty's service. The object of those meetings was, to form a plan for overturning the government of the country; and the plan which was formed, which will be proved to you in the most distinct manner by the evidence I shall lay before you, was of this nature. In the first place it was proposed, that when an opportunity offered, all his majesty's ministers, being assembled at a cabinet dinner, which is usually held about once a week during the meeting of parliament, should be assassinated. It was proposed that arms should be provided for that purpose, which I will by and by describe. About thirty or forty persons were considered as sufficient for the accomplishment of this object, and it was arranged that on knocking at the door, under pretence of delivering a letter, a party armed with swords, pistols, and hand-grenades, should rush into the room where those persons were assembled at dinner, and that they should be all destroyed. Another party was to watch the stair-case, to prevent any assistance from the servants; a third, the area, and other persons were to take care that no interruption should occur to the execution of this project from persons without. This was a part of the general plan. It was thought the blow would create such an impression, in striking off all the first authorities in the country, that it would afford an opportunity for carrying into complete effect the other projects of the conspirators. One of these projects was, to set fire to various parts of the town, and a party to be headed by a person of the name of Palin (who was one of the association) was to execute that project. Another project was, to take possession of some pieces of cannon stationed in the Artillery-ground. The party to carry into effect that part of the plan was to be headed by a person of the name of Cook. A fourth party was to take possession of two pieces of artillery stationed in Gray's-inn-lane,

It is necessary for me to inform you that all the persons whose assistance was to be collected on this occasion were not to be let into the whole history and contrivance of this plot. The secret was confined to those who were in the habit of assembling in Fox-court; but they had associates without, who understood that a plan was going on; that something was in preparation to which they were to lend their assistance, when it was ripe for execution, and that when ripe for execution, the particulars were to be communicated to them.

For the purpose of carrying this into execution, arms of various description were procured. It is unnecessary for me to particularize the whole of them, but I shall direct your attention to one or two descriptions of weapons. Independently of swords and pistols and a great number of pikes, there were, collected, for this purpose, a number of hand-grenades. These were collected chiefly by the prisoner Davidson: they were formed, each of them, of a tin box filled with about a quarter of a pound of gunpowder; a fuse communicated with the interior; large pieces of iron were placed round the box, and the whole was secured with cord, and afterwards dipped into pitch and tar, and cemented strongly together. Those grenades were intended, in the first instance, to be thrown into the house where the ministers were assembled at dinner: and they were also to be made use of for the purpose of aiding in the further projects which the parties had in view. Another description of instrument, prepared for the occasion, were fire-balls, which were called by them illumination-balls, to be made use of by the party, under the direction of Palin, in setting fire to different buildings in the metropolis. These preparations went on for a considerable period of time. As the instruments of destruction which I have thus described were successively prepared, they were brought to the place in Fox-court for inspection, and they were afterwards transferred from that place to what was called the dépôt, the lodgings of one of the conspirators, a man of the name of Tidd, who lived in a place called Hole-in-the-wall-passage, near Brook's-market.

VOL. XXXIII.

The plan which had been thus formed, before it was completely matured and ready for execution, was suspended by the death of the king. In consequence of that event the cabinet dinners were discontinued, and it became therefore impossible to execute the project at the period when it was originally intended, and you will find these parties were continually expressing their disappointment at the delay. They became at last so impatient, that, on Saturday the 19th of February, they determined to consider whether some other plan, if not so effectual, at least to a degree effectual for the accomplishment of the purpose they had in view, might not be substituted for it; and accordingly they determined, that on the following day, Sunday, in the forenoon, a committee should be appointed for the purpose of considering what measures should be taken, it was then considered that there was no immediate prospect of all the ministers meeting together, so as to enable them to attempt the enterprise which had been contemplated. On the Sunday, they accordingly met together, and formed themselves into a committee; and Thistlewood, who undoubtedly was the leader and framer of the whole plan, proposed that as it was probable they might be able to collect about forty men for the purpose of executing what was denominated the west-end-job, forty determined persons calculated for an enterprise of that kind should divide themselves into four parties, for the purpose of putting to death, at the same time, four of those who were considered the leading members of the cabinet. This plan was agitated, proposed, considered, and at last resolved upon. It was determined that all the rest of the project should be carried into effect, as it had been originally intended; but that instead of striking the blow at all his majesty's ministers, as circumstances did not permit that to be carried into effect, they would confine themselves with the means they possessed to the taking off four of the leading members of the cabinet, whose names will be mentioned to you in the course of the evidence. The prisoner at the bar expressed a hope that he should be of the party destined to put to death my lord Castlereagh, and he exclaimed, "It will not be necessary to draw lots for the purpose of knowing who shall be the individual to put him to death, for I am ready to do that with my own hand." After this resolution was adopted, the parties separated, and it was understood, that if on the following Wednesday (which was the day on which the cabinet dinners were usually given) there should be no opportunity of striking the great blow, then the plan should be carried into effect in the manner I have now stated. They met again on the Monday, and also on the Tuesday morning.

In the mean time the king's funeral had taken place, and as a proper interval had elapsed, it was considered that those dinners might again be renewed; and in the latter end of the preceding week, either on the Friday or on the Saturday, cards of invitation had been issued by the desire of lord Harrowby, requesting the attendance of the cabinet ministers at a dinner to be given at his house, on Wednesday the 23rd. You are aware that these dinners are usually announced in the public papers, and particularly in the papers which are supposed to be in the interest of Government. The court reporter sent the account of the invitation to the New Times, and it appeared in that paper on the morning of Tuesday the 22nd instant. These conspirators were assembled on that morning, at their place of rendezvous, in Fox-court. It was mentioned that a dinner was to be held on the following day, and that it was advertised in the newspapers. A newspaper was sent for, the paragraph was read, and the utmost exultation was expressed (in terms so gross that I do not choose to repeat them) by the prisoner now on his trial. Every thing was immediately in a bustle, and they determined to go round to their different associates, to get them in readiness, to carry into effect the enterprise on the following night.

I should state to you that they did not consider that the room in Fox-court would be a convenient spot, from whence to issue to the execution of their project. They were exposed there to a good deal of observation, and it was at too remote a distance from the spot where the blow was to be struck. In order, therefore, to carry on their design with more facility, they had hired premises in an obscure street, called Cato-street, near the Edgware-road; a street through which there is no passage for carriages. Premises consisting of a small stable, a cart-house, a loft, and two rooms communicating with the loft, were hired for the purpose of carrying the plot into effect, from a person of the name of Firth, by Harrison, one of the parties most active in the conspiracy; and it was determined that on the following evening, about six or seven o'clock, armed in the manner necessary for accomplishing their object, they should assemble at these premises in Cato-street.

When this project was thus nearly ripe for execution, it was conceived that they might, with the less danger, communicate the particulars of it for the purpose of getting additional assistance; and accordingly a communication upon the subject was made by one of the conspirators, Wilson, to a person of the name of Hiden, a milkman, living in the neighbourhood of Manchester-square. Wilson told him that there was a design to overturn the government of the country: he told him that this was to be effected by means of assassinating his majesty's ministers, who were to dine on the following day at lord Harrowby's; and that there were parties who were to take possession of the artillery in Gray's-inn-lane, and in the city, and another party to set fire to the town, in different parts, for the purpose of producing general confusion and disorder; and as the labouring classes of the people were supposed to be disaffected to the government of the country, that it was hoped a general rising would take place, and that a force would be collected sufficient to set at defiance the remaining authorities of government.

When this communication was made to Hiden, he listened to it with astonishment; and when required to join in it, he immediately assented, because he felt that when such a proposition was made to him by persons capable of forming such a plan, if he should refuse his assent to it, his own personal security would be endangered. He promised, therefore, to meet the conspirators, said he would bring such accession of force as was in his power, and after this communication was made, returned to his own home. He then began to reflect seriously upon the nature of this diabolical project; he turned in his mind what course he should pursue, and he immediately sat down and wrote a letter to my lord Castlereagh, communicating the particulars of the plan. With this letter he proceeded to St. James's-square, afraid to knock at the door of my lord Castlereagh, lest he should be observed, but remaining in the neighbourhood for the purpose of seeing his lordship in the street, of delivering to him this letter, and of making the important disclosure. No opportunity of carrying this design into effect occurred, and he then proceeded from St. James's-square to Grosvenor-square, where my lord Harrowby resides, for the purpose of endeavouring to make a communication to that nobleman. Fortunately my lord Harrowby went out to ride unaccompanied by a servant; Hiden stationed himself at Grosvenor-gate, and waited his return. This occurred about two o'clock on the Tuesday. He told his lordship that the letter contained information of a most important nature, and requested his lordship to take care that it should be instantly delivered to lord Castlereagh. Lord Harrowby asked whether he had given his name and address in the letter; he said he had not, but he immediately delivered a card to his lordship; and the moment this communication was made to government, of course every step was taken at the police offices for the purpose of counteracting the design, and securing the conspirators, when they should assemble the next night in Cato-street for the accomplishment of their object.

At about two o'clock on the following day, many of the parties assembled in Fox-court, for the purpose of finally equipping themselves for their enterprise, and, among others, the prisoner at the bar. Thistlewood came in, and seeing them thus engaged, used some words of encouragement, and said, "we must write a proclamation." Brunt, who lived in the front room, sent out his boy for some sheets of cartridge paper; six sheets were produced, and Thistlewood sat down and wrote three copies of a proclamation in these terms:—"Your tyrants are no more:—the friends of liberty are requested to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting"—signed "J. Ings, secretary."—It was intended that these proclamations should be posted up in the neighbourhood of the places where the fires were lighted, that they might be seen by the persons there assembled, and might add to the general alarm; and, gentlemen, what would have been the state of the metropolis at that moment, supposing, at nearly the hour of midnight, it had been circulated through this extensive city, that every one of his majesty's ministers had been cut off by assassins; that the town was set on fire in different places; and, in addition to all this, that artillery was moving from different points towards the city; and that a provisional government consisting of unknown persons, and therefore, perhaps, the more terrific and alarming, was actually installed and substituted in lieu of the legitimate government of the empire;—what would have been the state of agitation, alarm, tumult, and disorder in the metropolis, if such an event had taken place?

After this the prisoner prepared himself for the purpose of proceeding to the place of rendezvous, with pistols in his belt, a sword, two bags or haversacks over his shoulders, and a butcher's knife (for he is by trade a butcher) which he produced to the party, with the handle wound round with wax end, which he had so secured in order that he might have the firmer hold. He was resolved, he said, to take off the heads of two of the ministers who will be mentioned, and to expose them for the purpose of exciting the people to insurrection. Such was the language of the prisoner, miscalculating extremely the feelings of the people of this country, if he supposed they could be excited to insurrection by assassination and murder; for, if any thing were wanting to have deterred them from engaging in such an enterprise, it would be sufficient that it had been commenced by assassination—a crime foreign to the character of Englishmen, and which I hope and trust will ever remain alien to their feelings and habits.

After the prisoner had thus prepared himself, the conspirators by degrees went off for the purpose of assembling themselves in Cato-street. They met there at about six o'clock. When they arrived, their numbers amounted only to about twenty; fewer than they had calculated upon, for it was supposed that from thirty to forty was the number that would have assembled at that meeting. For some little time, there was a suspicion and a jealousy in the meeting, in consequence of the non-appearance of Tidd: they were surprised that he had not come, and became alarmed and agitated. But Brunt, who knew him well, stepped forward at this juncture, and said he would answer for Tidd that he would not forsake the cause. Shortly afterwards, Tidd, accompanied by a person of the name of Monument, whom we shall call as witness, entered the room. Still there were many of the persons present who, looking round, and calculating their force, and at the same time considering the object to which it was to be directed, felt that it was inadequate to the purpose. They betrayed symptoms of uneasiness and doubt. Thistlewood, who saw what was going on, and who was apprehensive lest the scheme should be abandoned, said they were too far advanced to recede; that if it was now given up, it would be another Despard's job; and begged them not to abandon the cause. Their numbers, he said, were abundantly sufficient: "we shall take them by surprise; though they may have many servants, they will be unarmed: we are now five and twenty, fourteen will be sufficient to enter the room, and the rest may guard the entrance." Brunt, who was always eager and zealous in the cause, then stepped forward, and said, "I presume those who betray alarm are not aware of the instruments we have prepared," and he then pointed to a grenade of very large construction, intended to be thrown into the room, and which would at once have effected the destruction of all the persons there assembled. Ings, the prisoner at the bar, also declared that if they did not proceed to the accomplishment of the object, he would either hang himself or cut his throat immediately. After this scene, it was put to the vote whether they should proceed, and they were unanimous in their determination to go on with the enterprise. It was then fixed that fourteen should be selected for the purpose of entering the room, and those who were willing to engage in that part of the design, were desired to pass across the room, and to take a particular position. Immediately the prisoner at the bar and several others, in consequence of this notification, went to the spot assigned.

At this moment an alarm was given below—"look out above there," was shouted. Thistlewood immediately went to the ladder (for there was a communication only by a ladder with the stable below), and, looking down, he saw persons coming up with considerable activity. They were police officers, Ruthven at the head, Ellis second, a man of the name of Smithers third. When Ruthven mounted the ladder, he looked round the room, and saw the persons there assembled armed in the manner I have described, desperate in their appearance, a kind of bench crossing the room covered with arms of various descriptions—some of the parties endeavouring to retreat into a small adjoining room—Thistlewood seizing a sword and following them into this apartment. Ruthven made good his landing; he was followed by Ellis, and by Smithers, a man of great spirit, who immediately sprung forward. Thistlewood drew back his arm, and as Smithers approached him he plunged the sword into his heart. Smithers fell dead upon the spot. There was a cry—"put out the lights," and the lights were put out; and there was a cry—"kill the thieves, throw them down stairs;" upon this there was a general rush to the ladder, Thistlewood descended in the confusion, he discharged a pistol at an officer near the door, escaped, and was not then taken.

The prisoner was first seized in the stable below. The knife I have described was taken from his bosom, but in the confusion, in some way or other, as you will hear from the witnesses, he made his escape. He was pursued into a contiguous street—John-street; finding that he was not likely to escape from his pursuer, he turned round and fired a pistol at him—the ball grazed his neck. The prisoner still continued to run, but was stopped by the watchman. When he was brought back, he was asked his motive for firing, he said—"I know the upshot of it, I wish I had killed you. I know what I have done." He was then secured. Davidson, the black, who will be produced at the bar, was also apprehended in endeavouring to make his escape. He was taken to a public house; and, as a further proof of the object of this meeting, and of the projects which the parties had in view, you will find that he immediately began to swear that the man deserved to be damned who would not die in the cause of liberty. Brunt, one of the most active of the party, effected his escape. He returned to his own lodging about nine o'clock. His apprentice was there, whom we shall call as a witness. He came in jaded and dirty. He said to his wife—"it is all over; we were attacked by a great number of officers. I have saved my life, that is all:"—however, recollecting himself, he went out shortly afterwards with another person, saying, "no, there is something to be done yet," referring, no doubt, to the other parts of the plan; namely, the setting fire to the town, seizing the cannon, and the other particulars which I have already stated. He returned in about two hours, and went to bed, first desiring his apprentice to clean his boots early in the morning; when he arose, he called his apprentice into the adjoining room, took out of a cupboard a number of hand-grenades, a number of bags filled with powder, so constructed as to serve for cartridges for the cannon, and a number of fire-balls. They were put into two baskets, one of them covered up with the apron of Brunt's wife, which had been used as a blind to the window of the room in which the parties had held their meeting. He desired his apprentice immediately to take the two baskets to a place called Snow's-fields, to the house of a person of the name of Potter—Potter being one of the conspirators who had been in the habit of meeting at Fox-court.

Just at this moment, Taunton, the Bow-street officer, ascended the stairs. He searched the room of Brunt, and found nothing; but going into the back room, he discovered the two baskets, prepared in the way I have described. Turning to Brunt, he asked him whose room that was,—he replied he did not know—a man whom he had met accidentally at a public house had taken it. He was asked to give an account of the baskets,—he said he knew nothing of them. Taunton then took him into custody, and proceeded immediately to Tidd's lodgings, which I have described as the dépôt, and there he found a trunk containing 965 rounds of ball-cartridge prepared for service; he found separate parcels of cartridges, amounting to between two and three hundred; he found several hand-grenades, and several cartridges prepared for cannon, and several fire-balls, showing that the project the parties contemplated was not confined to the assassination of his majesty's ministers, but had a more extensive range, and was of the character I have described.

I have now stated to you this case, as I know it will be proved in evidence. I have given you the whole history of the transaction, from its commencement in the middle of January, to its termination on the 23rd of February, when the prisoners were apprehended in Cato-street. You must of course be aware that in a case of this kind—a secret conspiracy carried on in the manner I have described—the minute details can only be proved by some of the conspirators themselves; I therefore must call before you, for that purpose, one or more accomplices. According to the law of England, and according to the law, I believe, of every country in the world, an accomplice, under such circumstances, is a witness competent to be heard in a court of justice: if it were not so, the consequence must be most ruinous to the interests of society; for the great check upon combinations of this nature is, that the parties feel they cannot trust each other; that they are in the power of their associates, and that those very associates may be called to give evidence against them: put an end to this, and let it be laid down as law, or as a practical course to be pursued by juries, that accomplices, when they come forward as witnesses, are not to be considered as entitled to credit; and you offer an encouragement to secret and dark conspiracies of this kind, for you hold out complete indemnity and impunity.

But when I say that an accomplice is to be heard in a court of justice, do not understand me to say that his evidence is not to be watched with the utmost jealousy and caution. You will, in the first place, inquire what has been the previous character of the man, and if you find it to be untainted, this circumstance will add to the reliance you will be disposed to place upon his evidence.

You will in the second place ask yourselves what interest he has in perverting the truth. When an accomplice appears as a witness, in a court of justice, he may possibly be desirous of lessening his own guilt at the expense of those with whom he has associated; but he has no interest in stating that the crime which the parties combined to commit was of a different nature from what it really was: he has no interest in aggravating the character of the offence. Although no express promise has been made, he must know, from the course pursued on these occasions, that if he comes forward and states fairly and honestly all that he knows of the transaction, the vengeance of the law will not fall upon him. But this can be no motive to induce him to falsify the facts, and to represent the case as being of a more atrocious character than it really was; and I ask you, therefore, when I call the person to whom I am alluding before you, in examining his evidence, to put this question to yourselves:—what interest has this individual in misrepresenting the nature and character of the crime?

You will in the third place inquire, whether in the story he is telling, he is exposing himself to be contradicted if he tells that which is false. If he says that there were such and such persons present at the transactions he describes, you will see that he must know that those persons may be called for the purpose of giving evidence against him; you will inquire whether this must not of necessity be a guarantee of his truth, and prevent his stating that which is false; and you will then observe whether those particular witnesses are called on the other side, for the purpose of contradicting him.

You will in the fourth place inquire, whether he is confirmed in the story he is telling; which is the great principle to be applied in the administration of justice on occasions of this sort. When you inquire into the credit due to an accomplice, is he confirmed in those parts of his story, where, from the circumstances of the transaction he can be confirmed—not in collateral and trivial particulars, which have no relation to the essence of the crime—but is he, in the main current of his story, confirmed in those particulars which from the nature of the case admit of confirmation. I beg you, after you shall have all the evidence laid before you, to apply those tests to the evidence of the accomplice, and say, whether or not you think him entitled to credit.

But this case does not depend upon the credit due to an accomplice; it may be necessary for the purpose of proving a particular fact, of making out some of the detail, to call an accomplice; but we have many other witnesses. I have told you of the communication made to Hiden, a man of unimpeached and unimpeachable character; a man who on the communication being made to him, instantly did that which every honest man would do, revealed it to the officers of government, that so foul and desperate a conspiracy might be defeated. But it does not depend even upon this evidence, for there are the facts themselves, which speak emphatically on the case. These parties were assembled: for what purpose were they assembled? for no ordinary purpose; the very arms and preparations negative such an inference. Is any assignable cause given or can be given, for this meeting, except that spoken to by the witnesses? Look at the nature of the arms that are prepared; they were not prepared solely for the purpose of executing this project of assassination, because you will find, that at the dépôt—at a distance from the place where the project of assassination was to be executed, and after all the preparations were complete for the purpose—there was found that quantity of arms and ammunition which I have mentioned; those illumination balls, as they were lightly called by the parties, and the preparations for loading the cannon, which shew to demonstration, that the case, as stated by the accomplices, is in the whole of it correct. It appears to me, that from the evidence as it will come before you, it is impossible to entertain a doubt upon the subject. But it is not for me to determine it, it is for you when you have heard the evidence dispassionately to judge.

It may be said that this was a wild and visionary project; and because it was a wild and visionary project, you will probably be told that no such project was formed. The question is not whether you or any other prudent and sober man, even if his heart would allow him, would have embarked in a design of this nature. It is impossible to examine the history of the plots and conspiracies by which any country in the world has in its turn been agitated, and not to say that, independently of other considerations, there is not one in a hundred in which any prudent man would have embarked. You will find them in general ill-arranged, wild, and extravagant, leaving every thing to hazard, formed with inadequate means, like that which is now the subject of your consideration. But men become enthusiasts in cases of this nature; they are blind to the immediate difficulties; they look to the attainment of the ultimate object, and, in so doing, overlook the impediments in their way. But let me only state one observation to you, and you will cease at once to consider that any argument can be founded upon the visionary nature of this plan, when you come to apply the case to these particular individuals. They had considered—~~surely~~ I know, but they had considered—that the great mass of the labouring part of the country was ripe for insurrection; they considered them as radically disaffected to the government of the country; they thought therefore that if they could strike this sort of stunning blow, they might at once commence an insurrection and revolt that would enable them to take possession of the government of the country. If they were right in the suspicion they had formed, that disaffection had spread so widely, and had assumed such a character, the project ceased to be wild and visionary; and it is upon that opinion, and that opinion alone, that the whole of this plan appears to have been built. But the question is not whether the project was extravagant, but whether the project was formed; and you will look to the evidence that will be laid before you, for the purpose of ascertaining that fact; and however wild, however extravagant it may appear to your sober judgments, if you find it proved by the testimony of witnesses, and by an appeal to facts which cannot be perverted or denied, that such a project was formed, then however wild and visionary it may be in your estimation, it will be your duty to pronounce accordingly.

I have laid this case simply before you. My learned friend who sits near me, and I, have no interest to answer upon this occasion, but to bring this case simply, distinctly, intelligibly before a jury of the country; every one of you is as much interested in the result of this inquiry as we can be: for myself I speak most sincerely, when I say that I am desirous only that justice should be fairly administered upon this occasion. I entreat you, if any reasonable doubt should exist in your minds upon this question, to remember the benevolent principle of the law of England, and give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt; but if after you have considered the whole question,—if after you have heard the whole evidence, it shall carry conviction irresistibly to your minds; however painful it may be, yet I am sure you will discharge your duty, whatever may be the consequence, with firmness and integrity.

EVIDENCE FOR THE CROWN.

*Robert Adams sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.*

You are now a prisoner in custody, I believe?—Yes.

Before you were apprehended, did you reside at Hole-in-the-wall passage?—Yes.

That is near Brook's-market?—Yes.

Were you acquainted with a person of the name of Brunt?—I was.

When did you first become acquainted with him?—The first of my acquaintance with Brunt was at Cambray in France; at that time he passed by the name of Thomas Morton.

I believe some years ago you were a soldier in the Oxford-blues?—I was.

How many years ago?—About eighteen years ago last Christmas.

You were discharged from illness?—Yes.

What has been your trade or employment since?—Chiefly shoemaking.

When you were in France were you pursuing that trade with the English army that was there?—I was.

When did you renew your acquaintance with him in this country?—I cannot pretend to say the month, but some few months after I returned.

Where did Brunt live for the last few months?—He lived in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane.

Do you know a person of the name of Thistlewood?—Extremely well.

When did you first become acquainted with him?—On the 12th of January, a Wednesday, I think.

In this year?—Yes, it was on a Wednesday; I think Sunday was the 9th.

Who introduced you to him?—Brunt and Ings.

The prisoner at the bar, Ings?—Yes.

How long had you known Ings before that?—About five or six days.

Where were you introduced to Thistlewood?

—At his lodgings in Compton-street, Clare-market; Stanhope-street, I mean.

Had you a conversation at that time with Thistlewood, in the presence of Brunt and Ings?—I had.

Tell us what passed upon that occasion?—On Brunt introducing me into the room to Thistlewood he said, "Here, Mr. Thistlewood, is the man that I was speaking to you about." "Oh, is this the man?" says Thistlewood, "you belonged to the Life-guards, did you not?" I said no, that I belonged to the Blues, the proper name of the regiment was the Royal-horse-guards. "I believe," says he, "you are a good soldier, and can use a sword well." I told him I once was a good soldier, and I once could use a sword well; I told him I could use a sword sufficiently to defend myself, if occasion should require it. Upon this he turned the subject respecting the different shopkeepers of London, saying they were all a set of aristocrats, and all working under one system; that he should glory to see the day that their shops were all shut up, and well plundered. He next turned his discourse respecting Mr. Hunt, saying that Hunt was a damned coward, and he was no friend to the people; that he had no doubt in his mind, could he get into Whitehall to overlook the books there, he should find his name upon the government books as a spy for government. Upon this he turned his discourse to Mr. Cobbett, that he had no doubt he was as bad; that with all his writings, he was not a man for the good of the country at all.

Did any thing more pass?—There was nothing more passed at this time, further than that Brunt said, he had two men to call upon in Carnaby-market; he asked Mr. Thistlewood whether he would call upon them for the purpose of seeing those men; this I did not mention before.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Never mind what you mentioned before.

Witness.—Mr. Thistlewood declined it, and upon that we left the room.

With Brunt and Ings?—Yes.

Mr. Attorney General.—I believe you went to prison on the 17th of January, for debt?—Yes.

Had you, previous to this, other interviews with the prisoner and Thistlewood?—I had an interview with him on Sunday the 16th.

Where was that?—At the White-Hart in Brook's-market.

Whereabouts did you meet? In what part of the house or premises?—We first of all met in the tap-room, and proceeded from the tap-room to the room we had taken.

Where was that room?—In the back yard on the ground floor.

Behind the White Hart?—Yes.

Who were present at that meeting?—There were Thistlewood, Ings, Hall, Brunt, Tidd, that was all, besides myself.

On the following day, the 17th, you were taken to prison?—Yes, I was.

How long did you remain there?—I remained there until the day after the death of the late king.

That was the 30th of January, I believe?—When did you next meet the prisoner at the bar, Ings?—I saw him the day after at the White Hart.

That would be the 31st then?—Yes.

Did you go with him to any other place, or meet him at any other place but the White Hart?—I believe I saw him at Brunt's room.

Whereabouts was Brunt's room, of which you are now speaking?—The room that Brunt occupied was a front room on the second floor, and the room taken for the meetings was a back room on the same floor.

Do you recollect who were at Brunt's room on the night of the 31st, when you went there?—I saw Thistlewood.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—About what hour was it?—This was between six and seven o'clock in the evening.

Mr. Attorney General.—Had you ever met in that room before you went to prison?—No, never.

This was the first time you had been in that room?—The first time I had known of its having been taken.

Mention whom you recollect to have been there on the evening of the 31st, when you say you went there between six and seven o'clock?—I will mention as far as my recollection enables me. I saw Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Edwards: I cannot charge my memory with any other at present.

Did any thing particular pass on that evening, in that room, that you recollect?—Nothing particular that I recollect.

When were you next at that room?—I believe it might be about the Wednesday night, to the best of my recollection.

At what time on the Wednesday were you there?—About seven o'clock in the evening.

Who were there on this Wednesday evening that you recollect?—I saw Ings, Hall, Harrison, and Davidson.

Any other persons that you recollect?—Thistlewood, Brunt, and Edwards.

Do you remember any thing passing on that evening?—There was a conversation between them respecting proclaiming of the new king; the indisposition of the new king brought up a conversation, a few words were said upon it.

Did you see any thing in that room that evening?—I did.

What did you see?—I saw some pike staves.

Did any thing pass on the subject of those pike staves?—Mr. Thistlewood made a remark that he wished those pike staves were all feruled, and holes bored at the end of them in order to admit the pikes; that they might be taken to a place of safety, which he called the dépôt, as he did not consider them to be safe there.

Did you know at that time where that dépôt was?—Not at that time.

Did you afterwards know?—I did.

Where was it?—At Tidd's.

At the house of a man of the name of Tidd?—Yes.

Where did Tidd live?—In the Hole-in-the-wall passage, an adjoining house to that where I lived at that time.

Thistlewood remarking that those staves should be removed to the dépôt; did any thing more pass upon the subject of them at that time?—No further than leaving word with Mr. Brunt, that he hoped they would be taken there when they were done, but they were not finished at that time.

What sort of staves were they?—They were green sticks, the substance of my wrist, some larger, some not so large; they were quite green, they were brought from the other side of the water. I did not see them brought, but I heard Ings say that he brought them there; they were fresh cut.

Do you recollect any thing more happening or passing that evening?—Yes; this evening it has come to my recollection: I saw, after the conversation that had passed respecting the new king, Ings himself pull a pistol from his pocket.

On that evening?—Yes, on that evening.

Was any observation made?—Yes, from the discourse; it being said that it was likely he would die, it was remarked by Thistlewood, he said he hoped he would not die in consequence of the duke of York coming to the crown. On this, Mr. Thistlewood said he had rather the new king would live for a little while longer, as it was not their intention that he should ever wear the crown. On this, Ings alluded to the people of the country in general, saying they were all a set of damned cowards; that the day the prince regent, at that time when he was prince, opened the parliament, "I, myself" says he, "went into the park that very day, and took a pistol in my pocket, with the sole intention to shoot the prince regent;" on his making use of that expression, he takes his right hand, pulls the pistol from his pocket, and, to convince them of the sincerity of what he had said, "There," says he, "is the pistol that I took."

Foreman of the Jury.—On what day did this take place was it the 2nd of February?

Mr. Attorney General.—Yes, we are still upon that evening.

Witness.—Regretting with himself that he had not an opportunity to do what he had intended, saying, had he done it, he had not cared a damn for his own life. I cannot bring to my recollection any thing further that passed that night.

How often did you meet at this room?—The appointed time was twice a-day, eleven o'clock in the morning, and seven in the evening.

Was there any furniture in this room?—Nothing but a stove fixed in the room.

Did you learn from the prisoner, or any of those persons whose names you have mentioned, for what purpose the room was taken?—I learnt that the room was taken for the purpose of Mr. Ings, taken for him; but for what purpose the room was taken, I cannot say, for I was not present.

Did you attend many of those meetings between the day you have mentioned and Saturday the 19th?—I did, but not so regularly as I did afterwards.

At those meetings at which you were present, between the 2nd of February and the 19th, did you at all or any of them see the prisoner Ings?—I saw him at every meeting I was at.

Do you recollect any meeting in the interval between the 2nd and the 19th, shortly before, or about the time of the king's funeral?—I cannot speak positively to the date, I can come within a few days.

Do you recollect a meeting before the time of the king's funeral?—Yes.

At that time, whom did you find in the room when you came in?—I found Thistlewood there, and Brunt, Ings, and Hall, Harrison, Davidson, and Bradburn.

Were they all there when you first came in?—They came in, some of them, afterwards.

Who were there when you first came in, according to the best of your recollection?—To the best of my recollection there were Bradburn, and Edwards, and Brunt.

Was Harrison there?—Yes.

Harrison had been in the life-guards?—Yes.

Do you recollect any conversation about what might be done at the time of the king's funeral?—Yes.

By whom?—Harrison. At the time Harrison began this subject, I was close by him; he had been communicating this to Thistlewood.

Tell us what passed after you came in?—Thistlewood began to tell me of the proposition Harrison had been making to them.

What did Thistlewood tell you?—That Harrison should say he had seen one of the life guards, and that the life-guardsmen should tell him, Harrison, that on the night of the funeral of the king, every man in the life-guards in both regiments that could be mounted were to attend the funeral of the king, and the foot-guards as well, all that could be spared, were to attend the funeral, and the police officers as well that could be spared from London. This was the conversation that passed between Harrison and the life-guardsmen; that after he left the life-guardsmen, it struck him that would be a favourable opportunity to collect their men together.

To do what?—For the sole purpose of having a riot in London that night, and to put themselves in possession of the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, two pieces there, the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground. It was thought by this time, when they had got these cannon, they should be able to proceed by means of the people who would turn over to them. They thought it would be best to send a party of men to Hyde-park-corner, in order to stop any orderly of his majesty's service proceeding from London to Windsor, to give information of what was going on in London. At the same time it was proposed, that the telegraph on the other side of the water should be seized, to put a stop to it, in order to prevent that communicating any transaction that was going on in London to Woolwich: at the same time it was thought necessary to dig entrenchments across the ends of the roads that led to different parts of London; to stop the artillery passing to those parts of London.

Was any thing more said about their plan?—It was thought by Thistlewood as well as Harrison; he agreed in his ideas on this head, that in case the soldiers at Windsor got any accounts that there was a disturbance in London, they would be so over-tired on their arrival in London, that they would not be fit for any duty. During this discourse, Brunt and Ings were not present at the time this was talked of.

But they came in?—Yes, at the conclusion of the observation I have just been repeating.

Upon Ings and Brunt coming in, what passed then?—On Ings and Brunt coming into the room, Thistlewood goes to them, and communicates to them the plan that Harrison had proposed, and what he had laid down by way of amendment, what he thought was necessary or might be done.

Did he communicate to them that which you have been stating to the court?—In short.

What did Brunt or Ings say to that?—The observation that Mr. Thistlewood had made to them did not meet with their approbation.

What did they say?—There is nothing short of the assassination or murder of the ministers. I will not be sure which was their expression: but there was nothing short of that should satisfy them.

Had you before this meeting heard either from Brunt or Ings, or any of the others, that there was any intention to assassinate or murder his majesty's ministers?—Yes.

From which?—From Brunt and Ings both.

Do you recollect any thing more passing at that meeting?—I do not recollect any thing particular that night, but I can recollect a circumstance between that and the 19th.

What was that circumstance?—Ings was in the room; his blood was all on the boil to think that he could not get to do that which he wanted to do.

Never mind that, what did he do or say?—He said, we must have the ministers, if possible, before the parliament dissolves.

On Saturday the 19th were you at Brunt's room?—I was.

At what hour of the day?—Between eleven and twelve.

In the forenoon?—Yes.

Were any persons there when you went in?—Yes.

Who were there?—I saw Thistlewood, Wilson, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, and Hall; I do not recollect any body else.

What passed upon your coming into the room?—On my entering into the room they seemed to be in a deep study between themselves; all on a sudden they got up, saying that it was agreed on, that if in case nothing occurred between this and next Wednesday night, that Wednesday night should be agreed on to go to work, for they were all so poor they could not wait any longer.

Was any thing proposed or settled?—Thistlewood at that time proposed there should be a meeting the following morning, at nine o'clock, in order to form a committee.

For what purpose?—The purpose of drawing out a plan to act upon; on this they were going to separate. Thistlewood all on a sudden said, "Oh, Brunt, if you go round to any of your men, give them orders to come armed."

Was Brunt present at this meeting?—Yes.

VOL. XXXIII.

You have not mentioned his name?—Brunt turns himself round, and says, "Damn my eyes! are you afraid of any officers coming into the room, if any officers enter the room now, as time gets so near, I will take damned good care they shall not go out alive."

In pursuance of this proposition did you go there again on the Sunday morning?—Yes, I did.

About what time in the morning?—Just at the turn of eleven.

Tell us whom you found in the room when you went there on Sunday morning?—When I went, there were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Harrison, Davidson, Hall, Bradburn, Wilson, Cook, Tidd, Edwards, and myself.

What passed after you entered the room?—I had not been in the room long before Mr. Thistlewood thought it highly necessary, as there were twelve men in the room, which was enough to form a committee, for some one to take the chair and enter into business; on this he proposed Tidd to take the chair.

Did Tidd take the chair?—Tidd took the chair, with a pike in his hand at the same time.

After that what was proposed or what was said?—After the chair was taken, Thistlewood standing on his left and Brunt on the right of Tidd; Thistlewood proposed that as they had been waiting so long, and were all out of patience, and there was no likelihood of the ministers meeting all together; it was agreed, he said, between themselves, that if nothing occurred between this and next Wednesday night, the ministers should be taken off separately at their own houses; he said, during this, they should not have so favourable an opportunity in destroying so many of them as they intended to have done, but as there was no signs of their coming all together, they must put up with what they could get: he thought within himself that three would be as many as they would be likely to kill.

Three of the ministers?—Yes; he proposed that this should be done on Wednesday night; it was proposed that, on the same evening, the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six at the Artillery-ground, should be taken, and that Cook should be the person intrusted with that command; that Cook should be at the head of that party.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Do you mean that Cook was to be at the head of the party to take the two and the six, or the six only?—The six at the Artillery-ground only.

Mr. Attorney General.—Was any thing said as to what was to be done with this artillery?—After he had got the cannon, it was proposed that these cannon should be loaded on the ground before they were brought out to bring them into the street; after that was done, and if any body interrupted them, these cannon were to be in readiness to fire on those persons that interrupted them directly; but if Cook found himself so situated by people coming over to him, that he would find himself able to make a movement, he was to move from there to the Mansion-house.

What was to be done there?—The Mansion-house was to be beset on both sides; the six cannon they were to take there were to be divided into two divisions, three on each side: Cook was to go to the Mansion-house, make a demand of it; if the Mansion-house was refused, he was to withdraw directly, go to his cannon, and give orders to fire on both sides; on doing this, it was thought they would soon give up the house to them.

What was to be done with the Mansion-house?—The Mansion-house was to be the seat of the provisional government. After they had secured the Mansion-house, it was thought that they might, with the two pieces of cannon that would be brought from Gray's-inn-lane, attack the Bank of England. After they had attacked the Bank of England, it was proposed to plunder it, provided they succeeded, which they made no doubt of: but they did not intend to destroy the books; Thistlewood thought it was necessary to keep the books, as that would be a means of bringing to light some of the proceedings of government, they had not yet got possession of.

Did any thing more pass?—There was something more belonging to this plan, but it was not proposed on this day.

Confine yourself to this day?—Mr. Palin was then proposed by Thistlewood.

Was Palin present?—No, he was not then.

What was said about Palin, at that time, by Thistlewood?—Palin should be the man to set fire to the different buildings that were proposed. As to the time, Thistlewood said they could not come to any particular set time at the moment, but as there would be time between that and the Wednesday night, he thought it better to leave that to a future opportunity.

After Thistlewood had made this proposal, tell us what passed?—After Thistlewood had made this proposal, he said, he had nothing more to say at that time upon it, but that Brunt, or his friend Brunt, had a proposition to make, respecting the assassination of the ministers—how it was to be done; on this Thistlewood declined; and Brunt came forward directly with a view to propose what he had to say, and was beginning to speak; Thistlewood said, "Stop, you had better let the proposals I have made be put from the chair, to see whether every one in the room is agreeable."

Was it put to the vote?—He put it to the men, "If any one likes to speak or say any thing on that which has been dropped, they are at liberty to speak."

Was the proposal put from the chair?—Yes, it was put from the chair, and was assented to by all that were in the room.

Being assented to, did Brunt say any thing?—Brunt came forward, saying, that the proposal he had to make was respecting the assassination of the ministers; he said it should be done in this way, that as many men as they could get together for that job, should be divided into as many parts as they thought they should be able to kill ministers, he supposed three or four.

Was that agreed to?—Brunt had more to say before that was put; he said, after these men were so lotted out for the killing of each of those ministers, that there should be one man from each lot should be drawn, and that man that it fell upon, should be the man that should murder the gentleman or the lord that they had to kill. The man that was appointed to do this, if he made an attempt and there was the least signs of cowardice seen in the man, that man, if he did not do that, was to be run through upon the spot.

Was that proposal agreed to?—This proposal was agreed to.

After that, do you recollect any other persons coming into the room?—Yes.

Who came in after that?—Palin, Potter, and Strange.

Before they came in, and after this proposal had been made by Brunt, do you remember any thing being said by any other person upon this subject? did Ings say any thing?—He did not.

Did Thistlewood communicate to Palin Potter, and Strange, the plan?—They were communicated to them both; Thistlewood his, and Brunt his; and they agreed to them.

Did any thing pass after they had agreed to them?—Mr. Palin had something to say upon it.

What did Palin say?—Palin got up and said "Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak a few words upon what has been dropped by Mr. Thistlewood and Mr. Brunt. I have paid perfect attention to what has been said, and have been one that has assented to it, agreeing as I do within myself to the propositions that have been made, if in case they can be carried, I consider it will be a great acquisition to what we have in view; but this is what I want to know"—"you talk of from forty to fifty men for the west-end job," as it was called by Thistlewood; "you talk of taking the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane—the six pieces of cannon from the Artillery-ground, and for myself to act my part, and all this to be done at one time." This was what he wished to be satisfied upon—how it was to be done.—"You ought to know better than I do what men you have to depend upon. I, for my own part, can give no satisfaction with respect to the men I may bring forward, unless I could be intrusted from the committee that was there sitting to communicate to them in part, if not in full, what their plan was, and what they were going to do, and when they would be wanted." It was thought that Mr. Palin knew what kind of men he had, and it was hoped he would be able to trust them.

Was that said?—Yes.

Who said that?—It was said by Tidd in the chair, and Mr. Thistlewood and Brunt; this conversation passed between them—if Mr. Palin had got such men, as he thought he could depend upon to intrust them with what was in hand, they did not conceive where the harm could be of Mr. Palin having that liberty.

Did any thing more pass at that meeting that you recollect?—No, not at that time; on this the chair was left; just after this, the chair being left, they were walking about the room, and Thistlewood turned round “Well thought of, Brunt, as thy friend Palin is here, you may as well take him to the place, which is just by here,” that was Furnival’s-inn-buildings; “let him look at the place, and pass his opinion upon it, to see whether it is practicable to do what we think of.”

Did Palin and Brunt then go away together?—They did.

How long were they absent?—I do not suppose ten minutes, to the best of my calculation.

Fox-court is near at the back of Furnival’s-inn?—It is not at the back of it, it is at one end of it.

It is behind it?—Yes.

Did they return again?—They did.

Upon their return, did either of them, and which, say any thing?—It was given in to the committee, that Palin thought it a very easy job, and it would make a good fire.

Did they then separate?—No, upon this Brunt renewed the subject of the assassination again; he said he had not an idea upon his mind that there would be any difficulty in regard to fixing upon the men who should be the men that murdered their different lordships. Ings was the man that said, whoever had the lot to murder lord Castlereagh, I am the man that will turn out to murder that thief.

When did you meet again?—On the Monday morning.

This being on the Sunday?—Yes.

About what hour did you go to Brunt’s on the Monday morning?—To the best of my recollection about ten.

Who were in the room when you got there?—I saw Brunt, Harrison, and Thistlewood.

Was Ings there then do you recollect?—Yes, he was.

Were any other persons there that you recollect?—I cannot say that I can charge my memory whether they were then, they were in the course of the morning.

Tell us what passed on your going to the room on that Monday morning?—On going into the room on the Monday morning they seemed to be rather cast down.

Tell us what passed?—The principal that passed in the morning was in consequence of a report which had been heard out of doors, and which I communicated to them.

What was that report which you communicated to them, state it shortly?—It was what Mr. Hobbs had told me the preceding night.

You must not refer to what you were told unless you communicated it?—That there were two officers had been there from Hatton-garden and Bow-street, from which it appeared that there was an information at Bow-street, and likewise at lord Sidmouth’s office, of what was going on.

What did they say to you?—Harrison turns himself round upon me, and says, “You have acted damned wrong.” I said “Why?” Brunt turned round directly, and said, “You have acted wrong, Adams,” I do not know, indeed, whether he mentioned my name, “if you have any thing to communicate, whatever you may hear out of the room, it is your place to speak either to me or to Thistlewood;” I told him I did not conceive I had any right to speak to either him or Thistlewood, I thought it was my duty to mention it to the whole, as it concerned the whole.

After this, did they go from the room for any purpose to separate?—They began to think of separating, to call on their different men, and to call on the Mary-le-bone Union.

Was there to be any meeting again that evening?—Not on that evening.

On the following day, the Tuesday, did you go again to Brunt’s in the morning?—Yes, I did.

About the same hour?—About ten o’clock as nearly as I can guess, they began to meet earlier after the 19th.

Whom did you find there on the Tuesday morning when you got there?—I found Thistlewood in the room, I found Brunt in the room, I found Tidd there.

Was Ings there?—Yes, and Hall; I had not been in the room long before I saw Ings pull out three daggers from out of his pocket; he was asked the intention of those daggers, he takes one in his hand and makes a rush, in that kind of way [describing it], “with a view,” says he, “to run into their bodies,” with an expression which I will not repeat, unless it is necessary; those being handed about they were put into his pocket; just at this juncture of time, just afterwards, in came Edwards, Edwards goes up to Thistlewood to tell him he had seen it in the paper that the ministers were to dine together, on the Wednesday evening, at lord Harrowby’s.

Upon that being communicated, was any thing done?—Thistlewood rather doubted it, having seen a paper in the morning and not having seen that; and he proposed, in order to satisfy every one, that the paper should be sent for.

Was the paper sent for?—It was,

On its being brought back, was it read?—It was read by Thistlewood himself.

Upon that, was any thing said by any of the party?—When the paragraph was read, and appeared to be true, Brunt jumped about the room, and ran backwards and forwards, “Now damn my eyes I believe there is a God; it has often been my prayer that God would call those villains together; now he has answered my prayer.”

What further passed?—Ings was equally as pleased as Brunt.

What did he say?—He said that would give a better opportunity, he should have an opportunity now of cutting lord Castlereagh's head off.

Did Thistlewood propose any thing then?—Thistlewood proposed then that there should be a committee sit in order to enter into another plan of assassination of the ministers altogether.

Was the committee formed?—The committee was formed; I was appointed myself to take the chair first: I took the chair and called to order. Thistlewood was going to proceed in his business, I having something that I wished to say, put a stop to him.

What did you say when you stopped him?—Before they proceeded any further in the business I hoped that every man that heard what fell from my mouth yesterday morning had given it a due consideration.

What passed upon that?—On my saying this they were all like a set of mad devils more than any thing else. Harrison was walking about the room like a madman; he looks at me like a madman, with his arm going all the while.

What did he say?—He said any man that threw cold water upon what they had then in view, he would run that man through directly with a sword.

In consequence of this confusion did you remain in the chair?—In consequence of this confusion, I was considered not fit to keep the chair.

Who was put into the chair?—Tidd.

Was any thing then proposed or said by any other person?—There was a proposition by Mr. Thistlewood respecting a plan that was to be proceeded in by the taking the ministers all together.

In consequence of your leaving the chair, was any thing proposed by any body? did Brunt propose any thing?—Yes.

What did he propose?—As Thistlewood was going to speak, Palin —

Palin was there then?—Yes, he was, he said, "No, as there has something fell from Mr. Adams's mouth yesterday morning, and he has made an allusion to it again this morning, I want to know what it is Adams has alluded to."

Was any thing further said by any body upon this?—Upon this Brunt jumps up directly, "Damn my eyes I will tell you what it is;" upon that he got up and communicated to Palin the same as I had communicated to them.

Did Brunt make any proposition?—He proposed from what had been said, that there should be a watch put upon earl Harrowby's house.

When was that watch to be put?—At six o'clock in the evening to a minute of time.

What were they to watch for.

They were to take particular notice who went into the house, if any body went in that they thought had the appearance of police officers or any soldiers such was to be communicated to the committee.

What was said upon that by any other person?—This was agreed to; but Brunt said further, that if in case there should be nobody found to enter the house, such as was likely to give us any obstruction, the business should be proceeded on; this being done, it was looked out who should go on the watch; they were picked out by Brunt, on a proposition made by him.

Were their plans further talked of?—This plan was dropped regarding Brunt; Thistlewood then came forward to address the committee.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—What do you mean by dropped?

Mr. Attorney General.—Do you mean an end put to the conversation?—Yes.

Was it agreed that there should be a watch or not?—It was determined that there should be a watch set, and then it was dropped.

Then Thistlewood came forward?—Yes.

What did Thistlewood say upon that occasion?—Thistlewood came forwards saying, it was a much more favourable opportunity in the ministers all meeting together than what it would be to take them separately at their houses: "In taking them separately at their houses, we shall stand a chance to have but two or three; in taking them all together at the dinner we may have from fourteen to sixteen of them, which will be a rare haul: I think forty men will be sufficient: I will go with a note to the door, to be presented to lord Harrowby by the servant, telling him I must have an answer." On going in he proposed that he should be followed by men supplied with pistols and different things, pikes, and so on, to see if there were servants about, and to present pistols to their breasts; if the servants offered to make the least resistance, they were to be shot upon the spot; when this was done the men that were appointed to take care of the house were to rush in after Thistlewood, take possession of the stairs leading to the upper part of the house; two men to do that; two men to take the command of the stairs leading to the bottom part of the house; each of these men was to have a hand-grenade in his hand, in order to put a stop to any body making any retreat from the upper part of the house, and as well from the lower part of the house; if any person attempted a retreat, if there was an attempt of the people, such as the servants in the house, to make their escape, a man was to clap fire to this hand-grenade and send it in amongst them, with a view to destroy them all together; two men at the same time were proposed to take the command of the area, one with a blunderbuss, the other with a hand-grenade; if any attempt was made from the lower part of the house, from the area, they were to be served in the same way as the persons in the upper part of the house. In the time of doing this the men that were to enter the room, after the servants were secured, and the stairs secured too, were to be led by Ings, at his own proposal.

What did Ings say?—Ings said he would go to their lordships' door, and particularly mentioned the description of thing he would take, in order for his defence; that he would have a brace of pistols; he would have a knife that he had prepared for the sole purpose, to cut the heads of them off as he came at them; the head of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth, he was determined to bring away in a bag he had got for the purpose, and one hand of lord Castlereagh he was determined to bring away; in a future day that would be thought a great deal of.

Did he say any thing about what he was to say when he entered the room?—He said he should say on entering the room, that he would go in this way, "Well, my lords, I have got as good men here as the Manchester Yeomanry; Enter citizens and do your duty."

Who were to go into the room with him?—He was to be succeeded by the two swordsmen that were appointed for the purpose.

Who were they?—Harrison and myself were appointed.

Was it stated what was to be done after this was accomplished at lord Harrowby's?—They were to make their retreat from the house in the quickest manner they could, with Harrison, going to the horse-barracks, in King-street, with illumination balls, as they called them, and fling them into a straw shed, with a view to setting fire to the barracks.

What was he to do with the fire-balls?—To put them into the window where the straw is kept to set fire to them.

What more was to be done?—The others were to proceed, after they had left the house, to Gray's-inn-lane, with a view to take the two cannon there: on the road to Gray's-inn-lane if they met any body that offered to give them any interruption, it was agreed that they should be shot or run through with a pike that they might have.

You say a party was to go to Gray's-inn-lane: was any thing else proposed to be done than taking the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane?—It was proposed to take the cannon as I have before described.

What cannon?—The two cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the cannon at the Artillery-ground.

Was it proposed or agreed who were to take the cannon at the Artillery-ground?—Cook was the man appointed for that purpose.

Do you remember whether any thing else was proposed?—Ings still repeated that he felt rejoiced that he should have an opportunity of cutting the heads of them off.

Harrison, I think you say, was there?—Yes.

Do you recollect any thing else being stated by the parties present?—Harrison, after this business was done, proposed that there should be a countersign, and those men that had to go round to inform the men that they had to call upon to come forward to-morrow night to their assistance, this countersign was to be communicated to them.

What was the countersign?—The countersign that was proposed was button; it was to be pronounced separately; the man that came up to the man that was to be appointed at the top of Oxford-road, the person approaching was to say b, u, t, the one that was there in waiting to receive him was to pronounce t, o, n; on this being done, he was to be conveyed to the place that was to be appointed afterwards by Harrison.

That being repeated by the man, the person was to be taken to the place that was appointed?—Yes, he was.

Did you go again to Brunt's that day?—I did.

At what time did you go again?—I called in the afternoon.

About what hour?—It might be three o'clock. On going up stairs, I perceived a strange smell; on my entering the room I saw the cause of it.

Who were in the room?—Ings, Hall, and Edwards. Ings was making the fire-balls for the purpose of setting fire to the different buildings. Edwards was making fuses for the hand-grenades.

Was Hall about any thing?—Hall was occupied in laying sheets of paper down in order to prevent the fire-balls sticking to the hand, after they had been dipped into an iron pot.

Did you stay there at that time, or did you go away and come again?—I went away almost immediately.

Did you call at Brunt's again that evening?—I did, between six and seven.

Whom did you find there, when you returned in the evening?—I found Thistlewood in the room. I saw two strange men in the room.

Two men whom you had not seen before?—Yes.

Do you know the name of either of those men?—I can tell the name of one; the other I cannot.

What was the name of that man?—The name of that man was Harris; but I did not know it then.

Whilst you were there, did Tidd come?—Tidd came about half past eight o'clock.

Did you remain there?—Yes, I did.

Upon Tidd's coming, what passed?—On Tidd's coming into the room, he being one that was appointed in the morning by Brunt, and Brunt himself, to go on watch at nine at lord Harrowby's house—

Who had been appointed to go at six?—Davidson was one, the other I cannot tell.

Davidson is the man of colour?—Yes.

At nine Tidd and Brunt were to go?—Yes. On Tidd entering the room, he expressed himself dissatisfied in being disappointed in not meeting a man that had promised to meet him that night. Brunt said after this, "It is time for us to go on the watch, to relieve the men at the proper time." Brunt and Tidd started for the purpose of going to lord Harrowby's: in about five minutes Brunt returned back again, saying that they had called at the house where the man was appointed, and had found the man, and that he was likely to be a man of great consequence to them, and that Tidd could not go and leave him. Ings said, then somebody else could go with him. Brunt looked round the room and said, "Adams, there is nobody can go except yourself." I consented, to go: just as I was going out, in came Edwards: he had been a kind of aide-de-camp to go backwards and forwards, and see that the men were on duty.

Did you go with Brunt?—Yes, I went with Brunt. On Edwards coming into the room, I asked him whether there had been any thing seen, he said, "what I have seen or heard I shall communicate to Thistlewood," then Brunt and myself proceeded to Grosvenor-square.

When you came there, did you see Davidson?—I saw Davidson.

Was there any person with Davidson?—There was another man, but he was not near enough for me to notice him; he went off.

How long did you stay in Grosvenor-square?—After we had relieved Davidson, we stopped a very little while, we went to refresh ourselves.

Where did you go to?—I do not know the name of the house, but it is at the corner of the Mews directly at the back of lord Harrowby's house.

Whilst you were there, did any thing happen?—Nothing occurred there except that Brunt got playing at dominoes after we had refreshed ourselves.

With some person there?—Yes. We stopped there till very near eleven o'clock, with my going out twice by the desire of Brunt, at intervals.

To watch?—Yes.

Brunt remaining during that time in the public-house?—Yes.

How long did you stay in, and in the neighbourhood of Grosvenor-square?—Till the time of twelve.

That was the time to which you were appointed to watch?—Yes.

Then did you return home?—I left the square, and came directly home; the watch was to commence the next morning at four o'clock. Ings and Hall were to begin at four o'clock.

The next day was Wednesday the 23rd?—It was.

At what time did you go to Brunt's on that day?—At about two o'clock.

You did not go there till two o'clock?—I called up there occasionally earlier, but did not stop.

Upon your going at two o'clock in the afternoon did you find Brunt?—I found Brunt in his own room.

Not in the room in which you met, but in his own room?—In his own room.

Were there any persons there when you came in?—There were no persons in the room but himself, his wife followed me in.

Whilst you were in the room with Brunt did any persons come in?—Strange.

Any other persons?—There were two or three whom I had not seen before.

Did you see any thing in Brunt's room?—There were several pistols that I saw lying on the top of the drawers, but the exact number I cannot state.

Was any thing done by Brunt or Strange, or any other persons in that room?—They began to put their flints into the pistols; on Strange coming into the room and those strange men, Brunt directly proposed they should go into the other room.

What did they do to the flints?—They put a bit of leather round them, to secure them.

What did you see on going into the back room?—On going into the back room I saw arms of different descriptions.

What were they?—Cutlasses, pistols, a blunderbuss with a brass-barrel.

Did any persons come into the room while you were there, besides those you have mentioned?—Yes, just after that came Thistlewood, and not long after him Ings and Hall came, and a very little while after that another stranger or two came in.

What passed on their coming in?—They began, as they came in, to prepare themselves with the different arms they wanted to take with them, such as fixing the flints, and fixing slings to the cutlasses; on Thistlewood's coming into the room he looks round him and says, "Well, my lads, this looks something like as if you were going to do something." He came up to me, laying his hand upon my shoulder, and said, "Well, Mr. Adams, how do you do?" I told him I was very low in spirits; he wanted to know what was the matter. I told him I wanted some refreshment, as I had not had any thing to drink that day; he directly proposed to Brunt to fetch something to put me in spirits.

Was any thing brought?—Yes; on this being said, Thistlewood proposed to fetch some paper, in order to write some bills.

What was done upon that?—Thistlewood produced the money to Brunt, and Brunt sent.

Did any thing pass before that, when he proposed to fetch some paper, what paper?—He said he should like the same kind of paper as the newspapers were printed upon. I said to him, "As you do not know the name of the paper, you had better get some cartridge paper, which will answer the purpose equally as well." The cartridge paper was sent for.

Who sent for it?—Brunt.

Whom did he send?—He said he would send for it either his apprentice or his boy.

Was any money given?—Yes.

By whom?—By Thistlewood; Thistlewood produced the money to Brunt.

Did Brunt go out of the room in order to get the paper?—He went out to the door.

Did he bring back the paper?—I cannot say who brought the paper, but I saw it in the room.

What sort of paper was it?—Cartridge paper.

Upon the paper being brought what occurred?—Upon the paper being brought, Thistlewood sat down to write; he wrote three bills out; in writing the last bill he expressed himself very tired, he did not know what was the matter with him, but he could not write any longer.

Were those bills which he first wrote read to the people in the room?—They were read by himself.

Did he read them aloud?—Yes.

What was it that he read?

Mr. Adolphus.—I must object to that.

Mr. Attorney General.—After he had finished those three bills he appeared tired?—Yes, he did. Am I to state the contents of the bills?

What became of those three bills which he wrote?—Those three bills that he wrote, the first thing that was to be done with them, after he had done with them, was to lay them down in the room, in order to dry: after they were dried they were doubled up; I saw one in Ing's hand, and I saw one in Thistlewood's hand; but what became of them after that, I cannot tell.

Mr. Adolphus.—I only wish to see the thing done regularly.

Mr. Attorney General.—Then, now tell us what Thistlewood wrote upon those bills?—"Your Tyrants are destroyed—the friends of liberty are called upon, as the provisional government is now sitting. James Ings, Secretary. February 23rd, 1820."

Mr. Attorney General.—I will not ask as to the other bills, my lord. I believe some other person was desired to take the pen to write the fourth bill?—Hall was called upon, and he refused it; and another person, a stranger to me by name, whom I never saw before, was called on, and he at first refused.

We will not go into that; was Ings in the room at this time?—Yes.

What was Ings doing?—Ings was very busy in preparing himself for action.

How did he prepare himself?—He put a black belt round his waist, in order to contain a brace of pistols; another black belt he hanged upon his shoulder, to support a cutlass; he next placed on each shoulder a large bag, in the form of a soldier's haversack. When he had done this, he viewed himself and he said "I have not got my steel, I am not complete?" he said "never mind;" he directly draws a great knife from his pocket and begins to brandish it about, swearing at the same time that was the knife he procured to cut off the head of lord Castlereagh and the rest, as he came at them. On being asked what he intended them bags for that he had about him, he positively swore that he intended to bring away the heads of lord Castlereagh and Sidmouth in them.

You say he brandished the knife; what sort of a knife was it?—It was a large broad knife that he said he had prepared for the purpose, and bound round the handle with wax end to prevent it slipping in his hand, when, he said, he should be at work.

After this, did any other persons come, or did those persons go away?—After this, Thistlewood and Brunt were out of the room.

Who came into the room?—Palin came into the room.

On Palin coming into the room, did any thing pass?—At the time Palin was in the room, perceiving that Thistlewood and Brunt were not present, he takes upon himself to address what were in the room: he said he hoped all that were in the room knew what they had met there for; if such, he hoped they would give it a proper consideration; in the first place, to see whether the assassination was likely to be a thing that would be approved of by the country, and whether in doing that the country would turn on their side.

Was any thing observed upon that?—Just after.

By whom?—There was a tall man in the room made some few remarks on what was dropped, after Mr. Palin went a little further on.

What did he say?—He said, "you seem to speak as if all in the room knew what was going to be done; this is what some of us have heard, but wish to be satisfied. I, for my own part, from what you have said respecting coming to an agreement to stick true to each other, am not afraid of myself, nor do I conceive that any man who turns out in a case like this ought to value his life."

Upon his saying this, do you recollect any thing being said by Brunt?—Just at the conclusion of this, Brunt enters the room again; seeing the alteration in the countenances of what were in the room, he wanted to know the cause; he was told by this tall man again, that there was some in the room that wished to know what they were met there for.

What answer did Brunt make?—"This is not the place," says Brunt, "where you are to be informed; go along with me to the Edgeware-road, there you shall know what you are going about, and all that goes along with me I will take care they shall have a drop of something to drink to put them in spirits."

Was any thing said to you? or did you take any thing yourself to carry to the Edgeware-road?—Yes.

What was given to you?—This blunderbuss with the brass barrel was fixed with a belt round my shoulder, and hung to it, and put under my great coat, that I had then on, to carry to Cato-street.

Any thing else?—After this, there was a broomstick which had been prepared for the reception of a bayonet at one end, this was Brunt's: I was to take this broomstick in my hand as a walking-stick, there was nothing further communicated, or, at least, done in the room at this present any way particular, except that Brunt said, it was time for us to begin to prepare us to go, as the room where we were would be wanted by Palin's men in the evening.

You told us in the early part of your evidence that some pike staves had been procured and were to have some ferrules put upon them; had they had, to your knowledge, ferrules put upon them?—Yes I saw ferrules put upon some of them.

Where, and by whom?—In the room at Brunt's, I saw a dozen of them ferruled by Bradburn.

Was there any cupboard in that room?—There was.

Had you ever seen that cupboard open?—Yes.

What was that cupboard used for?—It was used for the reception, for the purpose of putting swords; I saw some tallow there; I saw some pitch there; I saw some of those small hand-grenades in it, those were the principal things I have seen there.

Had you ever seen any gun-powder prepared there?—I had seen gun-powder, a musket, belt, and the hand-grenades laid there.

What had you seen done with powder in that room?—I saw the powder put into some of those hand-grenades to complete them.

Did you ever see the powder put into any thing else?—Not to my knowledge.

Have you ever seen any bags of any description there?—I saw the powder that was brought in a brown paper bag there, and I have seen Brunt take a bag to carry the hand-grenades there.

What time did you go away from Brunt's that evening for Cato-street?—As nearly as I can calculate, it was drawing very near to six, or it might be six.

With whom did you go away in company?—I went by myself, and was to be followed by Strange and this tall man, and two or three others whose names I did not know, and Brunt was to follow.

Did you go on towards the Edgware-road?—I went right up Holborn, and right up Oxford-street; in going up Holborn,

We need not go through the particulars of your journey to Cato-street, did you afterwards go to Cato-street?—Yes, I did.

Who went with you finally to Cato-street?—Thistlewood, Brunt, and a strange man, whom I do not know.

Where did you meet Thistlewood before you got to Cato-street?—In the Edgware road.

When you got to Cato-street where did you go? into what building or house?—I entered into a stabling, a kind of stable.

That is near the end of Cato-street, by John-street?—Yes.

You went under an archway?—Yes.

This stable is the first building on the right-hand side after you have passed through the archway?—Yes.

When you got into this stable whom did you find there?—I found Davidson sitting, and a person standing apparently as if they were doing something with the pikes; I passed them in the stable and went up the ladder into the loft above.

Were there any persons in the loft, over the stable, when you got there?—Yes; I found Ings and Hall there.

Any other persons?—Yes, Bradburn.

What were those persons about when you got into the loft?—They were taking the different arms.

Where were those arms?—Lying on the bench that was in the room.

There was a bench in the room on which the arms were?—Yes.

Was Tidd there when you arrived?—No, he was not.

Do you recollect any thing passing in consequence of Tidd's not being there?—Yes; in consequence of Tidd not being there, Thistlewood and Brunt were talking about it, Thistlewood began to be rather agitated for fear Tidd should not come.

What said Brunt?—Brunt seeing the men rather confused, for it was pretty general, said there was no occasion for any uneasiness respecting the arrival of Tidd, for he would venture to forfeit his existence that Tidd would be forthcoming. About this time, in consequence of what had appeared in the faces of the men, Ings began to show himself mad, quite terrified, he began to stamp and to swear, to take both his hands up in this way against his hair, as if he would tear it off, and said, "Damn my eyes, if you begin to talk of dropping the concern now, I will either cut my throat or shoot myself."

Did Thistlewood say any thing?—Yes; Thistlewood then said "for God's sake do not think of dropping the business now; if you do it will turn out a second Despard's job." Thistlewood, looking round, said, "you seem to think there are not men sufficient." He cast up the number of men that were in the room: "let us see, there are eighteen here and two below, that makes twenty, that is quite sufficient:" says he "suppose there to be sixteen servants in lord Harrowby's house, they are not armed; we shall go prepared, and it will not take us, from entering the house to coming out above ten minutes."

Was any thing done in respect to the men who were to enter the house?—He proposed that there should be fourteen men out of the twenty that should enter the room; that he thought six would be sufficient to take care of the servants.

When did Tidd come in?—He came in about twenty minutes, to the best of my recollection, before the officers entered the room.

Did Tidd bring any persons with him?—I did not see him enter the room, but I saw him after he was there.

You say he proposed fourteen persons should enter lord Harrowby's house?—Yes, on seeing Tidd in the room (for he was in the room at the time Thistlewood was talking of this), seeing Tidd in the room, Thistlewood fixed his eye upon him. I looked at him, and Thistlewood, upon seeing this, turned his eye away directly. I said, "do not you think it is a pretty set out? do you think they will be able to do this thing?" he said, "Never."

You say fourteen were to go into the house?—Fourteen were to be selected to go into the room; it was first proposed to be put to them to see if they were all willing to go: this was put, and it was agreed to, at the time the men were called out, the fourteen men that were to enter the room. Brunt produces a gin bottle from his pocket. Shall I state the men that were picked out to go into the room?

Was Ings one of those?—Yes, he was.

Were you one of them?—Certainly.

Was Harrison one?—He was one; this being done, thinking to get myself in readiness to go, I heard somebody in the stable.

What did you hear?—I heard something below, and directly there was said, "hollo," and Thistlewood directly takes a candle, and looks to see who it is; upon that, he sets the candle on the bench directly again, in quite a confused state. I never heard him speak.

Did any persons come up the ladder?—There were two officers directly entered the room.

What became of Thistlewood?—He sidled off from the place where he was, into a little room.

Was that the little room nearest the street?—It was the room, as the officers came up, on the right-hand side.

There were two rooms there, we understand?—I do not know that; I had never seen it till the officers came up.

Did any other persons go into that little room besides Thistlewood?—There were Ings and Brunt I saw in, and Harrison.

What happened upon the officers coming up?—On the officers coming up into the room, they stood in the room at the top of the ladder, as it were, with a small pistol presented, saying, "holloa, here is a pretty nest of you;" looking round, and seeing the arms of different descriptions lying on the bench, and some of them with arms about them, they said, "Gentlemen, we have a warrant to apprehend you all, and I hope as such you will go quietly." On this, Smithers, who was behind, cried, "make room, let me come up:" on Smithers coming into the room, between the two officers that were making way for him, at this moment of time, those that were in this little room made towards the door, a group of them; at that instant of time, I saw a man rush forward from the group of them; at the same time, another hand presented itself with a pistol; at that moment a pistol was fired off, out went the candle, and I could not see what went on afterwards.

VOL. XXXIII.

Did you see Smithers fall?—I did not see him fall.

In consequence of this, was there considerable confusion in the room?—Great confusion; the officers, as soon as they perceived their brother officer was killed, ran down stairs, and gave the alarm of murder.

What became of you?—I kept my standing where I was.

In what part of the room were you?—At the end of the bench, at the further end of the room.

Did you get out of the room?—I came out of the room after this.

Down the ladder?—Yes, through the stable, and out under the archway, the same as I got in.

And made your escape off?—Yes, I got out into Cato-street, and turned my head on one side, and there was a pistol fired out at the window at me. I thought it was at me, for there was not a soul besides.

You got out under the archway, and got off?—Yes; as I was under the archway the soldiers were coming through.

When were you yourself apprehended?—On the Friday.

Ings.—Am I allowed to ask any question, my lord?

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—You may ask any question, but you will consider whether to put it yourself, or to leave it to your counsel.

Mr. Adolphus.—If you will write down any question you wish to propose, if I think it proper I will put it for you.

Mr. Attorney General.—You have been in custody ever since?—Yes, I have.

Robert Adams cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

You were examined here on Monday, I think?—Yes.

I should like to know a little more of you; are you an Englishman?—Yes.

Born in what part of the country?—Ipswich, in Suffolk.

Educated as a Christian?—Yes.

You profess that religion, do you, now?—Yes, I do now.

Did you ever cease to profess it?—Yes.

What mode of faith, or disbelief, did you take up while you disbelieved Christianity? what were you then?—I was induced,

Never mind what you were induced; answer my question first, and you shall tell your inducement afterwards. What were you when you were not a Christian?—A man, certainly, in the same form as I am now.

What faith or persuasion had you when you were not a Christian?—If I must answer that question,

You shall answer the question.—Then I will. I was in faith what they termed a Deist.

Did you believe in God when you were a Deist?—They strove to make me,

Did you believe in God when you were a Deist?—Yes.

Then you renounced Christianity to be a Deist, and believed only in God?—Yes, that was the case.

How long may you have embraced Christianity again?—I consider myself to have embraced Christianity again ever since I first received conviction that I was in the wrong.

Give us the day and month?—I cannot.

Was it before the 23rd of February last?—I was convinced even before I was taken, and my conviction grew stronger after that.

Was it before or after the 23rd of February last you called yourself a Christian again?—After the 23rd.

So much for your religion. How long might you remain in the happy conviction of Deism? how many years?—Of a Deist?

When did you renounce faith in our Saviour?—It first happened since last August.

Since last August you renounced faith in our Saviour, and since last February you have taken it up again?—Yes.

In your progress downwards, you say you had got down from Christianity to Deism. Did you ever get to the point of Atheism?—Never.

Did you ever profess yourself a Deist?—Never.

Did you ever deny your belief in a God at all, and that the Scriptures were all a fable?—I never denied a God, though I was brought by that accursed work of Paine's to deny the Scriptures.

And now you are brought to call the Bible a good book, and Paine's accursed. How long did you serve the king?—Five years.

Where did you serve, in England or abroad?—In England.

In the Blues?—Yes, properly speaking, the Royal Horse Guards.

We among the illiterate call it the Blues. Had you any allowance or pension on your retiring from the army?—None at all.

You have retired again to your trade of a shoemaker?—Yes.

Is that your hand-writing? [shewing a small piece of paper to the witness.]—Yes, it is.

You were examined here on Monday?—Yes, I was.

Where have you been since?—I have been in the same custody as I was before.

Where was it?—In the House of Correction. Cold Bath-fields?—Yes.

In solitary confinement, or have you seen any body?—I have not been in solitary confinement, but I have not had communication with any body, nor have not had since I was taken.

Have you been in solitary confinement or not?—I have a room in the house of the governor.

Have you been solitary or seen any body?—I may say solitary, for when I reflected with myself,

I do not ask as to your reflections. Have you seen any persons or been alone?—I have certainly seen those that have attended me.

Have you seen any body who told you any thing that passed in this Court after you left it?—No, I have not.

That you swear?—I have not seen any body who told me any thing that passed in this Court.

Have you seen any body who told you any part of what passed in this Court after you left it?—No, I have not.

Have you had any writing, printing, or any other thing conveyed to you, communicating it?—I have had no writing whatever communicated to me.

Then you do not know any thing about what passed?—No; I heard the day before I went off, the day the verdict was given against Thistlewood, that he was found guilty.

Where were you day by day?—I was kept in a room by myself, because I would have communication with no person.

You were guarded?—I had two men with me.

Did you hear any thing of the observations upon your evidence?—No.

Not a word?—No.

Now I will tell you why I ask you that question: you have altered your evidence a good deal since that?—I do not know that I have.

Then I will bring it to your memory, that you have, without going through the whole course of your evidence the other day: how long have you known Edwards?—I have known Edwards ever since the early part of January.

How long have you known Ings, was that by Brunt introducing him to you?—Yes.

And you became acquainted with Brunt, on the continent three or four years ago?—Yes.

From the time you began to hold any communication or correspondence with Brunt, with Ings, and Thistlewood, was it your intention to execute the project they proposed to you, or did you intend to give information against them?—I never intended: it was no inward intention of mine to commit murder, nor I never had any intention to give information against them; after I got into the knowledge of what was in hand, I waited the opportunity to get out of it.

You never intended to commit murder, nor to give information, but you waited for the opportunity to creep out of it?—Yes.

What hindered your creeping out of it at any time?—From threats that had been held out.

Let us see how that is. Early in January, Thistlewood had a conversation with you, in which he said that the shop-keepers were all aristocrats, and he should like to see their shops shut up and plundered?—Yes.

Were you disposed to go that length? should you like to shut up their shops and plunder them?—I should not wish to go that length.

Moderate your action a little?—I am perfectly collected. I can stand here if you desire it till to-morrow morning.

Were you disposed to shut up the shops and plunder them?—I was not.

But you were in the society of men who said they were?—That society I was just entering.

There were no threats held out in that conversation?—Not at that time, that I admit.

You had the benefit of a recess of fourteen days in White-cross-street prison?—But I had had threats before I went into the White-cross-street prison.

Had you had threats before any thing was communicated to you?—Yes; before I went to prison.

Your first conversation with him was in January?—Yes.

What sort of threats were they?—This was the very day before I went into prison. I was asking Mr. Brunt, in the presence of Thistlewood, for the plan that, I was told by Brunt, first of all was drawn up. I wanted to know what it was; I wanted to see it. Brunt said directly that there would be nothing communicated or given till the day of acting. Thistlewood answered this directly, "By no means, there shall be nothing given, and the very day that we think of going to work," then says he, "we will have the men all together, give them a treat, and then we shall tell them what is to be done; and after that we will never lose sight of them." Upon this Brunt said he would take damned good care that there should be no writings kept in the room where they were, that would put them into danger, "But," says he, "if any man I have ever spoken to concerning this will give me reason to suppose he will give information, I will run him through and put a stop to it."

I wonder you were not afraid to come out of prison; that would have been the safest place?—I certainly was, I am sorry I did come out.

How much were you imprisoned for?—Twenty-three shillings and eight-pence.

And these discoveries were made to you before you went to prison, on the 16th of January?—Yes.

Had you been at any meeting with those gentlemen then?—I had met them several times at this public-house.

Whom had you met?—I had seen Brunt, I had seen Ings.

Do you remember on what day you were introduced to Brunt?—On the 2nd of January.

To Thistlewood?—On the Wednesday, I believe Sunday was the 9th, then it must be the 12th.

You told us the other day the 13th, I do not want to fix you particularly?—If I said the 13th, it must be a mistake; I know it was the Wednesday.

That was the first time you ever saw Thistlewood?—Yes.

How many times between that and the time when you went to Thistlewood's did you hear those threats?—I have stated to you the first time I heard threats thrown out.

When was that?—On the 16th.

Who held them out then?—Mr. Brunt.

What day of the week was the 16th, do you recollect?—On a Sunday.

You not being particularly incumbered with Christianity, thought that a good day to meet those people?—Yes, that was the first day we met in the room we were then in.

What room was that?—The White Hart.

It so intimidated you that when you came out again you sought those persons, and went on with their plots?—I had a right to be intimidated with such a man as Mr. Ings; when any thing occurred his whole blood and soul boiled for murder.

You had not seen Ings at that time?—God bless me are you going to reason me out of my Christian name? I have told you I saw Ings between the 2nd and the 9th.

Then I have mistaken you; oh it is so to-day I see; then on the 30th, when you had been imprisoned fifteen days, you joined those parties again?—I did.

Had the thing then got a great deal forwarder in your absence?—Yes.

The room had been taken, I think?—Yes, the room at the White Hart had been given up, which I did not know on the Monday morning, nor did I know of the room having been taken at Brunt's? I did not go to that room, but to speak to Brunt's wife.

You have told us of a meeting on the 3rd of February, you call it the 2nd to-day; was Edwards at that? I do not wish to raise any thing on the difference of date; the other day when you were examined did you say any thing about Ings pulling a pistol from his pocket and saying, he hoped the king would not die then, and that the duke of York would not come to the crown?—I did not; if you question me here you will bring a number more things to my mind; as I have pledged myself to my Maker to divulge all I know, I will tell it.

And the more you are asked the more you will know?—Undoubtedly.

You have told more to-day than you did the day before?—I told all I recollected.

But this curious idea of Ings, saying he hoped the king would not die then, but would live a little longer; and that the duke of York would not come to the crown, and that the king should never wear the crown, you did not state?—No, I did not recollect it.

You have told us that Ings, who happens to be the man before the jury, said they were all a damned set of cowards; that he took a pistol in his pocket when the prince regent went to parliament, with the sole intention to shoot him; that on his making use of that expression, he took the pistol from his pocket to convince them of the sincerity of what he had said, and exclaimed, "There is the pistol that I took," and that he regretted he had not done it, saying, had he done it he had not cared a damn for his own life; all that remarkable fact you kept to yourself on Monday last?—The reason why I kept it to myself was, that it did not come to my recollection: the words I have said this morning were all fact.

The reason you did not state it on Monday was, that it did not come to your recollection?—It did not.

I think you told us some things then, that did not come to your recollection to-day?—That may be. I will not pretend to say, that the next time I come up here I can communicate every thing as I have done to-day.

Certainly not; there are people that proverbially ought to have a good memory?—Yes, certainly.

You told us of their being to go to Brighton and Margate and Dover, and take possession of the outports; you have not told us that to-day?—I do not consider it necessary: if it had struck me, I would have mentioned it.

You make your evidence a little longer or shorter, according as the occasion suits?—Yes, I mention the circumstances as they come to my recollection.

On one day it is, that the king is to live a little longer, and on another day the ports are to be taken possession of?

Mr. Gurney.—That is observation, and not question.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am asking him a question.

Mr. Gurney.—But that is not a question.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—You should not now observe on the evidence.

Mr. Gurney.—Your lordship knows that we shortened his evidence the other day, and passed over various circumstances.

Mr. Adolphus.—You could not stop him; you tried several times. This about the digging entrenchments you did not state on Monday?—No, I forgot that.

The next time there will be a new story?

Mr. Gurney.—I must interpose, my lord.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—All these observations are certainly incorrect.

Mr. Adolphus.—He has said it himself; “when next I come into the box, I shall recollect other things,” and upon that I put the question, whether he would tell another story the next time he comes.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Ask him the question if you wish it.

Mr. Adolphus.—Shall you tell us a new story the next time?—No. If any thing new occurs to my mind when I come to stand here, I will state it.

There is another little fact you had not mentioned before, that the assassination must take place before the parliament was dissolved?—Yes.

That did not occur to you on the former occasion?—No, it did not. I recollect it perfectly well.

You have omitted something you told us last

Monday, that at the meeting on Wednesday the 3rd of February, Brunt said he had work to finish, and could not go about the assassination the next day?—I stated that on the 19th of February.

Did you not state that that happened on the 2nd or the 3rd of February which ever was the day?

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—What do you refer to?

Mr. Adolphus.—Brunt saying he had business to finish, and could not go the next day. Upon your oath, did you or not say that that took place on the 2nd of February?—I stand here upon my oath already. I conceive that as such, I said, and I say now, that Brunt being asked by Thistlewood to call on his men, said, he had work to do, and did not know that he should be able to attend; this was on the 19th.

Did he or did he not say so on the 2nd?—I do not remember his saying so.

Did you say on Monday last, upon your oath, that he said so on the 2nd?—If such a word dropped from my mouth, it is past my recollection.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am convinced I was mistaken in that, the date was written narrowly in the margin, and I overlooked it. This meeting on the 19th was when twelve persons were present?—No.

That was the 20th, the Sunday?—On the 20th; before they all left there were fifteen.

That was at the time Tidd took the chair with a pike in his hand?—Yes.

They did not then know of the dinner at lord Harrowby's?—No.

Their plan then was, to go to the houses of cabinet ministers, and kill two or three, or four of them?—Yes.

And then they were to take the cannon and do all the rest of the work?—Yes.

You have given us this addition to-day, that the cannon were to be loaded on the ground, and brought out to fire on any who opposed them; but that if Cook found himself strong enough, he was to make for the Mansion-house, and to secure that for the provisional government; all that you have told us for the first time to day?—If I recollect right, the major part of that was stated by me on Monday.

Was there any thing about the cannon being loaded on the Artillery-ground?—I will not go so far as to swear that I did state that.

Did you say any thing about Cook summoning the Mansion-house, and demanding it to be given up?—If I did not, I forgot it.

Bless me, cannot you remember from Monday? Those things you are speaking of were three months ago; is your memory worse since you took to Christianity?—No, my memory is strengthened.

Did you state that on Monday?—I stated that Cook was to demand the Mansion-house, and in case it was not given up, he was to fire upon it.

Or did you say it was to be summoned, or demanded to be given up, or not?—Certainly.

You said that as having happened then, did you?—I consider summon and demanding as two similar things. I do not know whether I am right or wrong.

I mean them as the same thing: to pass that we will come to the meeting on the 22nd; was that the time when Ings pulled three daggers out of his pocket?—Yes.

He said they were to run into one of their bodies, using an expression that you very properly kept back?—Yes.

Why did you not tell us that on Monday?—When I was here on Monday, if I was to state the whole, and give the whole, I should be able to state it; but for me to come here and select one single individual out of thirteen, it confuses me, it put a stop to my recollection.

Ings was at the bar on Monday, though he was not on trial on Monday; why did you not tell us that then?—If I had thought of it at the time I would have mentioned it.

It was then that the watch was agreed on?—Yes.

To be on duty from six in the evening till midnight?—Yes.

And a committee was to sit twice a-day; at eleven in the morning, and seven in the evening?—Yes; on the Saturday it was eight that they met, at nine o'clock on the Monday.

How long did your committee meetings last?—There was never no regular time.

Did they ever sit till 12 o'clock at night?—I never saw them sitting at 12 o'clock at night.

You have told us further that at the meeting on the 23rd or 22nd, Brunt said he had left Tidd to meet a man that would be of great consequence, and therefore he could not go to the watch, and you were to go, and Brunt and Edwards and you proceeded to Grosvenor-square, and there saw Davidson?—Yes.

Why did not you tell us that on Monday?—I did not consider, according to the dictation of counsel I had, that I had a right to tell that.

"I did not consider according to the dictates of the counsel" that examined me, how am I to understand that?—There were things that transpired on the 22nd, that I have not stated either last Monday or to-day.

This was one of those you did not state last Monday, but have stated to-day?—Those things I have not stated to-day.

But this as to Brunt's meeting a man you knew last Monday?—That was not in Mr. Thistlewood's proceedings.

You mentioned as being parties to that, Brunt and Tidd, and Edwards, and yourself, and Davidson?—This was proposed on the Monday morning, the Tuesday morning I mean, the question was asked whether Tidd,—

Did you state that on Monday or did you not? Did you say on Monday that Brunt said he had left Tidd to meet a man that would be of great consequence, and therefore he could not go on the watch?—Brunt said that on Tuesday.

Did you say that on Monday last here?—That I will not pretend to say.

We will go over a good deal at once: you are quite sure that when you came to Cate-street, twenty was the number of men there?—I took that from the statement of Thistlewood, I did not count them myself.

That there were eighteen above and two below?—Yes.

Do you know a gentleman of the name of Monument?—I never saw Monument at all, not to my recollection, not to know him by name.

Perhaps you can tell me the room is fifteen feet one way and ten the other?—I do not know the width.

Is that about a true description of it?—I should suppose it might.

Were you all pretty close together in that room, all you eighteen?—Not at the time the accident happened, the murder, I kept my standing where I was.

Where was that?—At the end of the bench under the window.

Was that nearest or furthest from the door?—Furthest from the door.

Was that nearest to the smaller room where those parties retired into?—That I cannot positively say, for I never observed the door till that moment.

You said you saw the party come, in a group, from that room?—Yes.

Was it near that?—That door appeared to me to be in the middle of the room.

Therefore the bench would be near it?—No, the door is in the side of the room, the bench stands lengthways.

Were you at the end nearest to or furthest from that room?—I never pretended to say the distance of that door from where I stood, and cannot.

Then you were nearly in the middle of the room?—I was at the end of the room.

The end nearest to the ladder, or the other?—Nearest to the street.

You could see all that was in the room?—Do you mean to ask me every thing that was in the room?

I do not ask you for an inventory of the things in the room, but you could see every thing?—Yes.

How many candles were there in the room?—One.

Only one?—One I will be answerable for; whether there were more I will not take upon myself to say.

Were there three or four?—I can be answerable for one, I can be answerable for no more.

You can answer whether they were there or not?—I did not see them.

At any time were there four candles lighted?—I never saw but one.

You can tell whether there were more or not?—I did not see them.

Were there more than one candle in the room at any one time during the time you were there?—If there were it was the time when I was out of the room.

When was that?—When I went down into the stable with Thistlewood.

Were there more than one?—There was not more than one.

If any man swears there were eight, he swears that which is false?—If he speaks the truth.

And a man that speaks the truth will not say there were eight candles in the room?—If any man swore there were eight candles in the room, I will swear he was a false man.

That one candle was put out, and it was all dark then?—As soon as ever the pistol fired it was all in a state of darkness.

Very good. I want to know which of the officers made a speech on coming into the room?—Not knowing the officers by name, I cannot say.

Should you know the gentleman again if you saw him?—I do not know that I should.

But it was one of the first men that came in?—Yes.

He used those words?—Yes.

And to those words you are quite positive?—To the best of my recollection those were the words.

I do not want to trap you in one word, or the turn of a word, but that one of the officers who came in said, "Here is a pretty nest of you?"—To the best of my recollection those were the words.

Or, "here is a fine nest of you," or something of that kind, "pretty" or "fine," or whatever it might be?—Yes.

You are quite sure a phrase of that kind was used?—Yes.

You are quite sure that this same officer said, "Gentlemen, we have got a warrant to apprehend you all?"—Yes, that was the expression.

And that you swear to?—I will be answerable for an expression of that kind.

"Gentlemen, I have a warrant to take you all, or to commit you all," or something of that kind?—Yes.

That you swear?—Yes.

And added "as such you will go peaceably, we hope?"—Yes.

Those were the words that were used by the officer?—Yes.

If any man has said that they only said "We are officers, seize their arms," that man must be a false man, must not he?—If such a word as that passed, I cannot charge my memory with it.

If any one has said that passed, and that only, he must be a false man?—Do you suppose it is possible for me to stand here and say I will be answerable for every word that passed, or even every transaction?

No, certainly; that is not my question; but you are certain that those words you have spoken to did pass?—Yes.

Mr. Edwards was the aide-de-camp to this business?—I always found Mr. Edwards seemed to be very deep in it, and very much in conversation with Mr. Brunt and Thistlewood.

And you gave him the title of aide-de-camp just now?—I gave him the title perhaps, but that was not the word that passed at the time.

No, so I understood, that that was a term you yourself applied to him. You used the expression. You went home after this affair, as quietly, as unabashed, as if nothing was the matter?—To outward appearance.

You did not tell us last time of the pistol being fired?—I did not think of it at the time, nor when I was taken did I think of it that it was fired at me, but in the coat I had on, there was a hole where the ball went.

But you did not think of that when you were taken into custody, nor on Monday?—There were several things that I have not stated to-day; when I come up again I will state them if they occur to me, and if they concern the prisoner. There are things I have stated to-day that did not exactly concern the prisoner on trial: those are the very grounds on which I omitted stating some things. I do not want to fix the guilt of another man on the prisoner on trial.

Certainly not, therefore I suppose he was the man that fired the pistol at you?—I do not know.

You have mentioned it to-day, and not on the former day: you are cautious of fixing any one, I see. Is that the great coat you had on at the time?—No, it is in the room I sleep in.

Has that ever been produced to show the shot-hole?—No, I did not find it out myself at first, but Maidment, the officer.

Do you know a person of the name of Chambers?—No, not that I recollect.

Thomas Chambers. Did you ever call on such a man, in company with Edwards, in Heathcock-court?—No, never in my life.

That you swear?—Yes, that I swear: nor do I know where it is.

You never called on any person of that name, nor do not know that person?—No.

Did you call on any person in company with Edwards, about three or four days before this affair in Cato-street took place?—Edwards went along with me in order to buy a pair of boots that a woman had to sell; that was the only time of my being in his company privately, that was on the Monday.

Where did you meet?—He called on me at my lodgings.

Did you call on any body?—No, we called in at a wine-vaults at the corner of Newport-market, and he treated me with a small glass of rum.

Did you ever call on any person along with Edwards to solicit him to join a party to kill his majesty's ministers?—Never in my life.

And say that you would have blood and wine for your supper?—Never: if any person comes to swear that, they will perjure themselves.

Whether they are converted to Christianity or not?—Yes.

Did you call on such a person twice?—I never called on any person in company with Edwards.

Do you know a person of the name of Stephen Whatman?—I do not.

I am going back three years; did you know such a person at that period?—I do not know that ever I did in my life.

Three years ago, that would be 1817?—I was then in France.

How long have you been returned from thence?—Two years the 10th of next month to London.

Had you, at any time, a conversation with a man living in Kingsland-road about the Tower, and using Cashman as a watch-word?—I had nothing to do with Cashman's concern.

Did you ever tell any person to speak about the Tower, and to use Cashman as a watch-word?—Never in my life.

After this affair was over in Cato-street, did you take any ammunition back any where?—No, after I left the room; I will tell you the last time I had any ammunition in my hand. I am going to state a thing I have not told before. Hall was the man that brought me a pistol, and brought me five rounds of ball-cartridges. I loaded the pistol, and laid it on the end of the bench next to me, and there lay the pistol when the officers came into the room. I have never handled a pistol since; and the four rounds of ball-cartridges I had left, after I loaded the pistol, I threwed them away in the room as I came out.

Had you to carry the large grenade?—I never had it in my hand. I saw it.

Did you carry it back to Tidd's the day after?—If you will believe me what I am about to say, here is the fact. I went home on the Wednesday night. I got home about nine o'clock; never did I lay my hand on the latch of the door to go out of it till I was taken by the officers.

Did you ever carry that hand-grenade any where?—I never took it up, nor saw it any where but at Brunt's. I can tell you as far as this; I believe I carried some pikes from that room of Brunt's up to Tidd's, this thing has never come out yet; there are a number of things I have not stated yet.

You never carried the hand-grenade at all?—No; if you wish to know the principal part of them, I can tell you.

I do not wish to know. Mr. Edwards, I think, was the engineer? he made the fuses?—He was making the touch-paper for the fuses that were put in; he was drying them by the fire; my time was too short in the room at that time to see more.

You have not told us what Edwards said at any of those meetings; one said one thing, and one another; what did Edwards say?—I cannot pretend to charge my memory that Mr. Edwards was a man that I ever can charge my memory with a score of words that the man said; he had very little to say, and what he had to say to Mr. Thistlewood and Mr. Brunt, and Harrison, it was always in a side-winded kind of way whispered to them.

You never heard from Edwards since you have been in confinement?—Never.

You forgot to tell us the story about the one-pound note to treat the men, you told us on Monday?—I had nothing to do with that to-day; it does not belong to this man's crime; I suppose I shall not have to state all the things every time; if I thought I should I would prepare myself.

You told us about six shillings, and one shilling, and seven-pence; that was all the money you ever saw: by whom were they given?—The six shillings was given by Thistlewood to Brunt.

What was the one shilling done with?—I have not stated that to my knowledge.

The paper that Edwards mentioned the dinner in was the New Times, was not it?—Yes it was.

That was the paper that was brought and contained the article?—Yes, I dare say you will find it in the New Times of February the 22nd.

I see the last question put you on cross-examination was, whether you knew who put the candle out, and you said you did not?—I do not.

There was but one candle?—There was but one candle; and that candle, as soon as ever the pistol was fired, went out; and, as I said, whether the candle was put out intentionally, or the report of the pistol put it out, I cannot tell.

Eleanor Walker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

I believe you are the niece and the servant of Mrs. Rogers, No. 4, Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner Brunt?—Yes.

Did he lodge at your master's house?—Yes.

Had he lodged there many months before last January?—He had lodged there about a twelvemonth as nearly as I can recollect.

What rooms did he occupy?—Two front rooms.

On the two pair of stairs floor?—Yes.

In the month of January last do you remember his introducing to you any other person to take a lodging?—Yes.

Who was that?—He did not tell me the name.

Did you afterwards find what the name was?—No, I did not know it till I saw his name in the paper; then I found it to be Ings.

Was that the man at the bar?—I cannot say.

Do you believe that to be the man?—He appears to be something like him, but I cannot swear to him.

Did Brunt tell you in his presence what he was?—No, he did not.

Did he tell you what he was?—No, neither of them.

What was the rent of the room?—Three shillings a-week.

Unfurnished?—Yes.

Do you remember for how many weeks he had the room?—A month or five weeks.

When he took it, did he say any thing about furniture?—He said he perhaps might bring in his goods in about a week or better.

Was this the two-pair of stairs back room?—Yes.

Elleanor Walker cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

What part of the house did you live in?—The lower part.

Was that far from the staircase?—It was near the staircase, but the door was always shut.

Could ten or twelve men meet once or twice a day without your knowing it?—I did not know it.

Was it likely ten or twelve men could go up once or twice a day without your hearing it?—I might hear it; I have heard persons come up and down stairs, but I did not see them.

As many as ten or twelve at a time?—No, I never heard that.

Ten or twelve in the morning?—There might have been, but I did not hear them.

Elleanor Walker re-examined by Mr. Gurney.

Is there a door by which the lodgers go up without going through your shop?—Yes.

Is that a front door into the court?—The shop door is in the court, and the private door in a passage.

And that leads to the staircase?—Yes.

Is there any back door besides?—There is only one back door.

Is there a back door?—Yes.

Do you call the door at which the lodgers come in, the back door?—Yes.

That is a door coming out of a passage on to the stairs?—Yes.

And they came in at that door without coming into your shop at all?—Yes.

Mary Rogers sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Elleanor Walker is your niece and servant we understand?—Yes, she is.

You remember the circumstance of her letting your two pair of stairs back room in January last?—I do.

How many weeks did this person occupy it?—Four or five.

How many did he pay for?—Four, and there was one left unpaid.

Was the lodging kept till Brunt was taken up?—Yes.

During the four or five weeks did you ask Brunt any question as to who the lodger was?—I did.

Did he tell you of what business he was?—He told me he was a butcher out of employ.

Did he tell you what he knew of him?—He said he knew nothing of him, only seeing him at the public-house, and hearing him inquire for a lodging.

Do you remember one evening when you were putting your children to bed, seeing any men upon the staircase?—I do.

How many men did you see?—Three.

Were they going up stairs or going down?—

Going up stairs.

Was there any thing remarkable in the person of either of the three?—The middle man was a black man.

I do not know whether you took sufficient notice of him to identify him?—No.

Joseph Hale sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Are you apprentice to Brunt?—Yes.

Did you live with him at his lodging in Fox-court?—Yes.

We understand he had the two front rooms, two pair of stairs?—Yes.

One to live in and the other to work in?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner, Ings?—Yes.

Do you remember his taking any room in that house as a lodging?—Yes.

What room was that?—A two-pair of stairs-back room.

Had you seen him in company with Brunt before the day on which he took that lodging?—Yes.

Where had you seen him?—In Brunt's workshop.

How long before he took the room?—About a fortnight; the first time I saw him in Brunt's room.

Had you seen him more than once before he took the room?—I believe I had.

At the time the room was taken, did Ings look at the room alone, or did any person look at it with him?—Brunt looked at it with him.

Did you hear either of them say any thing while they were looking at the room?—When they came out of it, I heard Brunt say to Ings, "It will do, go and give them a shilling."

Do you remember what day of the week that was?—On the Monday.

That evening did Ings come there?—Yes.

Did any person come with him?—Yes.

Who was that?—A man of the name of Hall, a tailor.

How did Ings get into the room?—He came and asked Mrs. Brunt for the key.

Did she give him the key?—I believe she did.

Did he and Hall go into the room?—Yes.

Did you hear any other persons come into the room that evening?—Yes, there were others.

From that time, until your master was taken up, did persons use to come to that room?—Yes.

At what part of the day had you an opportunity of observing that they came?—In the evening.

Had you done work generally at that time?—No.

Can you give me the names of the persons who used to come to those meetings in the evening?—Yes; Thistlewood, Ings, Davidson, Bradburn, Tidd, Edwards, Adams.

Do you remember Hall?—Yes.

Did he come?—Yes.
 Do you know a man of the name of Potter?
 —Yes.
 Did he use to come?—Yes.
 Do you know Strange?—Yes.
 Did he use to come?—Yes.
 Was there any furniture in the room?—No.
 How did they manage for furniture when they came to those meetings?—They used to borrow Brunt's chairs to sit on.
 Did your master go in in the evenings too when they were there?—Yes.
 Did you see those persons, or any of them, in your master's room, besides seeing them in this room?—Yes.
 Did they call each other by their names?—Sometimes.
 By what name did they generally call Thistlewood?—Sometimes T, and sometimes Arthur.
 Do you remember, any day, seeing the door open, and observing any thing in the room?—Yes.
 What did you see in the room?—I saw some long poles like the branches of trees.
 Have you at any times heard any work going on in the room?—Yes.
 What kind of work?—I have heard them hammering and sawing.
 Your master was taken up, I believe, on Thursday the 24th of February?—Yes, he was.
 On the Sunday morning before that, was there any meeting in that room?—Yes.
 Were the persons whom you have now named to me present at that meeting?—Yes.
 Were there any others there besides those?—Yes.
 Was that a large or a small meeting to the best of your recollection?—A larger meeting than what there usually was.
 Did they go away all together or one or two at a time?—One or two at a time.
 Was your master in the room with them?—Yes he was.
 After the meeting was over, did you see any body in your master's room in company with your master?—Yes; Strange.
 Had he been at the meeting?—Yes, he had.
 On Monday evening was there a meeting?—Yes.
 On Tuesday evening was there another?—Yes.
 In the course of Wednesday did any number of persons come?—There were several persons came up at different times.
 At the different times, how many persons can you speak to having seen or heard come up?—I cannot say how many; there were several, but I cannot say how many.
 At what time in the day did they come?—Some in the morning and some in the afternoon.
 Do you remember any of them coming into your workshop?—Yes.
 Who were they?—Strange, and a man that I do not know.
 At about what time of the day was that?—At about two o'clock.

What did Strange and this other man do?—They were flinting some pistols.
 How many?—Five or six.
 Did they finish flinting them?—No.
 What prevented their finishing them?—One of the men said there were persons overlooking them, and Brunt told them to go into the back room.
 Persons overlooking them from what place?—From the opposite houses.
 From the windows of the opposite houses?—Yes.
 Did they then go into the back room?—Yes, they did.
 Was Brunt in the back room much of that day?—Yes, he was in several times.
 Did you see Thistlewood there?—Yes.
 At about what time?—About four o'clock.
 Did he ask you for any thing?—Yes.
 For what?—For a piece of writing paper.
 Did you give him some?—Yes.
 To what place did he take it?—Into the back room.
 After that did any person come out of the back room and tell you to do any thing?—Yes.
 Who was that?—Brunt.
 What did Brunt tell you to do?—To go and get some cartridge paper.
 How much?—Six sheets.
 What money did he give you to pay for it?—Six pence.
 Did you go and buy six sheets?—Yes.
 To whom did you give them?—To Brunt.
 To whom did he take them?—Into the back room.
 After this did any of them go away?—Yes.
 Did any of them go into your master's room before they went away that you remember?—Yes.
 Who was that?—I do not know the man's name.
 Did your master go away?—Yes.
 About what time?—At about six o'clock.
 After Brunt your master was gone, did you do any thing respecting your mistress's tea?—Yes.
 What did she want for the purpose of making tea?—She wanted the table.
 Where was that table?—In the back room.
 Did you, at her desire, knock at the back room door and ask for it?—Yes.
 Who answered you?—A man by the name of Potter.
 Did he give you out the table?—Yes.
 Upon the opening of the door did you see whether there were other men in the room besides Potter?—Yes.
 How many?—four or five, I cannot be certain which.
 Was there a fire there?—Yes.
 In the course of that evening, did you see the prisoner Tidd?—Yes.
 Where did you see him?—He came to Mrs. Brunt's room.
 Upon his coming there, what passed between him and Mrs. Brunt?—She took him to the cupboard and showed him a pike head and a sword.

What did she say?—She asked him what she could do with them.

What did he say?—He told her to give them to him, and he would take them away.

Did he take them away?—He did.

I do not know whether you have told me about what time that was?—Between seven and eight.

Did you see where he went to?—He went into the back room.

After that, did you hear any persons go down stairs?—Yes.

Did any person come into your mistress's room and deliver any message to her?—Yes.

What message?—A person came and said if any persons came and inquired they were to be sent to the White Hart.

Shortly after, did any persons come?—Yes. How many?—Three.

Did your mistress direct them to the White Hart?—They did not know the way to the White Hart, and I went and showed them the way. When you came back from the White Hart, did you find Potter there?—He came while I stood at the door.

Did you tell him the same?—Yes, I did.

Did he go, on your telling him?—or did you show him the way?—He went, on my telling him.

He did not require you to assist him in finding it?—No.

At about what time did your master come home?—About nine o'clock.

Was there any difference in the condition of his dress from what it had been when he went out?—Yes.

What was the difference?—His boots were very muddy and the tail of his coat.

Did he appear composed, or otherwise?—No, he seemed rather confused.

Did you hear him say any thing to his wife about what had happened?—Yes.

What did he say?—He told his wife it was all up, or words to that effect.

What more did he say?—He said that where he had been there were a lot of officers came in.

What more did he say?—Just as he was saying that, a man came in.

Did he say any thing about his life?—He said he had saved his life and that was all.

Do you know the name of that person who came in?—No, I do not.

What passed between them?—He shook hands with him, and asked him if he knew who had informed.

What answer did the man give?—He said no.

Did the man say whether any thing had happened to himself?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said he had had a terrible blow on the side, and was knocked down.

Did you judge from the maner in which they spoke to each other where they had been together?—Yes.

After that did Brunt say any thing?—He went away.

As he was going away, do you remember what Brunt said?—He said there was something to be done yet.

And they went away together?—Yes.

When they were gone, did your mistress and you go into the back room?—Yes.

What did you find there?—There were several things in the cupboard.

Was there any thing that was not in the cupboard?—Yes, there was a long pole that stood in the corner of the room.

What was there in the cupboard?—Several rolls of brown paper and tar.

Any other things?—Yes, some round balls made with string and tar all over them.

What do you understand them to be?—I have heard since that they are hand-grenades.

They are tied over with rope-yarn?—Yes.

Were they the things which the officers found the next morning?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—You will see them hereafter, gentlemen. Was there any Iron pot in the room?—Yes.

To whom did that Iron pot belong?—To Brunt.

Any flannel bags?—Yes.

Full or empty?—There were two of them full of something.

Were the things left there?—Yes.

Did your master come home again?—Yes.

At about what time?—About eleven o'clock.

Did he give you any directions what to do in the morning?—Yes.

What were they?—He told me to get up as soon as I could, and clean his boots.

In the morning did you do so?—Yes.

After you had done that, did your master ask you any question?—Yes.

What?—He asked me if I knew the Borough. I told him yes. He asked me if I knew Snow's-fields. I told him no.

Did he then give you any directions how to find Snow's-fields?—Yes.

Did he tell you to whom he wanted you to go there?—Yes, he told me I was to go to Potter, Kirby-street, Snow's-fields.

After that, did he take you into the back room?—Yes.

Did he desire you to bring any thing there?—Yes, a rush basket.

Was there any other besides the one you took?—Yes.

Who took that?—Brunt.

Did he tell you what to do with respect to those baskets?—Yes, to put those things into the baskets.

The things you had seen the night before?—Yes.

Did you put the things which you had seen the night before into the two baskets?—Yes.

Was any thing then done with respect to either of the baskets?—Yes, one of them was tied up in a blue apron of Mrs. Brunt's.

To what use had that blue apron been before applied?—It had been used as a curtain to the window of the back room.

Was the other tied up?—No.

How happened that?—Brunt went into his own room to look for something to tie it up in, and two officers came in.

Two police officers?—Yes.

And they apprehended him?—Yes.

I am not sure whether I asked you as to the number who met there on the Sunday: can you speak to the number?—There were about twenty, I think.

Joseph Hale cross-examined by Mr. Carwood.

I think you told us on Monday or Tuesday, that when you found the brown paper, you found some pieces of cartridge-paper along with it?—One piece of cartridge paper.

Were not you surprised at those meetings?—Not particularly.

Of course, perhaps you knew what they were about?—No.

Were not you surprised when you found meetings, and their having arms together there?—I never saw any arms except in Brunt's room.

You saw them putting some flints into pistols there?—Yes.

Had not you any knowledge what that was for?—No.

You knew nothing about it?—No.

Were you ever in a court of justice before?—No.

Were you ever before a magistrate?—Never till I was examined about this business.

Never about any business of your own?—No, never.

Thomas Smart sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

I believe you are one of the watchmen of the night in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square?—Yes.

Do you remember, on the night of Tuesday the 22nd February last, being on watch?—Yes, perfectly well.

Were you on watch in Grosvenor-square?—Yes.

Did you see any people there that attracted your attention?—I saw four people, very suspicious characters.

At what time?—About half-past eight, or a quarter before nine.

Was one of those people a man of colour?—One man was a man of colour, and there was a tall man along with him.

You say they were suspicious looking people, what were they apparently doing?—Peeping down the areas, and watching as if they were about no good.

What time did you leave your watch?—Seven o'clock in the morning.

Was Bissix a watchman at the time with you?—Yes, he and I met every half-hour at the end of our round, and I told him there were four suspicious characters, and to keep a look out after them.

Charles Bissix sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Are you one of the watchmen of St. George, Hanover-square?—Yes, in Grosvenor-square.

Do you remember seeing any body that attracted your attention on the 22nd of February?—On the 22nd, as I was calling "half-past eight," being then at the end of my call, and therefore about a quarter before nine, on the same side on which lord Harrowby lives, there were two men passed me, one a dark man.

Do you mean a man of colour?—Yes, it was a little darkish, within about a quarter of nine, and he asked "watchman, is it almost nine o'clock," that is the dark man, I said, "it is not nine yet, but within a few minutes of it;" that was the answer I made.

Henry Gillan sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

Do you live at No. 15 Mount-street, Berkeley-square?—Yes.

Do you ever use the Rising Sun public-house?—Yes.

Where is that?—The corner of Charles-street, and Adams-mews.

Do you recollect being there any night, and playing at dominos?—Yes.

When was that?—On Tuesday the 22nd of February.

With whom did you play?—With Brunt.

What time of the evening was it when you first saw him?—Between nine and ten o'clock.

Had you been in the public-house before he came?—Yes.

He came in between nine and ten?—Yes.

Was he alone or in company?—There was another man with him.

Had they any refreshment?—Yes.

What?—Some bread and cheese and some porter.

How long did you play at dominos?—About half an hour.

Did you leave the public-house before they went, or did they go first?—I left first.

What time did you go?—About ten o'clock I think it might be.

Henry Gillan cross-examined by Mr. Carwood.

How do you know it was the 22nd?—By the list I have when I carry out medicines.

Have you that list with you now?—No.

That is the only recollection you have of it?—Yes, it is.

John Hector Marison sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

Are you journeyman to Mr. Henry Thomas Underwood?—Yes.

He is a cutler?—Yes.

Where does he live?—In Drury-lane.

Were you with him at Christmas last?—Yes.

Do you remember at Christmas last any person bringing you a sword to sharpen?—A person brought one on Christmas-eve to be ground.

How was he dressed?—He was dressed like a butcher.

Should you know the person of the man?—Yes.

Look at the prisoner, and say whether he was the man?—That is the man.

Did he call again for the sword?—He called three days afterwards for the sword, and paid me nine-pence for doing it.

Did he give you any particular directions about the first?—Yes, to grind the point particularly sharp, and to make it cut both back and edge.

Do you mean the point?—Yes.

Was that a cut and thrust sword, or a sabre?—A very short sabre.

You did according to the directions?—Yes.

Did he bring you any other work?—Yes, about a fortnight after another sword, a very long one, a sabre; he told me to grind that as I had done the first.

Did he give any name?—It is customary for us to ask the name, and to the best of my recollection he said Eames; it might be Inga.

Edward Simpson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

Are you a corporal-major in the second life-guard?—Yes.

Do you know a man of the name of Harrison, one of the prisoners?—I know a man of the name of John Harrison.

Was he formerly in your regiment?—Yes, he was.

Do you know whether Harrison was ever on duty at King-street barracks?—Yes, I am certain he was.

How long was he there?—In the regiment?

No; at those barracks?—I cannot say exactly.

Was he there time enough to know the state of them, and where the different things were kept in the rooms?—Yes.

Would his duty make him well acquainted with them?—Yes, perfectly acquainted with them.

Do they join upon Gloucester-mews?—Part of them do.

Are there any windows looking to the Mews?—There were formerly.

How long have those windows been stopped up?—They were stopped up two or three days after the affair of Cato-street.

Was there any straw or hay or other combustible matter in any rooms communicating with those windows?—There was straw in the room communicating with the window and hay likewise.

If fire had been thrown into those windows and communicated with the straw, would the consequence have been the destruction of the barracks?—Most undoubtedly it would.

James Aldous sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

I believe you are a pawnbroker?—Yes.

Where do you carry on your business?—In Berwick-street, Soho.

Do you know the prisoner, Davidson, the man of colour?—Yes.

Did he, at any time, pledge with you a brass-barrelled blunderbuss?—Yes, he did.

Did he leave it with you, or take it out of pawn?—He redeemed it.

When was that?—On the 23rd of February.

At what time of the day?—In the morning.

Did he say any thing to you at the time he took it out?—No, he did not.

You have seen that blunderbuss again?—I have.

Did you see it in court the other day?—No, I have not.

You have seen it at Bow-street?—No, I saw it at Portman-street barracks.

Who showed it you?—Mr. Ruthven.

Thomas Hiden sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

I believe you have carried on the business of a cow-keeper and dairyman in Manchester-mews?—Yes, I have.

Do you know a man of the name of Wilson?—I do.

The prisoner?—Yes, the prisoner at the bar.

Had you known him some months before last February?—I had.

Shortly before the 23rd of February, did he make any proposition to you?—He did; he met me and asked me if I would be one of a party who were going to meet to destroy his majesty's ministers.

To destroy them where?—He told me they had got such things as I never saw, and that they had got all ready and were waiting for a cabinet dinner.

Did he say what those things you had never seen were?—He said that some of them were made of tarpaulin, and some of tin, bound round with cord, and that their strength was such, that if it was set fire to, it would heave up the walls in front of the houses where we were walking.

Did he say what they were for?—He said it was to destroy his majesty's ministers; that they were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and when there was a cabinet dinner they would let me know; and he said they were to light up some fires.

Did he say where?—He said I had no cause to be alarmed.

Did he mention any names of persons?—He mentioned some houses, he mentioned lord Harrowby's, the duke of Wellington's, lord Sidmouth's, lord Castlereagh's, the bishop of London's, and one more that I do not know; he told me that I had no occasion to be afraid, that there was a gentleman's servant who had furnished them with a certain sum of money, and if they would act upon the subject he would give them a considerable sum more.

Did he say any thing as to what would be the effect of lighting up the fires?—He said, from the lighting up of the fires, it would keep the town in a state of confusion; and in a few days it would become general.

Did he tell you what was to be the use of those things such as you had never seen?—He told me they were to be lighted with a fuse and thrown into the room, and all that escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword or some other weapon.

Did he mention to you the name of any person, or offer to introduce you to any person?—He told me, if I would make one of the party which they depended upon me for, that Mr. Thistlewood would be glad to see me.

Did you promise to make one?—I told him I would make one.

Can you tell me how many days this was before the discovery in Cato-street?—I cannot.

Did you go, before that discovery in Cato-street, and give information to any person?—I wrote a note to try to see lord Harrowby and lord Castlereagh.

To whom did you address your letter?—I wrote to lord Castlereagh.

How soon was that, do you think, after you had seen Wilson?—It might be two or three days.

Did you deliver your letter to lord Castlereagh or not?—I did not; I went, but could not see him.

Did you deliver it to lord Harrowby?—I did.

Where did you deliver it to him?—I delivered it to him in Hyde-park, at Grosvenor-gate.

Do you remember the day?—I do not.

On the day of the discovery of the persons in Cato-street, did you see this man, Wilson, again?—I did; he met me in Manchester-street, as I was going home, with a little girl in my hand.

What did Wilson say to you?—He met me and said, "Hiden, you are the very man I want to see." I said, "Wilson, what is there going to be?" He said, "To-night there is a cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's, Grosvenor-square."

What more did he say?—He said I was to be sure to come: I asked him where I should come, and he said I was to come up to John-street to the Horse and Groom.

What were you to do then?—He told me I was to go into the public house, the Horse and Groom, or to stand at the corner of Cato-street till I was shoved into a stable. I was to meet him at a quarter before six, or by six o'clock.

Did you ask him any question as to numbers?—I asked him how many there were going to be: he said, about twenty or thirty there: I asked him if that was all that was going to be: he said, it was not all, there were to be four divisions; there was a party in the Borough, another in Gray's-inn-lane, another in the City, or in Gee's-court, I am not certain which.

Did he say any thing more respecting Gee's-court?—He said all Gee's-court was in it, but they would not act unless the English began first, for they had been deceived so many times, they would not begin unless the English began first.

What countrymen do you understand inhabited Gee's-court?—I understand Irishmen; he told me Irishmen; he said all the Irish were in it.

That they would not act unless the English began?—No, for they had been deceived so many times before.

Did he tell you any thing about any place in the city?—He said, after they had been at Grosvenor-square, they meant to retreat to somewhere about the Mansion-house; that was where all parties were to meet.

Did he tell you any thing about what was to be done in other places?—He said there were some cannon they could get very easily, two pieces in Gray's-inn-lane, by knocking in of a small door.

Any thing more than knocking in a door?—Nothing more than breaking in a small door.

Did he mention any other?—He said that there were four pieces at another Artillery-ground, which they could get by only killing the sentry, but I forget where that Artillery-ground was.

Did you promise him to come?—I told him I would come; I was to be sure to be there by six, or a quarter before six.

Did you go to John-street that evening?—I went to John-street, but I was behind my time in consequence of business.

At what time did you go there?—I think it was nearly seven o'clock.

Did you see the prisoner, Wilson, there?—I saw Wilson and Davidson.

Davidson is the man of colour?—Yes, he is.

Where were they standing?—They were standing at the post, the corner of Cato-street.

Do you know Davidson again?—Yes, I had known him a long time before.

When you met there what passed?—They said "you are behind your time." I said, yes, I could not keep it.

Pass over that; what farther did he say?—He asked if I was going in, saying Mr. Thistlewood was there.

What answer did you give?—I told him I could not go in, for I must go and get some cream where I could. I asked him what time they would go away from there.

What did he say?—He told me they would go away from there about eight o'clock, and if they were gone away from there I was to follow them down into Grosvenor-square.

Did he describe the house to you?—He said the lower side, the fourth house from the further corner, that I should find them.

Was any thing more said?—Davidson said "come, you dog, come, it is the best thing you were ever in in your life."

Is that the letter you delivered to lord Harrowby [showing it to the witness].—Yes it is.

Thomas Hiden cross-examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

Is this your own writing?—Yes, it is.

How long have you been a cow-keeper?—I have been a cow-keeper these four or five years. I have been a milk-man longer than that.

How long?—About five years.

Before that you were a shoe-maker?—No.

I thought you said you belonged to a shoe-maker's club. I thought by that you were a shoe-maker?—No, I never was.

In what trade were you originally?—I am no trade at all.

What were you before that?—I have been a gentleman's servant, and was brought up to farming in the country.

Five years ago, were you a gentleman's servant?—More than five years ago.

What gentleman's service were you last in?—The last place I lived in was colonel Bridges, in South Audley-street.

How long ago?—I cannot tell.

You must tell me a little better than that?—I dare say it is six years ago.

Cannot you speak more precisely?—It may be seven years.

What number in South Audley-street?—I believe it is 69.

Did he keep house there, or was he a lodger?—A lodging-house I believe it was, but he had the whole of the house.

Whether it was a hired house, furnished by him, or taken furnished you do not know?—No.

How long did you live with him?—No great time; I cannot say exactly.

How long?—It might be a month, or it might be two or three months.

Will you swear it was a fortnight?—Yes, it was more than a fortnight.

Was it three weeks?—Yes it was.

Was it more than a month?—I cannot say; this was my last place of service.

Whom have you ever served for any length of time? I should like to know some place where you had some settlement of abode?—I lived with major Dive, in Tavistock-street, Bedford-square, a year and three months.

In what year?—I think the year 1810.

Is he alive or dead?—He was alive a little while ago.

As what? In what capacity?—As footman, there was only me there.

Did you go directly from him to colonel Bridges?—No, I did not.

Where did you go to then?—I went and lived a little while with a gentleman in Stratton-street, a gentleman of the name of Brice.

For the last five years you have been either a milk-man or a cowkeeper?—Yes.

How long have you lived in Manchester-mews?—Going on of three years.

Have you always lived there the whole of that time?—My family have lived there.

Have you always lived there the whole of that time?—My family have lived there; I have not been at home all the time myself.

How much of the time have you been away from home?—I cannot justly say; two, or three, or four months.

Where do you live now?—I am ever in the Bench now, that is my home now: I am not actually in the place.

Where have you lived? in the Rules of the Bench?—I am not in the Rules of the Bench, I am in the Marshalsea.

In the prison of the Marshalsea?—Yes.

You are not in the Bench, but in the Marshalsea; how came you to say the Bench?—No; I did not say in the Bench, to my knowledge; I did not mean it, however.

Did you not say, just now, that you were in the Bench? look at the jury, and answer?—If I said so, I meant to say in the Marshalsea.

Did you say so or not, I want no ifs.—I am in the Marshalsea.

Did you not say, just this minute, that you were in the Bench?—I cannot say that I did.

Will you, upon your oath, deny that you said so?—No, I cannot say.

You cannot say upon your oath, whether you did or not?—No.

You are in the Marshalsea?—Yes.

For how much?—For about 18*l.* 2*s.* and odd.

Due to whom?—To Mr. Powell.

What is he?—He is a milkman and cow-keeper, I believe.

How long have you been in the Marshalsea at his suit?—I went in last Saturday.

Are you there in execution, or on a bailable writ?—I went in in execution.

How long before that had you been sued by Mr. Powell?—It is some time ago, some time the beginning of last summer; I do not know exactly the time.

How did you keep off going in so long?—I was out of the way for about two months, or from that to three months.

At what period of the year was that?—I do not know at what time of the year it was.

The jury will not be satisfied with that, you must bring your faculties with you?—It may be about June, July, or August.

Was it July or August?—It might be about June, or July, or August, or the beginning of September.

Was it so late as October?—No, I think not, I was home before October.

Upon your oath, were you at your house in Manchester-mews, as you call it, at any time in July or August, except Sundays?—Yes, I was at different times besides Sundays.

Who carried on your business for you?—My wife and my sister.

Do they live there and carry on the business now?—I do not know that they are living there now, but they carry on the business there?

Mr. Gurney.—And my question was, was he living there in February last?

Mr. Adolphus.—Did not you swear on Monday that you lived in Manchester-mews?—I or my family live there.

Did not you state to-day, or on Monday, that you lived in Manchester-mews?—My family.

Do they live there then?—They do live there, or did when I left them.

Did not you say, both on Monday and to-day, that you lived in Manchester-mews?—I did live in Manchester-mews.

Upon your oath, did you or not say, in that place, on Tuesday last, that you lived on that day, in Manchester-mews?—I did not name the day, but I said that day I lived in Manchester-mews.

Did not you answer, being asked where you lived, "In Manchester-mews?"—I am living now in this place where I stand, my family lived in Manchester-mews, me and my family when I was taken away.

Did you not say on Tuesday morning, that your place of residence was in Manchester-mews?—So it was; my family was there.

Will you swear your family or you lived in Manchester-mews on Tuesday morning?—I will swear that my family live there now, for aught I know.

When did you last see any of them?—I saw some of my family there when I left.

Where are they living?—They are living there now; they have the premises; they go backwards and forwards to them.

Who told you so?—My sister told me so to-day, that they go there two or three times a-day, but I do not know that they may be there at this present time.

You mean to refer to the present moment when you give this answer?—You put me to it.

And you live where you stand, and you lived at Manchester-mews, except during the time you are standing here, and the time you are in the Marshalsea?—Yes.

But whether you have any home or abode there at this present moment you do not know?—No.

How long have you known Mr. Davidson, as you spoke of him?—I have known Mr. Davidson for these three or four months.

Do you know a Mr. Edwards at all?—I do not know Mr. Edwards.

You do not know any such person?—No.

Recollect now, try to recollect yourself, do you know Mr. Edwards?—I do not know him.

You know no person of that name?—I know a person of that name.

Then why do you say you do not know him?—I know a good many persons, but they are many miles in the country.

How do you know that I am not inquiring for the very Mr. Edwards you know?—It may be so.

How came you to answer that you do not know Mr. Edwards, and then that you do know Mr. Edwards?—I know a Mr. Edwards 200 miles in the country, but I should not suppose you meant that Mr. Edwards.

Whom should you suppose I mean?—I do not know.

Where did you carry on your business as a milkman before you went to Manchester-mews?—In Little Durweston-street, by the Edgware-road.

Have you ever frequented the Scotch Arms?—I have been to it twice.

Where is the Scotch Arms?—It is in a small court somewhere down by the Strand.

Did you attend any club or meeting there?—I attended to what they call a club; I was there twice.

With whom?—I went with a friend.

Has that friend a name?—He is a master tailor by the name of Clark.

Why is it called the shoemaker's club?—I do not know, it was called so to me.

It was not a radical meeting, was it?—I do not know what meeting it was, it was reported as a shoemaker's club.

Did politics and affairs of state appear to be the subject of conversation there?—I am sure it is so long ago I do not particularly remember.

How long might it be?—Seven or eight months, but I am not certain to a month.

As you swear so particularly to conversations, was politics the subject of conversation there?—I cannot say, for I am not used to those matters.

Was it, or not?—I cannot say, whether it was or not.

You never saw any of those gentlemen at the bar, except Mr. Davidson and Mr. Wilson?—No.

And you had no conversation about those matters, except with Wilson?—I had some conversation with Davidson.

Where was that? in John-street?—Yes.

That was when you went and were so anxious to get your cream?—Yes, I had seen Mr. Davidson repeatedly before that.

Had you conversed with him about these particular affairs before that?—Yes.

How long was the last time before that you had seen him?—I do not know exactly, it might be a week or a fortnight.

Will you swear it was not more than a fortnight?—I believe I can.

Had you been at any of the meetings at Fox-court, or any thing of that kind?—No, I never was.

Then you did not know any thing of this particular affair till Wilson told you?—Not of that, I did not till he told me.

The cream was, of course, a thing of great profit to you?—It was.

How much did you get by it?—I do not know.

A shilling?—Oh, yes.

Half a crown?—More than a shilling.

By that particular order?—Perhaps, I might gain two or three.

For whom was it?—It was for a family, but I could not state the name.

What family was it?—A family in Princes-street.

Name them?—I do not know their names, but I have served them for three or four years.

What number in Princes-street?—I believe it to be No. six.

Princes-street where?—Princes-street, Cavendish-square.

Are they house-keepers, or lodgers, or what?—They have the house, I believe.

You have served them, how long?—Three years I believe, it may be something more, or it may not be so long; I believe it is about three years.

You do not know their names?—I do not know their names.

And you had an order from them for cream that afternoon which you could not execute?—Repeatedly I have had.

You had an order from them for cream that afternoon?—Yes.

What servant gave you the order? a female or a male servant?—Our people brought home the order, I did not see them.

What people?—My wife.

Did you see any person at the house on the subject of it?—I did not go to the house.

Who informed them you could not get it?—My wife, or my sister did.

You do not know the name?—No, I do not.

Whom do you see when you go there?—I do not serve them, my wife does, I believe they do not keep a man servant.

Were you ever at the house in your life?—Many a time.

What servant have you seen there?—I have seen maid servants.

When were you there last?—I cannot say.

How long before the 23rd of February?—I am not able to say.

Do you serve them daily?—Yes.

This is the family at number six, Princes-street, Cavendish-square?—Yes.

What quantity of cream was ordered for that night?—I really do not know, I have forgot.

And yet you knew that you were to get two or three shillings by it?—We get a shilling a pint.

You are not able to say what was the quantity?—No.

That will not do; we shall probably send there to inquire?—You may do so if you please.

How much cream was ordered for that night?—It has slipped my memory.

You can only remember that you were to get some two or three shillings by it?—I only know I went for cream.

Was it more than a quart?—I believe it was.

I ask you again, was it at not more than a quart?—I am not able to say indeed.

You will not indulge me with the name of any servant in that house?—I am not able.

Do you call the servants Mary, Molly, or Betty, or what?—I cannot say indeed, we have a many without any bill every week.

Was it the first time or second time you met with Wilson that the expression was used, you had no occasion to be alarmed, for there was a gentleman's servant supplied money?—It was the first time.

Upon your oath, did you not as positively swear, on Tuesday last, it was the second time, on the 23rd of February?—No, I did not say it was the first or second time last Tuesday.

Upon your oath, was not it part of your narrative of the 23rd of February, that he said there was a gentleman's servant supplied money?—He repeated it more than once or twice.

At two separate interviews?—At two different times.

At two different interviews; you met him but twice?—I had seen him many times.

How long had you been acquainted with him before this?—I have been acquainted with him this long time.

How long?—A great while; I met him at a tailor's where I used to go repeatedly.

How long had you not seen him before you met him the first time, when you talked to him on this business?—I saw him a great number of times before, long before.

Was it at any of those times that he told you a gentleman's servant supplied them with money?—He told me when I met him in the street on the 23rd.

Had he ever told you so before?—I do not remember that he had: he said his master was a ministerial man.

Had he ever told you so before those two times?—I cannot swear that he had or had not.

Why did not you tell us on Tuesday that he told you so at the first interview?—I told you that he said so.

That would have been something more to have told Lord Harrowby?—I do not know.

Why did not you tell us that last Tuesday?—He told me so repeatedly.

How many times do you mean by repeatedly?—He told me so twice.

That you call repeatedly?—Yes.

Did you go up into the room in Cate-street, or only speak to Davidson at the door?—I never went into Cate-street, only to the corner of John-street.

Thomas Hiden re-examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Did you continue to carry on your business at Manchester-news till last Saturday?—My family.

Were you then arrested and taken to the Marshalsea?—I was.

Have you remained in custody ever since, except on your coming up here with an officer?—Yes.

As far as you know, do your family remain there still?—They have got the premises now.

About this house, in Princes-street, you said, to the best of your recollection it is No. six; are you positive of that or not?—I think it is No. six.

Your wife generally serves?—She does.

Sometimes you have gone there?—Yes, sometimes I have.

Mr. Adolphus.—My lord, I understood him to say positively it was No. six.

Mr. Gurney.—No, he did not.

Mr. Adolphus.—Will your lordship have the goodness to permit me to ask as to the description of the house, if he will not swear positively to the number?

Mr. Gurney.—I will ask those questions with pleasure: how does the house stand?—I think it is the first door on the left hand side from the square going down to Oxford-street.

Is there any name on the door that you remember?—I do not remember.

The first door from whence?—Going from Cavendish-square down into Oxford-street, on the left hand-side.

The Earl of Harrowby sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Your lordship is president of his majesty's privy council?—I am.

Is it usual for the members of his majesty's privy council, who form what is commonly called the cabinet, to have dinners at each other's houses?—It is.

In the month of February last had those dinners been interrupted by the death of his late majesty?—They had.

Did your lordship cause cards to be issued inviting the members of the cabinet council to dine with you on Wednesday the 23rd of February?—I did, the latter end of the preceding week.

If nothing had occurred would that dinner have taken place?—Certainly.

Will your lordship have the goodness to enumerate the company who would then have been assembled?—The lord Chancellor; the earl of Liverpool, first lord of the Treasury; Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the Exchequer; earl Bathurst, secretary of State for the Colonial Department; lord Castlereagh, secretary of State for the Foreign Department; lord Sidmouth, secretary of State for the Home Department; lord Melville, first lord of the Admiralty; the earl of Westmorland, lord Privy Seal; the duke of Wellington, master of the Ordnance; Mr. Canning, president of the India Board; Mr. Bathurst, chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the Mint; the earl of Mulgrave; and Mr. Robinson, president of the Board of Trade.

Fourteen besides your lordship?—Yes.

Are all those whom you have named, my lord, members of the privy council?—They are.

Your lordship's house we have heard is situated in Grosvenor-square?—On the South side of Grosvenor-square, next door to the Archbishop of York's.

On Tuesday the 22nd of February was your lordship riding in the Park?—I was.

Were you accosted by a person of the name of Hiden?—I was accosted by a person whose name I did not know, but now know it to be Hiden.

Did he deliver that letter to your lordship, addressed to my lord Castlereagh [handing it to his lordship]?—He did.

Did he speak to you of it as of business of immediate importance?—He spoke to me of it as of business materially importing lord Castlereagh as well as myself, and some others, and wished it to be delivered immediately to my lord Castlereagh.

I believe your lordship was going at that moment to the council, and delivered it to lord Castlereagh shortly after?—I was going home to dress for a council at Carlton Palace, and not finding lord Castlereagh there, I despatched it with a note from myself to lord Castlereagh.

Did Hiden, at your lordship's desire, give you his card?—He did.

Did you meet him the next morning in Hyde-park, by some appointment you made?—I did.

In the plantation in the park?—I met him in the plantation in the place which is called the ring.

I am not at liberty to ask your lordship the particulars of the communication he made to you, but did he communicate to you, that there was any plan of attacking the cabinet ministers at your house?—That communication is contained in the letter: he made a communication in more general terms.

In consequence of the information you received, did your lordship and the other members of the cabinet alter the plan of the dinner?—The plan of the dinner was given up for that day.

Your lordship dined at Fife-house, at lord Liverpool's?—I did.

Did the preparations at your lordship's house proceed as if the company had been to dine there?—They proceeded as if the company had been to dine there, till they were stopped by a note I sent from lord Liverpool's, to inform my servant that they would not dine there, which, being despatched between seven and eight from Fife-house, I conceived reached my own house about eight o'clock.

You had concealed from your servant the alteration of the plan?—Yes.

The Earl of Harrowby cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

I must ask your lordship a question: you said before, I believe, that you had some intimation of this before that letter was delivered to you?—Yes, I did.

Did not your lordship know, or had not you regular communications of all that passed at those meetings?—I had no communication of what passed at any of those meetings personally.

You had intimation that something of the kind was in contemplation?—We had an intimation at a period antecedent to this, of a design somewhat of this kind being in contemplation.

Mr. Gurney.—I beg your lordship's pardon, but I omitted to point out to you Hiden; is that the person who made the communication to your lordship?—He is.

John Baker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you lord Harrowby's butler?—Yes.

Did you, by his lordship's direction, issue cards of invitation for a cabinet dinner, on Wednesday the 23rd of February?—I did.

Brant.—My lord, here are three or four of the witnesses in court, giving each other their evidence.

Mr. Gurney.—They may go out of court, they will not be wanted again. On what day did you issue the cards?—Either the 18th or 19th; I believe Saturday the 19th.

We have understood that the preparations went on till a late hour in the evening?—They did till about eight.

When did you receive notice from his lordship that the dinner would not take place?—It might be about eight o'clock, or ten minutes after.

To that period neither you nor any of the servants knew it would not take place?—No, they did not.

John Monument sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you come here in custody?—I do.

You are a prisoner in the Tower?—Yes.

Do you remember at any time meeting Thistlewood at the house of a person of the name of Ford?—Yes.

As nearly as you can recollect how long is that ago?—I suppose it was between two and three months before the meeting in Cato-street.

After you had so met him, did he call upon you?—Yes.

How soon afterwards?—I suppose about a fortnight or three weeks.

Did he call alone, or was there any person in company with him?—The prisoner Brant was in company with him.

Was any person in the room besides yourself, when he called?—Yes, my mother and my brother.

How long did he stay with you?—I suppose he was in the room about five minutes, when he called me to the outside of the door, saying he wished to speak with me.

When you went outside the door with him did Brant go with him or not?—No, he did not.

You and he went outside the door?—Yes.

What did he then say to you?—He said that great events were at hand; that people were every where anxious for a change; that he had been promised support by many people who had deceived him, but now he had got men that would stand by him.

What did he say further in that conversation?—He asked me whether I had any arms.

What did you say?—I told him, no.

What did he answer to that?—He said that no man should be without arms; he said every man that belonged to him had got some; some had got a sabre, some had got a pistol, and some a pike: he said that I might buy a pistol for about four or five shillings. I said I had no money to buy pistols; he then said he would see what he could do.

Do you recollect whether any further conversation took place at that time?—No, I do not think there did.

After that conversation passed did you return again into the room?—Yes.

Did Brant and Thistlewood go away together?—Yes, they did.

After this interview did Brant call upon you by himself?—Yes, he did.

How soon afterwards did he call?—About two or three days, I believe.

Did any thing particular pass at that interview?—No, I do not recollect that there did: he said he was in a hurry, that there were several people down stairs waiting for him, and he was going to call on several men, people in our trade.

Do you remember Brant calling upon you on Tuesday the 22nd of February?—Yes.

Did he call alone, or in company with any person?—In company with Tidd.

As nearly as you can recollect, at what time of the day?—I think it was between two and three o'clock.

When he called, at that time will you tell us what passed?—Yes; I said I thought I had lost you: he said the king's death had made an alteration in their plans. I asked him what plans: he said there would be a meeting on the following evening, at Tyburn-turnpike, where I should know all the particulars.

What did he say further?—He turned round to Tidd, and asked whether he should give me the word: and Tidd said, yes; he supposed there was no danger.

Upon that, what did he say?—He told me if I saw any people about, I was to go to them and say b, u, t, and if they were friends they would answer t, o, n.

Making the word button?—Yes; he then said he would be at our house the following morning and tell me further particulars.

Did any thing more pass at that meeting?—No: he and Tidd then went away.

On the following day did Brant call upon you, on the Wednesday?—Yes.

About what hour?—Between four and five.

Did he call alone or in company?—Alone.

What did he say?—He called me down stairs.

Was any body in the room above stairs?—Yes, my mother: he told me he wanted me to go in half an hour with him.

What said you to that?—I told him I could not, that I had got some work to do that must be finished, and that I could not go at that time.

What did he then say?—He asked me what time the work would be done; I told him not before six o'clock.

Upon your telling him not before six, what did he say to you?—He said I must go to Tidd's house, and he told me where Tidd lived.

Where was that?—In the Hole-in-the-wall passage, Brook's-market.

After he had told you this, did he go away?—Yes.

Did you, in pursuance of the directions he had given you, go to Tidd's house?—Yes, about half-past six.

Did you find him at home?—Yes.

What did he say to you?—He said that he was waiting for some more men, and they had not come; and he said that he would not wait later than seven o'clock.

Did any persons arrive before seven?—No.

When seven o'clock came, what did Tidd do?—He went to a box in a corner of the room, and took out a pistol.

What did he do with it?—He put it into a belt which he had got round his body, under a great coat.

What else did he do?—He took a bundle of pikes, I suppose about six or eight, wrapped in a piece of brown paper.

Pikes, or the heads of pikes?—The heads of pikes, about six or eight.

What did he do with them?—He took them in his hand.

Did he take any thing further?—Yes, a staff about four feet long.

Did you take notice of that?—Yes, it had a hole to receive something at the end.

Where did he then go?—He went down stairs, and through Brook-street, into Holborn.

Did you accompany him?—Yes, I did.

And up Holborn, I suppose?—Yes.

While you were going along Holborn, did he state any thing to you, or had you any conversation with him as to the business he was going on?—No, in Holborn he gave me the stick to carry.

Where had you conversation with him as to the object?—I think as we were going along Oxford-street.

Will you state what that conversation was?—I asked him what we were going about, and he said I should know when we got there. I asked him whether we were going to the House of Commons.

What did he say?—He said no, there were too many soldiers about there. I then asked him again, and he told me they were going to Grosvenor-square.

Did he say where in Grosvenor-square?—No, he did not. I asked him whether any one in particular lived there, and he said there was a cabinet dinner there that evening.

Did any thing further pass?—No, I do not recollect any thing further.

Where did he conduct you to?—To Cato-street.

To what place in Cato-street?—Through a gateway, and on the right-hand side there was a stable.

When you got to Cato-street to the gateway, what happened?—There were two people standing under the gateway.

Do you know who they were?—No, it was quite dark, and I did not stand close to them myself; I stood a few steps behind him.

Had he any conversation with these people?—Yes, he spoke a few words to them.

After that, did you go into the stable?—Yes.

What did you observe on your first entrance into the stable?—There were three or four men there, and there was a light, and he asked whether Mr. Thistlewood was up stairs.

What was the answer?—Yes, they told him he was.

Did you go up stairs?—Yes.

Was there any body in the room up stairs?—Yes, I suppose about one, or two, or three-and-twenty people, according to what I could tell.

Was Thistlewood of the number?—Yes.

Was there any table, or any thing like a table there?—A bench.

What kind of a bench?—It seemed to me like a carpenter's bench.

Was there any thing upon it?—Yes, a great many swords and pistols.

Did Tidd go up stairs?—Yes.

When you got up stairs, after you were there, was any thing said as to what they were going to do?—Yes, there was a man in a brown great coat sitting on a low bench on the opposite side from where I entered, and he spoke about the impropriety of going with so small a party as five-and-twenty men to lord Harrowby's, and Thistlewood said that that number was quite sufficient, for, supposing lord Harrowby had sixteen men servants, he only wanted fourteen men to go into the room, and therefore that number was quite sufficient. He then said what should they do when the business was done, when they came out of the room, because most likely a crowd would be about the door, and how should they escape.

That was the man that was addressing Thistlewood?—Yes; Thistlewood said "You know this is the smallest body;—the largest body is already away;" the prisoner Davidson then told him not to throw cold water upon their proceedings.

To whom did he say this?—To the man in the brown coat, for if he was afraid of his life he might go, as they could do without him.

By Davidson do you mean the man of colour?—Yes; Brunt then said, that sooner than they should leave the business they were going about, he would go into the room by himself, and blow them all up, if he perished with them; he said, "you know we have got that that can do it," or words to that effect; the man in the brown great coat said, though he did not like going with so small a number, yet as they were all for it, he would not be against it; he then proposed that they should put themselves under the orders of Mr. Thistlewood; Thistlewood said, that every one engaged in that business would have the same honour as himself; he then proposed that the fourteen men to go into the room should volunteer from among the persons that were in the room.

After Thistlewood had so proposed, what was done?—A few minutes afterwards, I suppose about eleven or twelve or thirteen out of the fourteen, ranged themselves on the other side of the room, and one of them, Tidd, came out to speak to me to say that I might choose my situation, and Thistlewood put him back, saying, "you all know your places." I could not understand all that Tidd said to me, I do not recollect any thing particular passing after that, till the officers came into the room.

How soon afterwards did the officers come into the room?—I should suppose about five minutes.

What happened when they came into the room?—There seemed to be two or three got up stairs before those in the room knew it, and one of those said they were officers, and told them to surrender, and said there was a guard of soldiers below.

Were you afterwards taken into custody in the room?—Yes.

And you have been in confinement ever since?—Yes.

John Monument cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

Mr. Thistlewood said, that every man would have equal honour with himself?—Yes.

What was to be your honourable post?—Indeed I do not know.

What led you there? was it the love of honour?—No, it was fear principally that led me there.

What fear could take you there?—The day before, when Mr. Brunt was at my house accompanied by Tidd, he said that any one that had engaged in that, and who did not come forward at the time would be destroyed.

Had you then engaged?—I had not engaged; he had not asked me no further than to go to the place.

Do you go to a place at the request of any man to do you do not know what?—It was foolish, but I certainly did.

You were foolish?—Yes, I cannot charge myself with any crime.

You asked, as they were going along Oxford-street, whether they were going to the House of Commons?—Yes.

Why did you ask that? did you suppose they were going there?—I was afraid it was something bad when I saw him take the arms.

What made you suspect they were going to the House of Commons?—I do not know any thing particular that made me suspect that.

To hear the debates perhaps?—No.

He told you it was a cabinet dinner?—Yes.

I think you used these words on Tuesday, "And then I fully understood what they were going about?"—Yes.

Then what did you fully understand they were going about?—I do not know that I said that exactly; but that I asked no further question, because I was certain what it was.

What did you then suppose they were going for?—I could not see that they could be going for any thing but to destroy the persons there assembled.

And you would very readily join in any thing of this sort?—No, I would not.

Had you belonged to none of those meetings before?—To the private meeting do you mean?

Yes, to the private meetings?—No, I did not.

How should those wicked men come to ask you, so honest a man, to join in this?—I do not know; I had first seen Mr. Thistlewood at Mr. Ford's house.

That was just after the Manchester business?—No, about a week before the meeting in Finsbury-market.

When was the Finsbury meeting?—I cannot say.

It was after the Manchester meeting?—Yes.

Then it was that Mr. Thistlewood told you that he thought all his friends should have arms?—Yes.

When Brunt called upon you, you told him you were not ready to go because you had got some work to do?—Yes.

What took you to Tidd's if you did not like this business?—Because I was afraid.

Why did not you go to a magistrate and tell him your fears?—That was a thing I should not like to have done.

He told you there was a by-word, a password?—Yes.

And you very readily agreed to go with him?—Not very readily.

You expressed a great deal of reluctance?—I cannot say I did, I was afraid to do that.

When you found yourself in a trap and taken, then your conscience came to you, did it?—It was to me before, for I never intended to do any thing, though I was obliged to go; when I found what they were upon, my intention was, when I got out, to have got away from them.

I think you told us of a conversation in which Thistlewood or somebody told a man in a brown coat, if he was afraid to join them he might go away, for they wanted no cowards there?—Yes.

Why did not you take advantage of that?—I wished, at the time, he had said so to me.

You thought it was only the man in the brown coat that might go?—Yes.

You joined them from fear?—Yes.

You proceeded from fear?—I did not know what their proceedings were at first.

You did it at a hazard?—I certainly acted very foolishly.

That is very tender, do not you think you acted very infamously?—No, I cannot say that.

Thomas Monument sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor-General.

I believe the last witness is your brother?
—Yes.

Did you know of your brother having seen Thistlewood at Ford's?—Yes, I had heard him mention it.

Did Thistlewood afterwards call upon him at his lodgings?—Yes, he did.

Do you live with your brother?—Yes.

Did Thistlewood call alone, or in company with any person?—He called in company with Brunt.

Did Thistlewood and your brother remain in the room all the time? or what occurred?—
They remained in the room some time, I suppose about ten minutes, and then Thistlewood asked my brother if he could speak to him.

Upon Thistlewood asking this of your brother, what happened?—They went outside the door.

Did they afterwards return into the room?
—Yes.

Do you remember Brunt calling upon your brother, on Tuesday the 22nd of February?—
Yes.

Do you recollect the conversation that passed at that time?—Yes, I do; Brunt brought a man of the name of Tidd with him; when they came into the room, my brother said to Brunt, "I thought I had lost you;" there was something said concerning the king's death.

By whom?—My brother, I think, said the king is dead since I saw you.

Do you recollect distinctly what was said about the king's death?—No, I cannot recollect exactly; Brunt said the king's death had made some alteration in their plans; my brother said "what plan?" he said their plans were different, they had different objects in view; then Brunt said to Tidd, "suppose we give them the outline of the plan:" but I do not know whether Tidd made any answer, and Brunt told us we were to meet up at Tyburn-turnpike, on the following evening at six o'clock; then they give us the pass word.

What was that?—It consisted of the letters b, u, t.

Who were to say the letters b, u, t?—We were, and if any of their party were there, they would answer t, o, u; and by that, we should know them.

Was that all that passed at that time, that you recollect?—Yes, they went away then.

Do you remember Brunt coming the next day?—Yes, it was near five o'clock in the evening.

What did he say?—He asked my brother if he was ready to go; he said, he could not go just then, for we were about finishing some work; he told him if he called upon Tidd in Hole-in-the-wall-passage, he would take him.

What time did your brother go, as nearly as you can recollect?—It was within a very few minutes of seven o'clock, when he left off.

You did not see him again that night?—I never saw him afterwards, till I saw him in custody.

George Caylock sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—At No. 2, Cato-street.
Do you remember on the 23rd of February last, seeing any person that attracted your attention in Cato-street?—Yes.

Who was it?—Mr. Harrison.

You had known him before?—Yes, I had.
Do you see him in court?—Yes, he is the gentleman that is standing there [pointing to the bar].

Where did you see him?—He was going into the stable, I asked him how he did, and he the same to me.

Did you ask him what he was going there for?—Yes, he said he had taken two chambers, and was going to clean them up.

Had you any further conversation with him?
—No, none.

In the course of the same evening, did you see any persons going into and coming out of the stable?—Yes.

At what time?—From five to seven, I saw different persons going in and out.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—There is no doubt that persons were going in and out; they were found there.

Mr. Solicitor General.—It is immaterial, certainly, my lord. I will call Ruthven.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

You are a constable at Bow-street?—I am.

In consequence of information, did you go to Cato-street on the 23rd of February with a party of the officers?—I did.

At what time did you get there?—About six.

Where did you muster?—The first information I had of going to the stable was about half-past eight; then we mustered at the corner.

What time did you enter the stable?—
About half-past eight, as near as could be.

Whom did you observe on going in?—I observed a man walking backwards and forwards with a gun on his shoulder, and a sword by his side, as a sentinel.

What sort of a man was that?—I cannot say, for I did not stop one instant. I said to the party with me, "secure that man," and went up stairs.

There was a ladder?—Yes.

Who proceeded with you up stairs?—Myself, then next Ellis, and then Smithers and Gibbs, as I have been since told, but I did not see him.

When you got into the loft, what did you observe?—I observed several men standing round a bench.

What do you mean by a bench?—There was a carpenter's bench in the room.

How many men might there be in the room?

as neatly as you can state?—About four or five and twenty.

Did you perceive any thing on the bench?—There was; I heard a clattering of arms, and saw some persons apparently sorting the arms on the bench.

Did you or Ellis say any thing?—I said, "We are officers; seize their arms."

Before you got up the stairs, before you gained the loft, had any thing been said by any person below?—I am not aware of it; I cannot call it to my recollection.

Upon your saying this, what did any one do?—Thistlewood looked up, caught up a sword, and retired into a little room; I think there were three or four retired into the little room and the others into the back part.

Was there a little room going out of the larger room?—There was, on the right of the bench as we went up.

Lord Chief Baron.—Which of the two side rooms?—The further one, my lord, next the street.

Mr. Bolland.—Did you know the person of Thistlewood?—I did, well.

How long had you been acquainted with him?—From the time of the state trials before, two or three years ago.

Where was Smithers?—Smithers then appeared on my right hand.

Did you hear Ellis say any thing to the party?—I did not.

What did Smithers do?—In approaching the door where Thistlewood had retired,

Did he then approach the door?—Yes.

Did he pass you?—He did.

Upon his approaching that door, was any thing done by any of the parties within that room?—Thistlewood stabbed him with a sword; he was fencing, to prevent any person approaching that door.

You saw him fencing before Smithers approached him?—Yes, and on his approaching him, he put his arm forward in this way.

Was any thing else done from that room?—Not that I saw.

Did you hear any thing?—A pistol was fired almost instantly on Smithers being stabbed, and the lights were put out.

What happened when darkness came on?—I then heard from that corner of the room where the little room was, some voice crying "Kill the b——rs, throw them down stairs."

Did the parties keep their original stations in the room, or withdraw themselves to the end of it?—On their saying that, I heard a rush towards the staircase.

Did you join in that rush?—I did.

Did you say any thing?—I did, upon their saying "Kill the b——rs, throw them down stairs," I said, "Aye damn them kill them," or "Aye kill them," or something of that kind.

Did you get down the ladder?—I did.

When you got down was there any light in the stable below?—There was not when I got down.

Where did you then go?—I got into John-street and met the soldiers.

Did you return to the stable?—I did.

Upon getting to the stable did you see either of the prisoners?—I did; Tidd.

Where did you see Tidd?—I saw him coming from the door.

Do you mean only coming from the door, or coming out of the door?—Coming out of the door; the door was open, and he was coming from it.

Was he walking or running?—Between the two, a sort of shuffle.

Had he any thing in his hand?—I did not observe that at that time.

What did you do?—I called to somebody following me to lay hold of him, and immediately upon my saying that he lifted his arm, and I saw a pistol.

Upon your seeing that did you seize him?—I did; I fell, and pulled him upon me on the dung heap.

Did the soldiers come up and extricate you?—They did.

Who extricated you?—Serjeant Legg and some of the men.

Did you take Tidd any where?—I did to a public-house called the Horse and Groom, the corner of Cato-street.

Was he searched?—I searched him.

What did you find upon him?—Two ball cartridges.

Where were they?—In his breeches pocket.

Was he accoutred at all?—He had a belt round his waist.

Was any other prisoner brought in, while you were there?—There was Bradburn.

Did you search him?—I did.

What did you find upon him?—In his breeches pocket I found six ball cartridges, and three loose balls.

Was he accoutred at all?—Round his waist there was a string five or six times round.

Would that string have answered the purpose of a belt for a pistol?—It would.

Was any other prisoner brought in?—Davidson.

What arms did he exhibit?—When he came in he began to sing a song, "Scots wha ha' wi' Wallace bled," and damned any man that would not die in liberty's cause, that he gloried in it.

Was he at all accoutred?—I did not observe it.

Did you search him?—I believe he was searched by another.

Was Wilson brought in while you were there?—He was.

I do not know whether you searched him or not?—I did not.

After this had passed at the public-house, did you return to the loft?—I did.

In what state was the loft, on your return?—There were several soldiers and four of the prisoners at the bar in the room, and some of the officers.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—What happened

when Smithers received this threat with the sword?—He fell back and said, "Oh, my God," or "Oh, I am done," I do not know which.

Mr. Bolland.—He very soon died?—Directly, I heard no more.

When you returned to the loft, did you find any arms?—Yes, I did.

What arms did you find?—Two swords,

We have now a list of all the arms which were found, and by whom; have you made an inventory of those arms?—I have.

Look at that, and say, whether it is an accurate account; did you make that yourself [handing a paper to the witness].—I did, I found two swords and one bullet, ten hand-grenades, and two fire balls.

These, you personally found?—Yes.

Is that a list of all the things in your custody, stating the respective places where they were found?—Yes.

Go on with your list.

Mr. Adolphus.—State the places where they were found.—Likewise one large one that I found, and which has been in my custody ever since.

Mr. Bolland.—What is that?—A thing filled with powder; it is something similar to the others, only much larger.

Has it a fuse to it?—Yes.

Read that list.—Thirty-eight ball cartridges, found by serjeant Lott; a firelock and a bayonet, by corporal Strickland; one powder flash, by James Edgar; three pistols and one sword, with six bayonet spikes and a cloth belt; one blunderbuss; one pistol; fourteen bayonet spikes and three pointed files; one bayonet; one bayonet spike and one sword scabbard; one carbine and bayonet; two swords; one bullet; ten hand-grenades; two fire balls; one large grenade and bayonet; the one I spoke of, and that was found in my presence, and that has been in my custody ever since; a rope ladder; one sword stick; forty ball cartridges; one bayonet and three loose balls; these were all found in the loft; in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball cartridges; three balls and some string put round him to act as a belt; one pistol that Tidd fired; a pistol that Wilson attempted to fire.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—You had not mentioned that Tidd fired.—The pistol that Tidd lifted his arm to fire he did fire, after he was partly lying on me on the ground. There were found in the stable, a blunderbuss; a sword, belt, and scabbard; one pistol; one ditto and one sword; twelve sticks with ferules: in the pocket of Tidd, two ball cartridges, and round him a leathern belt.

Mr. Bolland.—What sort of sticks were those?—They are long sticks, I should think six or seven feet long, perhaps eight, I am not quite sure; in the end there is a hole; two ball cartridges found facing the stable, and ten ball cartridges found thrown away in Newnham-street: one musket cut down, and one sword taken from Davidson: one haversack; cross belts; one pricker; bayonet scabbard; cartouche box, and a belt round his body, those were on Davidson: two haversacks; one belt and tin powder case taken from Ings: four pistol balls; one pistol key, and a knife case from Ings: a case to receive a large knife; one haversack, containing seventeen ball cartridges; three balls; one pistol flint; one pricker; one worm for drawing cartridges; one knife and a turn screw. I also got a stick which was left in the public-house.

Before you left the public-house where Davidson and Bradburn expressed themselves as you have stated, did Wilson express any thing?—Yes; he said he did not care a damn, he knew it was all over, they might as well kill him now as another time.

Before you went to the stable did you go to the Horse and Groom?—I did.

While you were there did either of the prisoners come there?—Cooper and Gilchrist came in.

Had Cooper or Gilchrist any thing with them?—Cooper had a stick.

What sort of a stick was it?—A mopstick or broomstick.

Did he leave it in the house or take it out with him?—He left it in the house.

Did you take possession of it?—Not directly. I did afterwards, that night, and have it now.

Did either of the prisoners come back for that stick?—Gilchrist did.

You say it is a mopstick?—It is.

Is there any thing particular about it?—At the end it is cut round that depth [two inches], as if to receive the socket of any thing.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

You say the lights were put out; how many lights were there?—As nearly as I can tell, in the two rooms, about eight. I think about four or five in the first room, the loft, and two or three in the end room where they retired to; but this I guessed from the glare of light that appeared.

The four or five in the loft, or first room, you could see?—I could.

You have no doubt there were four or five lights?—I have no doubt.

The words you said were very properly coming up "We are officers; seize their arms?"—Yes.

Nothing else? did Ellis say any thing else?—Not that I heard.

Did Smithers say any thing more than "Let me come forward," and when he received the blow, "Oh my God?" or, "Oh I am done?"—No.

Those were all the words that passed?—Yes, all that I heard.

James Ellis sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

You, I believe, are one of the conductors of the patrol at Bow-street?—I am.

On the evening of Wednesday, the 23rd of February, did you go with other officers to a stable in Cato-street?—I did.

Did you enter the stable close to Ruthven?—As close as I possibly could enter.

Did you find a light in the stable?—There was a light.

Did you find any men in the stable?—There were two.

Where was the man standing whom you observed first?—The first man I observed was standing about half-way between the door at which we entered, and the foot of the ladder which goes up into the loft.

Is that ladder placed at the further end of the stable?—At the further end, in the very corner, opposite the door at which we went in.

Who was that man?—I believe him to be Davidson.

The man of colour?—Yes; I took him by the collar, and turned him half round, and looked in his face, and I believe him to be Davidson.

How was he accoutred?—He had got a short gun, or carbine, in his hand, carrying it in somewhat of this manner [describing it], and at his left-hand side a long sword hanging, and two white belts across his shoulders.

You say you took him by the collar, and turned him half round?—Yes, and I looked in his face, and saw he was a man of colour; I immediately desired some of the others who were with me to secure that man.

Did you observe any other man?—Yes, there was another man in the further stall of the stable, near the ladder; he appeared to be a shorter man.

How was he dressed?—I believe he had got a dark coloured coat on, but I took but very little notice of him.

Did you follow Ruthven up the ladder?—I did.

Did you hear Davidson say any thing to the persons above?—I heard somebody from below call out something—"men," the last word was "men," but I could not understand the rest.

Did you understand it to be a signal to those above?—I did.

You say you followed Ruthven up the ladder, who followed you?—Richard Smithers.

As you ascended the ladder, did you hear any noise in the loft?—I did.

What did you hear?—I heard a noise, which appeared to me to be a rattling of swords.

When you got up the ladder who then spoke?—Ruthven.

What did he say to the best of your recollection?—He called out, "We are officers; seize their arms," or, "we are officers, surrender your arms," or to that effect.

Were there lights in the loft?—Yes, there were.

What were they?—There were candles.

How many do you remember seeing?—I am positive there were three or more, but I cannot speak to how many there were; there were three lights or more in the loft; there were lights in the little room, from the shade which I saw, but I could not see what lights they were.

Where were those candles placed?—Apparently on the carpenter's bench which stood across the room.

Upon Ruthven, and yourself, and Smithers getting into the loft, what did you observe take place?—The moment I gained the top of the ladder, I observed a number of men falling back to the back part of the loft, with their backs to the wall, placing themselves against the wall.

Did you see Thistlewood?—I did.

What did he do?—There were Thistlewood, and two or three others between the end of the carpenter's bench, and the door of the little room; and immediately on my gaining the top of the ladder, Thistlewood presented his sword at me, and shook his hand in this manner, as if to make a stab. I immediately desired him to desist, or I would fire at him.

Had you a pistol in your hand?—I had a pistol in my right hand, and my truncheon or staff in my left hand, which I held out in this manner [describing it].

Upon that what did Thistlewood do?—Upon that he retreated, backing into the little room, through the little door; at that moment Smithers having gained the top of the ladder, rushed forward to enter the door of the little room.

What did Thistlewood do upon his approaching the door?—At the moment that he reached the jamb of the door, Thistlewood made a thrust and stabbed him in the right breast.

Upon that what did Smithers say or do?—He held up his hands in this way over his head, and exclaimed, "Oh my God!" or words of that kind.

Did he fall immediately afterwards?—He fell almost immediately, he staggered past me and fell.

Upon this what did you do?—At the moment that he threw up his hands and exclaimed "Oh my God!" I fired.

At whom?—At Thistlewood.

You fired your pistol?—I did.

As soon as you had done that, what became of the lights?—The lights were all put out the moment that I fired, the flash of my own pistol was the last light I saw.

I presume great confusion took place immediately?—There was a great confusion.

Were you forced down the ladder into the stable?—By the rush made against me I was thrown down the ladder.

Were there any other shots fired?—There were several fired in the loft while I was upon the ladder.

Did you get to the door of the stable?—Upon recovering myself in the stable I got to the door.

Were any shots fired then?—There were two or three shots fired then; two, I think, passed me in the door.

From whence do you think they were fired?—I could not distinctly tell.

Did you perceive any fired from the window of the little room?—There was another shot fired in the stable by a man who stood near the bottom of the ladder; he fired up the manger.

When you got to the door did you observe any firing from the window of the room above?—There were some shots fired from the window of the little room above.

That room looks into Cato-street?—It does.

While you were at that door did you observe any man in Cato-street?—I heard the cry of "Stop him," and I observed a man running away.

Was he running down Cato-street?—Yes, running towards Queen-street.

What did you observe upon him?—I observed he had got white belts.

Do you mean cross belts?—Yes.

Did you pursue him?—I pursued him.

Did you catch him?—I caught him in Cato-street.

Whom did he turn out to be?—Davidson, the man of colour.

Upon your laying hold of him what did he do to you?—He made something of a cut with his sword.

Do you mean a cut at you?—I believe it was intended at me.

Did any other persons come up and assist you in securing him?—Yes, they did.

Who were they?—One of our people of the name of Gill, and another of the name of Chapman.

Did you leave him in the custody of your brother officers, and return to the stable?—I did, as soon as I had secured him I returned as quick as possible.

Did you then find lieutenant Fitzclarence and the soldiers there?—I found the soldiers there, I do not know whether lieutenant Fitzclarence was in the place.

Did you find any of the prisoners who had been taken in the loft or the stable?—There were four men; they were not in actual custody, but they could do no harm; they were in the loft among the soldiers.

Who were they?—I cannot speak very positively; Monument was one, and I believe Wilson was another, I think Strange was another, but I am not positive.

I believe you fetched Davidson to the loft?—As soon as they were secured I fetched him into the loft to them.

Then they were taken away to Bow-street?—Yes.

William Westcott sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

—You are also a conductor of the patrol at Bow-street?—I am.

VOL. XXXIII.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Are you going to fresh facts?

Mr. Gurney.—Yes, my lord, I am; did you accompany Ruthven and Ellis and the other officers of the stable in Cato-street?—I did.

You, I believe, did not go up into the loft at first?—No, I did not.

When they had gone up did you hear any noise of firing, or any confusion above?—I did.

Did you observe any person in the stable?—I did.

Whom did you observe?—Ings.

The prisoner Ings?—Yes.

At the first moment that you observed him what was he doing or attempting to do?—I did not see him attempt to do any thing; he rushed towards me as if attempting to get out of the stable.

What did you do?—I seized him by the collar,

And did what?—And shoved him back against the wall, at the foot of the ladder.

What did he then do?—He went to put his hand of his right side; upon that I hit him a blow.

As you thought to get a weapon?—Yes.

Upon that you hit him a blow?—Yes, upon the right side of the head, and knocked him down, then they came tumbling down the ladder.

Then the officers came tumbling down the ladder?—Yes, they did.

Did you hear the firing above?—O yes.

After you had heard that firing above, and they had tumbled down, did you see the flash of any pistol any where?—I did, from the bottom of the ladder.

Where did it appear to you that pistol was fired into?—As it appeared to me, it was fired into the stable.

Did you then observe any person come down whom you knew?—I did.

Where was that?—When the man came from the ladder into the stable, I saw it was Thistlewood.

Did that appear to you to be the man who had fired that pistol?—He did.

What did Thistlewood do?—When he came into the stable he turned round and presented a pistol to my head, but I released Ings, and I put my hand up to save myself, and the ball came here [pointing to his arm].

Did the pistol go off?—Yes it did; I put my hand up to save my head, and found myself wounded.

Did the pistol go off?—Yes, it did.

You left Ings to protect yourself?—Yes.

You found a pistol presented at you and it went off?—Yes.

And went where?—I found it had wounded my hand, and there were three holes in my hat, and one on the right side did not come through. I received then a violent blow on the right side of my head, and I fell.

Did it hurt your hand?—Yes.

Did it perforate the sleeve?—Yes, it went right through.

And through the hat?—Yes.

3 X

As you fell did you observe Thistlewood do any thing?—He immediately cut at me with a sword.

And what did he do then?—He rushed out at the stable door.

I omitted to ask you whether when Ruthven, Ellis, and Smithers went up the ladder, you heard either of them say any thing to the persons in the loft?—I heard somebody say something, but who it was I cannot say: I heard somebody say something, but I cannot say what.

A Juryman.—What became of Ings when he knocked you down?—He made his escape out of the stable.

When you raised your arm to ward off the blow that was aimed from a musket or pistol, by Thistlewood, you let Ings go?—Yes.

And he made his escape?—Yes.

Lake Nixon sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you a Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Did you go with the other officers to this stable in Cato-street?—Yes, I did.

Did you see Westcoatt in conflict with any person there in the stable?—Yes.

With whom?—With that man there.

Which, Ings?—Yes.

Did you see Ings leave the stable?—I did, I made a snatch at him to catch him, but missed him.

Was that after Thistlewood had got away?—No, I do not think he had got away then.

You made a snatch at him to catch him?—Yes, and he got out; I ran after him up John-street, but he was got so far.

Did you meet him in custody?—As I was going up John-street, I heard a pistol fired, or something of that kind.

You heard a pistol fired?—Yes.

Did you find him in custody of any persons?—I found him in the custody of Brooks and Champion.

Joseph Champion sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Did you go to this place, Cato-street, on the evening of the 23rd of February?—Yes.

Do you remember Ruthven going into the stable?—I do.

Did you follow him to the foot of the ladder?—I was about the sixth or seventh man behind him; I was at the foot of the ladder when he was at the top.

Whom did you see at the bottom?—Ings.

Did he cry out any thing?—He held up his head towards the top of the ladder, and said, "Look out, look out above."

Was any attempt made at that time to secure him, that you know of?—Yes; Westcoatt was at that time in front of him, endeavouring to secure him.

Do you know whether he made his escape?—He did; I turned to the top of the ladder, and as I was going up I saw the lower part of a man's body in the rack. I proceeded immediately to strike him on the legs, and endeavoured to force him back, and when I turned round, Ings was gone.

You heard Ings cry out, and went up the ladder part of the way, you heard a contest with Westcoatt, and Ings made his escape?—Yes.

Was he afterwards taken into custody?—He was.

Where?—In the Edgware-road.

Did you go to the spot?—Yes, I laid hold of him immediately after the watchman.

You found him in custody, and Brooks was one of the persons who had him in custody?—Yes.

Did you search him?—We took him to Mary-le-bone watch-house, and searched him.

What did you find upon him?—Four pistol balls, the key of a pistol, and a knife-case made of blue cloth.

What kind of knife, small or large?—Pretty large.

Have you seen the knife produced here the other day?—Yes, I have, it fits it exactly.

There was no knife about him?—No, not at the time we searched him.

The knife-case fitted the butcher's knife that was produced the other day?—Yes.

Had the knife any wax-end about the handle?—It had.

In addition to that did you find any thing else about him, any bags?—Brooks did; I saw them taken from his person; he took his great coat off, and there were two haversacks, one under each arm, and in one there was a tin case nearly full of loose powder; he had also a cloth belt round his body, with pistol holsters.

In addition to the haversacks there was a cloth belt round his waist?—Yes, which Brooks took from him.

Was that adapted to receive pistols?—It was.

Was that all that was found upon him that you know of?—There was a paper relating to some club, which I believe Brooks returned to him.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Do you ask this witness any questions?

Mr. Adolphus.—No.

John Wright sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You also are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Were you at this stable on the 23rd of February?—Yes.

Did you go to the foot of the ladder?—Yes, I did.

Whom did you see at the foot of the ladder?—I saw a man in the further stall in the stable.

Do you know whether or not it was the prisoner at the bar, Ings?—I do not.

Was it a man of about the same size?—About the same size.

Did you take any thing from him?—I took a knife and a sword.

What kind of knife was it you took from him?—A butcher's knife.

Was there any thing twisted round the handle?—Wax-end tied round it.

What kind of sword?—A sword about three feet long, with a brass handle, and a piece of string tied round it.

After this what happened to you?—I received a blow, and was knocked down, and received a stab in my side.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—You did not know the man.

Mr. Solicitor General.—No, but he says he was a man in point of size like the prisoner.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—And standing in a stall at the foot of the ladder?

Witness.—In the further stall.

Mr. Solicitor General.—You say you were knocked down, and had a stab in your side; after you recovered did you find that man gone?—Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General.—I shall not ask the witness as to the rest, I only ask as to that which affects the prisoner at the bar; did you search Wilson?—Yes, I searched Wilson.

What did Wilson say?—He said nothing particular.

William Charles Brooks sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

Were you one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Were you in Cato-street?—No, in John-street.

What did you perceive in John-street?—I saw the prisoner Ings running up the street, and when I crossed the street, there was another of my partners with a cutlass, and I had a pistol, and when I got on the road, he fired at me.

Fired at whom?—He fired at me, he told me he would shoot me.

Did the ball strike you?—Yes, I snatched at the pistol, and the powder scorched my hand, the ball went through the wrist of my great coat, through the collar of that coat, and through the shoulder of my waistcoat, it bruised my shoulder about the space of half-a-crown, and went out at the back I believe.

What was the effect of that?—It staggered me to the right.

Did he run on?—No, he came into the road to avoid my partner, I suppose, and ran into the Edgware-road, and flung the pistol away.

Was there a watchman there?—A little further on there was.

What was his name?—Moay.

Did he take him?—He laid hold of him just as I did.

Did you ever lose sight of him?—No, I was not further from him than I am to that gentleman [a yard or two].

You still pursued him?—Yes.

And between you he was taken?—Yes.

After you had taken him, what conversation passed between you?—I said to him, you rascal, why did you fire at me, a man you had never seen before? he said, to kill you, and I wish I had done it.

Did he say any thing more?—He repeated it, both to my partner and to the soldiers, he told one of the soldiers so afterwards.

William Lee sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are you one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Did you go to the public house, the Horse and Groom, in the evening, before the officers went to the stable?—Yes.

Did you observe any persons in the Horse and Groom, who were afterwards taken?—No, I did not.

Did you see Cooper and Gilchrist there?—I saw them go in there.

Were they taken that night among the persons there?—They were.

And taken to Bow-street?—Yes.

Lieutenant Frederick Fitzclarence, sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

I believe you are a lieutenant in his majesty's Coldstream regiment of guards?—I am.

Were you, on the 23rd of February, applied to by the Magistrates of Bow-street, to go to Cato-street?—I was.

Did you take a picquet with you?—I did.

What time did you arrive there?—A few minutes after eight.

What time was it that you entered the stable?—I should think three or four minutes after eight.

What did you observe?—The first thing I saw, going under the gateway leading into the street, was a police officer, who cried out "soldiers! soldiers! stable door! stable door!" I went on and met two persons coming out of the door-way; one of whom presented a pistol at me, I am not sure that it was a pistol, but he presented something at me, at the same time a sword made a cut at me, which I parried and seeing the body of soldiers coming up, he ran into the stable; I followed him, and the moment I got into the stable, I ran up against a man, who surrendered himself saying, "do not kill me, and I will tell you all;" I gave him over to the picquet, and went forward into the stable, where I went up into one of the stalls, and took another man out, whom I delivered over to the picquet, also; I then led my men up the steps into the loft.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—There was only room for one at a time?—No.

You headed your men?—Yes; the first thing I trod over was the leg of poor Smithers, and in ascending the steps, I saw three, or four, or five persons in the room; the light afterwards went out.

Did you see any arms in the loft?—A large quantity.

What description of arms?—One blunderbuss, or more, swords, pistols, pikes.

Were any arms picked up in the stable below?—Yes, there were.

They were delivered over by your directions to the soldiers?—Yes, the soldiers took them away.

Serjeant William Legg sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

I believe you are a serjeant in the second Coldstream guards?—Yes.

Did you go along with the party that was commanded by lieutenant Fitzclarence in Cato-street?—Yes.

In consequence of any intimation that you had, did you direct your party to advance quicker than they had, in double quick time?—Yes, in double quick time.

Did you get to the gateway which is near a public house, on the left-hand side of the street?—Yes.

Just before then had you heard the report of pistols?—Yes.

Did you perceive a man standing with his back against the wall, by the stable in Cato-street?—Yes.

Had he a pistol in his hand?—Yes.

Did he level it?—He levelled it at lieutenant Fitzclarence.

Did it go off or was it turned away?—It was turned away by my pike.

Did the pistol go off?—I then seized the pistol with my left hand, and a scuffle ensued between the prisoner and me.

Who was the prisoner?—Tidd.

Did the pistol go off?—Yes, after some time.

In whose hand?—In both hands: I had hold of the trigger at the time it went off.

I believe it tore your coat?—Yes, it did.

I believe you afterwards delivered Tidd to the police?—Yes.

Have you got the pistol still?—Yes, the pistol is here.

Mr. Gurney.—It will be produced among the other things.

Mr. Littledale.—What other prisoner did you take?—I took no other: after going up, in the loft I saw three others who had surrendered.

Whom did you see in the loft?—Cooper, Monument, and Gilchrist.

Samuel Hercules Taunton sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you belong to the public office at Bow-street?—Yes, I do.

Did you on Thursday morning, the 24th of February, go to Brunt's lodgings?—I did.

Did you see Brunt there?—I did, and apprehended him.

Did you search the apartments which are occupied by him?—I did, but found nothing in the front room.

Did you search the apartments that were occupied by him?—I did.

There you found nothing?—Nothing.

Having searched those apartments, did you go into the back room?—I did.

What did you find in the back room?—Two rush baskets.

Were they both done up?—Both packed up, one tied up in an apron.

What colour, blue?—Blue.

Did you ask Brunt about those baskets?—I did.

What did you ask him?—When I went into the room there was nothing in the room but two baskets and a pike handle.

Did you ask Brunt any thing about those baskets?—I did.

What did you ask him?—He said he knew nothing of them.

Were the baskets present at the time you asked him that question?—I brought the baskets out into the other room.

You asked him what was in the baskets?—Yes.

And he said he knew nothing about them?—He knew nothing about them.

Did you afterwards open the baskets?—Yes, I did.

When you opened the baskets what did you find in them?—Nine papers of rope-yarn, and tar, and other ingredients in separate papers.

Were they calculated easily to take fire?—Yes, I think they were; I tried some in the fire, and it burnt.

Besides this, what else did you find in the baskets?—There were some steel filings.

Were there any hand-grenades?—Yes, there were.

How many?—Ten, I think grenades.

What else were there?—Three papers of rope-yarn, and other ingredients.

Having that paper in your hand, read what was contained in one basket, and what was contained in the other?—Nine papers of rope-yarn, and tar and other ingredients, some steel filings, in one basket; in the second basket there were four grenades, three papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients, two bags of powder, one pound each.

What kind of bags were these?—White flannel bags.

About six inches long?—About six inches long, or rather longer.

And contained gunpowder?—Yes.

Were there any flannel bags that had no powder in them?—Five flannel bags empty.

Of the same form?—Of the same sort.

Any thing else?—One small paper of gunpowder, one leather bag containing sixty-three balls.

Leaden balls, bullets?—Bullets; that is the whole that was contained in the second basket.

Did you find any thing else in the room?—One iron pot.

Did it appear that that iron pot had had tar boiled in it?—Yes, very recently; and one pike handle I found in the same room.

Was there a ferrule at the end with a socket?—Yes, there was.

A rough stick?—Yes.

Was that all that you found at the lodgings at Brunt's?—That was all.

Did you afterwards go to Hole-in-the-wall passage to Tidd's?—Yes, I did.

How soon afterwards?—It might be three quarters of an hour, or an hour after; it was about nine o'clock in the morning I was at Tidd's.

Did you search these lodgings?—I did.

What did you find there, have you got a list of them?—Yes.

Read them in order?—Four hundred and thirty-four balls, in a haversack. One hundred and seventy-one ball cartridges, Loose were they?—Loose; Sixty-nine ball cartridges without powder; a brown paper parcel, with three pounds of gun-powder; in a brown paper, there was ten grenades: eleven bags of gun-powder, one pound each.

Were the bags constructed in the same way as the flannel bags that you found at Brunt's?—Yes, the very same.

About six inches long?—Rather longer.

With a pound of gun-powder in each?—Yes.

Any bags of the same description empty?—Ten flannel bags empty; a small linen bag with powder, a powder-flask with some gun-powder in it; sixty eight balls.

By that you mean bullets, I suppose?—Yes. Four flints, and twenty-seven pike-handles.

Were the pike-handles of the same description as you have already mentioned?—The very same.

Rough sticks, four or five feet long?—Yes.

With sockets at the end for a pike?—Yes.

Did you find any box there?—I found a box containing nine hundred and sixty-five ball-cartridges.

Was that all that you found at Tidd's?—That was all I found.

Samuel Hercules Taunton cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

There has been a person named Palin mentioned in the course of this cause; have you made any search after him?—Yes, we have.

There is a large reward of 500*l.* for apprehending him?—Two hundred pounds reward.

Palin and Cook; have you searched after them too?

Mr. Solicitor General.—Have you personally searched after them?—Not I. I have not.

Mr. Adolphus.—Has search been made after them by the officers?—I do not know what the magistrates might have ordered.

Samuel Hercules Taunton re-examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

A reward was offered for Palin?—Yes.

Has he absconded in consequence of the part he took in this transaction?—Yes.

Mr. Curwood.—He has absconded, that is all.

Mr. Solicitor General.—The reward was to apprehend him for the part he took in this business?—Yes, it was.

Daniel Bishop called.

Mr. Gurney.—It is necessary now to produce the things found at Tidd's, and also at Brunt's, and in Cato-street.

Mr. Curwood.—It is candle light, it will do in the morning.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Have you no other witness?

Mr. Gurney.—Only one or two; their evidence will be very short; we will produce them in the morning.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Gentlemen, it is quite impossible to conclude to-night; we must now adjourn to nine to-morrow morning.

[Adjourned to to-morrow morning, nine o'clock.]

SATURDAY, 22nd APRIL, 1820.

James Ings was set to the bar; and John Thomas Brunt, Richard Tidd, William Davidson, James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper were placed at the bar behind.

Daniel Bishop sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Did you apprehend Arthur Thistlewood?—I did, on the 24th of February.

At what time of the day?—Between ten and eleven in the forenoon.

Where did you find him?—At No. 8, White-street, Little Moorfields.

Was that his own residence, or the house of another person?—The apartments of a Mrs. Harris.

I believe he lived in Stanhope-street, Chancery-market?—He did.

Did you find him up, or in bed?—In bed.

With any part of his clothes on?—His breeches and stockings.

Upon your opening the door of the room in which he was in bed, what took place?—He just held up his head.

From under what?—From under the bed-clothes. I had got a pistol in one hand, and a staff in the other, I immediately threw myself on the bed upon him; I said, "Mr. Thistlewood, my name is Bishop, a Bow-street officer, I have a warrant against you."

And he surrendered?—He said, "I shall make no resistance."

Were his coat and waistcoat by the bedside?—They were.

Did you find any thing in the pocket of the waistcoat?—In the pocket of the waistcoat I found three leaden balls, a ball-cartridge, a blank cartridge, and two flints, and a small silk sash.

You took him into custody, and took him to Bow-street?—I did.

Daniel Bishop cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

How did you find out where he was?—It was in consequence of some information that was handed to me and my brother officers.

Information that he was not at his own house but was there?—Yes.

Was that information from your brother officers?—No, it was not.

Was it from a Mr. Edwards?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—I should have objected to that question.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—That is not a proper question.

Witness.—I do not know a person of that name.

Mr. Adolphus.—I should not have asked it if I had considered it irregular; but the moment your lordship gives that intimation, I stop.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—If these questions are to be asked it will break down all rules.

Mr. Adolphus.—I submit, my lord, to the intimation of your lordship's opinion.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven called again.—
Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are there now placed upon the table the things which were taken in Cato-street.—Yes.

You gave us an enumeration yesterday of thirty-eight ball cartridges, firelock and bayonet, one powder flask, three pistols, and one sword, with six bayonet spikes, and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet spikes, and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet spike, and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades; I do not see them?—Here they are [in a bag].

We must have them on the table. [they were emptied out.]

There is one hand-grenade much larger than the rest; that is what you call the large hand-grenade?—Yes.

Show the jury the fuse to it? [it was shown to the jury.].—There are some iron spikes tucked in.

Hand one of the small hand-grenades to the jury with a fuse? [it was handed to the jury.].

Are there any fire balls there? [one was shown to the jury].—I will give you an account gentlemen, by another witness, of the composition of these, I observe here are some bayonets with screws at the end, and some sharpened files with screws at the end?—There are [they were shown to the jury.].

Produce the pike staves?—[they were produced.] Take one of the pike staves from the rest, and show the adaptation of it, [the witness screwed in one of the pike heads]. They are all made to receive a screw?—Yes.

Have they a ferrule at the top?—They have.

Will you produce the belt and the knife-case found upon the prisoner? [they were produced.] Hand that knife with the knife-case and the belt to the jury: you observe, gentlemen, the knife-case and the belt are of the same cloth.

Ings.—The knife was not found upon me, my lord.

Mr. Gurney.—You observe the handle of the knife, gentlemen, is bound round with wax-end? [it was shown to the jury.].—Where are the two haversacks that were found upon the prisoner? [they were handed to the jury.] Show the jury the brass-barrelled blunderbuss, [it was shown to the jury.].—Which were the pike staves found in Cato-street?—The bundle I have just shown.

John Hector Morison called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

In whose service are you?—Mr. Henry Underwood's, in Drury-lane.

You have spoken to a sword having been brought you by the prisoner to sharpen?—Yes.

Is that one of the two swords which the prisoner brought to you?—Yes, this is the first.

What were the instructions you had particularly respecting sharpening that sword?—To grind and set it from the heel to the point, and to sharpen the point particularly on both sides, as sharp as a needle, he said.

And it is sharp?—Yes; since I ground it, it appears to have been rubbed upon a stone to help the keenness of the edge.

Samuel Hercules Taunton called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Have you there the things which you found at Brunt's room?—I have.

Produce them distinctly?—This basket contains nine papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients.

A Jurymen.—They appear to be the same kind of things; they are what are called illumination balls.

Witness.—There are also some steel filings.

Mr. Gurney.—Now produce to us the things out of the basket covered with the blue apron?—These are flannel bags full of gunpowder; there are also some empty [producing them].

A Jurymen.—There is powder in those bags. There is. [One of the bags was opened, and the contents shown to the jury].

Mr. Gurney.—The bags contain one pound each, I believe?—Yes.

Are there four hand-grenades?—There are [they were handed to the jury].

A Jurymen.—There appears to be nails in all directions.

Mr. Gurney.—We will call a witness who will give an account of their contents. Will you produce the pike-handle which was found there? [it was produced.] Is that filed at the end so as to receive a pike?—Yes, and it has a ferrule on.

You spoke of an iron pot, that had an appearance of melted tar. [it was produced.] Is there tar in the bottom?—There is.

You found also sixty-three bullets?—I did; here they are. [producing them.]

They are in a leathern bag or pouch?—They are.

Produce the things which you found at Tidd's lodgings: those were found the same morning, the Thursday morning?—Yes.

You stated that in a haversack there were 434 balls; 171 ball cartridges, and 69 without powder. [the witness produced the same.] There were three pounds of gunpowder?—There were. [producing them.]

You have opened that paper?—I have, and it contains gunpowder.

Mr. Gurney.—It shall be opened for your inspection, if you wish it, gentlemen.

Foreman of the Jury.—No, it is not necessary.

Mr. Gurney.—Produce the coarse canvass cloth, and the grenades you found in it; eleven bags of gunpowder of a pound each; ten empty bags; a small bag with a powder flask with some powder?—Yes.

Those are flannel bags of the same description as the other?—Yes, they are.

The full and the empty are all of the same description?—They are.

You found there, also, twenty-seven pike-handles?—I did.

Are they of the same description as the others?—They are.

Mr. Gurney.—You observe, gentlemen, they are all ferruled, and filed to receive pikes?—They were all of them ferruled, but with the greenness of the wood some of the ferrules have since dropped off.

Produce the box you found with the ball cartridges [it was produced.]. There are 965 ball cartridges in that box, are there?—There are.

They are in parcels of how many?—In parcels of five.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven, called again.
—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

There is one question I omitted to ask you: were those fire arms found at Cato-street, loaded?—They were most of them: there were one or two of them fired off.

Most of them you found loaded?—Yes.

They were drawn last Monday?—Yes.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Ask him whether those which were not loaded, appeared to have been recently fired off.

Mr. Gurney.—Did those which were not loaded appear to have been recently discharged?—I did not examine that.

Were those that were loaded, loaded with ball?—They were.

Serjeant Edward Hanson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

I believe you are a serjeant in the Royal-artillery?—Yes.

Have the goodness to look at those fire-balls, what do they appear to be composed of?—They are oakum, tar, and rosin.

If they were set on fire, and thrown into any buildings, are they well calculated to produce conflagration?—Yes, they would set wood on fire.

If they were thrown through a window on to a floor, would they be likely to set a house on fire?—There is not a doubt of it.

If thrown into a hay-loft, still more likely?—Oh yes.

How long do you suppose they would burn?—This is a very small one; I have seen much larger than this, among those before the court.

How long would they burn?—They would burn three or four minutes.

Look at these flannel bags with gunpowder?—That is a flannel cartridge, for a six-pounder.

That is the way in which powder is made up, for the purpose of loading cannon?—Yes, it is; only yours is a different kind of flannel, it is twilled.

That will answer the purpose, though not so neatly?—Oh yes, perfectly.

Take one of the hand-grenades; you have examined two of them before?—Yes, I have.

Take that to pieces, and show us of what it is composed [it was taken to pieces in the presence of the Jury]. The other prisoners may retire now, we shall have no occasion for their being present.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—You may now remove the other prisoners from the bar. [They were removed accordingly.]

Mr. Gurney.—Is that exterior tight binding material to give force to the powder when it explodes?—Yes, very material, it would not have half the effect if it were not tight.

Have you come to any thing different?—Yes, here is a bandage of woollen cloth of bombazine.

Is that cemented on?—Yes, very fast.

What do you find that immediately to inclose?—Four nails.

Do you mean nails used to rivet the tire of cart wheels on?—Yes [it was handed to the Jury].

Supposing you found inside that a tin case containing powder, which is lit by means of that fuse; would that explode and disperse those nails about like so many shot?—Certainly it would.

The binding you say by the rope-yarn would give greater effect to the explosion?—Yes, it would be a larger explosion; the faster it is tied, the more strong that makes the explosion.

A Jurymen (Mr. Young).—Could any body manufacture a thing of that kind, unless he is connected with the army?—That is nothing like our artillery-grenades, these are filled with pistol or musket balls, and then the vacancy between the musket balls, is filled with powder.

Mr. Gurney.—It is not made artificially like the army-grenade?—No.

A Jurymen (Mr. Smith).—Would it have the same effect?—Certainly, this would be very dangerous; they would be sure to be distributed round wherever they were thrown.

Mr. Gurney.—Supposing they were thrown into a room, the fuse would burn, I believe about half-a-minute?—Yes, thereabouts.

These nails would on the explosion, fly about killing and wounding the persons in the room?—Most assuredly.

Take out the nails and see whether you find a tin case filled with gunpowder?—Here is part of a blanket covering the tin case.

The fuse is inserted in the tin case?—Yes, it is brazed in, and each end is brazed on.

We will trouble you to force open that tin case. [the witness broke off the fuse and poured out the powder.]

How much powder is there in it?—I dare say there is about the same quantity as there was in the last, which I weighed; that was about three ounces and a half; it appears to be the same size.

Is it good gunpowder?—Very good.

That would be a quantity of gunpowder sufficient to cause the explosion you speak of?—Yes, there is rather more than we put to burst a nine-inch shell.

I need scarcely ask you, whether that grenade would be a most formidable and destructive instrument?—It certainly would.

Mr. Attorney General.—That, my lord, is the case on the part of the Crown.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen of the jury;—I know not whether any of you were in court during the inquiry which has already taken place; but, whether you were or were not, the fact of the conviction which has occurred cannot be unknown to you. Indeed, my learned friend the Solicitor-general, when he opened this case to you, did that which every man would expect from him—he told you that if that fact had come to your knowledge, it ought not to have the slightest weight on your minds in the consideration of the case which is now brought before you. But notwithstanding that my learned friend the Solicitor-general has so told you, I do feel, or rather I should feel under other circumstances, that it was a fact which would weigh very heavily upon me: because I know that however good your intentions may be, such is the frame and construction of the human mind, that it cannot dismiss from its consideration matters which at times, if men were more perfect, it ought to dismiss. But I feel that fact weighing less heavily upon me, because the late verdict was obtained by evidence, as I hope I shall be able to show you, materially different from the evidence which is given in this case. For in this case there is wanting a most material confirmation of the evidence of the accomplice, which was given by a witness who was called in the last case, and is not called in the present: I mean one Dwyer.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, I must interpose for the sake of regularity.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—We cannot go into what passed on a former trial. The Solicitor-general most humanely and most correctly began by deprecating the effect of that conviction in any way upon the minds of the jury; and sure I am, that though that caution might be deemed by the Solicitor-general to be necessary, it was not necessary with the jury, for they would themselves have confined their attention to the evidence in this case, without at all regarding what passed upon a former trial which is not now before them, nor under their consideration; and whether this or that witness was then called, or whether the proof be now different, they have no means of judging, and into these matters I cannot now suffer counsel to go. The jury are sworn to try the case presented to them in evidence. I need not tell you, gentlemen, I am sure, that it is your duty to forget, except so far as it is in proof, that there is such a person as Thistlewood—at all events to forget his conviction.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen, I receive, with all deference, the correction of his lordship, and I am sure I need not say to him, that I did not intentionally step beyond the line which I ought in correctness to pursue. Perhaps, in the anxiety I feel on the present occasion I may have done that which, if I had more self-possession than I confess I have at this moment, I should not have done. But, when his lordship has told me, that I have trespassed beyond the strict line of my duty, it shall be my most earnest endeavour so to guard my conduct, that I may not repeat the same fault. But this much I may with perfect regularity say, that you will not suppose (having heard of the former verdict) that it proceeded upon evidence precisely such as has been given in this case. You will not suppose that the evidence which warranted that former conviction is precisely the same as is now before you. But you will judge of this evidence as though you had never heard of that former case.

My learned friend, the Solicitor-general, has told you (what I, and I am sure all men will readily admit) that in the execution of the duty which he was called upon to perform, he was only anxious to acquit himself as a faithful servant of the public, by presenting fully and fairly the circumstances of this case for your consideration, and that as far as his own personal feelings went, when he had done his duty, he was regardless of the result. Gentlemen, I, equally with every man who knows him, give him full credit for that assertion ; I hope you will give me credit also, by believing (though my task is a more irksome one than his) that I have the same feeling, that I am anxious to do my duty to the unfortunate man at the bar ; but, I am also anxious at the same time, to do my duty to my country and myself. I am equally sure, that those amongst you who having been on the former jury, and consequently having heard the evidence, and given a verdict in the former case, whatever may have been your previous feelings and impressions, will discharge your present duty, regardless of what may be said by mankind upon any supposed contradiction of conduct, and that if you are not satisfied that the crime is proved against the prisoner by the present evidence, you will gladly deliver him by a verdict of not guilty.

The Solicitor-general also told you that the law in this case is so clear, that he did not feel it necessary to state it to you. The law of this case is very clear, but I think it most material that the very precise point you have to try should be stated to you. Because, the question here is not between guilt or innocence in the abstract, for certainly, I must admit, there is a strong suspicion, at least, if not conclusive proof, of a certain degree of moral guilt against these men ; but the question you have to decide is whether their guilt amounts to that which is charged upon this record ? namely, whether it be high treason ? and not only whether it be high treason, but whether it be that specific and direct high treason which is charged upon him by this indictment ? In order, therefore, to enable you to do your duty fairly, fully, and impartially, you must not only take into your consideration, and understand distinctly, what is the precise charge you have to try, but you must also apply the evidence and see that the evidence not only makes out guilt, but makes out that very specific high treason which is charged upon these men.

I dare say, though you are not lawyers, you know enough of the history of your country, to know that almost every man who has written upon the history of the constitution of our country, has stated that the firmest bulwark of the liberties of the subject is, that the law of high treason should be well defined : and most carefully was that done by our ancestors, by the statute of 25 Edward 3rd. Many things had before that time grown up to be thought treasons, many indistinct accusations had been adjudged treasons, so that no man could know whether he was safe or not from the oppression of power, in his conduct through life.—But when that statute was passed, in a few short and distinct words, it gave the subjects of the country to know what the law of treason was, and better still, it informed them what was not treason. A statute which one of the greatest lawyers that ever graced the English bench, my lord Coke, has called a blessed statute ; and blessed is the country that has such a statute for its guidance, for in proportion as we lose the advantages of that statute, in that proportion do we recede from that blessed state of security, which it conferred upon us.

That statute says distinctly (I mean to state as much of it as may apply to the case under consideration), first, that whosoever shall compass or imagine the death of the king, shall be guilty of high treason :—secondly, that whosoever shall levy war against the king in his realm, shall be guilty of high treason. Now here are two distinct facts stated in a few short and distinct words ; men cannot fail to know whether they transgress these enactments, or not ; and, although, from that period to the present, a number of other treasons have grown up, or rather a number of other enactments of treason have grown up at different times ; yet, always, under virtuous administrations, and by patriotic governors, they have been swept away as noxious weeds, poisoning the healthy soil of our country, and we have invariably returned to that blessed statute in every good and sound state of the constitution.

I lament to say, that in the reign of his late majesty, a statute passed which extended the law of treason ;—Mr. Attorney-general seems rather surprised at what I am now saying, but I repeat that I lament such a statute ever passed ; I lament every deviation from the ancient law of treason ; and even if it be justified on the ground that the necessity of the times called for it, then I lament that there should exist such a necessity in the state.—The latter statute to which I allude, and upon which a part of the charges in this indictment is founded, is the statute of the 36th of his late majesty's reign, which enacted "that if any person after the passing of this act, during the life of the king, and until the end of the next session of parliament, after the demise of the crown, shall within the realm or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of the same, our sovereign lord the king, his heirs and successors, or to deprive or depose him, her, or them from the style, honour, or kingly name of the Imperial Crown of this realm." Now here is created another new treason, and which is also charged upon this indictment ; by the statute of Edward it was made treason to compass or imagine the death of the king ; by this statute it is made treason, to conspire or attempt to depose him from his kingly office.—By the statute of Edward it was made treason, actually to levy war against his majesty within his realm ; by this statute it is made treason to conspire to levy war—and upon this last treason is founded another count of this indictment ; so that the four questions you have to try will be these.—Did the prisoner at the bar, compass or imagine the death of the king ? did he conspire to depose him from his imperial dignity ? did he actually levy war against his majesty ? or lastly, did he conspire to levy war (though he did not actually levy war) with an intent to compel by force his majesty to change the measures of his government. These are the precise issues you have to try, and whatever may be your opinion of the guilt of the prisoner as to other matters,—however atrocious you may think his conduct may be in a moral point of view,—however criminal he may be in other respects,—however he may have brought himself within the fangs of other criminal laws,—if you do not think he has actually committed one of these four offences, charged upon him by this indictment, you are bound to find him not guilty; and to leave him to take his trial upon other indictments, which will reach him, if he has been guilty of any other offence.—It will therefore be your bounden duty, most accurately to scan the evidence which has been given in this case, and apply it to the charge of the present indictment, and not to any other offence.

My learned friend, the Solicitor-general, has admitted to you, that this case does not come proved to you in all respects by unequivocal testimony; and he apologizes for this by saying, that in all cases of conspiracies you must of necessity call some of the conspirators, because without some of the conspirators you cannot know what passed in their dark consultations. This is another miserable consequence of departing from the ancient and well-considered statute of treasons. That admirable statute, amongst other things, enacts, that before a man shall be found guilty of any of the treasons there set out, he shall be provably convicted of the same. I do not believe in any other statute of the realm, that the same guarded caution is enacted, or the same word used; and the great lawyer to whom I have referred you before, lord Coke, writes a whole section upon the word provably. He says that it does not mean probably, but that a man must be convicted by that clear and distinct evidence which no man can doubt of. While that law remained unimpaired, the result was, that you could have no accusations of treason, but such as were capable of clear and demonstrable proof. Then men's lives were safe. But when you depart from the spirit of that ancient statute, and enact these new treasons which depend upon supposed conspiracies and secret consultations, you must call in the aid of witnesses such as you have heard upon the present occasion. Then it is that men's lives are no longer safe, but they may hold their existence, fame, and fortune, upon the testimony of the most worthless and infamous of mankind.

Bearing in your minds, as I hope you will do, these preliminary observations, examine the facts that have been proved in evidence before you, and say how far you think those witnesses, whom my learned friend the Solicitor-general admits to be bad witnesses, are confirmed by purer testimony; because he has told you himself that they are not to be believed unless they are confirmed in material circumstances. It is not confirming an infamous witness in some trivial circumstances, that will give him credit to any infamous tale he may tell you: you, at least, ought to have him confirmed as to so much of the important matters which he relates, that you, laying your hands on your hearts, can say you believe the rest of his tale. And here another difficulty in this case presents itself, for it would be in vain for me to stand up and say, these witnesses are not confirmed in a great deal of important matter: but you are to discriminate whether they are confirmed in any of that matter which constitutes the crime, high treason. If you do not find them confirmed in a single iota of that matter which alone constitutes high treason, though they are confirmed in other matters, it will be your duty to find this man not guilty. And here is the danger (and let me warn you of it as one) of not discriminating clearly to what extent they are confirmed. If you shall be of opinion they are confirmed to the full extent of the horrid plan of the assassination of his majesty's ministers, yet, inasmuch as I do not know of any law which makes that atrocious plan of assassination of the cabinet council amount to high treason, if you do not believe that there was an ulterior intention to levy war against his majesty, then you must find the prisoner not guilty.

It is impossible for me to deny that there is a great deal of matter in evidence before you which must make a man shrink back with horror; but if it were not for that circumstance which throws a shade over the whole of the case, I think there never was so ridiculous a plot detailed in evidence since the records of history began. It exceeds in absurdity all that was ever recorded in real history, or imagined in fiction. The plot which has been detailed to you to-day, and which you are required to believe was actually adopted as of practicable execution, for the purpose of overturning the existing government of this country, is a plot so perfectly ridiculous, that it is wholly incredible. I would ask you this, if you had been told of this scheme of rebellion as a really existing and adopted plan;—if it had been gravely related by a man of ordinary veracity, in whom you had ordinary confidence, unconnected with all the other circumstances of assassination, and the murder of the unfortunate man who met his death at Cato-street (all of which I know must have its effect upon your minds, and adds weight to the ulterior charge of treason),—I ask you if you had been told of this plot to overturn the government, precisely in the phrase and language of the witness, with the same exhibition of military stores, would not you have received the tale with a smile of contempt and incredulity? Then, if you would not believe a statement on the relation of a man in whose general veracity you might have some confidence, will you believe it upon the testimony of a self-confessed and most infamous witness? The absurdity strikes me so strongly, notwithstanding all I have seen, and all I have heard, that until you tell me by your verdict you do believe it, I will not give credit to the possibility of your having such belief.

We will first see what the alleged facts are as detailed to you by this man Adams. And here let me remark, that every witness is supposed to give his testimony under the sanction of an oath, the consequences of which he at least ought to believe are, that according to the truth or falsehood of the circumstances which he relates he will meet his reward, not only by the sanctions of the law of men, but by the special interpositions of Providence in this world, and by the laws of God hereafter. To begin with this witness,—what does he tell you?—that he has been an apostate in religion, and has forsworn his God; that God to whom he appeals for the truth of his evidence! That is the first view in which this witness presents himself. Such is the man who has to tell you a story, incredible in itself, and upon whose testimony you are required to believe it. But to proceed, he says that he became acquainted with Brunt, one of the other men charged in this indictment, at Cambridge, in France, about three years ago; that on the 13th of January last he was introduced to Thistlewood; upon which Thistlewood said to him:—"Oh, you are the man; you have been a soldier in the Guards." We need not go through the whole of the conversation, for it comes to this.—"I suppose you are a good swordsman."—"No, I am not so good a swordsman as I once was, but I can defend myself." And then comes the conversation about the present state of society; that "the people are aristocrats, and are all working under one system to support the government." Now you are to take it as a clear fact, that a plot was in agitation to overturn the government, and that so much was to be expected from the hand of this single swordsman, that Mr. Thistlewood,—a man not insane, however wicked,—at once unbosoms himself to him at their first interview, and tells him he wants his assistance, as you are to infer, though he did not directly tell him so in terms:—that he wanted his assistance to overturn the government—the powerful assistance of him, a single swordsman!

Then he gives you an account of his meeting the conspirators several times at the White Hart public-house, and then he goes to Brunt's, where he hears language, such, that if he had had one spark of honesty or feeling in his heart, he never would have gone a second time, but must have instantly disclosed it to the magistracy of the country. He there hears distinctly, according to his own account, a plan in agitation for the destruction, at one blow, of the whole of the cabinet council of this country. Does he revolt at this?—No! he goes on and joins them; he meets them day after day in their consultations on this plan—himself professing, and, if you believe his own words, truly intending at this time to be one in this atrocious conspiracy, fully bent to carry it into effect; and never does he till the halter is about his neck recede from that intention. And then he thinks to make a merit—by what?—by still greater baseness I had almost said,—when I say, "still greater baseness," I am afraid of using an expression that can in the least be supposed to take off from the baseness of his first conduct,—I hardly know how to express myself;—I was going to say, greater baseness in betraying his companions. I am afraid, in using the expression, of being supposed to say that such things as these ought not to be disclosed: but this I say, that in a man who goes the whole length, which he states he did, towards perpetrating a deed of unparalleled wickedness—in him it is the last trace of baseness that he should be the betrayer of his companions; low as they may be sunk in the pit of infamy, a still lower deep is his portion: and not one spark remains which can redeem him from universal and unutterable abhorrence. Thus it is, that this man stands before you, and upon his evidence alone it is, I say, that all the facts stand which constitute high treason, as I will shew you hereafter, and it is upon his evidence alone that you must convict the prisoner of high treason; although I admit his evidence is abundantly confirmed, as to the other parts of the case, namely, as to the horrible plan of assassination.

You will always bear in mind what it is that constitutes the treason. I have told you that every act of levying war against the king, or conspiring so to do, with an intention by force to make him alter his measures of government is high treason. Now all which you can infer against this prisoner of his guilt, with respect to this species of high treason, is from certain supposed conversations on Tuesday the 22nd, and Wednesday the 23rd of February. Adams tells you, that in addition to the plan to assassinate his majesty's ministers, they had it in design to do what?—to seize two cannon in Gray's-inn-lane; to seize six cannon in the Artillery-ground; to send to different out-ports, and seize those out ports. But that which most distinctly marks the intention of high treason, was a proclamation which he is pleased to say was fabricated by Thistlewood, and of which proclamation there is not a trace of confirmation in any other part of the cause. Now I know that the learned Attorney-general may say there is confirmation of this by an unsuspected and uncontaminated witness. He will tell you that Hale, the servant of Brunt, was called to fetch six sheets of cartridge-paper; and he will tell you also, that the witness, Adams, said the proclamation was written on cartridge-paper. Gentlemen, is that a confirmation of the contents of this supposed proclamation? You do not want confirmation of the fact of six sheets of paper being sent for; consider what they were about at that time:—they were preparing their arms, not for the plan of high treason, as I say, but for other most nefarious plans; they were then making cartridges, and what so fit, and what so likely, as that they should want cartridge-paper for that purpose?—And, indeed, there is a passage in the testimony of Hale, which, as far as it gives confirmation either way, gives a confirmation to my statement, rather than to the supposition of the learned Attorney-general; for Hale tells you, that among the articles in the cupboard they found fragments of the cartridge-paper; most evidently, therefore, they had been using this cartridge-paper, not for the purpose of fabricating proclamations, but of fabricating cartridges. Take this proclamation out of the cause, and there is nothing that can indicate that their intention was levying war against the state, so as to make their acts amount to high treason. There is a great deal in the cause to lead one to suppose, that they might contemplate a desperate riot, and a dreadful murder; that you might perhaps fairly infer, if that were the matter for your consideration; but that is not the charge upon this record: if you believe every tittle of the evidence up to that extent, yet you cannot consistently with your duty to God, to your country, and to yourselves, find the prisoner guilty of an intention to levy war; even if you could believe the other circumstances, that they meant to take the cannon, that they meant to fire the houses, and that they meant other acts of violence, which do not amount, or may not amount to a levying of war. And what you are most particularly to guard yourselves against is this, that you are not to convict on constructive high treasons. I know very well that there have been constructive levyings of war, but still levying of war is a question of fact. You are to consider, under all the circumstances, what shall and what shall not amount to a levying of war: there are great and dreadful riots which do not amount to levying of war, and if you are of opinion this would be only riot and not levying of war then the prisoner is not guilty of the matter of this Indictment. When I say there may be great and dreadful riots which do not amount to levying of war, and that you ought to be most careful about extending the law of treason by construction and implication, I would rather state it you from the language of one of the greatest judges that ever adorned the English bench, aye, and one of the best of men;—I mean my lord Hale, whom bishop Burnet calls “that great lawyer, and that honest man:” an honest man he was as you will judge from this short anecdote I will tell you of him. During the usurpation of Cromwell, so high was his credit as a lawyer, that that great and able man (for so he was, though an usurper) felt it for the honour of his government to employ my lord Hale; though my lord Hale had the boldness to tell him, that he doubted the legality of his accession to the throne of power where he had seated himself, and would act under no commission from him which should require him to pass a sentence of death on any man; notwithstanding this, he was so highly revered by that usurper, that he was made chief justice of his Court of Common Pleas. Still higher was he honoured by his legitimate sovereign, when restored to the throne of his ancestors; he was placed in a more exalted station. But under both governments he was an honest man, who never warped the law to serve the power of the usurper, or gratify the wishes of the dissolute ministers of the monarch. He never forgot his duty to his country, but was ever the firm friend of the legal liberty of the subject. I will tell you with respect to constructive treasons, what that learned judge and good man says. He states that the statute of Edward is distinct with respect to the levying of war, but he says, levying of war may be actual or constructive; that is, constructive such as great riots, or for general purposes; but he shews what he thinks of those lawyers who have extended the simple law of treason by implication and construction. And with respect to constructive treasons, I will myself say, and I am sorry to say it, they have been the device of bad lawyers to further the oppressions of wicked statesmen. Judges of the present day must be bound by the resolutions of their predecessors, and take the law of treason as they find it recorded; so says lord Hale, who, after having stated several constructive treasons, says, “These resolutions being made and settled, we must acquiesce in them,”—he says not a word of their propriety, or of his approbation of them, but you may see plainly what was the bearing of his own mind.—These resolutions being made and settled, we must acquiesce in them; “but, in my opinion, if new cases happen for the future that have not an express resolution in point, nor are expressly within the words of the statute of 25th Edward 3rd, though they may seem to have a parity of reason;—it is the safest way, and most agreeable to the wisdom of the great act of 25th Edward 3rd, first to consult the parliament, and have their declaration, and to be very wary in multiplying constructive and interpretative treasons, for we know not where it will end.” Thank God, gentlemen of the jury, it is in your power to put a stop to their dangerous progress:—if you find verdicts on these constructive treasons, God only knows where they may end; but once let English juries oppose them firmly by their verdicts, and whenever they have a case of constructive treason brought before them, of which the Crown lawyers can shew no precedent exactly in point, let them exert their glorious privilege, and deny to them a verdict of guilty on such constructive treasons. Do this, gentlemen, and save your country. You thus interpose an impenetrable barrier against the progress of power. I am one of the last men in the world to ask you to do any thing that should shake the confidence all men have in the laws; but I do ask you, feeling that I am doing my duty, to oppose yourselves to this dangerous tribe of constructive treasons; and if my learned friend the Attorney-general cannot show you an exact precedent in point, rather than follow his advice, follow the advice of that great and learned judge, oppose the constitutional barrier of your verdict to it, and rear up no more constructive treasons.

There is in this case so much matter of grave and serious import, that I cannot treat the other part of the case which remains with the levity and ridicule with which it well deserves to be treated,—I mean so much of the plot as relates to the overthrow of government. Good God! is it in a British Court of Justice that we are trying a plot for the overthrow of the British government with materials of war such as those lying before you? What is the greatest number of men that we have it in evidence were to be brought into the field for the destruction of this mighty empire?—Forty men! What were those forty men to do?—They were first to assassinate the whole cabinet council; they were to send a detachment to seize two pieces of cannon—not a single horse among them: they were to send another detachment to seize other six pieces of cannon! they were to seize on several out-ports! they were more particularly to take Brighton with a force; the detachment for this purpose, I presume, was to have gone down on the outside of some one of the quick travelling coaches, and to have taken the town by surprise! They were to surround London, as I believe it is stated in the evidence in this cause, that they were to be so much on the alert with the residue of their forty men, that not even an orderly was to be allowed to leave London for Windsor; but that truly even if an orderly were despatched, and were lucky enough to evade their vigilance and reach Windsor, they had nothing to fear, for the troops, having been up all night at the funeral of his majesty, could not return to town time enough to rescue London from the hands of this formidable band of warriors! Such is the story upon which you are to find these men guilty of high treason!

I have told you that there is no confirmation of that part of the story which relates to the facts constituting high treason, and that (though it may be tedious to you to repeat it so often) is the very essence of this cause, and which you should never dismiss from your minds. You are to look how far this man is confirmed; if he is merely confirmed up to the point of the assassination (which perhaps I may admit, for what is found in Cato-street, and the occurrences which there took place, may confirm him up to that extent), there remains no confirmation upon that part of the case which alone you are now called upon to decide, and on which alone you can say high treason was in the contemplation of these men. But before I dismiss the evidence of this man—(and I do it with the less reluctance, because my learned friend who is to follow me, though we came late instructed into the cause, yet, from the respite the Court granted him the other night, came so well prepared that it relieved my mind from the grief I felt from not being able to do my duty in the manner I wished to have done it, though I have omitted a great deal, there is but little my learned friend will omit; you will hear from him the evidence most minutely dissected in every part).—But, before I quit this man, let us seriously pause.—Who is he that tells us this tale, and demands our belief in his testimony? Who is this man? Let him answer for himself; he stands here upon his own confession—a betrayer of his companions!—a traitor to his king!—a rebel against his country!—an avowed intended murderer and assassin!—an apostate from his religion!—and a denier of his God!—Good heavens! Is it in a British court of Justice?—Is it here where we have met to administer justice according to the manner of our forefathers in this her ancient sanctuary?—Is it here before a British jury that the lives of eleven men are to be sacrificed, upon the evidence of such a witness, and not merely their lives, but—if the law is to be literally put in force—their lives with torture? Can a British jury condemn their countrymen to death and torture—their names to eternal infamy—and their families to utter ruin, upon the evidence of such a self-convicted wretch as this?

As I prefer, upon all occasions, the authority of great men, I would refer you, in this case, to what I have heard fall from my learned friend the Solicitor-general, without alluding to what cause, or when it was, or how long ago. But, upon an occasion when a witness was called to prove that another witness was not worthy of being believed upon his oath, the witness called to impeach the credit of the other, upon his cross-examination stated, that the man who he said was not worthy to be believed upon his oath, had made a proposition to him to go together into the park, for the purpose of extorting money from others by certain nefarious threats, and that he went with him but without having committed any guilt of that sort. When the Solicitor-general came to comment upon this testimony* the natural feelings of his mind broke out, and his exclamation was, “would an honest man, entitled to credit in a court of justice, act the part that this witness has acted?”—namely: would an honest man, entitled to credit in a court of justice, for a moment assent to a proposition to extort money from another? Then let me apply this reasoning to my learned friend.—Is the witness that he has produced—is a man who could act the part he has acted, entitled to credit in a court of justice? Is an apostate! a traitor! a rebel! a betrayer of his companions! an assassin! a murderer! all of which this witness Adams admits that he has been, and intended. In the language of my learned friend, is such a man entitled to credit in a court of justice? And yet my learned friends, the officers of the Crown, put up such a man this day (or at least yesterday) as a man worthy of credit in a court of justice. Can he be worthy of credit, unless indeed (which I think no lawyer will ever contend) he is worthy of credit when produced by the Crown to seek men's lives, but not worthy of credit when he comes into a court of justice to give evidence on their behalf: unless my learned friends, the Crown lawyers, can reconcile this contradiction, out of their own mouths I have it, that such a witness is unworthy of credit in a British court of justice.

* See the preceding case.

I know what answer may be attempted to be given to this observation. They will tell you, perhaps, that this witness is confirmed by other witnesses. I beg of you to examine the testimony throughout, and see whether you can find this witness, as to the material point which you are to try, confirmed by any, ay, by even an infamous witness, much less by an unsuspected witness. You will not take all this paraphernalia of war, if I may so call it, and the head roll of witnesses you have heard as confirming him as to matters in which he ought to be confirmed. They may confirm him in insignificant points, but you will look for confirmation in the matter of the alleged treason, and if you find no confirmation as to that point, I beg you, upon the authority of the learned Solicitor-general, to dismiss him with shame from this court of justice, as a man unworthy here to be believed upon his oath. If even he were confirmed by other witnesses no better than himself, as to the plot of insurrection and rebellion, it is no support to one infamous witness to confirm him by the testimony of other witnesses almost or equally infamous with himself. Look then to the evidence carefully, and see whether you can find a confirmation of this man in any respect by an unsuspected witness: look whether you can find a confirmation even by those other witnesses who are equally or nearly as devoid of credit as himself.

The witnesses who speak to the actual transaction, I believe, are but three in number. Now, after you have done with Adams, you come to Hiden. Let us see what sort of a man Hiden is. Hiden says, he was formerly member of a shoemakers' club, that is, in plain language, of a seditious club; that he met Wilson a few days before the 23rd of February, and then what do you find upon his own testimony is the first thing that passes between him and Wilson? He has the effrontery to tell you, that the very first proposition that was made to him, without disguise and without reserve, was, "Will you be one to murder his majesty's ministers?" Good heaven! what must a man be who receives such a proposition, and does not instantly revolt at it? Is he a worse man, or a better man, than the man who goes into the park to extort money by threatening to accuse another of certain offences? Is a man who can at once assent to a plot to murder the whole of his majesty's ministers, who, to use the language of my learned friend the Solicitor-general, can be guilty of such conduct, worthy of credit in a court of justice? The answer he would give you to that is, that he is not. Then, if he be not worthy of credit, what confirmation does he give to that infamous witness Adams? I do not know that it may be necessary to go through the whole of the evidence, but he details a long conversation between himself and Wilson all tending to this point, that they had a design in view to murder his majesty's ministers; but there is not one word of confirmation as to that matter which alone is the charge before you, and in which you are to decide. Not one word of confirmation of any of those facts and deliberations which amount to high treason. It is true, Wilson tells him (as he says) that there were some persons to go and seize the cannon at the Artillery-ground, and that they were to retreat to the Mansion-house; but all this is perfectly consistent with the case of a great riot; all this is perfectly consistent with a case that may be unconnected with the charge of high treason: it may be true to the whole extent of this statement, but it does not prove the charge of which alone you are to find the prisoner guilty. And then, at the close of this grave matter, comes what?—why this most ridiculous excuse.—"No, I cannot stop to help you;—I approve of your schemes, I wish you successful—I cannot stop to murder his majesty's ministers at present, because I have got to get a quart of cream for a family, by which I shall make a profit of a shilling!" If this statement is divested of the horror we must all feel at the recital of this abominable proposition of assassination; if it stood simply on the plot to raise rebellion, could I state the fact, and the means of its accomplishment, without at once exciting you to broad laughter? But what is the conduct of that witness when examined? According to his own account, he, without hesitation, joined in this nefarious plan; he shewed no horror or repugnance at it, but said he would be with them; and at last merely excused himself in the way I have stated.

The next witness is Monument—he states a conversation he had with Thistlewood. And the thing that presses most in his evidence is this; that Thistlewood said to him, he ought to get arms; for that all his friends had arms. You will attend to the particular circumstance of the time, when this was said—I cannot, I do not, stand here to deny, that there was a great deal of ferment at this time in the country. It was shortly after a transaction took place, or at least while it was still recent in the minds of men,—a transaction, than which no transaction that I recollect in my time, has been matter of more public discussion,*—I mean the transaction which took place at Manchester in August last, of which I will speak in no terms indicative of my own opinion. But this I may surely say to you, that it was a transaction of which many men thought very differently from each other;—many who were in general warm friends to all the measures of government, thought that a transaction, where so many British subjects had lost their lives, by an armed force attacking an unarmed mob, was at least matter of grave inquiry and investigation; and that before any public expression of approbation was given to that measure, at least it was fit first to be inquired into.—Others again, on the other side, who thought that the measure admitted of no palliation, did not hesitate to call it in plain language a massacre. Certain laws against public meetings followed upon that, which many men who were violent in their temper shewed a disposition to resist; and it was said among those, who thought public meetings necessary to secure public liberty, we will meet, and under these circumstances we will go armed to resist the attempts of the soldiery to disperse us. This fully explains what Thistlewood's meaning might be — “I and my friends who have this view of the public transactions, are determined that we will have our meetings as usual; and as we see that these meetings are interrupted by an armed force, we will have our arms also, and will attend armed.” I do not mean to deny that this is a desperate resistance to the law; but be it so. It is not high treason. And never dismiss from your minds if you think it not high treason, you must find the prisoner — not guilty; — High treason is what alone you are to try, and not disobedience to and dissatisfaction with the laws. So that even with this part of the witness's testimony, brought in confirmation of Adams, it is no confirmation of that in which he ought to be confirmed, though it may be confirmation of a very seditious and wicked intention on the part of those people.

* Vide 41 Hans. Parl. Deb. pp. 357, 370, 508, 887, 1180; 5 Hans. Parl. Deb. N. S. pp. 713, 719, 775.

This witness Monument, however, I should tell you, was at the meeting in Cato-street, on the 23rd of February, where the whole plan of insurrection, if you believe Adams, was to commence; and now I pray you, does he confirm that part of Adams's evidence, which goes to shew they had a design beyond the murder of ministers? He confirms the whole plot of assassination. The transactions in Cato-street, I do admit, confirm so much of the plan as detailed by Adams; but does he confirm that most important fact, the existence of a supposed proclamation, which was to give a character to the whole meeting? Thistlewood would probably have had that proclamation with him, if it had existence, and would naturally have stated it to the conspirators. Can you believe that if that had been the case he would not have confirmed that important fact? Does he tell you that any such proclamation was produced or alluded to by Thistlewood? or that any thing more was agitated at that meeting, than a design of riot, and this intended plan of murder or assassination? But the same observation applies to this witness, as applied to Hiden; and here let me call to my aid the observation of the learned Solicitor-general. Is a witness, who could so conduct himself, worthy of credit in a court of justice? Then here you have one infamous witness, not fully but partly confirmed by another infamous witness. Then comes a third infamous witness. Is it an aggregate of infamy that will ever make truth? What was his conduct in the witness-box to-day, when I asked what he thought of himself in joining in this nefarious scheme? — “I was very much to blame.” — Do not you consider yourself a most atrocious villain? — “In truth I was blameable;” I think such was his very expression, but it was some most trivial and insignificant phrase, expressive of no remorse of conscience, and which shewed that his former conduct had made no deep impression upon his heart, and that he continued the same unfeeling villain as when he set out upon the cold-blooded expedition of intended murder.

It may be argued (for I have heard it so argued before, and it may be so argued again), that there are witnesses who, if Adams, Hiden, and Monument speak falsely, might be called to contradict them — there is Palin — there is Cook — and there is some other man, who it is said might be called by the prisoner to contradict them. Gentlemen, is not that illusory? I have told you all along these conspirators are not innocent men devoid of all crime; and can you expect that we can call men here in behalf of the prisoner, who will voluntarily come to give evidence in his favour with halteres round their own necks. I might put it to the learned attorney-general, if one of them were to venture into this court and place himself in that witnesses box, would he suffer him to depart the court with impunity. Then, if men must come under such circumstances, can you suppose that they will come at all? Let not that argument, therefore, have any weight with you. Let not it weigh against the prisoners at the bar, that they do not call men, who if they were to come here, though they might contradict the witnesses for the Crown, as to all that part of their evidence which relates to the facts constituting treason, must confess themselves guilty of a great deal which would bring them within the grasp of criminal law. Under these circumstances, therefore, it is not to be expected that any such witnesses can be called. — If, therefore, Adams receives no confirmation from his two associates to whom I have referred; see whether he receives any confirmation from the other string of witnesses; when I say confirmation, I cannot repeat it too often, I mean confirmation as to that matter which makes the treason. Confirmation, as to other circumstances; I know there is enough.

Immediately after Adams has been examined, Eleanor Walker and Mary Rogers are called. What confirmation do they give?

They confirm the fact, that Brunt took a room—the back room in his own house, professedly for Ings, but really for certain meetings. I cannot deny that they had that room nor that they had consultations there, perhaps for nefarious purposes; but the question is, did their consultations there refer to high treason? And you will always bear in view, as far as the confirmation of those witnesses goes, it amounts to nothing at all as connected with the matters and facts which are necessary to constitute the crime of high treason.

After these, Hale is examined; he confirms nothing further than that they held meetings in that room; but I think there is a piece of his testimony important to the prisoner: He found the fragments of the cartridge-paper, unwritten upon; that cartridge-paper, which was sent for, I say, for the purpose of wrapping up cartridges, but which Adams chooses to say was sent for for the purpose of writing the proclamations. Then they call Smart, Bissix, and Gillan, three unsuspected witnesses I admit, but what do they prove?—that they saw a man watching in Grosvenor-square, opposite lord Harrowby's house: that is confirmatory of the charge of assassination, which I do not in the present inquiry dispute; but as far as respects high treason, it carries the evidence not one tittle further.

I shall pass over, or leave to my learned friend, all that passed at Cato-street; because here I am bound to admit to you, that the transactions which took place there are so incontestably proved, that I should deserve very little credit at your hands if I were to attempt to deny any part of them. But still it comes back to the same question again: you have to ask yourselves this question, was any thing done there indicative of the ulterior plan of treason? Much may be found there which confirms the nefarious plan of assassination of his majesty's ministers, but nothing is found there which confirms the ulterior plan alleged against this man of levying war against his majesty. And you are to be convinced that these parties were conspiring not only to kill his majesty's ministers, but to levy war against his majesty; and if on a view of the whole case you shall be of opinion they did not conspire to levy war against his majesty, although you may be satisfied they intended to kill his ministers, it is no proof to support this indictment charging treason.

Then comes the question, what is a levying of war? because, if when they had carried their plan unto execution it did not amount to a levying of war; of course the conspiracy to carry that plan into execution could not be a conspiracy to levy war. Now, levying war is entirely a question of fact. I know no technicalities which are to guide you; it is a question you are to put to your own good understandings, and say, what is war? War, in its common acceptation, we know consists in two states arrayed against each other, with forces organized and disciplined, commanded by officers, and supplied with all the material of war. Civil war is but the same thing, then one part of a state is arrayed against another part of the same state,—and, therefore you are to consider whether if this plan had been carried into execution, you see enough to say there would have been a levying of war. When I say it is a question of fact, I state to you the opinion of the same great and learned judge, whom I before quoted—lord Hale. He states, “what shall be said to be a levying of war,” and that is the question for you here, “it is partly a question of fact. For it is not every unlawful or riotous assembly of many persons to do an unlawful act, though de facto they commit the act they intend, that makes a levying of war, for then every riot would be treason.” So here, if you think they had laid a deep plan of wicked and extensive plunder, or of riot, or of murder, if it be not a levying of war, it is not high treason. But to continue the words of the learned judge, he says, “it must be such an assembly as carries with it speciem belli, that is, the appearance of war.” Now, let me pause here, and ask you in the language of this learned judge, did all that was proposed by this assembly carry with it “the appearance of war.” Forty men! Can you say an assemblage of forty men, for whatever purpose assembled, carries with it the appearance of war? He goes on—“as if they ride or march, verillis explicatis,” that is “with unfurled banners;” forty men marching with unfurled banners to take possession of two cannon, to take the mansion-house, and overthrow a mighty empire, is that a levying a war? “Or if they be formed into companies.” Are they formed into companies here? I have heard of no companies, nor of any commanders.—“Or if they are so circumstanced that it may be reasonably concluded they are in a posture of war, which circumstances are so various that it is hard to define them all particularly.”—So says the learned judge, and from what I read to you before written by the same great man, when it is hard to define them particularly, or they cannot be defined, then the jury are to judge of those circumstances, whether they amount to a levying of war or not. And if the learned Attorney-general can shew you no case precisely like this, it is safer not to let in constructive treasons, but to exercise your just power, and to acquit the parties of any such accusation.

If my learned friend the Attorney-general can furnish you with no parallel case, I think your own recollections will furnish you with something like one. I dare say you all remember three years ago, there was an indictment for high treason something like the present. If I remember the circumstances of that case aright, all the same atrocities were there given in evidence, by a witness much like Adams, and who was disbelieved, as Adams, I trust, will be to-day. That witness stated circumstances equally atrocious with the:

present; for though the murder was not then directed against his majesty's ministers, it was stated that the soldiers were to be murdered in their barracks; that the town was to be fired; nay, more, it was in evidence there that great parties did actually assemble, and you recollect that a gun-smith's shop was plundered of arms, and other arms were found upon rioters; they marched also with flags and banners, and yet with all these circumstances in proof, the jury then (judging justly, as I trust you will judge to-day) did not say that the parties were free of all guilt; no! they could not say that; for if they had been indicted for a great and enormous riot, no doubt they must have been convicted; but they said upon the testimony of that day, that which I trust you will say upon the testimony of this day, that whatever that case was, it was not a levying of war, and therefore not the high treason imputed.

With these observations I will dismiss this part of the case; only let me once more (perhaps I may be tedious; but a man would be rather tedious than fail in his duty) call your minds to this point:—It is not a question of guilt or innocence of the prisoner. It is a question of treason, and no other question you have now to try. There are other indictments now pending for the other offences. The question of treason, and that alone, is the one you have to judge of on the present indictment.

I do not apprehend the other parts of the charge will be much relied upon. But I will just say a word as to them. It is charged in two of the counts of this indictment, that there was a compassing and imagining the death of the king; and also that there was a design to depose him from his royal style and dignity. As far as you have any evidence before you (even putting out of your consideration the contamination of the material witnesses), there is no evidence whatever of any hostile intention against the person of the king. And it is to-day, for the first time, that I am to hear (though I dare say it is a very convenient doctrine to the ministers) that they consider themselves so unalienably united to his majesty, that all conspiracy against them and their places must be considered as a conspiracy against majesty itself. To deprive them of their places certainly is not high treason, because there always has been, and ever will be, parties who think the present administration,—when I say the present administration, I mean the existing administration of the day,—may be fairly opposed and removed, and that another administration can be formed, who will manage the affairs of the country much better. This is the uniform language held by some persons in a certain great assembly in this country. There is a constant endeavour to persuade the country to that effect; and, therefore, the depriving his majesty's ministers of their places is no treason. Has conspiring to deprive his majesty of one or two of them by force, ever been held to be high treason? Certainly not. And I do recollect to have read in some portion of our history (whether this reign or the last, I will not undertake to say) that certain privy councillors themselves have gone into the fields and pointed their pistols to each other, each intending, no doubt, to deprive a minister of his place and his majesty of a counsellor. Now, those gentlemen would have thought themselves very strangely treated, if an indictment for high treason had been preferred against them, though if the event of their battle had been different, they might have been treated with an indictment of another description. Then, to go one step farther, is depriving his majesty of all his ministers at once by force, high treason? I say it is not. And though I feel all the horror which must be excited in the breast of an Englishman at a plan of this sort, I cannot sacrifice my duty to my feelings, and refrain from warning you not to pervert the laws from their just ends—not even to punish guilt. For the protection of the lives and liberties of us all, which are only safe while the law is inflexibly administered, you will, I am sure, attend to the matter alone in the charge before you, and consider whether or not the prisoner has been guilty of high treason, and high treason alone.

It is a great consolation to me that I am to be followed by my learned friend, who with far more eloquence and ability than I possess, will point out the discrepancies in this evidence. I have been anxious to do my duty to the prisoner—not forgetting that duty which I hold every lawyer owes to his country. I have told you the danger, and have read from the highest legal authority the fatal consequences of letting in a flood of constructive treasons, which, thank God, it is in your power to prevent. And be assured of this, that whatever you may feel as to the particular circumstances of this case, you are best serving your country when you confine yourselves strictly to the consideration of the offence charged by the indictment before you. You will, therefore, take all the circumstances of this case into your consideration; you will say whether you can find upon the whole testimony, including the contaminated testimony of Hiden and Monument, those facts proved, from which you can infer, that there was a plan of levying war against his majesty, in order to force him to change his measures: weigh all the circumstances, if you do find them fully proved, I cannot expect you will find any other than a verdict of—guilty: if you do not find them fully proved, I am sure you will not hesitate to pronounce a verdict of—not guilty. Consider it well. I can say no more. May that Being in whose hands are the issues of life and death, direct your minds to a right conclusion.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PRISONER.

Thomas Chambers sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

Where do you live?—No. 3, Heathcock-court, in the Strand.

That is nearly opposite the Adelphi, I believe?—Yes, it is.

Do you know a man of the name of Adams?—Yes, I have seen him, he came to my place.

In whose company did you see him?—Edwards's.

About what time did you see him?—About a week before the Cato-street business took place.

Where did you see him?—In my room.

Who were there?—Myself and Edwards.

And Adams?—Yes.

Tell us what passed then?—

Mr. Gurney.—If my learned friend is proposing to give any contradiction to Adams, he should put a distinct question.

Mr. Adolphus.—With all my heart, I should rather do it so. Did Adams and Edwards come in company or separately?—They came together.

Did they make any proposal to you about the assassination of his majesty's ministers?—Yes.

Did Adams say to you that they would do it, and that they would have blood and wine or their supper?—Yes; Edwards asked me to go with them, and I would not go.

Then what did Adams say?—I refused; but I ought to state before that, after I learnt—

No; you ought not to state that. Did Adams say to you that they were going to kill his majesty's ministers, and that they would have blood and wine for supper?—Yes.

Did Adams and Edwards, at any time, come to you again at your lodgings?—On the Monday night in the week that the Cato-street business took place, it was a very wet night.

Did you see them again at your lodgings on that night?—Yes.

Was that the same night or another night?—The Monday night.

On the night of this affair, in Cato-street, did the two come to you again?—No.

Who came then?—No one, not that day.

When then?—On the Monday before the Wednesday.

Did they bring any thing with them?—Yes.

What?—A large bag.

Mr. Gurney.—Speaking from recollection I would appeal to your lordship's notes, whether there was such a question put to Adams.

Mr. Adolphus.—I was not able to take a note of my cross-examination, and therefore I cannot speak to it: I will not press it then.

Did you see them again?—Yes, with a large bag which they wanted to leave.

Thomas Chambers cross-examined by
Mr. Gurney.

What are you?—A boot maker.

How long have you known the prisoner Ings?—Where is the prisoner Ings?

Turn to the bar and look?—I might have seen him, but not to have any knowledge of him.

I know that; that is not an answer to my question?—How long have I known him? I cannot say.

About how long?—I cannot say.

You really cannot say how long?—No; I do not suppose I have been in his company above twice, or three times.

At what places?—The first place I ever saw him to speak to him was near the court where I live, at a pamphlet shop.

Is that the shop where they sell Black Dwarfs and Medusas?—Yes.

Kept by whom?—Let me see; I do not know; Watling, I believe.

You are quite right. Give me one of the other places at which you have seen him?—I cannot state where I have seen him.

Oh yes, you can?—I am sure I cannot in truth charge my memory with it.

I must trouble that memory of yours, because when you have seen a man three times you must know where. Shall I help your memory?—I cannot state where it was.

Do you know a house called the Scotch-arms?—Yes.

Where is that?—In Round-court in the Strand.

That is not far from your lodgings you know?—It is not.

Did not you see him there?—No.

Will you swear that?—Yes.

Positively?—Yes.

You have been there?—Yes.

When?—Three times.

When were those times?—Before Christmas.

Who was in the chair the first night?—There was no chair where I was, nor any business going on.

Mr. Adolphus.—I submit that to ask who was in the chair, when these prisoners are not proved to be there, is not evidence.

Mr. Gurney.—My learned friend is anticipating what probably may come out.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—I cannot anticipate what may come out in the evidence.

Mr. Gurney.—I am not pursuing it wildly I assure your lordship. Who was in the chair?—There was no person sitting in a chair.

But there might be a chairman without that?—But I can say there was not.

How many were there?—I cannot tell, I was in the tap-room.

No other room but the tap-room?—No.

The other nights you were there, were you in no other room but the tap-room?—Three times is all the times I was there, and always in the tap-room.

Do you know the Black Dog in Gray's-inn-lane?—I have been at a public house, which I have since heard was the Black Dog, once.

Who was in the chair then?—There was no chair then, it was in a little parlour.

What was the size of the company?—It might be about seven when I was there.

When was it?—On a Sunday night.

In what month?—I cannot state.

Before or after Christmas?—I cannot positively say.

I dare say you could give me the names of those seven, all of them?—I am sure I could not.

Give me the names of those you do remember?—I was invited there by a man of the name of Bryant.

When you went there whom did you find?—I cannot exactly say.

Just give me some of them?—I was invited to take a pint of beer with him, he was going to the Cape of Good Hope.

Who were there invited to take leave of your friend Bryant?—They were all strangers to me except one.

Who was that one?—That was Mr. Thistlewood.

Do you know Brunt?—Very well.

Will you swear Brunt was not there?—Yes.

You will?—I will; not when I was in the room he was not.

Do you know Palin?—No, I do not think I do know Palin, I never had any conversation with him to my knowledge.

That might be; but will you swear you do not know him?—No, I will not do that; for I may have seen him in a public-house.

Did you attend the meeting at Smithfield in December last?—You mean the last meeting that was held there.

You might go to the first as well as the last?—I was at all of them.

Who carried the black flag?—That I cannot state.

What flag did you carry?—I carried no flag the last meeting.

Any meeting? the last but one, perhaps?—Let me see; I have carried two flags.

Did you carry the black flag either of the times?—No, I did not.

What flag did you carry?—It had inscribed upon it "The Manchester Massacre."

Did you carry the flag with the inscription "Let us die like Freemen, and not be sold like slaves?"—I never saw such a flag as that.

At either of the Smithfield meetings you never saw such a flag?—Not to my knowledge.

Did you carry a flag on the triumphal entry of Mr. Hunt into London?—"The Massacre of Manchester?" no; the "Trial by Jury," that was the flag I carried.

You have told me you know Brunt very well, and that you know Thistlewood; do you know Davidson?—Yes.

And Tidd?—No; I have not much knowledge of Tidd; I may know him by seeing him in our stock meetings, in conducting our trade affairs.

Do you know Wilson?—Yes, I have seen Wilson.

How often have you seen him?—I cannot exactly say.

Do you know Harrison?—Very well.

And Bradburn? No; Bradburn I have not much knowledge of.

Strange?—No; I do not know Strange at all.

Gilchrist?—No, I do not.

Or Cooper?—Nor Cooper.

These you do not know?—No.

How long have you known Mr. Thistlewood?—Ever since Mr. Hunt's triumphal entry.

You, I dare say, were excessively shocked at this proposition, made by Adams and Edwards, to you, to go and assist in assassinating his majesty's ministers?—It shocked me so I would not go to do any such thing.

And as Bow-street is a very little distance from you, I dare say that induced you to go and lay information?—No.

Thomas Chambers re-examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

Did Edwards or Adams know of your acquaintance with those other persons when they came to your house?—I cannot say how Edwards came to know of it.

But, however, they came?—Yes, they did.

Mary Baker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Curwood.

Are you Mr. Richard Tidd's daughter?—Yes, I am.

There were certain things found at his house by the police officers?—Yes.

Some powder?—Yes.

And grenades, as they are called?—Yes.

And some balls?—Yes.

Who brought them there?—They were brought in in the morning that they were seized.

Who brought them?—A man and a boy.

Do you know a man of the name of Edwards?—Yes; he brought some of the hand-grenades.

Did he bring them there the morning they were seized?—No.

But before?—Yes.

When were they taken away after they were first brought?—They were taken and returned.

Did you see Edwards on the morning of the 23rd?—Yes.

What did he do then?—He came and took some of the grenades and powder away.

Were any of them brought back again?—No, not by him.

By any body?—I dare say they might be the same that were brought back on the 24th, but I do not know.

Was there one very large one, do you recollect?—Yes.

Who brought that first?—Adams.

Was that brought back again?—No.

Mary Baker cross-examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.

The box, I believe, was not taken away?—It was taken by the officers.

How long might the box have been there?—It might have been there two or three days.

How long had the grenades been there that were taken away on the Wednesday?—I do not know, they might have been there a fortnight, I cannot say as to the precise time.

What time of the day, on the Wednesday, was it they were taken away?—In the morning part.

Mary Baker re-examined by Mr. Curwood.

Was the box fastened or corded?—Corded.

Had it been opened at all to your knowledge?—Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Curwood.—We shall not trouble your lordship with any more witnesses.

Mr. Adolphus.—Gentlemen of the Jury:—The course of this cause has now reached that period when it becomes my duty to address to you such observations as appear to me likely to be favourable to the prisoner, who stands before you for his life or death; and if there wanted no other motive to induce you to give a serious attention and a kind indulgence where it shall be necessary to the arguments I have to submit to you, this consideration would be sufficient, that probably the few feeble sentences I shall utter, will, if your opinion should not coincide in that which I have to say, be the last favourable words concerning that unhappy man, which he will ever hear in this world. When I say favourable words, I do not mean that the learned judge, who is to sum up the evidence to you, will not make every suggestion in his favour that the law and the facts enable him to make, but that you will not hear from any person after myself, an address purely in favour of his cause, you will hear, recommended with all the weight of authority, and all the force of talent, a strong set of observations against him, against all that has been advanced by my learned friend, and against all that I shall advance; but in his favour you will hear nothing but those deductions which the evidence draws forth from the learned judge, and which, I hope, to whatever extent they may go, will also find with you a most favourable acceptance.

Having so very lately performed for another person the duty which I am now called upon to perform, I feel most sensibly that languor of mind, and that sensation approaching, if I may be allowed the expression here, to distaste, which ever attends those who have to tread twice over the same ground—those who have to advance, for a second time, the arguments and the topics they have advanced once before. I can have no means of varying my statements, except by abridging them; I can have no means of adding to their force, unless I were to call in aid—that which I have not—a renovated mind and extended abilities, such as within the short period which has passed between Wednesday and this day, of course cannot be expected. But I advance to the performance of this difficult task with a mind the more clear, and with faculties the more unfettered, because I am enabled to lay my hand upon my heart, and to say that no one opinion which I have had the honour to submit to the former jury, has since been impaired in my mind; but, on the contrary, that the transactions upon the present trial, and the variances from the evidence which I heard before, very much confirm and advance those opinions which I formerly held, and make me flatter myself that I shall not, without producing the effect of conviction, address to you some of my arguments and observations.

You have been told, in the fervid and eloquent opening of this case, by the learned Solicitor-general—and you have heard it since from my lord, in a way that I hope I shall not cause it to be mentioned again—that the verdict which has passed, ought to be as much out of your minds, as if it had never occurred. I agree perfectly in that; I recommend it; and I pray it may be so, but at the same time I know how difficult it is—nay, how almost impossible it is—for any men, however correct their minds may be, not to let their judgments be in some degree influenced by their memories, not to permit their minds to be swayed by some consideration of that which twelve virtuous, discreet and honest men have done before them. I am therefore, to pray you to exercise on behalf of this unhappy man, with its utmost rigour, that difficult duty of abstraction and self-denial—to forget every thing, except what you have heard in the course of yesterday and to-day, as much as if you were totally unconscious of its having passed; as if this man were brought to a separate trial, and had no connexion with any other person who has undergone, or is to undergo the judgment of a court and jury.

When I speak of my own weariness—of my own labouring under something approaching to distaste in entering on the trial of this prisoner, I cannot help contrasting myself with the learned Solicitor-general, and his evidently joyous and happy situation—he is going a journey, as he expresses it himself, with an assumed confidence, that he cannot fail of arriving ultimately at the point of success—he put it to you that he did not state what he expected to prove, but what he knew he should be able to prove; he did not put it that he had any doubt or difficulty about making out his case, but that experience had taught him, and he knew what he should be able to make out, because the witnesses had undergone examination before, and he could calculate what their disclosures would be. To me there can be no such advantage; to me the very little advantage I shall have, will be to shew you hereafter, by the comparison of Adams's testimony, as he varied it himself from one day to the other, that if I could be prepared to answer the facts then disclosed, new facts were in reserve, and I should have a new case from the same witness, he having known of things which he thought fit not then to state to the jury.

It is very usual with us, when we fear that the talent we have to bring to the subject may be overbalanced, either by the popularity of the cause, or the ability of the advocate you have already heard, to pray you will dismiss from your minds certain topics which have been introduced. In the course of the speech of the Solicitor-general, there was a great deal of fervid declamation applicable to the horrors which might have been produced by these speculative enterprises—I must beg you to avert your minds from those descriptions, to think only of that which is actually proved to have been meditated and done, to carry yourselves no further than the witnesses carry you, and to examine the testimony of those witnesses with that strictness, from which alone the result of justice can be obtained.

The learned Solicitor-general seeing rightly (I cannot call it foreseeing, for it was rather taking a retrospective view) seeing exactly what the course of his evidence would be, and what the course of the examination of his witnesses would turn out, proposed to prove his case by two means; the one by an accomplice, and the other by witnesses who should support that accomplice; and which witnesses he said to you (and particularly applied the observation to one of the name of Hiden) should be unimpeached and unimpeachable. The learned Solicitor-general then proceeded to state the law with respect to the examination of accomplices; certainly, it would be impossible to lay down positions of law with more eloquence than he did upon that occasion; but I cannot help thinking, with the deference due to his high station, and that character he has maintained through life, that a little accuracy might be added to his propositions, by talents much inferior to his own. In considering the evidence of an accomplice, this is most true, that you must consider him as a witness, whom necessity puts into the hands of a prosecutor, and for whose antecedent delinquency, they who bring him into court are in no way answerable; so far he can be used by a prosecutor, without throwing any stain on a prosecution, or those who conduct it. They do not willingly contaminate themselves with a bad man, but they do that which the Solicitor-general intimated to you they alone can do, they pursue the course of the conspiracy, by having recourse to the eye-sight and knowledge of those who have been in the dark recesses of those conspiracies, and can alone state what happened there. Thus far I agree most implicitly with the Solicitor-general; but when juries and a court have accomplices before them, there is a great deal more to be done than the learned Solicitor-general pointed out to you, which, indeed, amounted to no more than that you were to look at him with the same eyes as you would at the most respectable witness; for he says, first, you are to examine the interest he has in the evidence he gives; so you are if the most respectable man I see in court were to come to give evidence; if there is any interest or even any feeling arising out of partiality or affection, you will take that into your consideration, in forming your estimate of the evidence, whoever may be the witness: in that, therefore, an accomplice would not stand in a different situation from the most honourable of mankind; but he does stand in a different situation, and it is over this that the talent of the Solicitor-general has been employed to throw a cloak; he asks, has Adams any interest to add to the deepness with which the crime is already invested? Has he an interest to represent matters worse than they really were? has he an interest to carry any point in the cause? Yes, gentlemen; yes is the answer to every one of those propositions; he has the strongest interest; he has procured a conditional indemnity, as we are to suppose from the concession of the Solicitor-general, by proposing to come forward as a witness; but he comes in chains and in custody, he comes, not as a free man, speaking spontaneously the dictates of his own mind, and standing upon his honour and conscience; but he speaks as a man who must carry certain points, to earn that which has been promised him, and without which he has no reason to think he shall obtain either indemnity or advantage; they are to depend upon the success which attends his evidence. In this I do not rely on assertions which may be made; I shall refer myself to your own good sense, to the experience you must have of the nature and operations of the human mind, whether you can give the same belief to a man who comes into court in chains and in custody, which you would to a man who comes free from fear, and exempt from bias, especially when he comes in the chains and custody of those who can prosecute him at the same moment for the offence which he comes to prove against others. I do not say that he is incapable of being received as a witness, but that he must be received with much more care and caution than would be necessary with a witness of any other description.

We are asked again, does this witness expose himself to contradiction, and is he contradicted? the same question, too, applies to every other witness, in every other case;—every witness must take that which an accomplice must take, the chance of being contradicted, if his evidence is capable of contradiction. But the accomplice, whatever may be said about him in other respects, has this advantage over an honest witness, unless a proper deduction is made from his testimony by the jury,—that, in a matter of conspiracy, particularly all those, or nearly all those, who could contradict him, are tied up and prevented from doing so by being included in the indictment; and whether they be convicted or not, they cannot be witnesses to contradict him. If this prisoner, for example, were acquitted, undoubtedly he could be a witness for others; but until he is acquitted, the law does not give a man that advantage which he would have, if the individuals who might give evidence for him were charged in a separate indictment; and being supposed innocent until pronounced.

guilty, might be received as witnesses before their trial. Thus, therefore, those most capable of contradicting the accomplice, are tied up and prevented giving their evidence; but when we are asked, are the witnesses contradicted that have been brought forward, I cannot help thinking it something more of a taunting question than I should have expected. If there are men who are not named in the indictment, and who may be cognizant of some of the transactions on which it is founded, can it be supposed, when a witness for the Crown is brought into court under a guard, and in custody, that he who should come against the Crown, would fail to expect that his day would come; that ere long he would appear in court in a very different character from that of witness?—Can it be supposed, for example, that Palin, who has been named by the learned counsel for the Crown, can come here as a witness? It must be known he is beyond the reach of any subpoena; but even if he could be found, could it be expected that he would come forward? What then avails us the offer that we may produce him, when he who makes the offer must know that which the witness Taunton tells you upon his oath, that from the moment of this affair taking place, Palin had been a fugitive, and a large reward offered for apprehending him. Truly, the offer is most gracious to us: you may call Palin, when Palin could not come, if we could find him, without the certainty of going to prison; but Palin cannot be found, because all the vigilance of the police officers, stimulated by a large reward, does not enable them to discover him; such an offer, therefore, does seem rather an essay upon our weakness, than a suggestion of the means of extricating ourselves from peril.

When the statute passed, which directs that a list of the witnesses shall be given to the prisoner, it certainly was with the benevolent view, that by knowing who should appear against them, they might know what sort of evidence to prepare, in order to repel the testimony of those witnesses. The prisoners here have a list of, I think, one hundred and sixty-eight individuals; nothing to guide their judgment, no knowledge but such as their own feeble and unwarranted expectations enabled them to form of who would be likely to be called against them, and whom they should be able to contradict; they give their instructions accordingly, and when they are prepared with instructions to contradict a witness whom they expect to be produced, because he has been mentioned throughout the transaction, he is not brought forward. When another witness is called, and some evidence has been offered to prove him unworthy of belief, when we have other witnesses on the floor to prove him a man to whom no credit ought to be given, we find him withdrawn, and that expense has beggared still more an exhausted purse, and those witnesses who have come to particular facts—

Mr. Attorney General.—Really, my lord, I must interpose.

Mr. Adolphus.—I was within two words of finishing my sentence.

Mr. Attorney General.—If it is done it is not worth while to object.

Mr. Adolphus.—I should be sorry to say any thing irregular. If I am wrong I shall submit to correction from my lord. I trust I was making no observation that was not perfectly warranted by the opening. It was put to you, gentlemen, that you might believe the witnesses to be produced for the Crown, unless the prisoner contradicted them by witnesses. I was shewing you how difficult it was for the prisoners to produce that evidence, and I was shewing you more particularly that the list of 168, which by formality of law has been delivered to them, presented no certain indication who would be called; and that even if that circumstance could have guided their judgment, or influenced their intention, that some how or other, by the subtraction of some evidence, that judgment was exercised in vain. Now, though you have heard a much more able argument on the other side than I shall be able to make, I should think in common fairness, and common candour, I have a right to answer the arguments of the Solicitor-general, and to say that you are not without witnesses because we are not able to produce them, but because when we have gone to the labour and care of obtaining them, the expense is thrown away, for the witnesses announced to us are not brought forward by the Crown; and whatever reasons we may have had for believing they will be called, to our great disappointment they are not so.

It is said there are other witnesses, Cook and Harris, who have been present at some of those conversations, and may be called. I deny that there are any such witnesses; the witness, Adams, has told you that which is untrue; there are no such persons whom we could adduce; there are such persons in the other room, whom the Crown could call, and then we should see whether they would swear to that which the informing witness has advanced; but if I had produced to you a witness of the name of Harris or Cook, we might have been told “very true, that Harris or that Cook says he never was at such a meeting; but he is not the man alluded to.” We, on the side of the prisoner, do not know where to find him, and we should be treated with a sort of indifference as to the effort we had made (for I will not use any other expression), and be told we had proved nothing. “Last of all,” says the Solicitor-general—“You are to observe whether the accomplice witness is or is not confirmed:” not last of all, gentlemen, but first of all. I say it is a primary proposition in the administration of law, that an accomplice cannot be believed unless he is adequately confirmed; that he is, as the Solicitor-general says, a competent and a credible witness; nay, I can produce the dicta of judges, that he is capable of being heard, although there is no confirmation of his testimony, but shall ever treasure in my mind the succeeding words of the same learned judge: "When I have granted all this," he said, "I have conceded merely a barren truism, for it has always been the practice, and I believe always will be the practice of judges to tell juries that they cannot believe an accomplice unless he be confirmed, or, at all events, not to make up their minds to a verdict on such evidence unconfirmed"—not confirmed, I admit, in every proposition, but so confirmed in some particular essential to the issue, as to make it safe for a jury to believe the whole of his evidence.

There are other points to which I will call your attention, which will shew what credit ought to be given to an accomplice, and whether he ought to be believed or not; and I consider this of the more importance because, in defiance of all I have heard or may hear from any quarter, I do and must maintain, that the treasonable intention upon which alone you can find the prisoner at the bar guilty of high treason, lies in the mouth of the accomplice alone, and if he is unfit to be believed, and you erase, as you then must do, his testimony entirely from your memory and judgment, there is not a shadow of proof against the prisoner to convict him of high treason. When I speak of the confirmation of a witness, I do not speak of those unimportant confirmations which in some parts the accomplice has received; I do not speak of games of domino, of lighting of candles, of flannel bags, and ball-cartridges, which may have been intended for one purpose or another, but of some direct application of that intention, which at present lies only in the mouth of a witness whom I shall maintain to be, on his own showing, utterly incapable of being supported, except by complete confirmation.

The points to which your attention ought to be directed are these:—Is the account which Adams has given, probable or even possible? Is the conduct of the witness such as to entitle him to belief? Or does he throw doubt and suspicion upon himself? Is he contradicted by all the witnesses produced on the one side; and is he confirmed as far as he might be; or are witnesses withheld for fear that that which is intended for confirmation should turn out to be contradiction? Those are the points to which I think you ought to direct your attention. When I say you ought, I say it with submission to your own better judgments and the directions you may receive from above; but I say on every one of these points the evidence of Adams will be found lighter than the air or the vapour which floats upon it.

As to the probability of his story, it is almost conceded by the other side that it is utterly void of probability; they do not affect to say, this is a narrative we should have believed by itself, although we do not admit that the ground on which it is impeached, namely, its improbability, applies to that more than to other conspiracies which have existed within our own observation. I deny that, gentlemen; that improbable plots may have arisen within our own observation, or been stated in history, I admit; but I assert, that no one so improbable as the present ever existed in truth or fiction; when I say never, I do not pretend to have read every thing; but, in all my reading, I am not aware that any one so improbable ever existed either in Great Britain or elsewhere. I am not rash enough to say, and never will say, that because a plot is improbable, you are, therefore, to disbelieve its existence; but that if a witness comes forward, of a most suspicious and odious description, and gives you an account of a transaction void of all human probability, it is not his positive swearing that such a plot existed, that will induce you to believe it did exist; but on the contrary, you have to weigh this; have a dozen men, or any certain number of men, not being under the care of a keeper of madmen, or wearing a strait waistcoat, concurred in a plan which no human being can believe? Or is it the malignant fiction of one, who knowing already to what degree they were tainted by an intended murder, and how far they were endangered under lord Ellenborough's act, for shooting at the officers, threw in such additional circumstances as might include them all under a charge of high treason? The witness himself is arrested upon a charge of this kind—he is obliged to swear to that which will recommend him—he is obliged to swear deeply—he is obliged, in swearing, to assume the semblance of a Christian—he is obliged to aim at consistency, because he dares not move one tittle out of the line, for the consequences to him would be fatal; he comes before you in the midst of these urgent interests and pressing necessities: And can you think, that from such a mouth such a plot receives the sanction of probability?

My learned friend Mr. Curwood, anticipated that I should go minutely into the evidence, to shew its discrepancies, and the impossibility of its being true. I did so once, but I confess I am neither prepared nor desirous to go through it again, because I think that the leading points may be easily selected and arranged, and that the absurdities will be so glaring, that when once shewn, you will have a full notion of the extent to which you must carry your credulity before you determine in favour of the testimony of a witness like Adams.

It seems that at some time in January, an interview took place between Thistlewood, Brunt, and the witness Adams, at which something was proposed about the assassination of the cabinet ministers; that he became acquainted with Thistlewood, on the 13th of January, and that at some time between that and his going to prison on the 16th, this extraordinary conversation took place. I have a note of his examination on the former occasion, and I directed his attention to that, and adverted to some circumstances to which I shall not now advert, but shall notice in my further address to you; but that this plot was arranged in some degree, and was communicated to this man, who was then going to prison for so small a sum as six and twenty shillings; and who was shut up for that sum for fifteen days. Consider who this man is—a born subject of our lord the king—a soldier who has received his pay—a man who is bound at his time of life (for, as I should think, from his looks he must be nearly fifty), to have due and right views of the obligations of society—he keeps his secret in his own breast, determined neither to act upon it nor to disclose it, and restrained by what? by fear, says the soldier! fear acted upon me, even as early as the 15th of January, or the day before I went to White-cross-street, when I was within four walls.—Why did you not go and tell the Secretary of State or my Lord Mayor (for it was in London) of this plot, and claim the protection, of the prison-walls, till those persons were secured? He tells you that he felt fear, and yet he did not take the means of safety—a glorious specimen of the consistency you are to expect; but this man fears, and therefore hates; for no man fears that he does not hate; but these persons so feared and yet so hated, are the very first persons to whom he addresses himself on getting out. He is discharged on the 30th, and on the 31st of January he is with them again; on the 2nd of February again, and their plan is then disclosed—a committee is formed—the chair taken—resolutions are passed as matters of business, and all this in the presence of a man of the name of Edwards, but he never mentions one tittle to any one on the face of the earth.

Gentlemen, do you believe in the fear? do you believe in the motive? Is he not, in fact, the suborned witness of another man, to state something which never did occur, to bring these men whose lives may be forfeited, or are endangered for crimes of another description, within that of high treason, because that is a more acceptable mode of sacrifice, and may do for him that which another accusation would not have done? because as to every thing which relates to the intention of massacre at lord Harrowby's house, as to every thing which relates to the death of Smithers, or any other part of the subject you are now trying, there was evidence enough without this accomplice, and therefore, the election must have been made somewhere rather to convict these people of high treason, and to make them a sacrifice for that, than to convict them of crimes of which they could have been proved guilty, by the most unexceptionable witnesses, if they really are guilty; and so to rid the country of any danger from them, and prevent others from entering into such combinations in future.

Going through the whole of the evidence given on this part of the case, I premise that that is a perpetually glaring absurdity which nothing but the most abominable audacity could ever have detailed. I beg you to attend to the statement of the steps that were taken, of the propositions made, of the feeble force with which it was intended to execute the most extensive plot ever known in this country, and all this not taken up rashly, or on the spur of any occasion, but debated and methodised, discussed and argued for the space of five weeks, no one having the wisdom to discover that this project was like the baseless fabric of a vision. Even supposing they are all staunch and firm, even supposing—that which he gives you reason to understand they could not possibly suppose—that they had no spies or traitors among them, even if it were left to its own natural imbecility, the acts of plunder and murder, the conflagration of houses, and seizure of property might have taken place, but ignorance and stupidity are not so great as to induce men to believe that any thing further could be effected.

You have had that which produces always a sort of mechanical effect. I do not mean to pay an ill compliment to your understandings, but you have had a display of visible objects,—pikes and swords, and guns and blunderbusses have been put before you, to the end that this feeling may be excited in every man's mind, "how should I like to have this sort of thing put to my breast? how should I feel if this were applied to my chimney, and that to my stair-case," and so on: that is, that the individual feeling of each man may make him separate himself from society, may make him, through the medium of his own personal hatred of violence or apprehension of danger, think that this contemptible exhibition of imperfect armoury could operate on a town filled by a million of loyal inhabitants, or could give the means of overwhelming the empire. When touched by reason, they shrink to nothing, and will never produce a verdict contrary to the evidence of facts: it is like displaying the bloody robe of a man who has been stabbed or murdered; it is like the trick practised at every sessions, where we see a witness pull out some cloak or handkerchief dipped in blood of the person, to produce conviction through the medium of commiseration; they do not trust to description, but rely upon display. That is the effect of the production of these arms; but to suppose that, with such a collection however furnished, with such a combination of miserable means, four or five and twenty men (for that appears to be the number concerned; fifteen or sixteen the largest number that ever met to resolve) could conceive they could accomplish these mighty designs, does exceed all belief, unless supported by much better evidence.

But we are told that it is not because a plot is rash, or ill-conceived, that therefore the belief of it is to be rejected. I agree to that, provided it be competently proved. It is said, all plots, in all histories, have been rash and ill-advised; in that I do not agree: the strength of combination, the force of influence, or the weight and application of physical power has characterized every one I have read of; and where rashness has been displayed, it has been from a mere miscalculation, and not where the parties have, perceiving the hopelessness of their attempts, yet persevered in them. I have turned my mind to the case of the earl of Essex, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and I agree that that was a most rash and ill-concerted plot; but that illustrious nobleman had formed a plot in which he was countenanced by, and connected with, some of the first persons in the realm. The rashness of his enterprise consisted in the idea, on his part, that the great popularity of his enterprise would engage in his behalf the countenance of all the citizens of London. He went out with two hundred followers, and when he found himself coldly received, returned to his own palace, and there defended himself: he betrayed himself by his own rashness; he shewed, it is true, a want of knowledge of the minds of the people among whom he was to move, and a want of sufficient insight into the resources and wisdom of the government of queen Elizabeth, which he attempted to overthrow; but his was a very different case from a combination which has no support from influence, or from money; from powerful names, or overwhelming numbers.

Gentlemen, something may be said about a parallel to be found to this plot, in the plot of colonel Despard. Colonel Despard himself a soldier, understanding the art of leading soldiers, is said to have engaged in a plot fully as absurd as this. I shall be astonished if such parallel is attempted in the present case;—I was present at the trial of that unfortunate man and his associates; but from something I have heard on this subject, I thought time must have obliterated the circumstances from my memory, and I was obliged to refer back to the book, to see that it is as different from the plot you are required to believe, as it is possible one plot should be from another. There are it is true, gentlemen, fundamental similarities; the leader of that plot, had a feeling of resentment against one person, which it may be said is parallel with this in that respect, and he had ulterior objects;—he, the leader, a soldier, professed that he had four hundred soldiers at his disposal, and that with the influence of an explosion, he could get the rest of the soldiers, and all the people to be on his side.—Colonel Despard said, I have a hundred men who will advance, and take the Tower; is that the case here? here are eight men to advance, and take six pieces of artillery, and to march to the Mansion house. The defence of colonel Despard rested a great deal on the improbability even of his plot; but there was a damning fact on the very face of it, which no art could surmount, which no eloquence could palliate, his particular malice was directed against one individual, and that was the beloved and venerable sovereign then on the throne; his object was, to take possession of the great cannon in the park, and shoot the king as he went to the house of parliament.—If that was believed, as I know it was believed, then there could be no doubt or difficulty that it was a direct treason against the life of the sovereign himself; and however absurd might be his ulterior views, that by itself constituted the guilt charged in the indictment against him. But this is not at all like the plan of an attack on the lives of his majesty's ministers;—however valuable individually, or however important their services collectively, an intention to attack, or even the actual murder of them, is not treason. I know what I myself felt on that occasion, and I believe, the feeling extended to every one present, least of all excepting the jury, when witness after witness came into court, and deposed as to this part of the plan, and that the colonel being remonstrated with, as to its cruelty to others who might be in the way of the cannon shot, and the impropriety of murdering a man so well beloved as the late king, said, "I have examined the matter well, my heart is callous, and I am resolved to do it." Shall it be said that the rash plot of these persons, stands in the slightest degree of comparison with that, although in Despard's plot there was all the inferior apparatus of a provisional government: of the taking of castles; of securing ports; and occupying roads: but there was as a previous guarantee, an oath of fidelity to the provisional government, which it was pretended already existed, and the concurrence in this was brought home to every one of the conspirators. There were proceedings which implied the existence of such a body, and it was held out that men and money from France would not be wanting, and it was proved that they were confidently expected.—Is this a plot to be put into competition with the Cato-street conspiracy?—one wonders that such a parallel should be resorted to.—I shall be surprised even if it can be forced on the learned Attorney-general, and be treated by him as one tenable, even for the purpose of illustrating a thought, or turning a period.

I am not unread in the history of my country.—I know the plots and conspiracies which have been formed by vile men. I will not refer you to such as that of Long-beard the lawyer, who held his preaching in Cheapside; but as a conspicuous example, look at Wat Tyler's insurrection; had that the least similarity, or was it so much within the scope of improbability as this is? It arose out of the anger of one man, for an insult offered to his own family within his own walls; but far from its being the effort of an individual, the Chroniclers who enter most minutely into the history of the times (I think Hollinshed for one) have said, not only Tyler was exasperated by such an insult, but, that other persons were so in every county and almost in every town in England; and it is much doubted whether Tyler was the beginner of the insurrection, or whether another man in Essex did not bring it on before Tyler was a party.

But if the popular feeling was roused beyond the possibility of restraint, by the insult offered to Tyler of Dartford, it is evident that there was in the minds of men in general a sense of injury and proneness to resentment which wanted only an immediate provocation; for it is stated that on an insult offered to this man's daughter by a tax-gatherer, which flesh and blood would not endure, under pretence of levying a poll-tax, Tyler hearing a noise in his house, and entering with his lathing-staff in his hand, wrought the officer such a rap on the pate, that his brains flew out and he died instantly. That was the circumstance which roused the country, and occasioned that tremendous insurrection, in which records were destroyed, learning proscribed, nobility trampled under foot, and royalty itself defied and menaced. Is that to be compared to the feeble combination of a dozen persons in a back room, getting at a very small expense such a parcel of trash together, and supposing that by these they could over-run the country, and over-turn the empire? That was during the reign of an inexperienced infant king, advised by imprudent ministers, and deserted or feebly supported by timid friends: that aided by popular feeling of grinding and insulting oppression, ran throughout the kingdom, and prevented the exertions which might have succoured the Crown and relieved the capital: how unlike the feebleness of the present pretended combination; where the strength, the feeling and the influence are all on the side of government, and those who are supposed to meditate its overthrow are distinguished only by their beggary and their obscurity.

Jack Cade is another person, who raised one of these insurrections; but for what? to feel the pulse of the country towards a disputed title—his conspiracy is known and recorded in history, to have been supported by those who wished to put the Lancaster title in issue, and who gave their support under hand, to that false traitor, as he is called in our statutes.—That is as different, as any historical case can be; as different as the evidence before you is from reason, consistency, and truth.

Then I ask you again, is Adams's evidence incredible, as it will appear when it comes to be stated, in all its details? and using the same mode of supplication you have heard from my learned friend,—begging you to keep those observations in your mind, and try the evidence by that test—to forget the garnish of arms, a display more convincing than even all of the eloquence and weight of my two learned friends, who, before the verdict upon this man shall have been submitted to your consideration, will have had to address you.—I ask whether this is a plot you would believe out of the mouth of one witness whoever he might be, and much more out of the mouth of such a wretch as that is?

I proceed to the next point I have to treat on. Does Adams entitle himself to credit? Is there, in the account he gives of himself and the manner in which he answers questions, either in chief or in cross-examination, that which should induce you to give credit to his testimony? There is, I am told, in a neighbouring country (or at least there was) a time when a display was made by the timid and false-hearted of what they termed a cockade of circumstances; it had two sides, each representing devotion to a different cause; if Buonaparte was uppermost, the side was shewn which presented the three colours; if Louis was in power, then it was white. Such seems to be the description of Adams's conscience; he wears his religion as these time-serving men wore their cockades.

A man may change his party through fickleness, or may comply with those in power through mere inertness, without bad intention; but he who has received baptismal rites at the font, never renounces his faith in his Redeemer without disqualifying himself for ever from being received as a witness. What is the volume which touched his lips when he engaged to tell you the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth? The narrative of the sufferings on earth of that Blessed Saviour whom he denies; the precepts of a religion which he has renounced; the book on which we Christians place our hopes of hereafter, and by which we endeavour, as far as the frailty of man will permit, to regulate our conduct here; a book which he threw away as idle trash, because he had read as he expressed it, the accursed work of Thomas Paine; a book which he has denied as the basis of faith and the anchorage of hope, and yet he now comes before you as a renovated man, and asks you to give implicit credit to his oath. What book has answered the book of Thomas Paine in his mind? What has given him that light by which the errors of the heart and the head have been corrected? No inspired volume has wrought the blessed change; the handcuffs upon his wrists, and the irons on his legs have been his only tutors; and as he found it necessary to come into court to be a witness, he found it convenient to profess himself again a Christian? Flimsy pretext—abominable delusion! Incapable of obtaining credit for the smallest assertion such a man should make, but incomparably too insignificant, to induce a jury of Christians to hesitate for a moment in dismissing from their minds this man, whose statements can only pollute their ears and corrupt their judgments. Apostacy, odious as it is, does not form the whole odium of this wretch's character; he adds to this, as my learned friend has said, disloyalty to his sovereign—treason to his country—treachery to his companions—and he crowns his infamy by a brazen impudence in delivering his evidence. Bring him to the test of his own observations—I asked him, upon repeated occasions, stating to him what that evidence had been, and stating that, under the correct, I do not say the severe, vigilance of my learned friend on the other side, reprehending me very properly when I mistook any thing—I asked, how came you to omit, from your statement the other day, facts so important as many of those you have related to-day? “Oh, why,” said he, “I did not think they were of any importance in the cause: the prisoner about whom these statements are made, was not then upon his trial; my memory did not serve me, and I have a great many other things in my memory that I shall produce against other prisoners.” This was his own voluntary statement, and this, gentlemen, from a man who is sworn to tell, not the truth partially, not the truth as he may conceive it necessary, but to tell the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and to act upon that, so help him God. If he had never renounced his Redeemer, or blasphemed the book of life, as he has done, does he entitle himself to be believed by you, when he acknowledges that he is ready to put a construction upon that oath, different from that which all men must? and he sets up as an apology that he did not state these things upon the former occasion, because they did not relate to the prisoner upon his trial! Now, let us try that—the first addition he makes to his evidence is this—“Brunt said, he had two men to call upon in Carnaby-market. He asked Mr. Thistlewood whether he would walk with him, which Thistlewood declined, and I went with Brunt and Ings.” Does that relate in any manner more to the trial on which he was examined yesterday, than it related to the trial of Thistlewood, on which he was here before? Is his account of his suppressing facts, because they do not relate to the case true, or is it true that he invents new matter as he thinks the occasion will require? Again, he tells a long story of Ings doing something at a meeting at which Thistlewood was present, and which would have been of the utmost importance on Thistlewood’s trial, if true; that Ings pulled a pistol from his pocket and declared what he was ready to do, and went to do, when his Royal Highness the Prince Regent was going to the Parliament House, stating it in the midst of a conference with Thistlewood, who was then on his trial, and yet not one word of that did this fellow state; but he takes three days to invent it, against the prisoner now before you comes upon his trial, when he thinks he can more deeply impress his statements by the help of additional circumstances. We have been asked why we require juries to disbelieve witnesses, and yet produce no evidence to contradict them. Gentlemen, can we give locality and substance to the fleeting form of a phantom? Can we concentrate and fix the glittering rays reflected from the polished surface of a mirror? Unless we could do these things we cannot apply effectual contradiction to so unstable a witness as Adams; when we think we shall be able to do so, he avoids us; and when we have positive evidence in answer to another whom we expect, that witness is kept back from us, although used and mainly relied upon as a supporter of Adams on a former occasion.

In these respects, has Adams entitled himself to credit at your hands from his own shewing? Unless the experience of a small number of years compared with the rest of my learned friends at the bar—unless the knowledge I have of juries which those years have given me—unless the observation of thirty-five years, more or less, constantly applied to courts of justice, deceive me, it does not want the feeble exposition I can give to it to make any honest and discreet jury say, “on the evidence of this man we would not hurt a mouse or a beetle; his evidence with us must go for nothing.”

But I advance this matter a step further: you have seen that he is, in the first place, the narrator of a most improbable story; you have seen in the next place what character he gives of himself, and how he disentitles himself to your credit; is he to be disbelieved the more because the witnesses for the Crown expressly contradict him in many material points? It is a material point for your consideration in the case that is now before you, what passed in Cato-street at the unfortunate time when Smithers lost his life, and when many other valuable lives were in danger; certainly you will see it is. Now is this man supported or contradicted in that? — A person has been brought of the name of Monument, who has been sought as a confirmatory witness; let us see in what does their evidence differ. That there was such a meeting in Cato-street—that there were arms—that there was gunpowder—that there was a man killed—that all those circumstances occurred which every newspaper would have given you, and every newspaper had given you for two full days before Adams was taken into custody — three days before he gave his evidence, all this was known, and about that he would require no confirmation, and certainly receives no support: but is he confirmed, as to his being there, by any witness? In the first place, as to the number of men, he states most distinctly upon his oath, that Thistlewood’s declaration was, that there were twenty men; eighteen above, and two below stairs; that fourteen would be sufficient to rush into lord Harrowby’s dining room; the number was stated specifically, that six would manage the servants, even if they were sixteen in number. If this passed in a room, fifteen feet long, and ten broad, could Monument have been ignorant of it?—but, on the contrary, on quite another mode of interrogatory, and quite another occasion, although it is in relation to the same fact and ending in the same way, Monument tells you most distinctly that the number stated was twenty-five then present—that it was needless to count them, for Thistlewood knew there were twenty-five—and that they would be enough to do the business. That must have been the same conversation, only with this difference, that the mind of Adams, if he was there, was engaged in the introduction of those who were to frustrate their object, while the mind of Monument was engaged on what passed, and he told the truth. He says further that there was but one candle a-light when the officer came in; that when that one candle was put out, the whole place was in darkness. And that he swears most positively. Both the officers swear that there were more, one that there were five candles in the great room, and he should guess by the quantity of light, at least three in the back room.

Were the words he states uttered by the officer? or are they a fabrication to answer one purpose if they will not answer another? take those words seriously into your consideration.—Adams stated that when the officers came in, they said, "Here is a pretty nest of you, we are officers, and have a warrant to apprehend you; as such, we hope, gentlemen, you will surrender quietly."—If those words were said, all defence of these men must fail on another indictment; for they would, without doubt, be guilty of murder; but did the officers say so?—both the officers examined to it, most distinctly, honestly, and fairly giving their evidence, state all that we said was (for I put down the very words, and they say they were the same in substance), "We are officers, seize their arms;" no word about a pretty nest; no word about a warrant; no word about yielding, or surrendering:—all this is the vile fiction of this wretched witness, who, therefore, on every test he goes through, is unconfirmed, contradicted, and deprived of the very semblance of truth.

I shall be told, perhaps, it does not apply in the slightest degree to the basis and body of this conspiracy, whether there were three candles or eight candles, or one, and whether there were certain words uttered or not. Perhaps some of you have done your duty either here or elsewhere, on the trial of other criminal cases; you have heard prisoners at the bar call witness after witness, to prove an alibi; those witnesses have been kept apart by the policy of the law, and after their examination in chief to the principal point, they have been asked what had you for dinner—what person did you sit next—were there one or more candles on the table—did you get up to help yourself, or was there a footman in livery, or a maid servant; and a discrepancy in the evidence has turned the fate of the prisoner; it would be in vain for counsel to get up and say, my lord, it does not signify a farthing to the case before a jury, whether they ate roast beef or boiled mutton, or whether they had wax lights, or tallow candles, or whether they had a footman or a maid servant, the judge would say, no, sir, but we must see from the account they give whether the witness can be believed in any other respect; then I apply this to the witness, Adams; supposing there were no objection arising out of his own mouth, when he is contradicted on three points by witnesses called on his own side, is he a man to be believed, to hang up men by eleven at a time, when he gives his evidence from time to time, to carry the inculpation to the prisoners as they proceed in the trials? I hope a better judgment will prevail, and that my client will have the benefit of that better judgment.

It is said an accomplice ought to be confirmed, I say (and I trust I shall have the opinion of his lordship with me upon that subject) that he ought to be confirmed as far as he can be confirmed, for the very term confirmation implies doubt, and every circumstance by which doubt can be elucidated is a circumstance by which his evidence can be confirmed; if there is any thing this corrupt and tainted witness knows, it belongs to those who bring such cases forward to see whether it is or is not within the knowledge of some other who is more fit to be believed.—I say this, I hope, not lightly or rashly, I remember being once told on a prosecution by a learned judge, for whose judgment I shall ever have the utmost veneration, that the duty of counsel for a prosecution is as sacred as that of the judge himself, that if there was any thing within the knowledge of the prosecutor that could elucidate it, it ought to be brought forward, for that the life of a man is not a matter merely of forensic trial; the object is not to get a verdict, but to enable all mankind to do justice, and to see that the ends of public justice are fairly and fully accomplished. If this is true in a private or ordinary prosecution, is it not peculiarly so in this case? yes, gentlemen, it is; for whether eleven men shall or shall not be consigned to the rope of the hangman and the axe of the executioner, is of the utmost importance to each of these individuals; to them it is as important as if on their breath depended the safety of the empire, for to each man his own life is most dear and most cherished; we cling to life amidst sorrow and sickness, in depression, and even in despair. When hope has fled, the love of life remains, and it is for life that the unfortunate man at the bar now appeals to your justice, and to your discernment. But important as the question is to the parties, it ends as to them with the day of their suffering, but as a public record, as a monument of the times, it remains for ever. This conspiracy is the supposed cloud which has overshadowed the dawn of the new reign; whether it is of that density which is supposed, or whether it could be dissipated by a puff of wind, ought to be the main object of the present prosecutions, and in order to shew that in its real colours, their evidence ought to be resorted to, and none to be kept back. If there is any thing to be gained by these trials it is the strengthening of government in the confidence of the people, by a knowledge of the danger to which the government has been exposed, it is the applause of those worthy ministers who have detected and brought to punishment such a conspiracy as this, and it is upon that alone that the hopes of to-day can rest. Your verdict will decide the fate of that man: for the rest, Europe as well as Britain will judge at the present moment, and posterity will judge for ever: if therefore, any means of elucidation are withheld, all the testimony not produced will, in history and politics, be taken against those who keep it back, and thus not only hardship is wrought against the individual, but the very main spring which should animate loyalty and engage our affections in such a cause as this, will be taken away. The cause belongs first to that unhappy man, who must lay down his life, if you believe the witnesses against him; but it belongs afterwards to you, to me, and to every member of the British community, for our honour is concerned in the honour of our country, and in proportion as that is set high, so shall we rise in the estimation of other nations, and so will our respectability and gratification be increased.

I have done, I hope, except as to one point, with the witness Adams; but there is one part of his evidence to which I beg to direct your particular attention, which will shew you that that is particularly true, in one instance, which I impute to him as the governing motive of his whole conduct—that he has charged upon others those crimes and that guilt, of which he is the author, and which he perhaps alone is capable of forming; he tells you that Brunt professed opinions approaching to atheism; that he said, when he was told that he should have an opportunity of murdering all the ministers at once, that now he believed there was a God, that he had often prayed they might be brought together, and that now God had delivered those persons into their hands. That a man who has read the accursed works of Paine, till he has renounced the faith of Jesus, should use such expressions is probable; but call Brunt a murderer, call him an assassin, call him a traitor, a robber, or what you will, it is not to be credited out of the mouth of such a wretch as Adams—himself an avowed contemner of his bible and his Redeemer—that he who commits crime in this world cuts himself off from the hope of penitence, and that he has not that which the thief on the cross had, a hope that the penitent acknowledgment of his crime might enable him to enter into a state of mercy. I implore you for charity's sake not to impute this to Brunt on the testimony of such a wretch, when they might have called Edwards and others to prove it—Edwards, who is stated to have been present at that conversation, but who is not called to confirm this man in that or any other particular.

There is another point on which you will consider whether Adams is to be believed:—he swears distinctly, that he never had been at the lodging of a man of the name of Chambers, in a court called Heathcock-court, in the Strand: and that we might be sure that it was not the name of the court that might lead to an equivocation, I took the pains to fix that on him, “supposing it is not Heathcock-court, did you go to any such man, and make a proposal to any such man.”—No, no,—no was the regular answer. I have called the man who proved what he said, and what he did, and what he wanted to leave, and I have proved that every thing he said upon that was like that which he has said upon all other points, an effusion of rashness, or a concoction of premeditated falsehood. I saw the scope of the cross-examination, and I could not fail to see that Chambers was one of the men whom they call radicals—that he was one of those who had carried forward and assisted at meetings of these people—that he was deeply engaged in the exterior of these proceedings. No man can doubt that he was, for if he had not been something of the kind he would not have been a fit person for Edwards and Adams to practise upon—if he had not had the discernment and good sense to see through their treacherous designs, he too would have been at the bar as one of this traitorous conspiracy—his mouth would have been shut by his being indicted with the others; he is not a witness I should prefer to call, but he is a witness whom the treachery of Adams has rendered necessary, and you must weigh his evidence against that of Adams. This, however, is quite clear, from the cross-examination—Chambers was mentioned yesterday; due industry has not been spared in the mean time; all the particulars of his life are well known, and it is not pretended that the height of his crimination goes beyond this, that he was an acquaintance of Thistlewood, and had drunk with him in a public-house, that he was so far transported with the miserable politics infused into the minds of the vulgar, that he carried a flag at the Smithfield meeting, and the triumphal entry of Mr. Hunt. Is he a Deist? Is he a betrayer of his friends? Is he a traitor to his king, except so far as the circumstance of the Smithfield meeting goes?—No, no—no is the answer to all those questions, and his evidence must be confronted with the evidence of a man who is all these. How far such a man ought to be confirmed I will not say, but, standing as he does, I will say that he ought to be dismissed entirely from your consideration in the investigation of this cause. But is there evidence enough without him? for I take this to be a clear proposition, if a witness's credit is doubtful, before he comes into the box, that doubt may be removed by confirmation; but if he has in the box disabled the jury from believing some material proposition he has stated, he is self-convicted of perjury, and the jury must dismiss his testimony from their recollection, and hold him as no witness at all, and so I contend you must consider Adams. It is not for juries to sift and garble testimony, they must believe the witnesses on the whole, or they must dismiss them from their consideration altogether—indeed it would be an insult upon your understandings to say, in this matter the man is perjured—in such a matter he is not—we will believe so much:—the very word perjured shuts up the leaf of his evidence, it becomes dry and withered, and you read no more; and if therefore you believe, as I contend you must, that this is a false and perjured witness, his evidence goes for nothing, and he is removed entirely from the cause.

I come now to another witness, or to other witnesses; and let me see how far they confirm Adams as to any thing that is material. Hiden certainly stands in a favourable point of view. In one respect, my learned friend, Mr. Curwood, made a mistake respecting him, that he was a man who received the knowledge of the crime and afterwards concealed it: he is not such a man; there is this favourable circumstance in the testimony of Hiden (if you believe him) that when a communication was made of a supposed plot, he disclosed that to lord Harrowby at the first possible opportunity; but we are a long way from believing Hiden for that. That Hiden may have had some knowledge of the intended meeting in Cato-street, and the intention to murder his majesty's ministers, there is every probability; that he learned that from Wilson is a matter of much more doubt; that he may have derived it from Edwards or from Adams is extremely probable, and extremely consistent with the whole of the story, for, with all the wish in the world,—supposing him a conscientious, an honest, and an unprejudiced person,—to give that man credit for what he said, for God's sake examine, whether he is a witness of that untainted kind that ought to make up for the deficiency of testimony in Adams. I asked him where he lived, he told me he lived in Manchester-mews, Manchester-street. I was told afterwards, with some heat, that he had said he had lived there, or that he had been living there, or something of the kind; upon all these subjects you are the arbitrators, and I put it to you whether, until I had pursued my cross-examination to the extent of several questions, if you had been asked on going out of that box, to say who is the witness Hiden; you would not have answered he is a milk-seller, and lives in Manchester-mews, Manchester-street. Would not that have been the impression upon the minds of every one of you? Could you have had any surmise that he had been for several days a prisoner in the Marshalsea-prison, having been translated into the King's-bench for a debt which had been due several months, and for which he had been absconding from Manchester-mews? Can you then receive this man as confirmatory of the evidence in general which has been given by Adams?

But I go a step further: does he by himself (for that is necessary if I am right as it respects this case) does he pretend to know the name of Ings at all? You are trying Ings; I know it is part of the apparatus of the indictment that, being laid as conspiracy, the acts of one are evidence against the whole, and that, therefore, this man can come here to hang Ings on declarations of Wilson; but on whom does the evidence of the conspiracy rest? on Adams, and if he were to be taken away, Hiden has no standing ground. But put it thus:—here is a man to whom a communication of an intent to murder his majesty's ministers is made, and a proposition that he shall join in the attempt. He has, then, that which my learned friend, the Solicitor-general, has much pointed to, a direct interest in the declaration which he makes, because, without alluding to my lord Harrowby's personal character, for which I have as much respect and veneration as I ought to have, can any British nobleman be supposed to have received information from an obscure and humble individual, and not to have done that which becomes him? But there is something remaining to be done: lord Harrowby is too good and too prudent a man to give money to an individual before he has given his evidence, but I need not tell you what a man may expect on such an occasion: why does Mr. Hiden come here to tell you this plan of conspiracy and high treason, but for that which is to raise him from prison, and place him in affluence, because he has made a disclosure which is to save not only the life of lord Harrowby, but some of the best blood in the kingdom, and has enabled his majesty's ministers to detect this dangerous plot?

Then it being avowed that he was not one of the persons, it was unequivocally avowed to him, as he states it, what the destination of the whole plan was, and that he was to be engaged to assist in it; but, more than that, he states this to you, which, even if it were taken as true (and it shews there are proverbially men that ought to have good memories, and proves the use of examining men separately), he states all the houses which were to be set on fire, and there was not in the midst of it one word about the barracks or any one place except the houses of lord Harrowby, the bishop of London, lord Castlereagh, the duke of Wellington, and some others which I cannot mention; and then being asked again, he says, "there was no other that I can remember."

Then, gentlemen, do you believe in all this of the firing of the barracks, and all the rest which has been introduced into the cause by Adams? If such a thing had ever been stated, it is quite impossible that so material a feature should have escaped the memory of Hiden. You have no other evidence but that of Adams, with the confirmation of the serjeant who attends at that place, who says that a man who had been in the light-horse might very well know where the stables were, and the evidence given by the artillery-man that balls made of tar and pitch and rosin would set fire to boards, and still more easily to hay and straw: this is important evidence, as well as that of the man who made the discovery how the word button was to be spelt. But I beg you to observe this:—this witness is called to swear not to conversations held in the presence of many persons, but to one private conversation with one indicted individual who therefore can neither come forward to confirm or refute him, but who leaves the field free for this witness to walk on.

Now, recollect the account which that man has given of himself—of his purchase of cream, and his declining the engagement, because he was to go and purchase it; and his assigning that as the reason of his expecting you to believe all the rest of his testimony, when he knows not the name of a family he has supplied for three years, and cannot give you any particulars even of the number or situation of the house they inhabit. Such frail memories form very insufficient support to the rhapsodies or nonsense of such persons as Adams.

Then comes another witness as confirmatory of this man, Monument, who appears to have been selected only for the penury of his knowledge.—Mr. Edwards was present, and could confirm Adams, if Adams had a word of truth in him; but Monument was selected, because Monument was never present at any of the meetings—he was to be made use of according to circumstances; he was—even on the night of the 22nd—told to go with them, but not where they were going, and that the whole would be disclosed quite in time when they came there—he is brought here to state that which lieutenant Fitzclarence, and all the witnesses saw, and not one fact besides. There is no disclosure from any of them in a body, tending at all to confirm this, but private conversations with one individual at a time, the mouth of which individual, Brunt, is shut up; and another individual, who has already suffered the verdict of a jury, namely, Thistlewood. Is this the way in which a charge ought to be made out, when there are in the power of the Crown the means of elucidating the case.

One of the things this gentleman said in his evidence—on which a little confirmation might have been well bestowed, for he comes as a prisoner in custody—was, that all Gee's-court were to be in it; and there the question is asked of him, who do you understand principally are the inhabitants of Gee's-court—"Irishmen, and they have said they have been deceived by the Englishmen so often, that they would not concur in it unless the English began."—Is there not a witness in the list of the Crown, who lives in Gee's-court, who knew Gee's-court, who knew the persons it contained, and whom they do not bring forward?—it is abandoned in the very presenting it, and they dare not tender the confirmation—he might have told whether Gee's-court contains five, or twenty-five Irishmen—the Crown knew whether or not they had a witness to prove that—it may be known elsewhere, perhaps; but no such witness has been produced; they dare not call a witness to confirm that man, and in so doing, they give him up as not to be believed—he swears to conversations, about which he has no support, where he might have been supported if his evidence were true; but he is not supported. It was pressed upon him by my learned friend, "Why did not you at Cato-street, if you had no stomach for this fight, depart, when the tall man was told he was at liberty to go?" "Oh, I did not understand that that information applied to me; I thought it was only the tall man that might depart and not me a remarkably little man, and therefore I staid behind. I was too valuable to be parted with"—such a witness stamps his own evidence—that shows how embarrassed he is (though so fluent in the examination in chief), when he comes to give his evidence on those questions for which he has not prepared himself by antecedent rehearsal; and this shows what credit you ought to give to such witnesses.

Now, gentlemen, I must beg your attention under those circumstances, and under the direction of my lord, to the charge upon the indictment, and to the manner in which it is to be proved. I shall suppose, for the purpose of my present argument, that your attention will be principally directed to the third and fourth counts of the indictment, the first of which is under the statute of 36th Geo. 3rd. cap. 7, and which declares it shall be high treason to conspire to levy war against the king, for the purpose, observe, of making him change his government, or alter his measures, or for the purpose of subverting the constitution, and so on. But it is laid to be a conspiracy to levy war against the king, in order by force and constraint, to compel him to change his measures. I ask you, except in the rash and idle nonsense which Adams has talked to you, is there the slightest tittle of evidence of any intention, to force or constrain the king to do any thing? Is there the slightest evidence of intention to depose the king? Is there any evidence of intention to subvert the constitution of the country, by means of levying war, or to deprive and depose the king, as charged in the first count? The second count charges, that they conspired to excite insurrection within the realm, and subvert and alter the legislative rule and government, and to bring and put the king to death. The third charges a conspiracy to levy war against the king. All these are laid as conspiracies, not as acts, in order by force and constraint, to compel the king to change his measures and his counsels. The fourth count charges the prisoner with levying war with intent to subvert and destroy the constitution and government of this realm, as by law established; and to deprive and depose the king of the Crown.

Upon the first three, you will observe, the charge is a conspiracy entirely and altogether, and that conspiracy would not be high treason, unless it were coupled with the intention assigned as the motive of the conspiracy; and to conspire to commit any one of those acts, by the ancient laws of the land, as stated by my learned friend, Mr. Carwood, was not high treason.

Now, gentlemen, you are to satisfy yourselves whether there is any man, in the whole course of this evidence, who deposes to any such intention as that of deposing or removing the king, except this witness, Adams, whom I contend you are to put out of your recollection: or are there any two men (even giving him as one) who swear to any overt act or acts combined and accompanied by that intention, for the overt acts do not prove the intention; there must be something else from which to collect the intention. Now, I am bound to say that the only overt acts which can be proved as forming any point on which those who charge the prisoner with treason can rely, are those which took place in the meeting at Cato-street. The consultations are entirely in the mouth of Adams, and no other person proves any other treason. The meeting in Cato-street is proved by several persons, but no person connects it with any such intention; but, on the contrary, their conduct rebats such an intention. They were to meet to carry their conspiracy into effect by deposing the king, and seizing the government into their own hands. What were the means they had prepared? a certain number of arms, barely sufficient for an expedition on the high way, applicable to another intention which is disclosed, but not to that which is alleged in the indictment: they are to carry that intention into effect by seizing cannon, eight in number—by conveying them without horses—by acting with them without any ammunition—by attacking the Mansion-house; and, in order to make this formidable attack on the Mansion-house, they place themselves at the greatest possible distance; in order to seize cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, they remove from Brook's-market, in the very neighbourhood, to the very furthest extremity of London, and having performed what they call the West-end job, they are to transport themselves to the Mansion-house, a distance of nearly four, or, as they were to proceed, of five miles; two miles and a half before they can seize the first of those cannon, another mile and a half before they got the rest of these self-moving cannon, and another mile before they place them north and south, to attack the palace of the chief magistrate of the city: they are to make the cannon follow them as tamely as animals wanting their daily repast follow their keepers; and to do it with the more facility, they place themselves at the greatest possible distance from the scene of action.

There is one part of this case upon which I shall have to address you by-and-by, in inquiring whether their situation was well selected for that, but for all other purposes it is absurd to imagine they should have chosen to go to such a place without the means of effecting the end, without any thing that could contribute to success. Now, is there the least evidence or pretence of evidence of this? What says the witness? There were supposed to be twenty men, ten to seize the cannon, ten to light the town, and then they were to be joined by other parties: let us see how that was; the ammunition seized in Cato-street you have all seen; separate that from any other real or supposed ammunition—is there, I say, the least evidence that any ammunition fit for artillery, even supposing there had been artillery, had ever been carried out, or intended to be used for such a purpose?—Have you any evidence that that was disclosed to anybody?—no, not the least; and if these men (one by-the-by encumbered with two heavy heads in a bag) had sallied forth, they would have gone to places where they had no artillery, and where they had no support; and this is the overt act charged to induce you to convict them of high treason. If I were to hear to-day of a conspiracy from without, to liberate all the individuals in that gaol by throwing cherry stones and carraway seeds, I should think that more likely to be true than this; for my imagination does not go to the extent of believing there can be truth in that which you have heard, I will not say solemnly, but most flippantly, sworn to.

Is there any evidence of a levying war against the king? The transaction in Cato-street, I say, did not amount to a levying of war. If they had met in Cato-street and murdered all his majesty's ministers, that would have been a most horrible and un-English assassination, but it is not high treason; it is no more high treason to murder all the ministers than it was to murder one of the most amiable and honourable men who has existed in our times, the late Mr. Perceval, and for which I saw the assassin stand at that bar, and heard his trial, not for high treason, but for murder; and, with the affecting circumstance, which I shall never forget, that I saw the venerable sir James Mansfield summing up the evidence with tears of regret streaming down his aged cheeks, for an individual whom he had always loved, and whom all who knew revered. If any aggravation could have made such a crime high treason, that assassination presented the aggravation; but the murder of one, or of many, never did, nor ever can amount to high treason.

Supposing they had gone further, and seized the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the artillery-ground, that would not have been a levying of war against the king, for the cannon are not the king's; those at Gray's-inn-lane belong to the body of Light Horse Volunteers, those in the Artillery-ground to a private company; the seizing of those is a felony, but not treason; nor is the Mansion-house one of the king's palaces, it is the official residence of the lord mayor; nor is the Bank the king's, it is the house of a chartered company; so that unless you believe the absurdity of installing a provisional government of whom nobody knows any thing: the narrative taken altogether, falls short of a levying of war to bring it within the description of the 36th of the late king.

I shall not dwell upon this point, I have made my observation upon the law; I have no doubt it will be met with all the confidence of triumph from what I see on the other side.—I suppose it is considered that it will not bear discussion for a single moment—I am not the oracle of the law—you will hear whether it is law or not from my lord; if he declares it to be within the law, you will then consider whether you are satisfied by the evidence of two credible witnesses, that such intentions were entertained, and that such overt acts were committed, or whether two overt acts have been proved by two competent witnesses; if you should be of that opinion of course you will find the prisoner guilty; but if you are not of that opinion, I am sure nothing which you read in publications, before you knew you were to sit in that box—nothing of the feelings of loyalty which yourselves and I alike entertain—nothing of your feelings of desire for the preservation of those who hold high offices, which no man can feel more warmly than the humble individual who now addresses you—nothing of your fears for your personal safety—none of those considerations and still less any event that may have taken place in this court within these few days will sway you from a right consideration of the evidence; but you will proceed upon that according to the fair impression it shall make upon your minds. All these acts, and even these acts carried further—the conflagration of buildings; the plunder of individuals; the levy of money by irresistible applications at the door of every house-keeper—do not amount to high treason.

Looking at you, gentlemen, I think some of you are of an age to recollect that, which I recollect when young; when blood flowing like water, the conflagration of houses, and the blazing of prisons, appalled and astonished all mankind; when the civil arm was restrained by terror; when the military arm was not used for other reasons, till the intrepid mind of the then Solicitor-general set them in motion; when the persons who had thus acted were secured, they were not indicted for high treason, but for the simple felonies they had committed, for murder, for arson, or for larceny; but not one of those who were immediate actors in that scene was brought to trial for treason: the instigator and prime mover, indeed, was tried for high treason, and it was decided that he was not guilty of high treason, for that he had not levied war against the king. It may be said, that the statute of the 36th Geo. 3rd had not then passed, but still I contend that if all the acts these prisoners had conspired to do had been full and perfect, and completed—except the introduction of a new government, under the name of a provisional government—if all the bloodshed had taken place, and all the conflagration which they are said to have meditated had been effected, still, under the authority of those cases, I say their crime would not have amounted to high treason, so as to substantiate the charge in the fourth count, that of levying war against the king.

Now, supposing after all, I have combated successfully the relevancy and the sufficiency of the evidence, still there is much for me to account for. Can I say that my clients are men free from all guilt? God forbid that I should stand before you to say so. Shall I apologize for their guilt? Certainly I will not; but I am only anxious that it should receive its right character. Are they guilty of having intended to murder his majesty's ministers? I cannot shut my eyes against the force of conviction that they are. Are they guilty of having pursued schemes of murder or plunder in different parts of the town? The fire-balls, which have been brought would confute me upon that, if I attempted to deny it. Was there a personal vengeance against his majesty's ministers? Did poverty render men desperate, and impel them to crime? I cannot deny it, and for that crime they will have to answer; but that these eleven men, aided by nine others, sought to overturn the state, that they had their confidences to impart, and their associates to seek at the very moment when this plot was to explode, is so absurd, that I do not hesitate to pronounce it incredible and impossible.

It cannot be forgotten that this proceeding hangs mainly, if not almost entirely, on Thistlewood. It cannot be forgotten how lately he had been emancipated from imprisonment for sending a challenge to lord Sidmouth, which his lordship did not accept, but very properly presented him for punishment. It is natural that resentment should rankle in his mind; he took advantage of the transactions at Manchester, and the thanks recommended by ministers to the persons who had taken a part in them; he imparted to others the feelings by which he was impelled, and they, from various causes, co-operated with him; but to suppose that an idea of a provisional government, or of a revolution in the state, entered their minds, would be to say that all their plans were reduced to mere folly, folly more gross than that of ignorance made drunk.

I am now nearly at the close of the address which it is my duty to make. It has been stated to you—and it will I hope be stated twice again—I hope the attorney-general, and my lord, if I may be so presumptuous as to anticipate what either of them may say, will tell you that this is a cause of great importance. Gentlemen, indeed, and indeed, it is not so much for the life which your verdict may take away, as for the principle which your verdict may contribute to establish. It never yet happened that liberty or justice should receive a wound through an attack made on a good man; for on behalf of a good man all mankind arm themselves in their prejudices, and in their hopes; but the attack has always been made through the means of a bad man; and good men have afterwards been sacrificed by force of the precedent. So it is in the present day. If such a witness as Adams can gain credit for what he has deposed,—the revolution of this country, I know, will prevent our seeing Jeffries on the bench,—but we shall have Titus Oates in the witness-box, and audacious witnesses like him denouncing one plot after another. He first swore to the popish plot, and that was so popular that juries gave a ready ear to it, just as honest men would give an ear to a tale beginning in the murder of the most honourable and respectable men, and ending in the overthrow of the state; after the story had been told again and again, after the populace had, with shouts and acclamations, attended the convicts to the scaffold, reason resumed her empire, doubt intruded itself into the public mind, and they who at first triumphed in the overthrow of supposed traitors, came to so sad a feeling of repentance, that when lord Stafford's blood was to be shed on the same evidence for the same plot, when he turned round and protested his innocence, the answer of the sobbing crowd was, "God bless you, my lord, we believe you;" then it was that they felt that justice was misled by the credit given to the testimony of such a wretch; but it could not be got rid of till the revolution had introduced a better system; then indeed it was expiated by the conviction of the perjured witness, by his enduring the pains and indignities of imprisonment, the pillory, and the loss of his ears, and he ended his odious life in poverty and in exile. Alas! gentlemen, one drop of the blood he had shed could not be restored, one hour of the life he had destroyed could not be recalled; the regrets of his own times and of posterity for his victims were alike without avail; but the sight of his triumph, while his villainies were successful, was a perpetual gall to every man who loved freedom, and venerated justice, who loved his neighbour and feared his God, as you do. I exhort, I implore you to look with scrupulous exactness to the witness Adams—to a spy set on by an informer; return to the verdict which your consciences direct you, but for God's sake do not allow yourselves to be swayed by the evidence of a man so infamous, so detestable, so incredible.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—James Ings do you wish to rest your defence upon the observations of your counsel, or do you wish to say any thing for yourself?

Ings.—I wish to state the particulars how I became acquainted with the party in the first place.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Any thing, and every thing which you wish to state of course the court and jury will hear; now, therefore, is the time for you to state them: speak loud and we will attend to what you say.—You had perhaps better consult with your counsel.

Ings.—I have but a little to say, my lord.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Having drawn your attention to whether you will consult with your counsel or not, of course you will judge for yourself, and the Court will hear any thing you have to say.

Ings.—I would wish to speak to the gentlemen of the jury—

Gentlemen of the jury, I am a man of no education, I hope you will excuse my humble abilities; I will explain the particulars as far as is in my power. I left Portsea the beginning of May, 1819; I came to London, me and my wife and family. The reason I left Portsea was, I had nothing to do, nor any prospect of getting any employ for the support of my family; when I came to London I thought I should get employment; I had been in London some time—I was disappointed, I could get nothing to do—knowing nobody here, that was the reason. I inquired and used every means I was master of; I had a few pounds by me when I came from Portsea; I found the money was going very fast, and I did not know what to do. I had been in business, and had lost my money, not by drinking or gambling, nothing of the sort, gentlemen—I could not get any thing to do, and I told my wife I thought I had better go into business, with the little money I had. I went up into Baker's-row, and took a little shop, and carried on business from Midsummer to Michaelmas. The summer being very hot, was very much against me; I lost a considerable deal of money in the course of the summer—I could not get any custom—I found my money was very near gone. I went at Michaelmas and took a house in Old Montague-street, and turned it into a coffee shop and eating-house; and having done that my money was all gone. It did not turn out to my desire; I did not make money enough to keep my family. I persuaded my wife to return to Portsmouth, because she would then be among her friends, and that she had better be there without money than in London.

After my wife had left me some considerable time, gentlemen, there was a man used to come and take a cup of coffee frequently; he used to enter into politics about the government—he used to enter into the Manchester massacre, and so on. I did not enter into conversation with him; I supposed him to be an officer. I was after that in Smithfield-market, looking round to see whether I could get employ, having no money, and I met this man. He asked me how I was, and whether I would have any thing to drink.—No, I told him, I did not drink in the morning. He says, "You ought to stand treat. I have been at your house frequently, and never caught you out of doors before." "It is not in my power," says I, "or I would." He asked me the reason I would not stand treat, I said I had got no money, and if I did not get some work, I must sell my few things very shortly. "What have you to sell?"—"A sofa-bedstead, and various articles."—"I should like to buy the bedstead, if it will suit me: what is it stuffed with?"—"Horse hair." I took him to my lodgings in Primrose-street; it did not suit him. This was about the first or second of January.

In a few days I met the same person in Fleet-market; he accosted me there again in the same way, and asked me whether I would have any thing to drink—I answered him as usual; he said “respecting that sofa, I believe I have got a friend who will buy it of you if you have not sold it.” I said I had not. He said, “My friend will give you more than any one else.” He took me to his friend, and I showed him the sofa, and his friend would not buy it. We came back into Fleet-street, and I went along with him, and had some bread and cheese, and beer. He told me there was something about to be done, would I make one. I asked him what; he said, “No good man wants to know until it is begun; but there is something to be done.” We went and had some bread and cheese, and beer together; then he introduced me at the White Hart to two or three of my fellow prisoners. I asked him what his name was, he said it was Williams, but his name is Edwards. He told me he had made the image of Thomas Paine, at the Temple of Reason, at Mr. Carlile’s, and I understand the same man did make it; so that I am not deceived in the man. He introduced me at the White Hart to take some refreshment with them, but I never knew the business; I had been in the room, but nothing passed about it at the time when I was there, nor did I know the particulars of any thing, because they did not wish to trust me as a stranger. On that very day when we had the bread and cheese, and beer, I went and carried a sword to be ground for him. I left it in my own name; if I had thought there was any thing of this kind going on, do you think I should have left the sword in my own name at the cutler’s? Is that reasonable to be supposed? I had no idea when I carried that sword to be ground, that there was any thing of this kind going on, you may depend upon it. I met him afterwards frequently; I was very short of food, that was the reason I kept them company. I used to get victuals and drink at this room whenever I went; there was a fire, and the weather being so cold, I was glad to go—the man where I was, did not charge me for my lodgings at No. 20, in Primrose-street.

On the 23rd, I believe it was, gentlemen, he comes to my lodgings; he did not find me at my lodgings, I had been at the coffee shop, to get a cup of coffee; I met him in Bishopsgate-street; he says, “I believe there is something going to be done, if you will come up to my house.” He did not say where he lived, but “come up to the alley opposite Mrs. Carlile’s; I shall be there at six o’clock.” I went from there up to the room; I was there up in the room, and got some bread and cheese, and beer, in the course of the day. At six o’clock I went to the alley; he was standing waiting for me there, but I understand he lives up at a side-door somewhere in the alley, by what I have been told in the list of witnesses. I went with him, and he gave me a couple of bags, a belt, and that knife-case, and we came to the room in Fox-court, which has been mentioned, gentlemen; and he and I went away together from there; and he told me the bags were wanted to put some gin in—that the gin was to be got sly. The reason I put them under my coat was, that the patrols should not see them, for if they happened to see the bags under my coat, it would be discovered where he got the gin. I went up, up against St. Giles’s church—he went where he was to get that said gin. He told me it was not there, but was gone up; accordingly we went up Oxford-street, and he turned out at the left hand, and told me to wait. I believe I waited nearly an hour in Oxford-street for him that very night; he came back to me, and took me to a place I forget the name of the street, I never was there before in my life—John-street, where the arms were taken; I had never been there before. He told me he was going to call upon a friend, and said “Do you stop here, you will see some friends of mine directly.” I came under where the archway is, gentlemen, and I saw Davidson; Davidson took me into the stable, and he went up the ladder, and I staid down in the stable; I heard great confusion up in the loft; I never was in the loft at all, I declare before God that I never was, and I stood listening at the ladder. I had been in the stable about five minutes before the officers came in; there was only me in the stable when the officers came in with Mr. Ruthven, I believe that is the gentleman; there were several came in, and I jumped on one side up in the stall. There were two went up into the loft, and the third that came in collared me, and said, “You are my prisoner.” “Very well, says I,” and as soon as he collared me, he began beating me with a staff, till my head was swelled tremendously on one side. I heard the report of a gun or a pistol, and the officer left me. I ran out into the street and they ran after me, and halloed, “Stop.” I met a man in the street with a stick, he hit me violently over the head; he was coming towards me, and I towards him. I got round that man, and a watchman came and hit me with his stick; I was taken prisoner, and taken to the watchhouse.

Gentlemen, this man, Edwards, has been at all the meetings, he has planned and done every thing whatever that was to be done, and he is not brought forward; he is put into the list as a witness, and I am sold as a bullock that is driven into Smithfield-market, depend upon it, gentlemen, I am sold like a bullock driven into Smithfield-market. The attorney-general knows the man, and he knew all the plans and every thing, for two months before I was acquainted with it. I heard a gentleman when I was up before lord Sidmouth say, when they came out to look at us, lord Sidmouth knew of this a month or five weeks ago; that was when I was apprehended and taken before the council. I consider myself murdered, gentlemen, if this man is not brought forward—he is put on one side. I am ready and willing to die directly, if he will die on the scaffold with me. He was the inventor of the plot, if it is a plot, and he has known all about it. I do not value my life, if I cannot get a living for my family; I have got a wife and four small children; but I was drawn in this kind of way when I had no victuals and no drink. My anxiety about my wife and family I cannot describe to you, and I hope before you return your verdict upon me, that if you think me guilty you will have this man brought forward, or else I shall consider myself a murdered man. Edwards was the man that came to my house and got acquainted with me. I was not at any meetings; I have been accused of being at a public-house, but I never was, only since January, at a public-house in Brook's-market—I never was at any other meetings—I never attended meetings in my life, till since Christmas:—Gentlemen, I never was at none of the radical meetings in London, not during the time I was here; I hope you will weigh it well in your minds, gentlemen, before you return a verdict. The people you have had before you are people engaged in this plan, and if they can get out of the halter themselves, they would hang their God—I really believe, gentlemen, that man Adams would; but sooner than I would be the instigation of hanging a man I would die, if I had five hundred lives, yes, gentlemen, that I would.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—Is there any thing more you wish to say?

Ings.—I have nothing more particular to say, my lord—yes gentlemen, I forgot one thing; if you will examine that, that will prove my character from my childhood;—there is my character down there from my childhood.—[Handing in a paper].

Lord Chief Justice Dallas.—We cannot receive that; witnesses to character must give their evidence upon oath.

REPLY.

Mr. Attorney-General.—Gentlemen of the Jury; The case being now closed in evidence and in observation on the part of the prisoner, it becomes my painful and anxious duty to address you; and in doing so, I assure you that as it is my most earnest desire, so it shall be my endeavour to lead your minds fairly and calmly to the conclusion, which not in my judgment, but in your own, you ought to arrive at upon this question; and although I cannot but regret that in so doing I shall have to ask a continuance of the patient attention which you have hitherto paid to this inquiry—an inquiry of infinite importance, both as it regards the individual before you, and as it respects the public—I feel happy that the opportunity is now arrived, that will enable me to remove prejudices which have been attempted to be excited by the learned counsel who have addressed you on the part of the prisoner, as to the nature and still more as to the conduct of this prosecution.

It has been insinuated—nay, it has been stated in terms—that the result of this trial is intended to have the effect of extending the law of treason, and through the medium of your verdict against an unfortunate, and, according to the epithet of one of my learned friends, a wicked man, of creating a precedent to enable future governments and persons hereafter holding the high rank and situation which my honourable and learned friend and myself have the honour of filling, to enlarge the power of the Crown, and sacrifice the liberty of the subject. What there has been in the course of this investigation—what there is in the nature of this case—what there is in the conduct of my learned friend or myself, to call for such observations, I am at a loss to imagine; but sure I am, if I knew myself and my honourable and learned friend, that our only anxiety on the present occasion is, that by the due administration of the justice of the country, and by that alone, the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar shall be established.

The law of treason is definite and clear; but my learned friend, who first addressed you, will give me leave to state that he misapprehends the law as it now stands, when he tells you that an attempt has been made by the statute introduced in the late reign, to extend the law of treason, or to introduce that which he characterizes as constructive treason. He is too good a lawyer—at least I give him credit for being such—not to know that that statute has not extended the law of treason; that it has done no more than make those acts, which before its existence had been determined by the highest authority, and by the sages of the law, to be overt acts of treason under the statute of Edward the 3rd, substantive and distinct treasons in themselves. But my learned friend, knowing this, has endeavoured to prevail upon you to believe (although I am satisfied he will have attempted it ineffectually, because any erroneous impression made by his address, will be completely removed, when in the last stage of this proceeding you shall have heard the law laid down to you by the high authority which to-day presides), my learned friend I say has attempted to persuade you, that not only the late statute had in view the introduction of uncertainty and speculation in the law of treason; but that the object of this prosecution also is, to endeavour to establish a precedent of constructive treason.

There is no foundation either in law or in fact for such insinuations and such assertions; there can be no other motive operating upon the present occasion than a wish that impartial justice shall be done. If the conduct of the prisoner at the bar, and those who are implicated with him in this charge be, as is admitted by both the learned counsel, of the most wicked description, involving them in crimes at which our nature shudders—crimes by the commission of which, according to the sentiments of their own advocates, the lives of those men have probably become forfeited: let me ask you as reasonable men, what inducement, what interest, what motive can there be on the part of the Crown, to attempt to bring home to them a charge of a higher description, unless it be the firm conviction which operates upon my mind (and which I am afraid must, in the conclusion of this inquiry, operate upon your minds) that a crime of greater magnitude has been committed.

My learned friends on the part of the prisoner, have acted rightly in calling your attention to the specific charge you are to try. God forbid that any other consideration should enter into your minds, when you come to draw your conclusion upon the evidence, than whether that charge, and that charge alone, has been made out. Whatever other guilt the prisoner has incurred, whatever delinquencies he may have committed, discharge them from your recollection; keep your minds steadily intent upon the accusation now made against him, and fairly, calmly, and dispassionately weigh the evidence which has been adduced in support of it. I beseech you to do this, and I ask of you to do no more. After an impartial view of the case, pronounce that verdict which your consciences alone shall dictate and approve: if it shall lead to a verdict of acquittal, you will gladly relieve the prisoner at the bar from the weighty charge made against him: if, on the other hand, you are satisfied that the charge is proved, let no consideration of the consequences of your decision operate upon you: look steadily at the only question into which you have taken a solemn oath to inquire; and fear not from any thing which has been advanced by the counsel for the prisoner, to pronounce a verdict of guilty.

My learned friend the Solicitor-general, when he opened the case to you, stated very shortly the charge made by this indictment, conceiving (and I think rightly) that with respect to the law of the case, there was neither difficulty nor doubt. He said he would relieve your minds from all technicalities; he told you, that which I take the liberty of repeating to you now with perfect confidence, that if you are satisfied that the prisoner harboured an intention of attempting to overthrow the existing government (whether that design could or could not be accomplished—whether the means used were adequate to the end or not), and that he acted upon that intention, he is guilty of the crime imputed to him by this indictment. It is not necessary by the law of treason, that the crime should be consummated, by the perpetration of the act in contemplation; and for the plainest of all possible reasons; if such necessity existed, no man could ever be tried for high treason; if the acts meditated must be executed before the crime is completed, it must be ascertained whether the government is overturned or not, before a man could be called upon to answer to the charge. Without, therefore, troubling you either with the ancient statute of 25th Edward 3rd, or the more recent act of the 36th of his late majesty, I beg you to keep your attention closely directed to the facts; ask yourselves these questions: did the plot exist? And was the prisoner at the bar a participator in that plot? If you find that the evidence compels you to answer in the affirmative, it then will be your bounden duty to find him guilty of the charge.

Much has been said upon the testimony of the first witness, Adams; indeed almost the whole of the very able and eloquent address you last heard has been pointed at it; and some complaint has been made of the manner in which my learned friend the Solicitor-general, in opening this case, stated to you that his testimony should be examined. My learned friend told you that Adams was an auxiliary in the scheme; he recommended to you, in weighing his evidence, to consider the interest, or supposed interest, he might have in the result of this prosecution; you were requested to see whether he was contradicted upon any material points, and lastly, the Solicitor-general begged you to give your best attention to the confirmation which would be produced to you of his narrative. I still say these are the tests to be applied to that man's testimony, and I very much mistake, if, on the review which I shall feel it necessary to take of his evidence, and when I come to point out to you the parts in which he is confirmed, any man can doubt the truth of the story which Adams has told.

The first question my learned friend on the other side has asked, is, does he entitle himself to credit by the manner in which he gave his testimony? and here he very naturally introduced an answer which Adams gave upon his cross-examination with respect to his former life. Undoubtedly, a very melancholy fact he did admit to you, that during a portion of his life he had been misled by those doctrines which of late have been so industriously propagated, and which I cannot but fear have been circulated principally with a view to lead to these destructive plans and schemes in which we charge that the prisoner at the bar has been involved. It is the object of men, who have sedition and treason in prospect, to endeavour first to undermine the religious faith of those whom they may wish to make their associates in their crimes. He has confessed to you that, by having had in his possession Paine's works, he did for a time become an infidel with respect to the christian religion, but he never gave up his belief in a God: he owns to you that he had abandoned his belief in that sacred volume which is our guide and consolation here, and the sure foundation of our hope hereafter; but he tells you though he had for a time been so deluded, he has returned again to that belief in which he was born and educated. He is not a solitary instance of such a return under circumstances of affliction: another occurs to my mind which has happened only within these few days, and of which I dare say you are all apprised. I allude to the unfortunate Magennis, at this time under sentence of death for an attempt to assassinate a constable: after his conviction, and when he came to examine his own mind, and to reflect on the situation in which he stood, and the life he had led, that man, in the moments of sorrow, was satisfied that he had been deceived by those who had undermined his faith, and he again embraced the religion he had abandoned. And in considering the conduct of Adams, I think it not at all impossible that his providential escape from Cato-street may have led to that reformation which, I trust, is complete.

You have been desired to attend to the manner in which he gave his testimony. I request you to do the same. It has been said that on some former occasion on which Adams was a witness, but of which you are bound to take no notice, he did not give precisely the same account of minute circumstances as he has on the present trial; that is to my mind the strongest proof of the truth of his story,—you are men of the world and men of experience; is there any thing more suspicious than, when a man has given a long narrative containing various circumstances, accounts of various meetings and consultations, that he should upon a second examination, repeat minutely the testimony he had previously given in the same words, and without variation or alteration?—I say such conduct to my mind would be the strongest proof that the witness told a fabricated and false story. But when his attention is on a second occasion called to other circumstances, and to other persons, that he should remember other occurrences which he had not previously detailed, is not only most natural, but a proof that he comes as the witness of truth: he gave you the fairest account possible; when questioned as to several facts he has now introduced affecting the prisoner at the bar, he said, when I was before here, this man was not on his trial, and I was not then so particularly examined as to the share he had in the transaction; but now that my recollection is awakened, I am enabled to state circumstances that did not then occur to me. But, says my learned friend, he now emits many facts which, upon a former occasion, he gave in evidence: in my opinion such omissions are so far from detracting from his testimony, that they add a weight to it. He narrated the events as they arose in his memory at the time, not from a story learnt by rote, and as a child would repeat his lesson. As men of the world, and as men of experience in these matters, I am satisfied you will consider that the evidence of Adams is confirmed, and his credit established by the very circumstances upon which my learned friend founds his objections to its truth.

I wish, gentlemen, to examine all the objections which are made to the testimony of this witness, before I draw your attention to those strong confirmations which have been very properly passed over by my learned friends who are advocates for the prisoner, it being their duty to present the case to you in the view most favourable for their client. It is said there are contradictions of him by the other witnesses, and I think those first relied on are as to the number of persons in Cato-street; and it is asserted that Adams is at variance with Monument. Let me call your recollection to what passed there with respect to the tardy appearance of Tidd, the man whom Monument accompanied, and who you will recollect was almost the last person who arrived on that evening. Considerable agitation had been exhibited by the party, in consequence of his not coming at the period at which he was expected; Adams was there long before. Adams tells you that at one period, when the matter was talked of, Thistlewood said there were eighteen in the room above, and two below, making twenty. Now what is the account given by Monument?—that after his arrival with Tidd, and just before they were about to leave the stable, and when some conversation took place respecting numbers, it was stated, I think he says by Thistlewood, that there were then five and twenty. There would be no material inconsistency in these accounts even supposing the fact to which the witnesses are speaking to have taken place at the same time. You have often heard—indeed it is a trite observation—that where witnesses are speaking to the same occurrence, it is the best test of the truth of the story they relate that they do not exactly accord in all the circumstances attending it, but that there are some slight variations between them. I say that even if these men were speaking of the same transaction, you have this fact confirmed instead of being contradicted, namely, that at one period of the evening there was a desire to ascertain the number of the men assembled. Monument, therefore, at all events confirms Adams as to ascertaining their number, and they differ only as to the number when ascertained.

But then you are told there is another contradiction; that Adams differs from the officers, as to the number of candles that were in the room; that he says there was one or two in the first room, the officers on the contrary that there were three or four, and that it appeared to them there were some in the side room from the shades thrown by the persons entering it; and lastly, you are asked to refuse your belief to the account he has given, because he differs as to the expressions used by the officers from their recollection of them. Turn to the minutes you have taken of the testimony given by the officers, and if my learned friend is entitled to argue that Adams's evidence is proved to be untrue by that testimony, I will show you that by the same test it can be demonstrated that the evidence of the officers is not correct. Ruthven saw but one man when he entered the stable: Ellis and another speak to seeing two. It might be said, Ruthven does not speak the truth; and if my learned friend's mode of reasoning is to be generally applied, you might altogether discard the unimpeached testimony of the officers.

There is another point in which Adams is confirmed by some of the officers, and is unconfirmed by others. Adams states that when the officers were approaching the ladder he heard a voice exclaiming, "Holloa, shew a light above." Ruthven stated that when he went up the ladder he never heard such an expression. I am not sure whether Ellis stated that he did not hear it: but when you come to the evidence of Westcott, he proves there was such an expression. Adams says the officers exclaimed, "here is a pretty nest of you, give up your arms," and the officers say that they cried out "We are officers, give up your arms;" if this discrepancy can destroy the testimony of Adams, it will destroy that of the officers, upon whom the counsel for the prisoner have not cast the slightest imputation.

These are all the contradictions which have been relied upon by my learned friend on the other side, and I hope you will agree with me that the observations in answer are satisfactory. But then he says there is not sufficient confirmation in this case, and that all the confirmation of the witness Adams which ought to be given, has not been adduced. I will venture to assert, and I think you will agree with me, that there hardly ever was a witness confirmed as he has been in such a variety of points, and points too so material to the inquiry. It is said by the counsel for the prisoner (we shall see with what truth), it is true that Adams is confirmed in many particulars, but as to the intention and the plan of the parties, the corroboration of his evidence altogether fails; and yet, gentlemen, this is urged to you by advocates who admit broadly, plainly, and unequivocally, that the plan upon this occasion was to assassinate his majesty's ministers. How do they get at that plan? on what evidence is it that my learned friends make this admission? They make it upon the testimony of Adams,—upon the testimony of Adams confirmed indeed by the occurrences in Cato-street, and the evidence of other persons to which I shall call your attention hereafter.

Let us try the hypothesis submitted on the part of the prosecution. We say there was a deliberate plan formed by the prisoners Ings, Thistlewood, and their associates, to overturn the Government,—that the first blow to be struck to carry that plan into effect was the assassination of his majesty's ministers in Grosvenor-square, on the night of the 23rd of February, and that that blow was to be followed up by movements in various parts of the town. The proposition of the other side is, that the plot was certainly to assassinate his majesty's ministers, but that it was to begin and end there, and that no proof arises out of the testimony of Adams, none out of the evidence of Hiden, none out of the account given by Monument, none from a variety of facts established, and which cannot be controverted, that there was any design contemplated by the conspirators beyond the destruction of the illustrious persons assembled as guests at the table of lord Harrowby, and the conflagration and consequent plunder of a part of the town.

To prove the case for the prosecution, one of the conspirators himself is called: I beg leave to add my humble recommendation to that of the Solicitor-general, as to the caution and attention with which you should examine such testimony. A man, who admits himself to be a participator in such a scheme, is to be watched with the greatest circumspection, and his evidence is to be most scrupulously weighed; but in this as in every other case, where it is impossible for you to get at the secret consultations and deliberations of the persons engaged, if the testimony of an accomplice cannot be received; the crime must go unpunished; for, if it is to be laid down that an accomplice is not a witness to prove the offence, complete indemnity is offered to persons forming such a scheme: they may proceed as far as they please, knowing that if even their friends prove treacherous, they cannot be received as witnesses in a court of justice against them. Fortunately, however, for the administration of justice, that is not the law in this country; an accomplice is a competent and a credible witness, if his testimony receives confirmation—not confirmation as to every part of his story, for that would in most cases be impossible, and in all unnecessary, for if the law required confirmation of every part of the account of an accomplice, and such confirmation could be adduced, his testimony would not be requisite, the witnesses who could so confirm him, might themselves be examined. If, therefore, you find the testimony of Adams supported in material points, if he relates facts to which other persons of undoubted veracity depose, then you will be justified—you will be bound to conclude that the whole of his account is true.

Now let us see in what points Adams is confirmed, and I will take you, although it may occupy a little of your time, through the different parts of his narrative, and shew you how he is supported. The first thing which he states to you is, that upon his coming out of prison and meeting again with Thistlewood and Brunt, he was carried to a room in Brunt's house, which had been hired by the prisoner Ings for the purpose of their consultations, a circumstance which is proved by Eleanor Walker and Mary Rogers, who tell you that the room had been hired for the prisoner Ings, under the false pretence that he was going to occupy it as a residence; and it is also confirmed by Hale. Was that room used as a lodging for Ings? Did he ever occupy it as such, or carry any furniture there? Was not the only purpose for which that room was used that which Adams states, namely, for the consultations and deliberations of those persons who had this treasonable plan in view?

in this then Adams is confirmed. But it is said it is an unimportant fact. What, is it unimportant to have it proved that persons have hired a room for the purpose of consulting, deliberating upon, and maturing plans of assassination and treason? Have you not confirmation that it was taken under a false pretence? Is it even asserted by the prisoner, or by his learned counsel, that that room was not hired under the colour of being a lodging for Ings, but for the real and only purpose of planning and furthering the conspiracy charged by the indictment, and of preparing those instruments of destruction which you have seen produced in the course of this trial? Adams tells you that meetings were constantly held in that room, from the instant of his emerging from prison up to the 23rd of February. He states to you that impatience having been expressed by these persons as to the accomplishment of their schemes, it was determined that on Wednesday something should be done; he informs you that Thistlewood had appointed a committee to be held on the Sunday morning, in the room adjoining Brunt's apartments, and that such committee met. Here then Adams is confirmed in a most material and important manner. He says there was a larger meeting than usual on that morning; and Hale, the apprentice of Brunt, informs you that the assembly of Sunday was more numerous than any he had ever before observed in that room. What was done in that room? How were these conspirators employed there? Adams tells you that he saw some working upon the pike-staves which have been produced to you, and others upon the grenades and fire-balls which have been exhibited. What does Hale state? That he frequently heard persons working there; that the sound of sawing was not unfrequent, and that he actually noticed in that room the ammunition they had prepared.

What is the next important point? A fact which it was impossible Adams could invent without the certainty of being contradicted if it was not true:—he says that, on the morning of the 23rd, he went into Brunt's room, and saw there a man of the name of Strange, and another person whom he does not know, flinting (I think that was his expression) their pistols, and preparing their arms; how stands the confirmation upon that point? The apprentice boy (between whom and Adams there has been no concert, for there could be none, as Adams has been in custody from within a day or two of the time of the meeting in Cato-street up to the present period), Hale tells you that on that day he saw Strange and another man, whose name he does not know, getting ready their arms, preparatory to going to Cato-street. Who are the persons who attended at this room? Adams enumerates the names of several of the prisoners, and of others who are not indicted; he tells you that Thistlewood, Ings, Davidson, Brunt, Harrison, Bradburn, and Hall used to attend there, and that in addition to them there were Potter, Palin, and Cook; it was proved by the apprentice boy that every one of those men was in the habit of frequenting this apartment. Is this, then, all invention on the part of Adams? No, he is confirmed by testimony that is unimpeached, and unimpeachable; for no endeavour has been made in the course of this trial to throw the slightest imputation on the character of Hale; no attempt in cross-examination to shake his credit, or to induce you not to believe in the fullest degree the testimony he has given to the court.

But there is another most remarkable fact in which Adams is confirmed by Hale. Adams tells you that, on the 23rd, after they had met in the room hired by Ings, and before they set out for Cato-street, Thistlewood proposed to write a proclamation, which was to be exhibited upon the walls of the houses adjacent to those to which fire might be set, in order that it might be the better read by the populace. He required paper for that purpose, and Adams says, that Thistlewood talked of getting such as newspapers are printed upon, but that on his suggesting cartridge paper, Brunt was desired to procure six sheets. Would a man invent such a fact, not knowing who was sent for the paper, and being quite unconscious that he would be capable of confirmation? It is in evidence before you that Brunt went to his apprentice Hale, desired him to procure the cartridge-paper, that it was procured and taken into the room. Hale, therefore, confirms him as to that fact. My learned friend, then adverted to the contents of the proclamation, and he argued under a mistake for some time that Monument might have confirmed Adams, whereas the evidence was, that Monument was not in Brunt's house at all. Can you, then, when you have these confirmations before you, say, upon the assertion of counsel only, yes, we will believe the paper was procured, but we do not believe that it was obtained for the purpose suggested, although the fact is sworn to by the same witness? And you are asked, because it is said part of this paper was found in the cupboard, to believe that the rest had been used for the making of cartridges, though you have not the slightest evidence that cartridges were at that time preparing; they were all procured before, and all that the conspirators were then doing was accoutring themselves for the purpose of going to Cato-street.

What is the next fact? I should have introduced it before in point of order, and it is a most striking circumstance. It is proved that, on the Tuesday, some alarm had been excited in consequence of Adams's communication that the landlord had informed him they had been suspected of holding improper meetings at the White Hart. You will recollect the agitation that prevailed amongst them upon that occasion; they were so bent upon their schemes that they could not brook the suspicion that their plan was likely to be known; still more were they offended by the attempt of an associate to damp the ardour of their adherents. In order to ascertain whether there was the least suspicion of them entertained by the government, it was with great shrewdness proposed that a watch should be placed on lord Harrowby's house, to commence at six o'clock, to continue till twelve, and to be again set at four in the morning, in order to ascertain whether any soldiers were introduced into that house, or any other in Grosvenor-square. That is proved beyond the possibility of contradiction. Could Adams be aware of such confirmation? You have heard it flippantly (I do not use the word offensively) treated as a mere confirmation of a game of dominos having been played. It appears to me a most important confirmation; it is shown that Davidson and another were first to watch, and that Tidd and Brunt were to relieve them. Tidd came to Brunt's house in Fox-court after some delay, and departed from thence in company with Brunt, for the purpose of taking their share of the duty in Grosvenor-square, but stated that there was a person whom he wished to see on that evening, a very important man, and that if he should be so fortunate as to meet with him, he should not be able to attend the watch. After a short time, Brunt returned, saying that Tidd had met the man, and that he could not watch, and Adams was selected to accompany Brunt. It is established by the watchman, that a man of colour was seen with another loitering about the square. It is proved to you by Gillan, that on that evening he actually played with Brunt at Dominos, in a public house in the neighbourhood. Thus you have the fact of the watching confirmed beyond the possibility of doubt, and my learned friend might as well argue that because Gillan did not hear them say that they were watching lord Harrowby's house, there is no evidence of the purpose for which they went into Grosvenor-square on that night. Can you be brought to draw such a conclusion by such fallacious reasoning? At the time Adams gave the account, it was impossible for him to know that Gillan could be brought forward to confirm this part of his statement. I say, then, again, this is a most remarkable confirmation of the circumstances which passed on the evening before the 23rd, not less remarkable than the two confirmations of the events of that day to which I have already called your attention; namely, of their coming to prepare their arms at Brunt's room, and the sending for the cartridge paper by Thistlewood to prepare the proclamations.

There is another material circumstance; Adams tells you, that Tidd's house was used as a dépôt for the arms:—do you want testimony on the part of the Crown to prove it? If confirmation is required, you find it in the evidence of the unfortunate young woman who was called for the prisoner. She states that the box containing the cartridges and combustibles had been there a fortnight: let them have been carried there by whom they might, there they were for the purposes of this conspiracy; and a most remarkable fact she has introduced, with which we were before unacquainted, that on the very morning of the 23rd, some of the articles were removed from Tidd's premises by these persons; I leave you to say whether they were not removed from thence to Cato-street. Here, then, Adams is confirmed in a most important point, not only important as it respects the assassination, but when you come to consider the nature of the things that were prepared, you must be satisfied that the contents of that box were calculated for the execution of a plan embracing other objects beyond the destruction of his majesty's ministers.

Another fact worthy of your attention is stated as to the proceedings of Tidd, on the evening of the 23rd. It is proved by the apprentice Hale, that after some of the conspirators had gone to Cato-street, Tidd called at Brunt's, and received a pike head and a sword, which he said he would take care of, and carry to the place where they were wanted. Monument and Adams tell you, that Tidd did not arrive at Cato-street till after the other conspirators; it is clear, from the testimony of Hale, that he did not set out from Fox-court till all the others were gone.

There is another circumstance in which he is most materially supported, and supported beyond the power of contradiction, a fact which he has not invented, for it is spoken to by others, and confirmed by the seizure and production of the deadly instrument to which it relates. Adams has informed you, that the prisoner at the bar produced a large butcher's knife, and you will recollect the bloody purpose to which Ings stated it was to be applied: Adams remarked that it had wax-end round the handle, which the prisoner said had been placed there to enable him more firmly to grasp it, and to prevent its slipping from his hand. That very knife, be it recollected, is taken from Ings on the night of the 23rd, and on his person afterwards was found the case to which it belonged, and in which he had most probably carried it. Are all these confirmations nothing? Do they not mainly corroborate the whole story told you by Adams? Do you not find his testimony supported in almost every particular in which it is capable of confirmation? and are you then to be told, when his evidence is thus strongly corroborated, that you are to believe him as to one part only of the conspiracy charged, namely, the assassination of his majesty's ministers, and that you are to dismiss from your consideration all he has sworn as to the ulterior objects of this nefarious scheme?

In addition to the knife, you have also a sword, particularly pointed out to you among the many found in Cato-street; that sword was carried by the prisoner, as long ago, I think, as Christmas last, to a shop in Drury-lane, for the purpose of being sharpened, and particular directions were given by him respecting it. The unfortunate man at the bar states, in the few sentences he has addressed to you in his defence, that he took that sword to the stable by the desire of another person; that it was not his own sword, but that Edwards gave it him, and that he carried it for him. Although you have heard occasionally of Edwards, there is not the slightest proof that he was in Cato-street at all, but, on the contrary, his presence there is negatived; this sword, therefore, must have been carried by some one of the persons who were in Cato-street. In addition to the sword and the knife, Adams speaks of two bags or haversacks, which Ings exhibited before he went from Fox-court; that he accoutred himself with them, and stated that the horrible purpose to which they were to be applied was, to carry off the heads of two of his majesty's ministers, from the massacre in Grosvenor-square; the prisoner is actually found with those two bags suspended from his shoulders; but I am tiring you I fear with the enumeration of these circumstances; but they will make good the assertion with which I set out, that you would find so much of confirmation before you, that it would be impossible for you to doubt the general accuracy of the account of Adams.

I must trouble you with a remark or two on the interest Adams is said to have upon this occasion, and on which so much observation has been made. What possible interest, I appeal to every one of you, can he have in superadding, if it did not exist, the ulterior purpose of overturning the government? Adams is apprehended—he states, there is a nefarious plot to assassinate the whole cabinet, sufficiently infamous, as my learned friend admits—sufficiently horrible; what credit then is he to obtain by charging the conspirators with the further intention of destroying the existing order of things? His interest was all the other way—he had disclosed enough of infamy and guilt, when he had made known the plan of assassination. If the scheme originated in motives of private revenge entertained against the ministers individually, what object could he have in stating that it was a mere step for the accomplishment of other projects? He had already heaped upon his own head, and that of each of his associates, a load of crime, sufficiently heavy to press them down; and what possible motive can be assigned for his increasing their delinquency and his own by stating, that they intended to overthrow the government? the charge so far from giving a greater appearance of truth to his account, was calculated to diminish its credibility in proportion to the magnitude and atrocity of the crime imputed. I submit there is an absence of all interest in Adams to make the offence of these men more heinous than it was, and that nothing can have induced him to implicate them to the extent he has, but a desire of disclosing the whole of the conspiracy, and making as ample atonement as is in his power to the offended laws of his country.

While we are talking of private revenge against his majesty's ministers, permit me to ask, if the gratification of that feeling was the only object these conspirators had in view, why was not the scheme which they originally purposed and approved, of assassinating the ministers at their own houses, persisted in? If the plan originated in hatred and animosity against the individuals, tell me, as reasonable men, what anxiety could they have to take off the whole of the cabinet at one blow, unless it was intended to carry into effect the overthrow of the state, by availing themselves of the confusion arising out of the destruction of all the executive ministers of the Crown? When you find by the concessions of my learned friends (and they have made none which the necessity of the case has not forced upon them, they have admitted nothing it was possible for them in duty to the prisoner to deny), when the counsel for the accused are, by the strength of the evidence, forced to allow that there was a conspiracy to murder his majesty's ministers, and that the prisoners met in Cato-street, for that avowed purpose; I ask any man to assign even a plausible reason, why Adams, a participator in the guilt, should wish to add to the admitted enormity of their crime, by charging them with intentions of a still more atrocious nature.

If, then, Adams has no interest to deceive you, and if you find him confirmed in the material parts of his narrative, what just reason can there be for refusing credit to the testimony he has given to the court? But does the case rest upon the evidence of Adams? do my learned friends imagine, that you, or that I, have blotted out from our recollection all that we have heard from the mouths of the other witnesses? Before I dismiss Adams, let me call your attention to Chambers, who is put into the box to contradict him. My learned friends, to whom the prisoner has confided his defence, examined Adams, as to whether he had called on this Chambers, and used certain expressions; Adams denies using the expressions imputed to him, and the gentleman who last addressed you says, he must admit that Chambers has been mixed up with bad company by my friend Mr. Gurney who cross-examined him—that undoubtedly he is a radical—that he has been carrying flags at different meetings—but that nothing beyond this can be brought against his character. I remember (perhaps they have not escaped your memory) the very forcible observations which were made by the learned counsel who first addressed you on the part of the prisoner (adopting language supposed to have been used by the Solicitor-general, in examining the testimony of a man, who had been stated to have had proposed to him by another, to make an abominable accusation against a third person, with the view of extorting money); my learned friend said, that the Solicitor-general had remarked, that the man who could receive such an application, apparently assent to it, and not communicate it to a magistrate, was unworthy of credit; and the learned gentleman applied that observation of the Solicitor-general to some of the witnesses on the present occasion. The counsel for the prisoner, not fully anticipating the evidence which Chambers would give, has by these observations cut up root and branch the testimony of that man. Chambers tells you unblushingly, that a proposition was made to him by Adams, to join in a conspiracy to assassinate his majesty's ministers, accompanied by expressions which must have disgusted every man, who heard them, "that he would buy that night on blood and wine." Chambers lives within five minutes walk of Bow-street; but until he is produced before you as a witness, he buries the diabolical proposal in his own bosom; he associates still with his friends the radicals, and he never communicates the nefarious scheme to a magistrate, in order to put a stop to it, and bring to punishment its guilty projectors. Then what credit will you give to this man? If it be argued that a man who has been solicited to join with another to extort money from a third, by making a charge against him affecting his character is unworthy of belief if he conceals the fact; with what force does the observation apply to this most extraordinary witness? How it at once destroys his evidence! According to his own confession, when the proposition was made to him, he did not shew the least disapprobation of it; he exhibited no signs of horror whatever at receiving it from men, of whom, according to his own account, he knew little, and to whom he owed nothing on the score of friendship that could have induced him to keep the communication secret; yet he never divulges it to a magistrate, or any human being, till he is called here to-day for the first time to make it public. Upon this miserable attempt at contradiction of Adams, I will not trouble you with another observation, as I think you will be of opinion, that the weight of credit is due to Adams who denies the conversation, rather than to Chambers who says it passed, and who has till this hour kept it a secret.

The occurrence of Chambers to my recollection, carried away my mind from the witness, Monument. It has been said you should attend not only to the evidence, but to the manner in which it is given. In my opinion, no man ever gave his testimony in a more deliberate or solemn manner than Monument? he was not shaken in a single fact. What is his account?—that he had been introduced to Thistlewood, by a man of the name of Ford, some few weeks before this affair, and that afterwards Thistlewood called upon him with Brunt. It is very material for you to recollect the conversation that took place between him and Thistlewood upon that occasion; the fact of Thistlewood coming and desiring a private interview with him is confirmed by the evidence of his brother, who says that he was at home at the time Thistlewood and Brunt called.

ed. It is broadly asserted that there was no treason in this conspiracy; that nothing beyond an intention to assassinate his majesty's ministers is proved. Be good enough to recollect what it was that Thistlewood said to Monument at that visit.—"Great events are at hand; the people are desirous of a change. I have been deceived by many persons, but now I have a number of men that will stand by me." Great events are at hand!—The people are desirous of a change! What events?—what change? The change of his majesty's ministers? On that change, gentlemen, you had observations offered to you that hardly became the gravity of this momentous inquiry: it was stated that to oppose his majesty's government, and to endeavour to remove his ministers, was not treason; that even for two privy councillors to fight a duel was not treason; and therefore it was argued seriously, that because men in a fair opposition to the measures of his majesty's government might endeavour to displace his ministers, it is not treason to remove them all by assassination. "Great events are at hand, and the people are desirous of a change." Can you doubt that Thistlewood intended to convey to the mind of Monument that a great political blow would soon be struck, and a change in the form of government effected? If not, what did he mean by saying that he had now people that would stand by him, although he had been deceived before? What had that to do with the removal of his majesty's ministers, by fair means? Nothing, gentlemen, nothing. It proves, most satisfactorily, the guilty purpose which was at that time lurking in the minds of Thistlewood and his misguided adherents.

What does Monument prove more? He tells you that when he arrived in Cato-street, apprehensions were expressed as to the numbers there assembled not being capable of accomplishing all the schemes the prisoners had in view. Thistlewood told them they were not to be alarmed, that there were men enough to go to lord Harrowby's and that there were other parties—for what purpose?—not to go to lord Harrowby's, that is not pretended—Thistlewood alluded to parties who were to meet in other parts of the town. This declaration, coupled with facts to which I shall by and by advert—I mean their preparations—shews, beyond all doubt, to the mind of every reasonable man, that their great plan was the overthrow of government, however inefficient the means for that object, and that the removal of his majesty's ministers was only the first step in the march of destruction. Monument is untouched in his character by any thing that has appeared before you, except so far as his going to Cato-street, and his apparent adoption of their schemes affects him; his private conduct is unimpeached, his evidence is uncontradicted.

Then there is another witness of still greater credit, at least I think you will consider him so, I mean the witness Hiden; his testimony, joined to the meeting in Cato-street, proves this treason. Let us examine what Hiden's conduct and character have been: you have heard motives imputed, you have had interests suggested which might operate upon the minds of other witnesses, let me ask you fairly, what motive can you assign to a man's disclosing a circumstance, as Hiden did, before it took place? Why should he impart the mere expectation of a meeting in Cato-street, if no meeting had been intended? Is there any charge against Hiden? Had he any sinister end to serve by the disclosure? Gentlemen, I must confess, I felt some little indignation while the comments were making by my learned friend on this man's testimony; he said lord Harrowby was a very respectable character, a very worthy man, but still he insinuated to you that money had either been offered—

Mr. Adolphus.—God forbid, Mr. Attorney-general. I did not, indeed. I never meant to insinuate any such thing. I said that gratitude would naturally impel my lord Harrowby to do something for the man who had done this to save his life, but that of course nothing would be done till after the trial, and that the recollection would remain upon his mind to the close of his days.

Mr. Attorney General.—Gentlemen, I am extremely glad of the interruption. Then my learned friend's remark points only to what may have been passing in the mind of lord Harrowby. He may treat my observation in the manner he thinks it deserves, but I must put you in mind that there is no question asked of the witness as to any expectation of reward in a pecuniary, or any other manner. Then if he had formed no such hope, why is the effect of it imputed to him? Is it intended to detract from the credit of lord Harrowby, or of the witness? With respect to lord Harrowby, it is completely disavowed; it is distinctly admitted that he has not given Hiden money for that which he has done; it is said he must feel gratitude for the preservation of which the witness has been the means, but that no pecuniary reward has been bestowed. What then do you find operating upon the mind of Hiden, when he makes the communication?—at that time there was no charge existing against him, nothing has appeared in the evidence to fix upon him any acquiescence in the communicated plan; he stands before you, not as an accomplice, not as a person lending himself to the wicked schemes of these conspirators, not as a man acting from pecuniary or other improper motives; he comes before you as an individual to whom the plot had been divulged by Wilson, and who feeling it to be his bounden duty to make it known, gives information of it by means of a letter, which he delivers to lord Harrowby, requesting that nobleman to put it into the hands of lord Castlereagh, to whom it was directed.

But see how this disclosure affects the testimony of Hiden in another view. He must have been a prophet if it was not true: how did it happen to be verified by the transaction on the following night in Cato-street? Had he been in Fox-court? Had he ever seen any of the preparations? No, gentlemen, the only knowledge he had gained was by the communication of Wilson, and yet he imparts before-hand events which afterwards take place. Then is there no evidence from Hiden of the ulterior purpose of this plot?—does he tell you that it was confined to the assassination of his majesty's ministers? "He asked me to join their party; I asked for what; he said, to be one of a number who were going to meet to destroy his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner; that they had got all ready, and were waiting for a cabinet dinner; that they had some things such as I never saw; that some of them were made of turpentine, and some bound round with cords, and some made with tin, and their strength was such, that if set fire to they would heave up the wall in front of the houses opposite to us; he said, that it was intended to set fire to several houses; he mentioned some, lord Harrowby's the duke of Wellington's, lord Sidmouth's, lord Castlereagh's, the bishop of London's, and one more which I do not remember." For what were these houses to be set fire to after his majesty's ministers were destroyed? If revenge was the object of the assassins, that would have been attained by the horrible murder of the illustrious persons assembled at lord Harrowby's but it does not rest there, and I feel it to be proper to call your particular attention to what Wilson further told Hiden upon that occasion:—"Things," he said, "were to be thrown into the room where the ministers were sitting, and all that escaped the explosion were to die by the sword, and that by lighting the fires it would keep the town in a state of confusion, and in a few days it would become general." There, gentlemen, you have the key-stone to the whole of the object they had in view; inefficient as their means, wild as their scheme, visionary as their purpose may appear to you, sitting here soberly and calmly to consider them, these conspirators viewed them with very different eyes; they vainly imagined that such a blow being struck, the discontented people (as Thistlewood had represented them to be) would join them with an overwhelming force, and enable them to destroy the existing government, and erect another upon its ruins. I say, therefore, that this communication of Wilson to Hiden, coupled with the other facts in the case, proves, beyond all question, the plot they had in contemplation.

But see how the conversations Wilson held with Hiden, confirm Adams also: you will find that after there was a further communication between them on the afternoon of the meeting in Cato-street, Wilson said to him "you are the very man I want." Hiden asked "what is there going to be—Wilson said, there is going to be a cabinet dinner to-night at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square, and I was to be sure to come—I asked where I should come—he said I was to come up to John-street, to the Horse and Groom, or to stand at the corner of Cato-street, till I was shoved into a stable. I asked him how many there were to be, he said there were four divisions, one in Gray's-inn-lane, one in the Borough, and one in the city, or Gee's-court, besides that in Cato-street—he said Gee's-court was all in it, but they would not move till the English had begun; he said after they had been at Grosvenor-square, they meant to retreat to somewhere about the Mansion-house, that was where all the parties were to meet; now you will recollect that Adams tells you their plan was, to get possession of the Mansion-house, and make it the seat of the provisional government; he is confirmed in this by Hiden, not one of the conspirators—he said also there were places where they could take the cannon, four pieces in some Artillery-ground, by killing the sentry, and two pieces in Gray's-inn-lane, which could easily be got at, by knocking in some door."

It is argued before you with great force, and with considerable ingenuity and eloquence, that Adams's testimony cannot be believed, because this story of taking the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and at the Artillery-ground, is incredible, and therefore the whole must be the invention of Adams, and Adams alone; but you will find other persons did not consider it so visionary—Wilson not only mentioned the plan to Adams, but mentioned it with apparent confidence in its practicability. Thus is the existence of the general plot confirmed, and the testimony of Adams himself in a very material point supported.

An attempt was made on the cross-examination, to shake the credit of Hiden, by an inquiry into his place of residence, and into what he was going about on the evening of the 23rd; and my learned friend had gravely insisted, that because he asked him where he lived, and he answered Manchester-mews, Manchester-square, and it turned out that no longer ago than last Saturday he was taken in execution for debt, and therefore came up in custody of an officer, the first answer was false, although he left his wife and family in Manchester-mews. If such a misfortune should happen to any of you as the being taken to prison for debt, and three days after you were asked where your residence was, would you think you told a falsehood, if you had said my residence is in Manchester-mews, or wherever it may be? The man had just been removed from his house, he was brought up in custody, he could not have meant by that answer to deceive any person, because he knew that a habeas corpus had been issued to bring him here, and that he could not appear but in the custody of an officer; and yet for want of other materials you were seriously addressed upon this topic by one of my learned friends at great length, and asked to disbelieve the testimony of Hiden.

But he was also cross-examined as to a family in Princes-street, Cavendish-square, which he had served for three years, and I cannot forget that the witness was loudly told to be accurate in what he said, because inquiries would be made, to see whether he told truth or not. Many hours have now passed over our heads since Hiden was examined; ample opportunity has been afforded to the prisoner at the bar, to discover whether that fact was true or false; but no witness has been produced to you to shew that he was incorrect in any part of his testimony. Hiden then stands uncontradicted; he is a man against whom there is no imputation of previous bad conduct of any description; he answered most willingly every inquiry respecting the persons with whom he has lived as servant, to whom access therefore might have been had, if any thing could be found against him; it was not last night that the prisoner knew for the first time that Hiden was to be a witness, for by the lenity of our law, as my learned friends know, he has had for nearly a month in his possession a list of all the witnesses who could be produced against him, their places of residence, and their business or occupations, so that he can have no excuse to make that he is taken by surprise, and is not therefore prepared to investigate the character of the witness.

My learned friend made some observations on the list of witnesses, that the number is very great, and therefore, the difficulty they had in considering who was to be called in this or that particular case, was great also; this, gentlemen, is said to induce you to suppose; that the prisoner has been subjected to hardship. Between forty and fifty of those witnesses are either police officers, wardens of the Tower, or police magistrates, whose testimony has not, but might have been wanted, and whose names, therefore, the legal advisers of the Crown were obliged to insert, for this reason, that if the name of a witness is not in the list he cannot be examined against the prisoner. We were obliged to insert not only those who were known to be acquainted with the facts, but those also who, by the remotest possibility, could be necessary to be produced before you. I believe, therefore, every warder of the Tower is in that list, from the apprehension, that something might occur after the prisoners were in custody, that it might be material to give in evidence: all the police officers, all the soldiers who were in Cato-street, only two of whom have been called, are included in it; and therefore the complaint which has been made, appears to me to be one, which, after this explanation, you will think without foundation. They knew as well as we did who the material witnesses were likely to be, and had an opportunity of discovering every thing that could be brought forward against this or that particular witness.

I have now observed upon the testimony of Adams, Monument and Hiden. I do not trouble you with going over the various points of confirmation, but I beg to call your attention to what took place at Cato-street, and to the materials collected there, with a view to shew the ultimate objects of this plot. It is admitted that one part of the plan was to assassinate his majesty's ministers: what were the instruments provided? Were they only adequate to that purpose, or were they not evidently designed for a larger and more extensive scheme? I know not how many hand-grenades were found; you have seen them, and had one of them opened, and you have heard the effects likely to be produced by their explosion. To the work of assassination many of the instruments which lie on the table are well adapted; I mean the guns, the pistols, and the swords. But were pikes requisite, or were they not rather designed for operations in the streets? A pike in a room is of little utility, and when you see the length of their handles, and the number of them (many more than were necessary for the party assembled in Cato-street), I think you will agree with me that they could be prepared for no other purpose, but to be used in the open air. But gentlemen, 1,200 rounds of ball cartridges have been shewn to you, 965 in the box, and between 200 and 300 found in a bag at Tidd's house—were those designed merely for the assassination of his majesty's ministers?—Can you entertain a doubt that they were intended for more extensive destruction? There is another part of the preparations which hardly requires a remark to satisfy you, it was meant for other objects; you have seen the flannel bags and their contents, and it is in evidence that they are cartridges for cannon, and are made to be used in six-pounders. Were there to be any cannon at lord Harrowby's?—No. How then were these cartridges to be applied? The answer is obvious. Wilson communicated to Hiden that cannon were to be taken at the Light-horse Volunteers riding school, in Gray's-Inn-lane, and at the Artillery-ground: for those cannon these cartridges were intended; no reasonable man can doubt it; some of them were found at Tidd's and some at Brunt's, none in Cato-street; is it not then evident that they were designed for the accomplishment of other deeds of blood, after these conspirators had perpetrated the assassination in Grosvenor-square?

Were no other persons engaged in this plan than those who assembled in Cato-street? Recollect, gentlemen, Hale says, that after the party was gone to Cato-street he was directed to carry any persons that called at Brunt's, to the White Hart in Brook's-market; Potter and others did call; for what purpose? They were not going to Cato-street; they were not of the party to attack lord Harrowby's. The expression of Brunt, when he returned to his house in the evening, confirms the apprentice. "We will go out—all is not over—something is yet to be done." What was to be done? They had been defeated in the plan of assassinating his majesty's ministers. That something was expected to be effected by those persons spoken of by Wilson to Hiden, of whom Palin and Potter were two. My learned friend thought he derived a triumphant argument from the absence of Palin; but I think it operates against the prisoner at the bar; he says, it appears that a reward has been offered for Palin's apprehension, and asks therefore how he can produce him on this occasion; he tells you Palin has absconded—absconded for what?—Is he a participator in the plot at Cato-street? Was he at Cato-street? He has absconded, because he knows there were other purposes in view, traitorous and treasonable, in which he is deeply implicated; that is the reason why he is not forth-coming to-day.

How does this apply to Hall, Cook, Harris, Potter, and others, whom Adams has mentioned? Hall might be produced; my learned friends do not bring him forward; and their argument is this, Adams's story is a fiction, these persons were not there, or if they were there what he states to have passed did not take place. If they were not there they might be called to prove that fact; it could not hurt them; all of them would be able to contradict Adams, and satisfy you that what he has sworn is false; what is the plain inference from this? that they were there; and if they were, as Adams has stated what occurred on several occasions, they might be made witnesses to contradict him. I say, the absence of those men confirms beyond the possibility of doubt the testimony of Adams.

Then if this be so, how stands the case before you in point of proof? The fact of their meeting in Cato-street, the preparations which are made, the intention to assassinate his majesty's ministers, are not only proved, but not denied by the prisoner at the bar. What object had these men in the assassination of his majesty's ministers, if it was not to be followed up by other acts? You have it in evidence from Hiden, you have it in evidence from Monument, the fact itself, the evidentia rei shews that they had in their minds that ulterior purpose which we charge, and which is the only question you have to try on this occasion. Do not be deceived by any arguments which you have heard, that you are to consider whether the plan could be effected—whether the means were adequate to the end—whether it was not wild and visionary. To you and me considering the case calmly it may appear to be so; it was wild, it was visionary, my learned friend says, unequalled in folly in the history of this country or any other; and he challenged me to produce before you Despard's case as a parallel, and commented at great length upon the facts of it; and you will recollect that Thistlewood, one of the party, had that plot in his mind, even in Cato-street; for he said, when complaint was made of their want of force, "that if they did not proceed then, it would be a Despard's job." The plan of Despard was quite as wild and quite as visionary as the present. Part of his scheme was, to assassinate the king, part of this was to assassinate the ministers. Despard thought he could take the Tower and the Bank, with means less effectual than those exhibited on this occasion; he had a few men, but where were his preparations? Had he hand-grenades—had he pistols—had he pikes—had he ball-cartridges—had he all those implements which have been produced to you? he imagined that with twenty men he could take possession of the large cannon in the park, and fire it at his majesty as he was going to parliament, and that they might afterwards make themselves masters of the Tower, and establish a provisional government. My learned friend says, he might have taken possession of the cannon in the Park, and have murdered his majesty; and I say here with respect to the assassination of his majesty's ministers, it appears to me that was not difficult of execution, and would probably have been carried into effect. I will not describe to you what has been so well pictured by my friend the Solicitor-general; I only ask you to conceive what would have been the confusion and terror through the metropolis, if they had been able to accomplish that and some other parts of their plan—if in the dead of the night, the inhabitants of this great city had been alarmed by fires in various places by the report that his majesty's ministers had been destroyed in Grosvenor-square, and that there were parties in arms roving over the town. It is not at all impossible, that for a few hours the conspirators might actually have been in possession of London; there was nothing visionary in the primary objects of their plot; the destruction of the ministers, the firing of houses, were both practicable; I admit the rest of their scheme could not have been carried into effect, nor could Despard's; they were, to a certain extent, both equally wild. If my learned friends cite instances, I cite Despard's case as one, in which similar plans had been conceived, and similar intentions manifested; and for which that unfortunate man suffered on the scaffold.

Then, gentlemen, do not be led away by the notion, that because the conspiracy appears wild or visionary, you are to dismiss it from your consideration; the question is not, whether its objects could have been effected, but whether they were contemplated by the prisoner at the bar, and his associates.

With respect to the facts as they affect the prisoner, I will not go over them particularly; you find him at their various meetings; you find him using expressions at those meetings, indicating his intentions; but, above all, you find him finally at Cato-street:—he says he went there innocently; you will recollect the manner in which he was accoutred,—he had two straps over his shoulders, from which hung two haversacks; he had a belt round his waist in which were a brace of pistols; he had this knife, for no doubt can be entertained that he was the man who had the knife, his own defence has admitted it; he was by the step-ladder which ascended to the loft above; he was there first seized by the officer, who took from him the knife, and I think, the sword; he then escaped from the stable; he is pursued; you remember the violent resistance he made; this man, who would have you believe he was innocent of any improper object, or any improper purpose, actually discharges a pistol at the officer, and on being interrogated by that officer why he fired at him, he exclaimed, with brutal ferocity, that he wished he had shot him dead.

Then the cloth case of the knife is actually found on his person it has been fitted to the knife, as you have seen, and that case is actually made of the same materials of which the belt round his waist was composed; thus you have him from the commencement of the plot to the close, active in the promotion of this design. I do not trouble you at present, nor will I, with the various expressions he used, the savage exultation he displayed when they found the cabinet dinner was to take place, or his determination to mutilate some of the ministers, and expose their mangled limbs to the populace. But I must beg you to recollect that in Cato-street Davidson was taken; and if any thing were wanting to show the designs of these conspirators, you have it in Davidson's expression—"Who would not die in liberty's cause." Then the cause in which they were embarked was one for procuring liberty by the overthrow of the country in which we live; here is a declaration of one of the party as to the object of their plot.

This being the case, and these the questions for your consideration, I leave with perfect confidence to you the verdict you have to pronounce. I do assure you, gentlemen, unfeignedly, that my only anxiety has been that the case should be presented to you fairly, and with such observations on my part as my duty as a servant of the public calls on me to make in answer to those offered to you on the part of the prisoner. The constitution of the country has wisely placed in your breasts the ultimate determination of this question. It has been represented to you, and truly, by my learned friend who last addressed you, that it is a case of very great importance. Undoubtedly, it is so, but there is nothing so important as the due administration of justice; if the charge has failed in your estimation, in proof, if you entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the unhappy man at the bar (but let it be recollected, it must be a reasonable doubt),—then the merciful inclination of our laws will require that you should acquit the prisoner. But if the facts and the testimony by which they have been proved, clearly satisfy your minds that the charge has been substantiated—that the designs which I have stated to you were harboured in that man's bosom, and that he acted with others in the furtherance and completion of them, as the witnesses have told you—then, important as the case is as it regards the prisoner, it becomes infinitely more important as it affects the public, and it will be your bounden duty to find him guilty. That you will decide uprightly and honestly, no man who has witnessed your attention and desire to scrutinize and weigh this case, can doubt.

SUMMING-UP.

Lord Chief Justice Dallas. — Gentlemen of the Jury; this long and painful inquiry being now (so far as regards the proof and the observations from the bar) terminated, it becomes my duty to recapitulate the evidence, with such comments as the circumstances of the case shall seem to me to require. In this late stage of the proceeding, it would be more than superfluous—it would be idle to remind you, that the charge imputes to the prisoner at the bar the highest crime which any subject can commit. Other offences aim at the person or property of individuals, but high treason, by seeking the subversion of the established government, aims at the property, the liberty, and the lives of all. Still, however, nothing will depend upon the comparative magnitude of this offence; for be the alleged crime great or small, every man, standing in the situation in which the prisoner is placed, is entitled to have the charge against him clearly and satisfactorily proved; with this only difference (and I make the observation in the outset, as being in favour of the prisoner), that in proportion to the magnitude of the offence and the consequences which result from his conviction, ought the proof to be clear and satisfactory. Whether, in the present case, it be so or not, it will ultimately be your exclusive duty to determine.

The indictment contains different counts or charges which are founded upon two particular statutes; the first being an ancient statute, to which you have already been frequently referred, and which passed in the reign of Edward the 3rd; the second a more recent act, which passed in the reign of his late majesty. And, in the outset, and before I draw your attention to any part of the evidence, I shall describe the nature and substance of these different charges disentangled from technical and artificial statement. The first count is a charge of compassing and imagining to depose the king—which is made treason by the statute which passed in the reign of his late majesty, the 36th of Geo. the 3rd—and the overt or open acts stated in the indictment, are manifestations of a secret intent; for it is in the intention that the crime of high treason consists. The treason alleged, is compassing and imagining to depose the king, and the overt acts are in themselves such, all or some of them, as are sufficient in point of law to bring the case within the treason charged, supposing the overt acts themselves to be as matter of fact made out by sufficient and satisfactory proof.

Passing over the second, the third count is a charge of conspiracy to levy war against the king, in order to compel his majesty to change his measures and with respect to this also, I have to inform you, that the overt acts which are stated in support of this count, are clearly sufficient to sustain the charge in point of law, if the acts themselves be established by the testimony before you.

With respect to the two remaining counts upon the face of this indictment, it is not necessary to go particularly into them; the one is a charge of levying war, which need not be particularly adverted to in this case; but this I will say only, if the evidence which you have heard be true, and the insurrection which is sworn to have been intended had taken place, and if it were an insurrection not for a private purpose, but for a public and general purpose, such insurrection would have been a levying war against the king; but in this case, the charge is not the actual levying war against the king, but the conspiring to levy war. With respect to the remaining count, that of conspiring to put the king to death, I would state to you, if it were necessary, that it is not requisite in order to support a charge of such a description, that any blow should be actually aimed or intended to be aimed at the royal person, or that the natural life of the king should be the direct object of those who enter into a conspiracy of such description; it is enough that measures are meditated calculated to bring about a change in the government, the effect and tendency of which would be as a natural and probable consequence, the death of the king. But, however, with respect to these counts, to render the investigation as simple as possible, you may dismiss them from your consideration, and confine yourselves to the two counts, one of which states the compassing and imagining the death of the king, and the other a conspiracy to levy war in order to compel the king to change his measures. Having thus explained the nature of the charge, to which it will be necessary for you to apply your minds, I proceed immediately to recapitulate the evidence.

The first witness called is Robert Adams, a prisoner in custody upon the same charge as that against the prisoner at the bar. The account which he began by giving of himself is, that before he was taken he lived in Hole-in-the-wall-passage, near Brook's-market; he was acquainted with Brunt; the commencement of his acquaintance with him was at Cambray, who then, in 1816, passed by the name of Morton. He says, "I was myself originally a soldier in the Oxford Blues, about eighteen years ago, and from those I was discharged, owing to illness, and since then I have been a shoemaker. I pursued that trade while I was in France with the English army. When I returned to England, I renewed my acquaintance with Brunt; he lived in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane." He is then asked as to Thistlewood; and he says, "I know Thistle-wood, with whom I first became acquainted on the 12th of January, that was on a Wednesday, in this year; Brunt and Ings introduced me to him; I had known Ings," that is, the prisoner at the bar, "five or six days before." So that with respect to Thistlewood, the evidence of Adams opens with the fact, that he was introduced to Thistlewood not merely by Brunt, but by Ings, the prisoner at the bar. He was introduced to Thistlewood at his, Thistlewood's, lodgings in Stanhope-street, Clare-market. "I had some conversation with Thistlewood in the presence of Brunt and Ings. On Brunt introducing me into the room to Thistlewood, he said, 'Here, Mr. Thistlewood, is the man I was speaking to you of.' 'Is this the man?' he said; and then, turning to me, he said, 'You lately belonged to the Life-guards?' I said, 'No, to the Blues.' He said, 'I presume you can use the sword well, and are a good soldier?' I answered, that once I was a good soldier, and could use the sword well; and that, even now, I could use it to defend myself, if ever it should become necessary. He then said of the different shopkeepers in London, that they were all a set of aristocrats, and all working under one system; that he should glory to see the day that their shops were all shut up and well plundered. He next talked of Hunt, that he was a coward, and no friend of the people; and he had no doubt, if he could get into Whitehall, and overlook the government books there, he should find his name as a spy employed by them. He next spoke of Cobbett, and said he was equally bad; for with all his writings, they were not calculated to do good to the public at all. Nothing further passed at this time. Brunt said, he had two men to call upon in Carnaby-market, and asked Thistlewood whether he would call upon them for the purpose of seeing these men? Thistlewood declined it, and upon that we left the room with Brunt and Ings. On the 17th of January, I went to prison for debt; on Sunday, the 16th," that is, the day before, "I had another interview with Brunt, at the White Hart, in Brook's-market, in a room at the back. At this meeting, Thistlewood, Ings," (the prisoner at the bar) "Hall, Brunt, Tidd, and no other persons that I recollect, were present. It was the following day that I went to prison for debt, and in prison I remained until the day after the death of the king. I saw Ings on the 31st of January, at the White Hart; and I saw him also at Brunt's room in the course of this day; I mean on the second floor front room." He says there was also another, a back room, upon the same floor, and that room was the place at which the meeting took place; this was between six and seven in the evening. "I had never met them before, and I then went to this place for the first time. Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, and Edwards were there, and nothing particular passed in the course of this evening. The Wednesday night following was the next time

I was there, about seven o'clock in the evening, on the 2nd of February, and I found Ings, Hall, Harrison, and Davidson there, and Thistlewood, Brunt, and Edwards. There was a conversation between them respecting the indisposition of the new king; they said a few words on this subject. At this time I saw in the room some pike-staves; Thistlewood said, he wished they were feruled, and holes bored at the end of them in order to admit the pike, that they might be taken to a place of safety, which he called the dépôt, not considering them to be safe in the place in which they were. I did not know at this time where the dépôt was; but I learned, afterwards, it was at Tidd's, who lived in Hole-in-the-wall-passage, adjoining the house in which I lived; the staves were green sticks of the substance of my wrist; they were brought from the other side of the water; they were fresh cut, quite green, and thicker than my wrist; the same evening I saw Ings pull a pistol from his pocket; they said in the course of conversation that they thought the king would die; Thistlewood said, he had rather the new king would live for a little while longer—and you will attend to this, gentlemen—"as it was not their intention that he should ever wear the crown; he alluded to the people of the country in general, saying that they were all a parcel of cowards; and Ings said, on the day the prince regent went to open the parliament I myself went into the Park, took a pistol in my pocket, with the sole intention to shoot the prince regent; he then pulled a pistol out of his pocket, and said, this is the pistol which I took, regretting within himself that he had not an opportunity to do what he had intended; saying, had he done it, he did not care a damn for his own life. I cannot recollect any thing that passed more upon the subject; the appointed place of meeting was the room in question, and the times of meeting twice in the day, at eleven in the morning, and seven in the evening; in the room there was no furniture, a stove only; and I learned that the room was taken for Ings, the prisoner at the bar, but for what purpose I cannot say, not having been present when it was originally taken. I attended several meetings between that and Saturday the 19th; I saw the prisoner Ings at every meeting I was at; I recollect a meeting before the time of the king's funeral; I found Thistlewood there, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Harrison, Davidson, and Bradburn; they came in some of them afterwards. Harrison had been in the Life-guards. Thistlewood began to tell me what Harrison had proposed; he said he had seen one of the Life-guards, who had told him that on the night of the funeral every man of the Life-guards was to attend it that could be mounted, and that the Foot-guards would be required to attend as well; and in addition to this, all the police officers that could be spared from London; that after he left the life-guardsmen, it struck him that would be a favourable opportunity to collect their men.

together, have a riot in London that night, and take possession of the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the pieces of cannon also in the Artillery-ground; it was thought they should be able to proceed onwards by the means of the people, who would turn over to them, and he thought it would be best to send a party to Hyde-park-corner, in order to stop any orderly in his majesty's service proceeding from London to Windsor, to give information of what was going on in London; the telegraph should also be seized, to cut off all communication with Woolwich; it was thought necessary to dig entrenchments across the ends of the roads that led to different parts of London, to stop the artillery from entering London; Thistlewood and Harrison agreed that if the soldiers got any intelligence that there was a disturbance in London, they would be so overtired on their arrival in London, that they would not be fit for duty; Brunt and Ings were not present at this part of the conversation; at the conclusion of the observation they came in; and on their coming in, Thistlewood went to them, and communicated to them what I have been stating shortly; Brunt and Ings, the prisoner, at the bar, disapproved, saying that there was nothing short of the assassination or murder, I am not certain which word they made use of, would satisfy them; I had heard before from Brunt and Ings that there was an intention to assassinate the king's ministers; I do not recollect any thing more particular passing this night. Between this night and the 19th of the month, Ings was often in the room; he said, we must have the ministers if possible, before the parliament shall be met. On Saturday the 19th I was at Brunt's, between eleven and twelve in the forenoon; Thistlewood, Davidson, Harrison, Ings the prisoner, and Hall, were there; on my entering the room they rose, saying, that it was agreed on, that if nothing occurred between this and Wednesday, that Wednesday night should be agreed on to go to work, for they were all so poor they could not wait any longer; Thistlewood proposed there should be a meeting to-morrow morning to form a committee, to draw out the plan upon which we were to act; and on this Thistlewood said, Brunt if you go round to your men give them orders to come armed; Brunt turned round, and said, damn your eyes, are you afraid of officers entering the room? should any attempt to do it, I will take damned good care that none of them should go out alive. They met again on the Sunday morning; it was just turned of eleven; Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Harrison, Davidson; Hall, Bradburn, Wilson, Cook, Tidd Edwards, and myself. I had not been long in the room before Thistlewood proposed to enter on business, and that Tidd should take the chair, which he did with a pike in his hand; and after the chair had been so taken, Thistlewood proposed, as they had been waiting so long, and as there was no probability of ministers meeting together, that if nothing occurred before Wednesday night, the ministers should be taken off separately at their own houses; that they should not be able to destroy so many, but they must put up with what they could get; that they thought three the most likely number they would be able to kill; and he proposed Wednesday-night, but what precise hour of that night I cannot name; it was also proposed, at the same time, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six in the Artillery-ground should be taken; and the latter were to be taken, Cook heading the party that were to take them; and after they were taken they were to be loaded on the ground before they went out, and if any body interrupted them, those cannon were to be in readiness to enable them to make a stand. He was then to make a movement to the Mansion-house, and the Mansion-house was to be beset on both sides, three cannon to be brought up against each; he was to make a demand of the Mansion-house, and if the demand was refused he was to fire on both sides; on doing this it was thought they would soon give up the house to them, and it was to be made the seat of the provisional government. After this had been thus secured, he thought that with the two pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane they might attack the Bank of England, and proceed to plunder it; but Thistlewood thought, that it would be necessary not to destroy but to keep the books, as it would be the means of bringing to light some of the proceedings of government, with which they were not acquainted. Palin was not present at this time; but it was proposed that he should be the man to set fire to the different buildings that had been mentioned; as to the time, Thistlewood said it could not be fixed, but that there would be time between that and the Wednesday-night; he thought it better to leave it to a fitter opportunity, and then Thistlewood said he had nothing more to say. Then Brunt came forward and said, that he had a proposal to make respecting the assassination of ministers, and how it was to be done; on which Thistlewood retired, and way being made for Brunt, he came forward to propose his plan, and when he was beginning to speak, Thistlewood said, Stop, you had better let the proposals I have made be put from the chair, to see whether every one in the room is agreeable, and he put it to the men to speak if they wished; the proposal was accordingly put from the chair, and assented to by all. Brunt now came forward and said, that his proposal, respecting the assassination of ministers, was this; he said it would be done in this way, that as many men as they could get together for that job should be divided into as many parties as they could kill ministers; that after the men were singled out for killing the ministers, one man should be drawn out from each by lot, and that man that it fell upon should be the man that should murder the gentleman or the lord, that they had to kill; and if he failed, and shewed the least sign of cowardice, he was to be run through the body upon the spot; this proposal was agreed to. After that Palin, Potter, and Strange came in, and Thistlewood communicated to them what had passed, and they agreed to it. Palin got up, and said he wished to speak a few words upon what had dropped from Thistlewood and Brunt; he said, I have paid great attention to what has been said, and have agreed to it; and if it can be done, it will be a great acquisition to what we have in view; but this I want to know—you talk of from forty to fifty for the west-end job; you talk of taking the two pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane, and six pieces of cannon from the Artillery-ground, and how is all this to be done at the same time? In addition to which, I am also with my men to set fire to the different buildings; and he wanted to be satisfied how it was to be done. He said you ought to know better than I do what men you have to depend upon; with respect to myself, I can give you no satisfaction as to the men I can bring forward, unless I can be trusted to communicate to them part of the plan, if not the whole of what they are going to do; and when they will be wanted. Upon this, Thistlewood, Brunt, and Tidd said it should be communicated to them; and Palin was satisfied. After the chair was left, Thistlewood turned round and said; Brunt, now Palin is here, you can take him to the place near here, and let him see if it be possible to do what we think; and Palin and Brunt went away together. They were not absent above ten minutes; when they returned, they had been, they said, to a building behind Furnival's-inn, which Palin was to inspect; upon their return, Palin said he thought it a very easy job, and it would make a good fire. Upon this Brunt renewed the subject of the assassination; and he said, he had an idea that there would be no difficulty in drawing the men who were to assassinate the king's ministers. Ings said, whoever has the lot to murder lord Castlereagh, I am the man to turn out to murder that thief; this was on the Sunday. He met them again on the Monday morning at Brunt's, about ten; and he says, when I got there, there were Brunt, Harrison, Thistlewood, and Ings the prisoner at the bar; in the course of the morning others came; and on entering the room on the Monday, they were gathered round the fire and seemed cast down. I communicated the report I had heard, that there had been two officers of the police, one from Hatton-garden, and another from Bow-street, to know what was going on; and that they had intelligence from Bow-street, from which it appeared, that there was an information at Bow-street and at lord Sidmouth's office of what was going on. Harrison turned round and said, you have acted damned wrong. I asked why? Brunt turned round and said, you have; if you have any thing to communicate, it is your duty to speak to me or to Mr. Thistlewood. I said I thought it was my duty to communicate it to all, as it concerned all; they then began to separate, to call on their men and on the Marylebone Union. On the following morning I went again to Brunt's; on the Tuesday morning, about ten o'clock, I found in the room Brunt, Tidd, Ings, and Hall, and I had not been long there before Ings pulled three daggers out of his pocket; being asked the intention of them, he made a sort of flourish" which the witness described, "and he said it was with a view to run these daggers into their bodies: they were put into his pocket. Just after this Edwards came in, and went up to Thistlewood, and he said he had seen in the paper of the day that the ministers were to dine the following Wednesday at lord Harrowby's. Thistlewood doubted this, not having seen it in the paper which he had seen; and it was therefore proposed that the paper should be sent for. It was sent for, and brought, and read by Thistlewood himself; when it appeared to be so, Brunt jumped about the room for joy, saying I believe now there is a God, for I prayed that he would call these fellows together, and now he has heard my prayer; Ings said, we shall have an opportunity of cutting off lord Castlereagh's head. Thistlewood proposed, that a committee should be formed to consider a plan to assassinate the ministers altogether; it was formed; I was to take the chair, which I did, and I called them all to order, and Thistlewood was going to proceed, but I said first that I had something to say, and stopped him; I begged to know, before they proceeded, whether every man who heard me yesterday morning had given what I had said a due consideration; but upon this," he says, "they were like a set of mad devils; and Harrison said, the first man who said a word to throw cold water upon what they had then in view, he would run that man through directly with a sword; I was removed from the chair, and Tidd was put in. Thistlewood was about to propose a plan, but Palin stopped him, and said, Mr. Adams said something yesterday, and has alluded to it this morning, and he wanted to know what it was before we proceeded further. Brunt said, damn you I will tell you what it is, and then he proposed that there should be a watch set on lord Harrowby's house; that it was to begin at six in the evening, and consist of two men at a time, who were to take notice who went out and who went in, and if they were police officers or soldiers it was to be communicated to the committee; and Brunt further said, that if nobody was found likely to obstruct the business, it should be proceeded on. Then Thistlewood himself came forward; he said it was a much more favourable opportunity to take them all together and at this one house than it would be to take them separately. In taking them separately, at their own houses, they should perhaps have but three or four; but take them all together, and there may be fourteen or sixteen, and that will be a rare haul. I should propose, he said, forty men to go with me; I will go with a note to the door, to be presented to lord Harrowby, knocking at the door, and telling the servant that I must have an answer, and then on his going in, he proposed that he should be followed by different men, with pistols, swords, cutlasses, and pikes, and if the servants made any resistance, they were to be shot, and the men were to rush in after they took possession of the stairs; two men at those leading to the upper part, and two at those leading to the lower; each was to have a hand-grenade to prevent any retreat, and if any one attempted to escape, they were to put fire to the hand-grenade, and fling it among them to destroy them; two men were also to take the command of the area; one with a blunderbuss, the other with a hand-grenade; and if any attempt were made from the lower part of the house, they were to be served in the same manner; and the servants being so secured, then the men were to enter the house, led by Ings at his own proposal; he said he would go to his lordship's door, with a brace of pistols and a knife, for the sole purpose of cutting off their heads, meaning the heads of lord Sidmouth and lord Castlereagh, and that in addition to this, he would bring away the hand of lord Castlereagh; and having done this, it would be thought in future a great deal of. On entering the room, he added, that he should say, well, my lords, I have got as good men as the Manchester yeomanry; enter citizens, and do your duty; he was to be followed by the two swordsmen, and they were to be Harrison and myself; and after this was done," that is, after the assassination had taken place, "they were to retreat, and Harrison was to take an illumination ball, to go to the horse-barracks in King-street, and fling it into a straw shed, to set fire to them; others of the party were to go to Gray's-inn-lane, to take the cannon there; and on the road there if they met with any interruption, they agreed the persons interrupting should be shot or run through with the pikes they might have. Cook was to go to the Artillery-ground; Ings rejoiced again that he should have an opportunity of cutting off their heads. Harrison was there; he proposed a countersign to be communicated to the men who came forward, and Button was the name; it was to be pronounced separately; the man that came up to the person stationed at the top of Oxford-road, was, on his approach, to say B, u, t, and the man who was to receive him, was to pronounce t, o, n, and on this being done, he was to be conveyed to the place to be appointed afterwards; this was proposed by Harrison; I went again to Brunt's on that day in the afternoon, at three o'clock; in going up, I perceived a strange smell, and I soon discovered the cause; Ings, Hall, and Edwards were in the room, and I saw that Ings, the prisoner, was making fire-balls for the purpose of setting fire to the different buildings. Edwards was there preparing fuses for hand-grenades. Hall was laying sheets of paper on the floor to lay the fire-balls on after they had been dipped in the tison pot, to prevent their sticking to the hand; I went away almost immediately, and returned between six and seven, when I found Thistlewood there; there were two strange men, whom I had not seen before; Harris was the name of one, he was then unknown to me; the other was then unknown to me, and is so still. I remained there: Tidd came at half past seven. On his coming in, having been applied to, to go with Brunt at nine, to watch lord Harrowby's house, he agreed: Davidson was to go at six; and, on Tidd's entering, he expressed himself not satisfied at not meeting the man he expected. Brunt then said, it is time for us to go on the watch, to relieve those who had been stationed there, and Brunt and Tidd went out to go to lord Harrowby's. In about five minutes Brunt returned, saying, that they had called at the house where the man was appointed to be, and that he was come; that he was a man likely to be of great consequence, and that, as such, he himself could not go with Brunt on the watch. Ings said, somebody else should go with him. Brunt asked me to go, and I consented: just as we were going out, Edwards came in. I asked him, whether any thing had been seen? He said, what he had seen or heard he should communicate to Thistlewood. When we came to Grosvenor-square, I saw Davidson and another man. After we relieved Davidson, we stopped but a little while; we went to refresh ourselves at a house at the corner of the mews, directly at the back of lord Harrowby's house. Brunt got playing at dominos with a person who was there, and stopped there till eleven. I went out twice, by his desire, to watch, and I stayed in the neighbourhood till twelve o'clock, which was the time to which we were appointed to watch. When I left the square, I came directly home; the watch was to commence again the next morning. Ings and Hall were to be upon the watch at four o'clock in the morning; that is, on Wednesday the 23rd. I went to Brunt's early in the morning, but did not stop; I went again at two o'clock; I found Brunt in his own room; there was nobody else in the room at first, but Strange came in shortly after myself, and two or three other men came in who were not known to me; and a drawer being opened, I saw several pistols; I cannot tell the exact number. Brunt, at this time, proposed to me to go into the regular room, which was the back room; they were putting on leather under the pistol flints; and in the back room I saw arms of different descriptions, cutlasses, pistols, and a blunderbuss with a brass barrel. Just after, Thistlewood came; then the prisoner and Hall; then another stranger or two; and as they came in they prepared themselves with different arms; they then fixed the flints in the fire-arms, and put slings to the cutlasses. Thistlewood looked round, and said, well, my lads, it looks now as if you are going to do something; and he came up to me, and said, well, Mr. Adams, how do you do? I answered, low in spirits, I have had nothing to drink to-day. Then some gin was brought; and after this, Thistlewood proposed to fetch some paper in order to write some bills: he produced money for the purpose to Brunt, and said, that he should like the same sort of paper as newspapers were printed on. I said to him, as you do not know the name of this paper, you had better get cartridge paper, which will answer as well, and Brunt accordingly sent for it by his apprentice boy. The cartridge paper being brought, Thistlewood sat down to write three bills; but in writing the last, he expressed himself tired; he appeared to be confused, and said, he could not write any longer. Three bills were read by himself aloud, and they were put on the floor to dry, and then doubled up; I saw one of these in Ings, the prisoner's hands, and one in Thistlewood's hands, and the words he read were these: 'Your tyrants are destroyed! the friends of liberty are called together, as the provisional government is now sitting.' And then he read, as subscribed to this, the name of James Ings, Secretary, February 23, 1820. He then appeared tired. Hall then was called upon to write a fourth, but he refused: a stranger was then proposed. Ings was in the room, being busy at this time preparing for action; and he put a black belt round his waist, which was to hold two pistols; he had slung round his shoulder a belt for a cutlass, and on each shoulder there was a large bag, in the form of a soldier's haversack; and this being done, viewing and examining, or looking at himself, he said, I have not got my steel, I am not complete; but never mind. He then drew a great knife, brandished it about, and said, it was a knife to cut off the head of lord Castlereagh and the rest, as he came at them. Being asked, what he had the bags for? he said, he intended to bring away the heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth in them: it was a large broad knife that he said he had prepared for the purpose, and bound round the handle with wax-end, to prevent his hand from slipping when at work. After this, Thistlewood and Brunt, who had been out of the room, returned. While they were absent, Palin came in; and when he perceived that Thistlewood and Brunt were not present, he took on himself to address those who were in the room, and said, he hoped all in the room knew what they were met for; he hoped, he said, they would consider it properly; whether the assassination would be approved of by the country, and they would or would not turn on our side. A tall man then made some remarks, saying; you seem to speak as if all in the room knew what is going to be done; I am not afraid myself, nor do I consider a man who turns out in a cause like this ought to value his life. At this moment Brunt entered the room, and seeing a change or alteration in the countenances of those who were in the room, he asked the cause. The tall man told him again, that there were some in the room who wished to know what they were met there for, upon which having told him this, Brunt answered, this is not the place where you are to be informed, but go up with me to the Edgware-road, and then we shall know, and all who go with me shall have drink to put them in spirits. A blunderbuss, with a brass-barrel, was slung over me under my great coat, a broomstick which had been prepared for the reception of a bayonet at one end was given me as a walking stick. Nothing else particular was then done, except that Brunt said it was time for us to prepare to go from the room where we were, as it would be wanted by Palin's men in the evening. I saw the ferules put on the pike staves in Brunt's room by Bradburn; there was a cupboard in the room, in which were some swords, some tallow, some pitch, and some of the smaller hand-grenades. I had seen in that cupboard, gun-powder, a musket-belt, and the hand-grenades; and I saw powder put in some of the hand-grenades there to complete them. About six o'clock we went away from Brunt's for Cato-street; Brunt and the strange man were with me at first; afterwards I met Thistlewood before I got there, in the Edgware-road, and I arrived at Cato-street, at the corner of the street under the archway; the building was a stable on the right side; I found there Davidson sitting and a person standing, they appeared to me to be doing something to pikes; I went through the stable up into the loft. Ings, Hall, and Bradburn were there, they were taking different arms from a bench in the room; Tidd was not there, and in consequence of his not being there, Thistlewood appeared rather agitated, for fear he would not come; Brunt seeing the men rather confused, for it was pretty general, said there was no occasion for any uneasiness respecting the arrival of Tidd, for that he, Brunt, would forfeit his own existence that Tidd would be forthcoming. In consequence of what had appeared in the faces of the men, Ings now began to be terrified, and" as the witness described it, "as if he was mad; he began to stamp and swear, to put both his hands up to his hair as if he would tear it off; and said 'Damn my eyes, if you drop the concern now, I will cut my throat or shoot myself.' Thistlewood said, for God's sake do not talk of dropping the business now, if you do it will turn out a second Despard's job; and looking round, Thistlewood said, that there were men sufficient, eighteen here, that is in the loft, counting them, and two below, being twenty men in all, which number he said was sufficient; suppose, he said, sixteen servants should be found in lord Harrowby's house, they would not be armed, they would not be prepared; we are armed, and it will not take us, from our entering the house to our coming out again, above ten minutes; Tidd came in in about twenty minutes before the officers entered the room, and he proposed that fourteen should be the number to enter the house, and it was put and agreed to, and they were selected; at this time Brunt produced a gin bottle from his pocket; Ings was one of the fourteen selected, I also was one, and Harrison was another; this being done and the people ready to go, I heard somebody in the stable; there was a bustling, and a sound, a sort of holloa! shew lights from above! on this Thistlewood took a candle, went to the stairs, and looked to see who it was, and then he put down the candle seeming in quite a confused state; I never heard him speak: at this time two officers entered the room, Thistlewood sidled from where he was into the inner room; Ings and Brunt and Harrison were also in the inner room; the officers stood in the room at the top of the ladder, with a pistol presented, and one of them said, here is a pretty nest of you, adding, gentlemen, we have a warrant to apprehend you all, and I hope you will go quietly; at this time another of the officers of the name of Smithers said to his brother officers make room let me come up; and on his coming up between the two officers, going on between them and looking forward, the group in the room rushed forward, and I saw a man rush forward, another hand presented itself with a pistol, which was fired, and the moment it was fired the candle went out, and I could see nothing afterwards; I did not see Smithers fall; there was now great confusion; the officers seeing Smithers murdered, ran down stairs and gave the alarm of murder; I came out from the stable as I went in, and made my way through; a pistol was fired at me, I think at me, from the window; I succeeded in getting home; while I was under the archway the soldiers were coming through. I was myself apprehended afterwards on the Friday morning, and I have been in custody ever since."

On the cross-examination, he says, "I was examined here on Monday, on the former trial; I was born in Suffolk, and educated as a Christian; I was once a Deist, but I believe in God, I have been a Christian again ever since I was concerned in this affair; I was taken after the 23rd of February, and I have called myself a Christian since; I had, since last August, renounced faith in the Christian religion, and have taken it up again since the time I have mentioned, that is, on the day that this business happened, on the 23rd of February. I never was an Atheist, nor ever denied a God, though I was brought by that accursed book of Paine's, to deny the truth of the Scriptures. When I was in the army, I served in England, in the Blues; I now have no allowance, nor had I any pension on retiring. On looking at a paper, which is not afterwards produced, he says, this is my writing; since Monday I have been in the House of Correction, as I had been before, not in solitary confinement, but I have had no conversation with any body. I have been in the habit of seeing men in this court, but I have seen no one who has told me what passed; nobody has told me; I am kept in a room by myself, guarded by two men, and heard nothing about the trial, except what I have stated. I have known Edwards since the early part of January; Brunt was on the continent some years ago." Then he says, "I never intended to give information against the others, nor to commit murder; after I had got into the knowledge of what was in hand, I waited an opportunity to get out of it, but I was prevented by threats that had been held out; I was not disposed to plunder the London shops, nor to do any thing of the kind; there were no particular threats made use of at the time that I am speaking of; there were threats the day before I went into prison; I was asking Brunt for the plan that was first drawn up in the presence of Thistlewood; Brunt said, there would be nothing communicated till the day of acting. Thistlewood said, nothing shall be communicated; they said, the day that we think of going to work, we will have the men all together, and give them a treat, and then we shall tell them what is to be done, and after that we will never lose sight of them; Brunt said, there should be no writings kept that should put them into danger, but said, that if any man he had spoken to of this, by his behaviour should induce him to think that he would inform against the others, he would instantly himself run him through the body. I was in prison for a debt of twenty-three shillings and eight-pence. It was on the 16th of January that I heard those threats thrown out by Brunt; it was a Sunday; we were in a room at the White Hart; on the 30th, when I had been in prison fifteen days, I joined those parties again; and when I was discharged from prison, I found that the White Hart, as a place of meeting, was given up during the time I had been in prison; I never knew, till then, of the room taken at Brunt's; on Wednesday, in February, Edwards was there. The other day, when I was examined, I did not tell about Ings pulling a pistol from his pocket, saying, he hoped the king would not die then, and that the duke of York would not come to the crown; I did not tell the other day about Ings saying, they were all a damned set of cowards, that he took a pistol in his pocket when the prince regent went to parliament, with the sole intention to shoot him; that on his making use of that expression, he took the pistol from his pocket to convince them, and exclaimed, there is the pistol that I took, and that he regretted he had not done it, saying had he done it, he had not cared a damn for his own life; and the reason why I did not then tell it was, that it did not come to my recollection till to-day." He says, in order to shew he did not before tell all he knows, the transaction is so multifarious and so extensive, he did not recollect it. He says to-day, "I have not said any thing about their being to go to Brighton and Margate and Dover, and take possession of the out-ports; if any thing now comes to my mind, while I stay here, I will state it; but it did not occur to me to mention before what I did when I was examined before, that at the meeting on the 19th of February, Brunt said, he had work to finish, and could not go about the assassination next day; and I say now, Brunt being asked by Thistlewood, on the 19th, to call on his men, said he had work to do, and did not know that he should be able to attend. I was at a meeting on Sunday the 20th; at that meeting, before they all left, there were fifteen present, that was when Tidd took the chair; they did not know then of the cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's, their plan then was to go to the houses of the ministers to assassinate them, and then they were to take the cannon. I think I stated on Monday last, their plan to take the cannon, and go to the Mansion-house, if I did not I forgot it. At the meeting on the 22nd, Ings, took three daggers out of his pocket. There were thirteen different persons present, but I cannot recollect the different individuals who were at each meeting, and what was said by each; I cannot recollect what happened as to each in this way. If I had thought of any thing that was material when I was examined before, I should have mentioned it. The regular time for meeting was that which I before mentioned; and I never remembered our continuing assembled till twelve at night. Brunt said he had left Tidd to meet a man whom Tidd could trust, and therefore that he did not go to the watch. Things transpired on the 22nd which I have not stated either on last Monday or now; what I have mentioned now I cannot say that I mentioned here on Monday last; I cannot say whether I told of Brunt having a man to meet, and in consequence proposing to me to take the watch. I stated the number in Cato-street was twenty; I took that from the statement of Thistlewood (I did not count them myself), that there were eighteen above and two below. I do not know Monument at all. The room might be fifteen feet by ten; we were not close together when the accident happened, and I cannot say whether I was nearest the door, I mean the door leading into the little room, which was in the middle of the room on the side of the room; I was at the end of the bench next the window, where I could see about the room. There was one candle; I cannot say but there might be another, but I never saw but one, and if there were more than one, it was at the time when I was out of the room; and if any man swore there were eight candles in the room he would not speak the truth, and I would tell him that he was a false man. I cannot tell whether the officers made a speech, but to the best of my recollection, one of the officers said, Here is a pretty nest of you! One said, gentlemen, I have a warrant to take you all, and this was the sense and effect of what he said; adding, as such I hope you will go peaceably. I cannot recollect that it was said, We are officers, yield your arms. Edwards was always very deep, and much in conversation with Brunt and Thistlewood to outward appearance. I went away after this affair quietly. I did not before tell of a pistol being fired at me, I did not know it at the time; but in the coat I had on there is a hole where the ball went; the great-coat I had on is in the room where I sleep. I never called on Chambers, in Heath-cock-court, with Edwards; I do not know where it is. Three or four days before this affair took place in Cato-street, Edwards went with me to buy a pair of boots of a woman; that was the only time of my being alone with Edwards. We called in at the wine vaults near Newport-market; I never called on any person along with Edwards to solicit him to join a party to kill his majesty's ministers, and I never said, I would have blood and wine for my supper. I never knew Stephen Whatman. I never had a conversation with a man in Kingsland-road about the tower, and using Cashman as a watch-word. I did not take any ammunition back after I left Cato-street. Hall, in the room, gave me a pistol and five rounds of cartridges; when the officers came, the pistol lay at the end of the bench next me. I have never handled a pistol since; the cartridges I threw away as I came out. I never carried the large grenade anywhere; I carried some pikes from Brunt's up to Tidd's. I saw Edwards making the fuses and the touch-paper for them. I cannot remember a score of words which Edwards used; what he had to say was in a side-way with Thistlewood or Brunt. I did not tell the story about the one pound note this day which I told on Monday. The largest sum I ever saw was six shillings, given by Thistlewood to Brunt; one shilling at another time, and seven-pence at another. The newspaper Edwards mentioned was the New Times. There was but one candle, which was put out instantly on the report of the pistol, but whether by the report of the pistol I cannot tell."

Now, gentlemen, postponing till hereafter all observation on the testimony of accomplices, I will only desire your attention to the fact, that we are now passing to a different head of testimony, that is, the evidence of persons not accomplices, nor in any way involved in the imputed guilt of these transactions, but witnesses as to whom it is not pretended (and properly not pretended) by those who conduct the defence, that they are not entitled for what they say to the fullest credit from you: and therefore it will be very material for you, as affecting the conspiracy in general, and more particularly the prisoner at the bar individually, to attend to the facts which are now about to be proved by unimpeached and unimpeachable witnesses.

The next witness is Eleanor Walker. She says, "I know Brunt; he lodged at my master's house; he had lodged there about a twelvemonth last January; he occupied two front rooms on the second floor; in January last he introduced another person to take the back room two-pair of stairs, whom I did not then know by sight, or by name, but I afterwards found out that the name of this person was Ings the prisoner at the bar. The prisoner took the room; I did not know him then; Brunt did not tell me at this time what he was; the room was to be taken at 3s. a-week, unfurnished; he said perhaps he might bring in his goods in a week or better."

On her cross-examination, she says, "I lived in the lower part of the house; I have heard people occasionally going up and down, backwards and forwards, but I did not see them." On her re-examination, she says, "there is a door belonging to my mistress's house, by which lodgers go up from without, without going through the shop, and there is a private door which leads to the staircase, and the back door comes out of the passage towards the stairs; and coming through this, they can go up without going through the shop at all."

The next witness is Mary Rogers, who told you that the former witness is her niece, and was her servant at the time of which she has spoken. She says, "I remember her letting the two-pair of stairs back room in January last; it was occupied for five weeks, and the person who took it paid for four; one week remained due." She says, "the lodging was kept till Brunt was taken up; I asked Brunt who the lodger was; he told me that he was a butcher out of employ; he said, he knew nothing of him, except that he had seen him at a public house, and had heard him inquire for a lodging; and on one evening, when I was putting my children to bed, I saw three men going up stairs, and the middle man of the three was the black man;" which I need not remind you is the description of Davidson (who has been one of the prisoners at the bar included in this indictment, and who is to be tried on a separate indictment) in company with Ings and Brunt.

Joseph Hale is the next witness called; and his evidence also is extremely material. Hale is an apprentice to Brunt, and he says, "I lived with him in Fox-court; he had two rooms in the front of the house, one to live in, and the other to work in; and there I knew Ings, the prisoner at the bar. I remember his taking the two-pair of stairs back room as a lodging; I had seen him in Brunt's workshop about a fortnight before he took the lodging, and more than once. Brunt looked at the room with him; and when they came out, I heard Brunt say to the prisoner, it will do, go and give them a shilling; this was on Monday. Ings came there that evening, and Hall was with him. Ings came and asked Mrs. Brunt for the key" the key being usually kept hanging up in Mrs. Brunt's room; that is, the key of this back room, in which there was no furniture when taken by the prisoner at the bar, and into which it does not appear by the evidence that any furniture was brought. The key being asked for it was brought, and they went into the room. "I heard others come that evening; and from this time till my master was taken up, persons used to come to the room in the evening, and they were or some of them were, Thistlewood, Ings the prisoner at the bar, Davidson, Bradburn, Tidd, Edwards, Adams, Hall, Potter, Strange; there was no furniture in the room; they used to borrow Brunt's chairs to sit on; Brunt himself used to attend. I saw these persons also occasionally in Brunt's room; they called each other by their names sometimes, and they called Thistlewood sometimes T, and sometimes Arthur," which you know is his christian name. "One day I saw the door open, and then observed some long poles, like branches of trees. I have heard hammering and sawing going on in the room. My master was taken up on Thursday, the 24th of February; on the Sunday before, in the morning, there was a meeting in the room, the persons I have named being then present; there were others besides; it was a larger meeting than usual; they went away one or two at a time; my master was in the room with them; and after the meeting, I saw Strange with my master, in my master's room. On Monday-evening there was a meeting; on Tuesday-evening there was another meeting; on Wednesday several persons came up at different times, I cannot say precisely how many, but several of these came in the morning, and some came in the afternoon. I remember Strange, and a man I did not know, coming into our workshop about two o'clock, and Strange and the other man were then flinting five or six pistols, which they did not finish; for one of the men said, there were persons overlooking them from the houses opposite, and Brunt told them to go into the back room, for they could be seen out of the window of the houses opposite, and they went then into the other room, Brunt and the other men. I saw Thistlewood there, about four o'clock, he asked for a piece of writing paper; I gave him some, he took it into the back room; after that, Brunt came out and told me to go and get six sheets of cartridge-paper; he gave me sixpence to buy it. I went and bought the sheets, and gave them to Brunt; he took them into the back room, and after this some of the men went away; some others went into my master's room; my master went away about six o'clock. After he was gone, my mistress wanted her table for tea, which was in the back room. I knocked at the door, and asked for the table; Potter answered, and gave me out the table, and on opening the door I saw four or five men, besides Potter. I saw Tidd in the course of the evening, who came to Brunt's room. Mrs. Brunt took him to the cupboard, and shewed him a pikehead and a sword, and asked him, what she could do with them? upon which he told her to give them to him, and he would take them away, which he did; he took them into the back room; after that I heard some persons go down stairs; a person came into my mistress's room, and said, if any person came and inquired, they were to be sent to the White Hart; shortly after three persons came; they did not know the way to the White Hart; I went and shewed them; after that Potter came; I told him the same thing, knowing the way he went himself; my master came home about nine, his boots were very muddy, and the tail of his coat; he seemed rather confused. He told his wife" (this was after the Cato-street business), "it was all up, or words to that effect, that where he had been, there had been a lot of officers come in, that he had saved his life, and that was all; as he said this, a man came in, Brunt shook hands with him, and asked him, if he knew who had informed? he said, no, he had himself received a terrible blow on his side, and was knocked down; and from their manner of speaking together, I judge they had been together. As he was going away, Brunt said, there was something to be done yet, and they went away together. When they were gone, my mistress and I went into the back room, and I saw a long pole in the corner of the room; and in the cupboard I saw several rolls of brown paper and tar; some round balls I saw also, made with string, and tar all over them. I have heard since, that they are hand-grenades; they are tied with rope yarn: they were the same that were found by the officers the next morning. There was also an iron pot in the room which belonged to Brunt, and there were two flannel bags, which were full. My master came home about eleven, and directed me to rise in the morning as soon as I could, and clean his boots, which I did; he then asked me if I knew the Borough? I said, Yes.—If I knew Snow's-fields? No.—He told me how I was to find them, and that I was to go to Potter, Kirby-street, Snow's-fields. He desired me to bring a rush basket into the back room, and he took another, and desired me to put those things into the basket which I have described as having seen the night before; one was tied up with a blue apron of Mrs. Brunt's, which had been used as a curtain to the window of the back room; the other was not tied up; he then went into his own room, and looked for something to tie it up with; at this moment two officers came in and seized them. On the Sunday to which I have spoken, I think at the meeting there were about twenty present."

On cross-examination, he says, "I was not surprised particularly at the meetings; I did not suspect what they were about, nor had I any knowledge of what the pistols were for; I never was in a court of justice before; nor ever before a magistrate, except when I was examined about this business."

This ends, for the present, the testimony of these three witnesses—coming forward, under the circumstances I have stated to you—wanting no confirmation as to any part of their testimony, and who prove against the others, and the prisoner at the bar, the facts which I have stated to you—the taking of the room for the prisoner—the employment of that room—the approach to it by the stairs—the backway—the frequent meetings—their continuing for five weeks, down to the discovery which took place in Cato-street—the arms seen from time to time—the putting all the bags in the room taken for Ings, and the other circumstances I have stated.—How far this evidence is material, if there were no other evidence to confirm the account given by the witness Adams, or whether it be at all material, and if so, how far material, in combination with all the other evidence to which your attention will be drawn, it will be for you to consider when you compare the different parts of the case.

The next witness called is Thomas Smart, who is a watchman in the parish of St. George's, near lord Harrowby's house. He says, "I was on the watch, on the night of Tuesday the 22nd of February, in Grosvenor-square; I saw four very suspicious looking characters, about half-past eight or a quarter before nine, on the 22nd of February, and one of these was a man of colour; there was a tall man with him: they were peeping down the area, and I left my watch at seven in the morning. Bissix was a watchman at the same time with me; he and I met every half hour, at the end of our round; and I told him there were some suspicious characters, and to keep a look out after them."

Charles Bissix is next called, who says, he is a watchman in Grosvenor-square, and was there on watch on the 22nd of February; "at about a quarter before nine I was at the end of my beat, on the same side on which lord Harrowby lives; there were two men passed me, one was a dark man, a man of colour I believe; he said, watchman, is it almost nine? to which I answered, within a few minutes."

Henry Gillan is next called; he says, that he used the Rising Sun public-house, the corner of Charles-street and Adams-mews; and he says, "on Tuesday, the 22nd of February, I was there when there came in two persons, and I afterwards played at dominos with Brunt, between nine and ten in the evening; I was there before he came in; another man came with him; they had bread and cheese, and some porter, and we played about half an hour. I left the house first and I left it about ten; I know that it was the 22nd of February by the list by which I carry out my medicines; I have not the list with me now; that is the only recollection I have of it."

Then John Hector Morrison is called, who says he is a journeyman to Mr. Underwood the cutler, in Drury-lane, and worked with him at Christmas last, remembers on Christmas eve last, a person bringing him a sword to sharpen; he was dressed like a butcher.—To this part of the evidence you will of course attend, in connection with the testimony that will afterwards appear;—the time when this happened—the circumstances under which it took place—the circumstances of who brought this sword—all are highly material. He says, that the person in question brought a sword to his master's shop, on the day before Christmas-day; he says, he was dressed like a butcher; "Ings, the prisoner at the bar, was the person who brought the sword; he called three days after, and paid me nine pence for grinding it; he told me to grind it, and to make the point particularly sharp, and to make it cut both back and edge; it was a short sabre. After this he called again, and brought a very long one, which might be a fortnight after, and then he gave me the same directions which he had given before as to the other. It is customary with us to ask the name, that we may know to whom we are to return the things when they are called for; and he said, Ings or Eames was his name, to the best of my knowledge;" and, looking to the prisoner, he says, Ings is the man who, at the time in question, brought these two swords, with a direction to have the point, the edge, and the back, the one long, and the other short, sharpened. This is the evidence of a person not connected with the conduct of any of these parties, in any of these transactions, but a witness on whose testimony no observations of an adverse nature can be made, or have been attempted.

Then Edward Simpson is called; he is corporal-major in the second Life-guards. "I know Harrison; he was formerly in our regiment; he has been on duty at King-street barracks; I cannot say how long, but he had been there long enough to know the different state of the barracks in the course of his duty; he would be perfectly acquainted with them; the barracks join Gloucester-mews; there were formerly" (that is before the transactions that were discovered on the night in question) "windows looking into the Mews; those had been stopped up three or four days after the affair in Cato-street; there was straw in the room always, and hay likewise, and if anything inflammable had been thrown in, and the straw had caught, it would have been the destruction of the whole barracks."

The next witness is James Aldous, a pawnbroker in Berwick-street, Soho. He knows Davidson: "he pledged a brass-barrelled blunderbuss with me, which he redeemed on the 23rd of February, in the morning; he said nothing at the time; I have seen it since; it was shown to me at Portman-street-barracks by the officer;" this blunderbuss being one of those proved to have been taken on the night in question proved by this witness to have been pawned with him by Davidson.

Now, gentlemen, we return, after these six witnesses—impartial and unconnected with the case—to a person who stands in some respect in a particular and peculiar situation; and I now call your attention to the evidence given by Thomas Hiden. He says, that he is a cow-keeper and dairyman, living in Manchester-mews; that he knows the prisoner Wilson; he had known him shortly before last February. Wilson I need scarcely remind you is one of the persons who has been proved to have been from time to time present at these meetings, having conducted himself in the way in which he appears to have done on the testimony of former witnesses, some of whose evidence I have read, and the remainder you will presently hear. He was also taken on the night in question, as will appear from the subsequent part of the evidence, in Cato-street. "He asked me if I would be one of a party who were going to meet to destroy his majesty's ministers, and he told me they had got such things as I never saw, and they were waiting for a cabinet dinner; he said the things were made of tarpaulin, tin and powder, and that it would heave up one of the walls of the very house by which we were walking; he told me that they were to destroy his majesty's ministers; they were to have a cabinet-dinner, and at what time he would let me know; they were going, he said, to light up some fires." Now with this you will connect the evidence which stands also on unsuspicious testimony—the testimony of officers, by whom in the various places these fire-balls were afterwards found—with the account given of the nature of them and their effects, by the serjeant of the artillery who was afterwards called as a witness. He tells you, that Wilson, one of the persons who had attended these meetings, and who is charged with being one of these conspirators, told him that they were going to light up some fires; "he named lord Harrowby's house, the duke of Wellington's, lord Sidmouth's, lord Castlereagh's, the bishop of London's, and one more which I do not know. He said I had no occasion to be afraid, that a gentleman's servant had furnished them with a certain sum of money, and if they would act upon the occasion or on the subject he would give them a considerable sum more; he told me"—and you will have the goodness, gentlemen, to attend to this—"that by lighting the fires and keeping the town in a state of confusion, in a few days it would become general; that the hand-grenades were to be lighted for the purpose of being thrown into the room, and all that escaped the fire were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other means; but, he added, if I did make one of them, Mr. Thistlewood would be glad to see me, and I told him I would make one; after this"—and this is material for you, gentlemen, to consider; this person was not at the meeting on the night in question in Cato-street, nor at any of the former meetings, nor was ever himself apprehended on any charge of conspiracy or crime—"I wrote to lord Castlereagh, it might be two or three days after; I went to lord Castlereagh's, but could not see him; I delivered it to lord Harrowby in Hyde-park; it was on the day of the discovery that I saw Wilson again in Manchester-street, who said, you are the very man

I want to see; he said, there would be a cabinet-dinner at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square, and I was to be sure to come; I wished to know where, he said to John-street, to the Horse and groom; he told me I was to go into the public-house, or stay by the corner till I was shoved into a stable close by; that I was to meet him at a quarter before six or by six; I asked him how many there were going to be? he said about twenty or thirty there, but those were not all, for, he added, there was a party in the Borough, and another in Gray's-inn-lane, and another in the city or Gee's-court, I am not certain which he said; he said that all these living in Gee's-court were in it; but they would not act unless the English began first." You have heard from other evidence, that the court in question is chiefly inhabited by Irish, and therefore Wilson told him that they would not act unless the English began first; indeed it is followed up by saying "Gee's-court had all embarked in it; he told me they were all Irishmen that inhabited Gee's-court; he said after they had done in Grosvenor-square, they were to meet somewhere about the Mansion-house; he told me, also, there were pieces of cannon which could be easily got in Gray's-inn-lane, by knocking in a small door; that there were four pieces at another place, which they could get by only killing the sentry in the Artillery-ground, where exactly I cannot recollect; I promised him to come, and he promised me to be there a quarter before six; I went to John-street, but I was behind my time in consequence of business; it was nearly seven o'clock; I saw Wilson and Davidson; Davidson is the man of colour; they stood at the corner of the gateway; I had known Davidson a long time before; they said, you are behind your time; I said, yes, I could not keep it; Davidson asked me if I was going in, saying, Mr. Thistlewood was there; I told him I could not go in, for I had been employed to go and get some cream, and I asked when do you go away; he said, he thought about eight, and if gone away, I was to follow them into Grosvenor-square, and he told me that I was to be at the bottom of the square, the fourth house from the corner at the bottom of the square; Davidson said, come you dog, this is the best thing you ever had to do with in your life." Upon a paper being produced to him, he says, "this is the letter which, before this meeting in Cato-street, in Hyde-park, I myself personally delivered to lord Harrowby."

On his cross-examination, he says, "the letter is my writing. I was a cowkeeper about four years; I never was a shoemaker before I was a cowkeeper; I was a gentleman's servant, and I was brought up to farming; I lived in my last place, at colonel Bridges's in South Andley-street, that is six or it may be seven years ago, I cannot precisely say; he had the whole house, but whether it was a hired house furnished by him or taken furnished, I do not know; I did not live long with him, it might be two or three months, it might be two or it might be one, at this distance of time I cannot exactly say which; I lived with major Dive; a year and three months, in Tavistock-street, Bedford-square, I lived there as a footman, he keeping only one; I then went to Mr. Brice, in Stratton-street; for the last five years I have been a milkman or a cow-keeper, I have lived in Manchester-mews three years, my family has been there; I have been two or three or four months from home at a time, and I have been lately for debt in the prison of the Marshalsea; I was in prison for about eighteen pounds due to Mr. Powell, who is a milkman and a cow-keeper, I went in last Saturday, being taken then in execution. In the beginning of last summer, I was out of the way between two and three months, it might be June or July or August, or the beginning of September, but not so late I believe as October; I was at home at different times in July and August, my wife and my family carry on the business, she and my family remained there and carried on my business for me; my family still live in Manchester-mews, at least they did last Saturday morning, and they have been there all the time I have mentioned, and are there now for all I know; they are living there now, my sister told me so to-day; I have known Davidson for three or or four months; I do not know Edwards; I know a Mr. Edwards; the person you are inquiring for may be the person whom I know; the Mr. Edwards I know lives two hundred miles in the country." therefore he thinks that cannot be the person about whom the counsel for the prisoner was inquiring; he says, "I carried on the business of milkman in Durweston-street, by the Edgware-road; I have been twice to the Scotch Arms in a small court by the Strand, I went to the shoemakers' club, I went with a friend of the name of Clark, a tailor; I cannot state what was the subject of conversation, it was seven or eight months ago. I only know the prisoners Davidson and Wilson, and had conversation with them, I had seen Davidson it might be a week or fortnight before; I had never been at Fox-court; I knew nothing of this particular affair till Wilson told me; the cream is a great profit to me, I might gain two or three shillings by that order, it was for a family I was to get the cream; they lived at No. 6, Princes-street, Cavendish-square, I have served them for three or four years, I do not know their names, I have had orders for cream repeatedly from them, our people brought home the order, I did not go to the house, my wife or sister went to tell them it could not be got; I do not serve them myself nor ever did; my wife serves them I believe; I have been at the house many times, I have seen maid servants there, I cannot say when I was last there; I serve them daily; I do not know what quantity of cream was ordered for that night; we get a shilling profit upon a pint, and more than a quart was ordered; I do not know the name of any servant in the house; it was the first time I met Wilson that he said I had no occasion to be afraid, for there was a gentleman's servant who supplied money;" he then says, "he told me so at two different times, I had known him long before, and have often met with him; I never went into Cato-street, only to the corner."

On the re-examination he says, "I carried on my business till last Saturday, in Manchester-mews; I was taken last Saturday in execution. I think the number was 6, of the gentleman's house who was to have had the cream, and I think it was the first door on the left-hand-side from the square, going down to Oxford-street." Now this is, you see, a witness who, more or less, but not altogether, has on this day at least been described to you as an accomplice; whether he is so or not, or in what particular situation he stands, I shall consider more fully hereafter. But at present, you will remember that he is a person who, though he tells you he in words consented (and whether in heart or not it is for you to judge) to go with these persons on this purpose being communicated to him by Wilson originally, yet, before the hour arrived in which this fatal project was to be carried into execution, he appears to have gone with a letter to the noble lord to whose evidence I shall afterwards call your attention—a letter first intended for lord Castlereagh; but such was his anxiety, not having been able to see that noble lord, that he went to lord Harrowby's house; finding he was riding, he went to the Park; and in the Park, before the meeting took place, he delivered the letter in question. Now, I can only say that it is not merely most extraordinary, but unaccountable, that he should have been able, unless gifted with the spirit of prophecy, to deliver a letter to lord Harrowby, before the meeting in Cato-street, giving him notice of a conspiracy there going on, if it were merely a thing as yet in the womb of time!

The next witness who is called is lord Harrowby himself. He tells you, that he is president of the council; that it is usual to have cabinet dinners; and that in February last these dinners had been interrupted by the death of his late majesty. In the latter end of the week preceding the 23rd of February, he caused cards to be issued inviting the members of the cabinet council to dine with him on Wednesday the 23rd of February; he then mentions, with their respective offices, the several persons who were to have been present at that dinner; and you will see how far this agrees with the number stated to the persons assembled in Cato-street, by Thistlewood as likely to be present at the cabinet dinner, and who were there stated to be fourteen or sixteen. His lordship mentions the lord Chancellor, the earl of Liverpool, Mr. Vansittart, earl Bathurst, lord Castlereagh, lord Sidmouth, lord Melville, the earl of Westmorland, the duke of Wellington, Mr. Canning, Mr. Wellesley Pole, the earl of Mulgrave, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Bragge Bathurst; and his lordship afterwards adds, fourteen besides himself;

"all these were members of the privy council; my house is on the south side of Grosvenor-square, next door to the archbishop of York. On Tuesday, the 22nd of February, I was riding in the Park, and I was accosted by a person whom I did not then know; I now know that person to be Hiden; he gave me this letter, addressed to lord Castlereagh; he said it was of material importance to lord Castlereagh, as well as myself and some others, and wished it to be delivered immediately. I was myself going to Carlton-house, to attend the council that was held by the king; and therefore, not finding lord Castlereagh there, I despatched it with a note from myself to him. I met Hiden in the Park, by appointment, the next morning. He made a communication to me there; the communication which he made to me is contained in the letter, except that which I have spoken to before; and I should add, that at this time, he personally made that communication to me in more general terms. The plan of the dinner, upon this, was given up for that day; I dined at Fife-house, the earl of Liverpool's. The preparations at my house proceeded to all outward appearance," that the plan of giving up the dinner might not be known to the persons assembled, "as if the company had been to dine there, till they were stopped by a note I sent from lord Liverpool's (which being despatched between seven and eight from Fife-house, I conceive reached my own house about eight o'clock) to say that the cabinet dinner could not take place. I had concealed from my servants the alteration of the plan, and every thing went on as usual. I had no communication with any person as to this particular thing; but we had information, long previous to this, of some general design of this nature being intended." Here, therefore, you see (if the fact could be doubted upon the testimony of Hiden, if Hiden could be considered at all an accomplice, which you will judge) whether he is completely confirmed by the noble lord who has given this evidence, proving that Hiden gave him a letter in the Park, which gave him the information contained in that letter, and upon which they had previous general information. Lord Harrowby having left the court, was called back; and Hiden was called up; and his lordship says, "that is the person who delivered me the letter."

The next witness, is John Baker, butler to lord Harrowby; and he speaks to same effect as lord Harrowby as to the dinner.

Now we fall back to the testimony of a person who undoubtedly is an accomplice, namely, John Monument; who introduces himself by telling you that he is at this time a prisoner in the Tower. He says, "I met Thistlewood at the house of a person named Ford, about two or three months before the meeting in Cato-street; about a fortnight after, he called on me; Brunt was with him; I was in the room, and my mother and my brother were with me;

he was in the room five minutes, when he called me to the outside of the door; Brunt did not go out with us; he said great events are at hand"—here again, gentlemen, you will attend to what follows—"great events are at hand; the people every where are anxious for a change; he had been, he said, promised support by many men, who had deceived him; but now he had got men that would stand by him; he asked me whether I had any arms; I said no; he said no man should be without arms, every one who belonged to him had arms; some a sabre, some a pistol, some a pike, and that I might buy a pistol for four or five shillings. I said that I had no money to buy a pistol; he said that he would see what he could do; there was no other conversation at this time; I returned into the room; Brunt and Thistlewood went away together. Two or three days after this, Brunt called on me by himself; he said he was in a hurry, and nothing particular passed; on the 22nd of February, Brunt called again, in company with Tidd, about two or three o'clock; I said I thought I had lost you; he said the king's death had made an alteration in their plans; I asked what plans; he said there would be a meeting on the following evening at Tyburn-turnpike, where I should know all the particulars; and then he turned round to Tidd and asked, should he give me the word? and Tidd said yes, he supposed there was no danger; and then he told me that if I saw any people about, I was to say to them b, u, t, and if they were friends, they would answer t, o, n, making the word button; he said he would call the next morning and tell me further particulars; they then went away. On the following day, Wednesday, Brunt called on me between four and five o'clock; he called me down stairs, and told me that he wanted me to go with him; I told him that I could not then, for that I had some work to finish; he asked me when it would be done; I told him not before six; he told me then I must go to Tidd's house, and he told me where Tidd lived, in Hole-in-the-wall passage, Brook's market; he went away, and at half-past six I went to Tidd's; I found him at home; he said he was waiting for some more men, and they had not come; and he said he could not wait later than seven o'clock; at seven o'clock Tidd went to a box in the corner of the room, and took out a pistol, which he put into a belt round his body under a great coat, and then he took about six or eight heads of pikes, in a piece of brown paper, in his hand, and a staff four feet long which had a hole to receive a pike-head; he went down stairs into Holborn, and I along with him, and we went up Holborn, and going up Oxford-street, I asked him what we were going about? he said I should know when I got there; was it, I asked, to the House of Commons we were going; he said no, there were too many soldiers about there? he then told me we were going to Grosvenor-square; I asked who lived there; he said there was to be a cabinet dinner there that evening; nothing more passed, and he then took me to Cato-street, through the gateway on the right hand into a stable; two people were standing under the gateway: he spoke to them; I went into the stable, there were three or four men there, and a light; he asked whether Mr. Thistlewood was up stairs, they told him he was; we went up stairs; there were one or two or three and twenty people, as near as I can tell, of whom Thistlewood was one; and on a bench there were a great many swords and pistols; Tidd went up stairs, and when up stairs a man in a great coat spoke of the impropriety of going with so small a party to lord Harrowby's. Thistlewood said it was quite sufficient, for if lord Harrowby had sixteen servants, fourteen of our men would be quite enough to go into the room. The man then said, what shall we do when we come out of the room, as there would be people in the street, who might prevent our escape; to which Thistlewood answered, this is the smallest body, there is another and a larger body, the largest is already away. Davidson then told the man not to throw cold water upon their proceedings, for if he was afraid of his life, they could do without him, and he might go. Brunt then said, sooner than leave the business, he would go into the room alone and blow them all up; he said you know we have got that which can do it, or to that effect; the man then said he did not like going with so small a number, but as they were all for it, he would not be against it; he then proposed that they should put themselves under the orders of Thistlewood; when Thistlewood said every one engaged in the business would have the same honour with himself; and he then proposed that the fourteen men to go into the room should volunteer from among the persons that were in the room; a few minutes afterwards, twelve or thirteen out of the fourteen ranged themselves accordingly on the other side of the room; one (Tidd) came first and spoke to me, on which Thistlewood put him back, and said, you all know your places; I do not recollect any thing particular passing after that until the officers came into the room, which was about five minutes." This brings us to that part of the transaction, which introduces the police officers first into the stable, and afterwards up into the loft. He says, "there seemed first to be two or three, they got up stairs before these in the room knew it; they told them in the room that they were officers, and called upon them to surrender, telling them that there was a guard of soldiers below; I was taken into custody in the room and I have been in confinement ever since."

On cross-examination, he says, "fear led me there; Brunt at my house said, that every man who engaged in it and did not come forward, should be destroyed; I was foolish, but I cannot charge myself with any crime; I was afraid there was something bad; I did not know why I suspected they were going to the House of Commons. When he told me it was to a cabinet dinner, I asked no further questions, because I was certain what it was; I could not see that they could be going for any thing but to destroy the persons so assembled at dinner; I had not been at their private meetings; I saw Thistlewood at Ford's about a week before the Finsbury meeting, and this was after the Manchester meeting; and I went to Tidd's because I was afraid to express reluctance to go with them. When I found what they were about in the room, my intention was to get away from them, when Thistlewood or somebody told the man in the brown coat, that if he was afraid to join them, he might go away, I wished he had said so to me; I joined them from fear, and proceeded from fear. I did not know what their proceedings were at first; I admit that I certainly acted very foolishly."

This last witness, I have already told you, undoubtedly stands in the situation of an accomplice, about him therefore I say no more at present.

The witness who is now called is Thomas Monument. He says, "the last witness, John Monument, is my brother." Gentlemen you will attend to this; Thomas Monument is not one of the persons charged with this conspiracy, and therefore upon this part of the case, taking his brother as an accomplice, the point for your consideration will be, how far he is confirmed by this witness, whose testimony not being attacked may be assumed to be true. He says, "John Monument, the last witness, is my brother; I lived with him; Thistlewood called upon him at his lodgings, in company with Brunt; they remained in the room some time, I suppose ten minutes; and then Thistlewood asked my brother if he could speak to him; they went out-side the door." This witness therefore, not an accomplice, confirms the story told by his brother, who is, in all the particulars stated by John as to Thistlewood's coming there, calling his brother out to speak to him, of course about something that could not be disclosed before Thomas. "Brunt called upon my brother on Tuesday the 22nd of February, and brought a man of the name of Tidd with him, when they came into the room, my brother said, Brunt, I thought I had lost you; then something was said concerning the king's death; Brunt said, the king's death had made some alteration in their plans; my brother said, what plans? he said, they had different objects in view. Then Brunt said, suppose we give them an outline of the plan; and then Brunt said, that we were to meet up at Tyburn-turnpike on the following evening at six o'clock: he then gave the pass word;" and he repeats the pass word as other witnesses have done; "the next day, about five o'clock in the evening, Brunt came and asked my brother if he was ready to go; he could not go just then, for he had to finish some work, and he told him to call on Tidd and he would take him; my brother then went away at near seven o'clock, and I never saw him after this till I saw him in custody." You will judge for yourselves on this part of the case, how far the testimony of Monument the accomplice engaged in the conspiracy, is or is not confirmed in all its particulars by the testimony of his brother who speaks to these facts, who never went near Cato-street, and who is in no way connected with these transactions.

George Caylock is the next witness, who says, "I live at No. 2, Cato-street; on the 23rd of February I saw Harrison, one of the prisoners at the bar, in Cato-street; he was going into the stable; I asked him how he did and what he was going there for? He said he had taken two chambers and was going to clean them up."

The next witness is the first of the police officers who went to Cato-street, George Thomas Joseph Ruthven. He went to the spot about six o'clock, and he entered the stable at about half-past eight. "On going in, I observed a man walking backwards and forwards with a gun on his shoulder; I did not observe him particularly; there were others with me; I said to them, secure that man, and I went up stairs first myself; next came Ellis, and then Smithers, and Gibbs as I have been since told, but I did not see him. On getting into the loft, I observed several men standing round a carpenter's bench; there were about twenty-four or twenty-five round the bench. I heard a clattering of arms, and saw some persons apparently sorting them. I said, We are officers; seize their arms. Thistlewood looked up, caught up a sword, and retired, with three or four others, into a little room to the right of the bench; two or three men went also into the back apartment. I know Thistlewood well; have known him from the time of the state trials, two or three years ago. Smithers then appeared on my right hand, he approached the door where Thistlewood had retired, on which Thistlewood stabbed him with a sword; he had been fencing with the sword before, and a pistol was fired almost instantly, on which the lights were put out. I then heard a voice, kill the b——rs! throw them down stairs. On this there was a rush towards the staircase; I joined in it, and got down stairs; there was no light in the stable when I got down. I got into John-street, and there I met the soldiers. I returned to the stable, and I saw Tidd coming out of the door; I called to somebody following me to lay hold of him; and immediately upon that he lifted his arm, and I saw a pistol; I pulled him on me, and we fell upon a dung-heap; the soldiers came up, and serjeant Legg extricated me, and I took Tidd to the Horse and Groom. I searched him; I found two ball-cartridges in his breeches pocket, and a belt round his waist. Bradburn was brought in while I was there; I searched him, and I found six ball-cartridges and three loose balls, and round his waist was a string, five or six times round, that would have answered the purpose of holding a pistol. Davidson was also brought in, and he began to sing, Scots wha ha wi Wallace bled; and he said, damn any man that would not die in liberty's cause; he gloried in it. Wilson was brought in, but I did not search him. After this I returned to the loft and found there several soldiers, four prisoners, and some police officers in the room. When Smithers received the thrust with the sword he fell backward, and cried, Oh my God! or, Oh I am done! I do not know which, and died directly. I found arms on returning to the loft;" then he produced the list of all the things that were found in the loft, together with another list of arms, ammunition, and accoutrements; of all of which you have heard so much and seen them displayed, and which were found not only in the loft, but a part at Brunt's, and a part at what is called the dépôt at Tidd's. "Tidd fired a pistol when he was lying upon me. Wilson, when in the Horse and Groom, said he did not care a damn; he knew it was all over; they might as well kill him now as at any other time. Before I went to the stable I went to the Horse and Groom; while I was there, Cooper and Gilchrist came in; after they went out Gilchrist came back for a stick, one end was cut round, as if to receive the socket of any thing. I think there were about eight lights in the two rooms; four or five in the first room of the loft. I could see them; I have no doubt there were four or five. I said, we are officers; seize their arms. Smithers said nothing more than, let me come forward; and when he received the blow he fell back, crying, Oh my God!"

James Ellis is the next witness called; he says, "I was one of the conductors of the Bow-street patrol on Wednesday, the 23rd of February. I went with other officers, and entered the stable close to Ruthven; there was a light in the stable; two men were there. The first I observed was standing about half-way between the door and the foot of the ladder. I believe it was Davidson; he had a short gun or carbine in his hand; he carried it so"—[the witness pointed out how] "and at his left hand side a long sword and two white cross belts. I took him by the collar, and turned him half round; I looked in his face, and saw that he was a man of colour, upon which I desired some of the officers to secure him, and left him. There was another man near the foot of the ladder in the further stall of the stable; he appeared to be a shorter man, he had a dark-coloured coat. I took little notice of him. I followed Ruthven up the ladder, and heard what I understood to be a signal to those above. Smithers followed me; I ascended the ladder, and I heard immediately a rattling of swords when we got up. Ruthven called out, that we were officers, seize or surrender your arms, I am not positive which; there were candles in the loft, three or more, and lights in the little room besides. The lights were placed on a carpenter's bench, which stood across the room. On getting into the loft at the top of the ladder, I saw a number of men falling back, placing themselves against the back of the loft. I saw Thistlewood and two or three more between the carpenter's bench and the door of the little room. On my gaining the top of the ladder, he shook his sword in this manner at me, as if to make a stab. I desired him to desist, or I would fire. I had a pistol in my right hand, and a constable's staff in my left hand, which I held up so. Thistlewood retreated, backing into the little room; and at that moment, having gained the top of the ladder, Smithers rushed forward to enter the door of the little room; and the moment he was in, Thistlewood stabbed him in the right breast. Smithers held up his hands. I saw him fall back, and heard him exclaim, Oh my God! and falling almost immediately, he staggered past me, and rose no more. I fired at Thistlewood; the lights were put out the moment I fired; the flash of my own pistol was the last light I saw. Great confusion immediately took place; there was a rush by me; I was thrown down the ladder; several shots were fired in the loft while I was on the ladder; two or three shots were fired, when I found myself in the stable; two passed me at the door. I cannot tell exactly from where fired. Another shot was fired in the stable by a man who stood there. There were some shots from the window of the little room, which looks into Cato-street. While at the door, I heard a cry of, Stop him! and observed a man running away towards Cato-street; he had two white cross belts. I pursued him, and caught him in Cato-street; it was Davidson. On laying hold of him, he made a cut, intended for me, with a sword; others came up, he was secured. I left him with an officer, and returned to the stable, where I found lieutenant Fitzclarence and the soldiers; four men were in the loft in custody of the soldiers; of these Monument was one and Wilson another; they were all taken to Bow-street, and finally committed."

The next witness is William Westcoatt, who went with Ruthven and the others, but not up into the loft. He says, "when they had gone up I heard a noise of firing and confusion"—and then this witness tells you, and to which you will particularly advert—that he, remaining below, observed Ings in the stable, who rushed towards him, the witness, as if endeavouring to get out of the stable. He says, "I seized him by the collar, and shoved him back against the wall at the foot of the ladder; he put his hand to his side as if to get out a weapon; I knocked him down; at this time the officers came tumbling down the ladder. I heard a firing above; I saw the flash of a pistol from the ladder after they had come down; it appeared to have been fired into the stable; then a man came down the ladder who appeared to have fired the pistol; it was Thistlewood; he turned round and presented a pistol at my head; it went off. I had before lifted up my left hand, it passed through the sleeve of my coat; and while he was doing this" that is lifting up and presenting the pistol, "I let go of Ings whom I was holding before it wounded me, and there were three holes in my hat; I received then a violent blow on the right side of my head, and I fell; as I fell, Thistlewood made a cut at me with a sword, and rushed out at the stable door."

The next witness is Luke Nixon, also a Bow-street patrol, who went with the other officers; he says, "I saw Westcott in conflict with Ings, in the stable; I saw Ings leave the stable; I made a snatch at him to catch him, but missed him; I do not think Thistlewood had got away then; Ings got out, and I ran after him up John-street, but he had got too far; on this I heard a pistol fired, and going up I found him in the custody of Brooks and Champion."

Joseph Champion is next called, he also is one of the Bow-street patrol; he says, "I followed Rathven to the foot of the ladder; I was about the sixth or seventh man behind him; I was at the foot of the ladder when he was at the top; I saw Ings at the bottom;" this is the second witness who speaks of him by name; as to the former officer, you will judge whether he identifies him or not by description; he says, "I saw Ings at the foot of the ladder; he looked up, and cried out, look out above; Westcott endeavoured to seize him, but he made his escape. I followed him, and laid hold of him just after Brooks had laid hold of him; we took him to the watch-house, and we searched him, and on his person we found four pistol-balls, the key of a pistol, a case of blue cloth for a large knife, which fitted the butcher's knife produced here, and which had wax-end twisted round the handle; I took off his great coat, and then under this, about his person, there were two haversacks slung, over his shoulders; I saw in one of them a tin case, with loose gunpowder, nearly full; he had a cloth belt round his waist with pistol holsters."

John Wright was also one of the Bow-street patrol; he was there on the 23rd of February, and saw a man in the further stall, and says, "I took a knife and sword from him; it was a butcher's knife, with a wax-end tied round the handle of it; the sword was about three feet long; I took these from a man at the foot of the ladder, in size like the prisoner at the bar;" and who is proved by the other two witnesses to have been by name Ings the prisoner; he says, "I was knocked down, and received a stab on my side; when I recovered he was gone."

Brooks is then called, who was also a patrol; and he tells you, "when I was in John-street, I saw Ings running up the street; I crossed the street, and found one of my partners with a cutlass; I went up, and the prisoner presented a pistol and said he would shoot me, and fired; the ball struck me, and went through my collar and the shoulder of my waistcoat, and out at the back of my neck; it staggered me to the right, and then (I suppose, meaning to avoid the pursuit of my companion, who was following him) he came into the Edgeware-road and threw the pistol away; a little further on, there was a watchman of the name of Mosey, who laid hold of him just as I did; I never lost sight of him till he was taken; I said, when taken, you rascal, why did you fire at me, a man you had never seen before; he said to kill you, and I wish that I had done it; and this he repeated afterwards to the soldiers, and to my partners."

William Lee is also a Bow-street patrol, and he says, "I went to the Horse and Green in the evening, before the officers went to the stable; I saw Cooper and Gilchrist go in there; they were taken that night and conveyed to Bow-street."

The next witness was lieutenant Fitzclarence; he says, that he is a lieutenant in the Coldstream-guards; that he was applied to on the night in question, to go to Cato-street; that he took a picquet with him, and arrived there a few minutes after eight; he entered the stable three or four minutes after eight: going under the gateway, leading into Cato-street, I saw a police officer, who cried out, Soldiers! soldiers! stable-door! He says, that he saw two or three persons in the stable—"I was met by two men, one presented a pistol at me; I am not sure that it was a pistol, but he presented something at me, which appeared to me to be a pistol; at the same time a man with a sword struck at me, which I parried. Seeing a body of soldiers coming up, he ran into the stable; I followed him, and the moment I got into the stable, I ran up against a man who surrendered himself, saying, do not kill me, and I will tell you all; I gave him over to the soldiers. I then ran forward into the stable; I went up into one of the stalls, and took a man out, whom I also delivered to the soldiers;" and then in the very gallant and proper discharge of his duty—considering the firing that was going on, the time of night, the obscurity of the place, and the danger with which it was attended—he goes up this narrow ladder, on which there was only room for one at a time. He says, "I led the soldiers, and when I got into the loft, I fell over the legs of poor Smithers. By the light in ascending the steps, I saw three or four men in the room; I secured these also; then I went on, and there was a large quantity of arms in different places of the loft; blunderbusses, swords, pistols, pikes, and the arms were packed up and seized by the different soldiers who took them away."

The next witness called, is Serjeant William Legg, who is a serjeant of the second battalion of the Coldstream-guards, and went with captain Fitzclarence, who directed the party. He says, the moment the police officers had spoken to him, the party were directed to advance in double quick time. "Just before," he says, "we had heard the report of pistols; there was a man standing with his back against the door; he had a pistol, and he levelled it against captain Fitz-clarence; but it was turned away by my pike. I then seized the pistol with my left hand, and a scuffle ensued between the prisoner and me; that prisoner was Tidd. After some time, we both having hold of the pistol, it went off, and tore a hole in my coat; I delivered Tidd to one of the police; the pistol is here; on going up into the loft I saw three others who had surrendered."

The next witness called is Samuel Hercules Taunton, who says, "I belong to the police-office at Bow-street. On Thursday morning, the 24th of February, I went to Brunt's lodgings, where I saw Brunt and apprehended him; I searched the apartments occupied by him, but found nothing in the front room; I then went into the back room, where I found two rush baskets, both packed up, one tied up in a blue apron; and having seized Brunt, I asked him about them, and he said he knew nothing of them. I brought the baskets out, and I opened them afterwards; and I found in them nine papers of rope-yarn and tar, and other ingredients calculated to take fire; and also steel-filings. In one of the baskets there were four hand-grenades; three papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients; two bags, containing each one pound of gun-powder; five flannel bags empty; one leather bag containing sixty-three bullets. In the room there was an iron pot, which appeared to have had tar boiled in it very recently, and a pike handle finished in rough; this was what I found at Brunt's. I afterwards went to Tidd's, about nine in the morning, and searched his lodgings, where I found 434 balls in a haversack; 171 ball-cartridges, loose; 69 ball-cartridges, without powder; three pounds of gun-powder, in a brown paper; 10 grenades; 11 bags of gunpowder, one pound each," these are the flannel bags; "and 10 flannel bags, empty; and there was a small linen bag with powder; a powder flask with some powder in it; 68 bullets, four flints, and 27 pike-handles with sockets at the ends for pikes; and a box which contained 965 ball-cartridges. This is all I found at Tidd's."

He was asked, upon his cross-examination, about Palin; whether there is a reward offered for him? he says there is; that he has observed that he is advertized for the part he took in this business.

Daniel Bishop is the next witness called, and says he apprehended Thistlewood between ten and eleven in the forenoon of the 24th of February, at No. 8, White-street, Little Moor-fields, in the apartments of a Mrs. Harris; his own abode, he says, being in Stanhope-street, Clare-market. He says he was in bed with his breeches and stockings on. "Upon my opening the door, he just held up his head from under the bed-clothes; I had a pistol in one hand and a staff in the other. I told him who I was, my name, and that I had a warrant against him; he said, I shall make no resistance. His coat and waistcoat were by the bed-side; in his waistcoat pocket there were three leaden balls, a ball-cartridge, a blank-cartridge, and two flints, and a small silk sash. I took him into custody."

VOL. XXXIII.

On the cross-examination he says, "I do not know Edwards."

Ruthven was then called back, and he produced the arms taken from Cato-street.

Morison was called back, and identified a sword found there as the one brought to him to be sharpened, by Ings. He says, that it "was directed to be made particularly sharp at the point, both back and edge, as sharp as a needle; it appears to have been rubbed on a stone to keep the keenness of the edge."

Taunton is next called back, and he produces the arms found at Brunt's. He says, "this basket contains nine papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients; there are also some steel filings." Then he produces the basket which was tied up in a blue apron, and says, "these are flannel bags full of gun-powder; there are also some empty; there are four hand-grenades; a pike-handle, filed at the end so as to receive a pike, and it has a ferule on; this is the iron pot, there is the appearance of tar at the bottom; these are the sixty-three bullets in a leathern bag." Then he produces the things found at Tidd's, and, looking at them, he says, "These are some of the ball-cartridges; three pounds of gunpowder, some hand-grenades, eleven bags of gunpowder, of a pound each, some empty bags;" and he produces the various things found there.

Then Ruthven is called back, and he proves that those arms found in Cato-street were most of them loaded, one or two had been fired off; the others were drawn last Monday.

Then Serjeant Hanson is called; he is in the Royal Artillery, and he looks at the fire-balls; he says, they are composed of oakum, tar, and rosin; and if they were lighted and thrown into a house they would set the house on fire; if into a hay-loft, still more likely. He says, looking at the fuse, it would burn about half a minute; and, looking at the thing itself, he says, this one would burn three or four minutes; and then looking at one of the cartridges (and this part of the evidence is very material) so seized at this dépôt, he says, "this is a flannel cartridge for a six-pounder, powder is so made up for the purpose of charging cannon; but ours are not made up in the same way, for they are serge; this will answer the purpose." Then he looked at the hand-grenades, he took one to pieces; and then he says, that the exterior tight binding, as they appear to you to be, increases the effect when they burst; if they were slack they would not have half the effect; and then he pointed out to you, before they were taken to pieces, the great nails in different situations, which in a thing likely to explode with this violence, would, like a shower of shot, be scattered in all directions, and be productive of infinite mischief; and then he says, this is more powder than we use to burst a nine-inch shell.

4 F

This is the whole of the evidence for the prosecution which I have felt it my duty in this case, so important to the prisoner at the bar, to state to you.

On the part of the prisoner, the first witness called was Thomas Chambers; who says, that he lives at No. 3, Heath-cock-court, in the Strand, nearly opposite the Adelphi. He is called to impeach the character and the testimony which was given by the witness Adams; and he says, "I had seen Adams in company with Edwards about a week before the Cato-street business took place; I was by myself in my room when they came together; they made a proposal to me about the assassination of the king's ministers, and asked me to go with them; I refused; Adams said to me they were going to kill his majesty's ministers, and they would have blood and wine for supper; they came to me again on the Monday-night, (it was a wet night) before the Cato-street business; they brought a large bag and wanted to leave it. I am a boot-maker; I cannot say how long I have known Ings; I have not been in his company above two or three times. I met him near the court where I live, at a pamphlet shop, where they sell the Black Dwarf and the Medusa; the shop is kept by Watling; I know the Scotch Arms in Round-court, in the Strand; it is near my lodgings; I never saw Ings there; I had been there three times before Christmas; there was no business going on, nor any chairman; the three times I was there, I was in the tap-room; I have been at the Black Dog in Gray's-inn-lane; there was no chair there, it was in a little parlour, and I saw seven persons there; I was invited there by a man of the name of Bryant, who was going to the Cape of Good Hope; they were all strangers to me but one, and that one whom I knew was Thistlewood; I know Brunt very well, but he was not there; I will not swear I do not know Palin; I have not had any conversation with him, but I may have seen him; I was at all the meetings in Smithfield; I cannot state who carried the black flag upon that occasion, but I have carried two flags; there was inscribed on one, 'The Manchester Massacre;' never saw a flag, 'Let us die like Free men, not live like Slaves.'" On Hunt's entry, I carried a flag of 'Trial by Jury;' I know Davidson; I have not much knowledge of Tidd, I may have seen him; I have seen Wilson; I know Harrison very well; I have not much knowledge of Braddurn; I do not know Strange, nor Gilchrist, nor Cooper; I have known Thistlewood since Mr. Hunt's triumphal entry; the proposal of assassination shocked me so, that I did not go; Bow-street was near me, but I did not myself go to Bow-street and give any information; I do not know whether Edwards knew of my acquaintance with the other people."

Then the next witness who is called, is Mary Barker, the daughter of Tidd. She says, some powder was found at his house, and some grenades and balls; "they were brought in the morning by a man and a boy; I know Edwards; he brought some of the grenades, Edwards was the man; they were taken away and returned; I saw Edwards on the morning of the 23rd, he came and took some of the grenades and powder away; they might be the same that were brought back on the 24th, but I do not know; there was one very large one; Adams brought it; that was not brought back again."

Upon cross-examination she says, "the box had been there two or three days; I do not know how long the grenades had been there they might have been there a fortnight; it was on the morning of Wednesday that they were taken away; the box was kept corded, it had not been opened to my knowledge."

This is the evidence on the one side, and on the other; and it is for you to say whether, upon this evidence, the prisoner at the bar be or be not guilty of the criminality imputed to him by this indictment; one of the charges being a conspiracy to depose the king, and the other a conspiracy to levy war against the king; such as I have before stated.

You have been truly told, that the nature of this offence consists in the intention; and the intentions charged are those which I have pointed out. The overt acts themselves are but manifestations of the inward intent, and if such overt acts as are stated are established by the evidence, there can be no doubt that, in point of law, the prisoner is guilty.

Now first, with respect to the purpose—I must be a public purpose: and the purpose charged is an intention to bring about a revolution in the government, to compel the king to change his measures, and to put many of those employed in the administration of the government to death, by the means that have been stated and proved. But still, if this were merely an intention to assassinate the king's ministers, and that such assassination should end with itself, however diabolical such a design would be, still having no ulterior public view, it would not be the offence imputed; but it will be for you to judge on the facts in proof, what were the motives, and what the end and object of the conspiracy in question.

To begin with the evidence of Adams. If you believe him, there can be no possible doubt in the case; for he proves the origin and progress of different meetings, from time to time, at which this scheme was formed and matured, up to the moment when it was preparing to be carried into execution. But you have been told, and truly, that Adams is an accomplice; that he is a man, upon his own confession, as guilty as those against whom he appears to give evidence; and so undoubtedly he must be taken to be. But it is not to be expected in cases of this sort that an accomplice can ever be an innocent person: the very nature of his situation imports, that he himself is connected in guilt with those whom he stands forward to accuse; and if the doctrines which we have heard this day could be adopted, it would never be possible to call an accomplice, because his testimony would be got rid of by the single observation that he was an accomplice, that is, a guilty man himself. At the same time you have been truly told, that though in point of law an accomplice is a witness competent to be received, and therefore one who in point of law it is competent to a jury to believe, yet in the practical application of the rule, juries ought not to convict upon the testimony of an accomplice, unless his testimony receives proper and reasonable confirmation. Upon this part of the case, I have heard the law not intentionally but grossly mis-stated; the rule is, that an accomplice must be confirmed—confirmed in some particulars, but not confirmed in all; for you have been truly told, that if this last were the rule, it would be unnecessary to call an accomplice; because if the other persons could confirm him in all, by proving the same facts themselves, their evidence would supersede the necessity of his evidence, and therefore it is not necessary to confirm an accomplice in all particulars, the rule being, that it is necessary only to confirm him to such an extent as that upon the facts stated by other witnesses, the jury may see that he is worthy of belief. Now is this, or is it not, the case of Adams?

Gentlemen, to take first the testimony of the three witnesses, to whom I have referred—the maid servant who let the lodgings—Mrs. Rogers, to whom the house belonged—and Hale, who was the apprentice of Brunt. What is proved by all these three witnesses? You will judge, whether it be or be not the strongest possible confirmation of the evidence of an accomplice, which perhaps it is capable of receiving. Adams had told you that a back room was taken in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane; that it was taken by Brunt for Ings, who was described to be a butcher out of employ; and it is distinctly proved—confirming in that particular every part of Adams's testimony—that the room was taken for Ings, that the meetings were held in this room, that he continued there up to the night of the meeting in Cat-street, that he never returned there after that night, and that Brunt, another of the party, went out at the same time, returned the same evening, and conducted himself in the manner you have heard. All these essential and leading features of Adams's evidence, are confirmed by the testimony of these accredited witnesses. And not only this, but on that very evening you find that Brunt came home, and told his wife that it was all up; that the police officers had found their way into the loft; that he himself had escaped only with his life; and then, shortly after, came in another man, who also had been present, and who stated, he had received a blow. The apprentice, Hale, upon whose character no imputation is attempted to be cast, proves the poles, the bags, pikes, and pistols—all these deadly preparations going on from time to time in the apartment of Ings, in the house from which Ings and Brunt sallied forth on the night in question. Ings never did return to it; and Brunt returned and behaved himself in this way. The next morning the officers found Brunt packing into two baskets, to be conveyed away, all the different arms and ammunition, which have been produced before you; therefore, if the case rested upon the testimony of Adams only, is this such confirmation of the truth of the story told to you by him, as to make him a witness worthy of your belief? So I state the question, leaving it to you to answer it to yourselves.

Independent of this, there is the testimony of Monument, with regard to whom, if it rested merely on his testimony, it might be said, that one accomplice cannot be confirmed by another; but unfortunately it does not, for his brother, who is not implicated, proves Thistlewood and Brunt coming to the house. He confirms every part of the testimony of Adams as to this part of the case; and in addition to this, you have the evidence of another witness, and that a person who stands in a very different situation—the evidence of Hiden. He, up to a certain time, had engaged in the transaction in question; but such was his remorse of conscience, so completely did he sicken in mind as this night approached, that you find that before the parties assembled in Cat-street, he did that which he could not have done unless, as I stated before, he had possessed the spirit of prophecy;—he actually, in order to prevent the mischief intended, went to lord Castlereagh's, and afterwards to lord Harrowby's, and delivered the letter, a forewarning to prevent what would otherwise have taken place. Whether he be, therefore, an accomplice up to a certain stage, or not, it is immaterial to examine; he was not an accomplice at the time he did that, which tended to defeat the plan proposed.

Nor does it rest on the testimony of Adams so confirmed, or Monument so confirmed, or the fact of the delivery of the letter, but you will judge whether this story is not also confirmed by all that took place on the night in question in Cat-street. There you find, assembled in the stable and in a room spread over with arms—a hay-loft I might almost say converted into an arsenal—a number, and of the number was Ings the prisoner, of persons drawn up, as it were in military array, on the point of sallying forth, he was seized—he escaped; he was pursued—he turned round and fired a pistol; and on being asked by one of the officers, what he meant by shooting at him an innocent man, he said, to kill you, and I wish I had done it—I am sorry to add, but it is my painful duty to draw your attention to the evidence, that a sword was taken from a man not known at the moment by the person who took it to be Ings, but proved to be him by two other witnesses; and when he was seized, there was found on his person a sheath or case fitted to the knife of which you have heard, and under his coat and over his shoulders were found those two bags of which Adams had spoken; the bags in which the avowed intention was to carry away the heads of some of the murdered party.

Now this is truly, in all its circumstances, a case of a most extraordinary nature. It is admitted, that all these persons were met (not it is argued for a treasonable purpose) but with an intention to proceed to a cabinet dinner, to assassinate all the ministers assembled there; to what motive can this be referred? Was it private malice? Was it personal revenge merely? The lots of the prisoners at the bar were cast too widely asunder from those of the objects of their vengeance, to permit us to account for their plan on any grounds of private or personal difference. Is it possible to suppose, that the object was to commit a murder merely, and stop there? Of this you will judge, looking to the nature of the preparations made; not merely daggers concealed, but long staves for pikes; not merely cartridges for pistols; but cartridges of a size to charge artillery; grenades sufficiently strong in their construction, to be equal to the power of a nine-inch shell—the number of arms—the quantity of ammunition—the military dépôt—the fire balls, and the surveys made.—Connecting this with what relates to the Mansion-house and the Bank—the provisional government—and the expectation that the people would rise and join—it is for you, gentlemen, to judge, whether this was merely to lead to and end in the assassination of the king's ministers; or, whether there was not an ulterior purpose of insurrection and revolution, to which the assassination was but preparatory and subervient.

But it has been said, is it probable that persons comparatively so few in number should suppose themselves able to accomplish such a mighty purpose as to bring about a revolution in the government of the country? I cannot tell what in their estimation might be probable; but this is a most uncertain test by which to judge; for if I had been told there could be found five-and-twenty men on the face of the earth, and still more (and I grieve to say) five-and-twenty men of the country to which we have the happiness to belong, who could have combined to commit such a dreadful deed of barbarity and blood, I should have said, till they had been detected in the way in which these persons have been detected, it is utterly impossible! It never did happen—it never can! I cannot believe on any testimony that it is intended. But how fallacious would have been such reasoning is proved too clearly by the fact! And the fact established, the next step I fear is of no difficulty whatever. For that public revolution could only have been intended by such means, is as difficult to disbelieve as it was difficult to believe in the means till established. Besides, upon the evidence, it will be for you to say, whether extensive co-operation was not the support and consequence to what they looked, as proved expressly not only by the measures but by the different declarations given in evidence.

The prisoner has called witnesses to impeach the testimony of Adams, of whose evidence you will judge. You have heard his defence, which I need not repeat to you, and in which he has desired you, before you dispose of his case, fully to examine all the circumstances, and well to weigh the verdict you may pronounce. In that prayer I most readily join. Weigh well the evidence! Deliberate thoroughly on the result! And if in conclusion you can have any doubt of the facts which constitute the overt acts charged, or the purpose alleged as connected with them; if you think that, however horrible, this was an intended assassination, and nothing more; that the conspirators were to go into the house, commit the murder, and then separate, and that with that separation all operations were to cease—if this should be your opinion—in the honest exercise of your judgment apply it to the case, and acquit the prisoner. But, on the other hand, if it be impossible fairly to form such a judgment, then you will perform that duty which in the name of that Being referred to more than once in the course of these proceedings, you have been sworn well and truly to discharge, and pronounce the prisoner guilty because you believe him to be so. Finally, if you have any doubt, give him the benefit of it, and nobody will rejoice more than I shall, if you can, with satisfaction to your consciences, pronounce him not guilty.

The Jury withdrew at twenty-five minutes past eight, and returned in twenty-five minutes, finding the prisoner GUILTY on the first and third counts.

704. The whole Proceedings on the Trial of JOHN THOMAS BRUNT, for High Treason, before the Court holden under a Special Commission, for the Trial of certain Offences therein mentioned, on the 24th and 25th days of April: 1 Geo. IV. A. D. 1820.*

SESSIONS HOUSE, OLD BAILEY,

MONDAY, APRIL 24th, 1820.

Present

The Right Hon. Lord Chief Baron [Richards.]
The Hon. Mr. Baron Garrow.
The Hon. Mr. Justice Richardson.
The Common Sergeant,
And others his Majesty's Justices, &c.

[The Prisoner was set to the Bar.]

The Jury Panel was called over, commencing with No. 219.

Richard Emery, cooper, challenged by the Crown.

Stephen Gaurd, bricklayer, challenged by the Crown.

John Apple, drug-grinder, excused on account of illness.

Thomas Brayne, mason, challenged by the prisoner.

William Butler Baker, challenged by the Crown.

William Benn, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

John Roper, gentleman, fined for non-attendance.

William Norton, sawyer, challenged by the prisoner.

William Blason, gentleman, challenged by the Crown.

Alexander Barclay, gentleman, and grocer.

Mr. Barclay.—My lord, I feel so completely influenced by the facts that came before me on the former trial,† that I really do not feel myself a competent judge.

Lord Chief Baron.—It is no objection unless the parties object.

Mr. Curwood.—We prefer him, my lord, because he will be able to see the difference.

Mr. Barclay.—I trust I may be exempt under these circumstances.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—It is no objection in point of law.

* See the preceding and following Cases.

† He was one of the Jury on the trial of Arthur Thistlewood.

Mr. Barclay was sworn.

Edward Hughes, gentleman, excused on account of illness.

Edward Grant, cow-keeper, excused on account of illness.

Thomas Lester, bookseller, challenged by the Crown.

Joseph Sheffield, esq. and ironmonger, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Goodchild, esq. sworn.

Joseph Haynes, bricklayer, challenged by the Crown.

Robert Stephenson, anchormith, challenged by the Crown.

Mr. Stephenson.—I am sorry to be under the necessity of appealing to your lordship, but I should think, having been challenged twice* I may claim a right to withdraw altogether.

Lord Chief Baron.—Certainly not.

Mr. Stephenson.—I have always applied myself strictly to do my duty, as I have been taught from my infancy, but I conceive I am trifled with.

Mr. Solicitor-General.—It is no reproach to any gentleman that he is challenged, either on the one side or the other, and ought not to be so considered.

Lord Chief Baron.—No, certainly not.

Richard Blunt, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

Isaac Gunn, baker, challenged by the Crown.

William Churchill, gentleman, and wine-merchant, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Suffield Aldersey, esquire, sworn.

Thomas Wilkinson, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Fish, tobacconist, challenged by the prisoner.

Edmund Collingridge, water-gilder, challenged by the Crown.

William Shore, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

James Herbert, carpenter, sworn.

John Slater, gentleman, sworn.

Josiah Bartholomew, watchmaker, challenged by the prisoner.

* Now, and in the case of Arthur Thistlewood.

John Jones, carpenter, challenged by the Crown.
Henry Ramsey, boat-builder, excused on account of illness.

Thomas Bristow, coachmaker, challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Granger, lighterman, challenged by the prisoner.

George Dickenson, builder, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Parkinson, upholsterer, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Ashton, esq. and ship-chandler, challenged by the prisoner.

James Wilmot, market-gardener, sworn.

George Phillips, jeweller, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Bird, distiller, challenged by the prisoner.

William Johnson, baker, challenged by the Crown.

John Edward Shephard, gentleman, sworn.

Samuel Gould, calico-printer, challenged by the Crown.

James Wadmore, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Brown, oilman, challenged by the prisoner.

George Allen, brass-founder, challenged by the prisoner.

William Reed, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

George Davis, cooper, challenged by the prisoner.

John Farnell, brewer, challenged by the prisoner.

John Westbrook, brick-maker, fined for non-attendance, but the fine afterwards remitted on proof of illness.

Jonathan Passingham, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

Joseph Drake, draper, challenged by the prisoner.

Joseph Clements, market-gardener, excused on account of illness.

John Fowler, iron-plate worker, sworn.

Samuel Rhodes, esq. and cow-keeper, challenged by the prisoner.

William Gibbs Roberts, cooper, sworn.

Richard Smith, esq. challenged by the Crown.

Joseph Pendered, iron-plate worker, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Garrett, shipwright, challenged by the Crown.

Matthew Ashton, coach-master, challenged by the prisoner.

Richard Hatchett, esq. and farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

John Dickenson, builder, sworn.

William Bushby, esq. fined for non-attendance.

Thomas Austin, esq. excused on account of illness.

John Dolan, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Dicks, silversmith, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Wood, painter, challenged by the prisoner.

James Gates, joiner, challenged by the Crown.

Robert Wells, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

Edward Bracebridge, watchmaker, challenged by the Crown.

John Jones, stock-broker, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Partridge, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

George Henn, ship-chandler, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Hardy, esq. and rope-maker, challenged by the prisoner.

William Jarrett, watch-engraver, challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Wimbush, horse-dealer, fined for non-attendance.

John Bunting, gentleman and tailor, challenged by the Crown.

William Davies, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

William Cooper, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

Robert Greaves, gentleman, excused on account of illness.

Christopher Dawson, ship-builder, challenged by the Crown.

William James Farmer, baker, challenged by the prisoner.

David Newman, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

George Thorpe, clock-case maker, challenged by the Crown.

Henry Seaborn, cooper, excused on account of illness.

Francis Sheborn, esq. and farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

Edward Simpson, shipwright, challenged by the prisoner.

William Davies, shopkeeper, challenged by the Crown.

Richard Franks, esq. and silk-mercant, challenged by the Crown.

John Smith, undertaker, sworn.

Thomas Langley, ship-chandler, challenged by the Crown.

George Priest, esq. challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Wilson, gentleman and merchant,

Mr. Curwood.—I have no cause to show, my challenges are exhausted.

Mr. Attorney General.—The prisoner shall not suffer inconvenience from that circumstance.

Challenged by the Crown.

Michael Atkins, esq., challenged by the Crown.

Alfred Batson, esq. and porter-dealer, challenged by the Crown.

George Taylor, bricklayer, challenged by the Crown.

John Woodward, gentleman, sworn.

THE JURY.

Alexander Barclay,

John Shephard,

Thomas Goodchild,

John Fowler,

Thos. Suffield Aldersey,

Wm. Gibbs Roberts,

James Herbert,

John Dickenson,

John Shuter,

John Smith,

James Wilmot,

John Woodward.

The Jury were charged with the prisoner in the usual form.

Mr. Attorney General.—Before Mr. Bolland opens the case, I think it my duty to bring before your lordships a circumstance which has occurred since you last sat in this place. The Court, from an anxious desire that nothing should occur during the course of these trials, which could by any means operate to the prejudice of the prisoners, at the commencement of the proceedings directed that no publication of the proceedings on the first or any other trial, should take place until the whole of them were brought to a conclusion. With that injunction, I believe I may state, that the daily papers have most properly complied; but it appears by the paper which has been put into my hands, that a publication was made yesterday in the Observer newspaper of the whole of the trial of Arthur Thistlewood, and not a very short account was given also of the trial of James Ings, and my lords, this publication has been issued with a full knowledge on the part of the publisher, of the prohibition which the Court had pronounced, for I find that prohibition published in this very paper which contains the account of the trials I have mentioned.

It is not my intention at this moment to interrupt the proceedings which are about to take place, by calling upon your lordships to take any specific step upon this most daring and flagrant contempt of the authority of the Court; but I think I owe it to the dignity of the Court, and to the situation which I hold, to state thus publicly, that this conduct cannot pass unnoticed; and that undoubtedly some proceedings will be taken, when the means are furnished to bring the matter in a proper shape before your lordships.*

Prisoner.—Would your lordship have the goodness to give me the indulgence of a seat, at intervals, when I am tired.

Lord Chief Baron.—Certainly.

THE Indictment was opened by Mr. Bolland.

Mr. Attorney General.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—You have heard, from the opening of the indictment by my learned friend, the nature of the charge which is preferred against the prisoner at the bar; and as the circumstances of this case, about to be laid before you in evidence, have already come to the knowledge of some of you from the duty you have lately performed, and may probably have reached the minds of the rest; let me, in the outset, beseech you to dismiss, as far as you can, all recollection of what you have heard or read upon the subject of this proceeding, and to confine your attention exclusively to the facts which will be adduced in evidence upon the present occasion. I am convinced that every one of you has anticipated me in this request, and that therefore it is unnecessary, but in justice to the prisoner at the bar you will forgive me for having made it; and I am satisfied, that through the whole course of this trial, your minds will not be influenced by any thing but the evidence in the case, and that, upon that evidence alone your conclusion will be formed.

The charge against the prisoner at the bar is that of high treason; and without troubling you with stating the different counts of this indictment, I shall content myself by observing to you, that it is necessary by the law, that the acts intended to be given in evidence against the accused, shall be stated in the indictment. Those acts consist in consultations and deliberations by the prisoner at the bar, and others, to overturn the constitution of the country, to excite insurrection against the established government—in having actually prepared means for that purpose—and in having formed and acted upon an intention to assassinate all his majesty's ministers. Those statements are introduced into the indictment as indicating and evidencing the intention harboured in the mind of the prisoner at the bar and his associates, to depose the king from his royal authority, or to levy war against him, in order by force to compel him to change his measures and counsels; and I believe I may state with perfect confidence, that if these overt acts, as they are called, shall be proved to your satisfaction, they will establish the charge of high treason against the prisoner at the bar. I consider it, therefore, sufficient at present to request your attention to the nature of the evidence which will be laid before you, without troubling you further upon the law of the case.

The prisoner, John Thomas Brunt, was a shoemaker, residing in Fox-court near Gray's-inn-lane, and it will be proved by the witnesses, that early in the present year, plans (which probably had for a period long before existed in the mind of the prisoner at the bar, and the other persons who were associated with him), were more matured and brought nearer to the point of execution. One of his associates was a man who must frequently be mentioned in the course of this investigation, of the name of Thistlewood, a name probably not unknown to any of you, and it is a duty I owe to the prisoner to request that you will lay out of your consideration any thing which has occurred with respect to Thistlewood, and confine yourselves strictly to the proofs which will be laid before you in support of the particular charge you are now impanelled to try. Another person, included in the present indictment, James Ings, by trade a butcher, will also appear to you to have been an intimate of the prisoner Brunt. At the commencement of the present year, meetings were called by these three individuals, Thistlewood, Ings, and the prisoner, at which several other persons, who will be introduced to your notice in the course of this trial, were assembled. They were held at the White Hart in Brook's-market, not in the public house itself, but in a room in the yard belonging to it. It being thought however, for some reason or other, that this was not a secure place for their meetings, another room was obtained, in the house in Fox-court, in which the prisoner at the bar lived; and it will appear, that though hired for the ostensible purpose of being occupied by Ings as a lodging, it never was applied to that purpose, but was used exclusively for the meetings which the conspirators daily held, in order to consult upon their plans, and to prepare the means for carrying them into execution. This room was on the same floor with the apartments of the prisoner Brunt; his were in the front, that hired for Ings was at the back of the house; the key of it was kept at Brunt's, and access to it obtained by applying to him or some member of his family.

* See the commencement of the trial of Arthur Thistlewood, April 17th, supra; and the proceedings at the close of the present trial, infra.

It will be in your recollection that at the close of the month of January, his late majesty died. It had been part of their plan to commence operations by the destruction of his majesty's ministers, and it was thought that no opportunity would be so convenient as that which the assembling of those distinguished persons at a cabinet dinner would afford. In consequence of his majesty's death, those dinners were suspended, and therefore no such opportunity was at that time likely to occur, at least the prisoner and his associates so believed; it was therefore proposed at one of their deliberations, that although the whole of their scheme could not be accomplished, some individuals of his majesty's ministry should be cut off either at their own houses, or at other places; and it was thought that the night of the king's funeral might be a convenient time for the commencement of their plan. It was observed by one of them, that the soldiers, or the greater part of them, would then be withdrawn from London to attend his majesty's funeral at Windsor, and that many of the police officers would be necessarily absent upon the same duty; and from these considerations it was proposed to the meeting, that that night should be fixed as the period for beginning the projected operations. This proposal, however, either was not adopted, or, if then agreed to, was not afterwards acted upon, and their operations were postponed beyond the evening of his majesty's funeral. At length the conspirators, heated and inflamed with the object which they had in view, became impatient; and you will find that on the 19th of February (a day to which your attention will be particularly directed), at a meeting at Brunt's room, at which Thistlewood, Ings, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, and others were assembled, their impatience was exhibited. Many of them said, that they were resolved that a blow should be struck without delay, and that if no convenient opportunity occurred in the mean time, at which the whole of his majesty's ministers might at one blow be cut off, they were determined that something at all events should be attempted on the evening of the following Wednesday. Thistlewood, acquiescing in this opinion, proposed, that upon the ensuing morning they should assemble again, and that a committee should then be appointed for the purpose of digesting the operations of Wednesday; and it will appear to you, that on Sunday the 20th of February, the party met more numerously than had been usual; twenty persons or more were, I believe, collected.

The plan of these conspirators embraced other objects besides the destruction of his majesty's ministers; different parties were to be posted in various parts of this metropolis; some were to set fire to buildings, which were to be pointed out; others were to seize the cannon deposited in Gray's-inn-lane at the Light-horse Volunteer stables, and in the Artillery-ground near Finsbury-square. It was intended, that after the taking of those cannon and the firing of different places in the metropolis, they should meet at the Mansion-house; which was to be the seat of what they termed the provisional government. This being settled and arranged on the Sunday, you will find that their activity increased to complete the preparations they had begun. Ammunition was procured in very large quantities; hand-grenades, which will be exhibited to you, were prepared; fire-balls, to which they gave the appellation of illumination balls, were made, to be lighted and thrown into the houses which were to be set on fire; cartridges for the cannon were obtained in considerable quantities; arms of every description—guns, blunderbusses, pistols, and swords—were collected. Other instruments which were found will be exhibited to you; they are pikes made of staves of ash and beech, into one end of each of which were to be screwed bayonets or sharpened files; thus connected together, the bayonet and the staff formed a very formidable weapon, of the length of eight or nine feet.

In order to their security, fearing that their motions at Brunt's room might be observed, they had appointed another place as a depository for the arms and ammunition which they had procured, and you will find that place was at the house of Tidd, who is another of the persons charged in this indictment, who lived in Hole-in-the-wall-passage, in Brook's-market. They met again on the following day, Monday, the 21st, when their plans were again considered, and they were still equally eager to complete them on the Wednesday; and you will find their deliberations turned again entirely on the mode in which their scheme was to be carried into effect.

On Tuesday the 22nd another meeting was held. At that meeting a man of the name of Adams, who will be called before you as a witness, communicated to them something which had occurred with respect to himself, and which excited a suspicion in his mind that their intentions were not altogether unknown to the government, and that their motions were watched. The very suspicion of this excited great agitation in the minds of those who were present; they were so convinced of the fidelity of each other, so confident in the means which they had prepared, that they could not brook the notion that there was any possibility of failure. Such, at least, was the general impression upon the minds of the persons assembled there; but you will find that one of them, called Palin, who was to head a detachment for setting fire to the town, thought that the suggestion made by Adams ought not to be treated with inattention. Brunt proposed, in order to ascertain whether their scheme had been detected or not, that a watch should be set that night. Gentlemen, I ought previously to have stated to you, that upon the morning when this which I am relating to you, took place, it had been ascertained by the meeting, from a newspaper, that upon the following day a cabinet dinner was to be given by lord Harrowby; an event long anxiously wished for; an opportunity long desired by the prisoners, as by finding all his majesty's ministers assembled at one place, they hoped the more easily and the more effectually to perform their diabolical work of assassination. Brunt proposed that a watch should be set, and the spot fixed upon was lord Harrowby's house. Brunt said, "If our plan has been detected; if there be any ground for this suspicion which Adams entertains, no doubt there will be some preparation made at lord Harrowby's house, to meet the intended attack; and if, therefore, upon watching his house to-night and to-morrow morning, it shall appear that no soldiers are introduced into that house or any of the adjacent houses, that no preparations are made for the expected attempt, we may be quite satisfied that our plans remain undivulged, and that we are in perfect security." I will not repeat to you the expressions which were used at that meeting; the exultation which was displayed at finding that at last this opportunity they had been so long expecting would occur, and that at last the day had arrived, on which they would be able to perpetrate their nefarious crimes. It will be sufficient for you to hear them once, from the witnesses who will be called before you.

On that evening, in pursuance of the suggestion of Brunt, a watch was set in Grosvenor-square at six o'clock. Two persons, one of whom was Davidson, were to take the duty from six till nine, when they were to be relieved by two others, who were to remain till twelve; it was thought that from that time till four in the morning no observation would be necessary, but that at the last mentioned hour the watch should be resumed. Davidson and his associate went into Grosvenor-square, and continued there from six till nine. At that hour they were relieved by Brunt and the witness Adams, and a remarkable circumstance occurred upon that evening, which puts it out of all doubt that the prisoner Brunt was there. It will be proved to you, by witnesses, not only that he was seen in Grosvenor-square, but that he was engaged in playing at dominoes in a public-house at the corner of Charles-street, which is close to the square, with a young man of the name of Gillan.

Upon the following morning, the 23rd, the day on which the plans of the conspirators were to be carried into effect, you will find that they met at Brunt's house; and that in the afternoon, between two and three o'clock, many of the persons again assembled there for the purpose of proceeding to another place, to which I shall now call your attention. It was thought, by these persons, that, in order to carry into effect the plan of assassinating his majesty's ministers at lord Harrowby's house, those who were destined for accomplishing that part of the plot should be brought together at some spot not very remote from Grosvenor-square; and it will be proved to you that on the Tuesday it was resolved that they should meet near Tyburn turnpike; and that those who were not intrusted with the whole of their schemes should have a word given them, by which they might be able to ascertain, at their arrival there, who were the persons with whom they were to act. It however so happened, that before the Wednesday, the prisoner Harrison procured a stable in an obscure street, called Cato-street, leading into John-street, in the Edgware-road, which was considered by them a very convenient place for assembling and making their preparations for the attack at lord Harrowby's house. The access to Cato-street, at each end, is under an archway; so that it has the appearance rather of a mews than of a street; at one end it is accessible only by foot passengers, at the other end there is an entrance for carriages. This stable was prepared for their meeting on that evening; Harrison and others were seen carrying things into it in the course of the afternoon of the 23rd, and some cloth or sacking was nailed up against the windows of the building on the side looking into Cato-street, for the obvious purpose of preventing the persons opposite from observing what was passing within.

On the afternoon of that day, Thistlewood, Ings, Bradburn, Hall, and others of the party met at Brunt's room, and you will find that they were seen putting flints into their pistols, accoutring themselves, and arming themselves with blunderbusses, pistols and swords, with which they were to proceed to Cato-street, and afterwards to lord Harrowby's.

It was thought by Thistlewood that it would be proper to prepare some sort of address to the people, which should be exhibited that night in different parts of the town, for the purpose of exciting disaffection, and of inducing persons to join their party; and he sat down, and wrote a proclamation, in the preparation of which, circumstances occurred most material for your consideration. It will appear to you, that there being in the room no paper upon which Thistlewood could write the proclamation, and it having been suggested that cartridge paper would best answer the purpose, Brunt, the prisoner at the bar, sent his apprentice, Hale, to purchase some. Hale went out, and bought six sheets, which were afterwards carried into the room. Upon that paper Thistlewood wrote the proclamation, which it was intended should be stuck up near the places to which they intended to set fire on that night, so that by the light it might be made visible to the persons collected in the street. The address was to this effect: "Your tyrants are destroyed; the friends of liberty are called on to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting. J. Ings, secretary. February 23rd, 1820." Three of these proclamations were prepared by Thistlewood, for the purpose of being used in the manner I have stated to you.

After this was done, and after they had provided themselves with arms, they proceeded to the stable in Cato-street.

It is proper that I should in this part of the narrative inform you, that upon the preceding day, intimation was given to lord Harrowby, of the plan which these persons had in contemplation, by a man of the name of Hiden, a cow-keeper, living in Manchester-mews, Manchester-street, and who was known to one of the conspirators, the prisoner Wilson. As the night of the execution of their plan approached, they became more and more anxious to procure all the assistance they could; they endeavoured to enlist associates from amongst those with whom they were acquainted, and to whom therefore they had the less difficulty in divulging generally the schemes they had in agitation. Hiden was, as I have observed, known to Wilson, and it will appear to you, that two or three days before the Wednesday, Wilson had imparted to him the outline of the conspiracy, the taking the cannon and the assassination of his majesty's ministers, hoping and expecting that Hiden would join them. Hiden, when he came to reflect on the communication made to him, immediately felt the necessity of making the matter known to those more particularly interested in the event, and he wrote a letter to lord Castlereagh, and communicated to him the intended proceedings, which had been imparted to him by Wilson. He was unable to see lord Castlereagh personally, and he was fearful of being observed to go into lord Castlereagh's house lest it should be known to these persons that he was making a communication; he therefore took an opportunity of watching lord Harrowby, when riding in the park on Tuesday, and he delivered to him a letter addressed to lord Castlereagh, requesting his immediate attention to it, stating that it was of the utmost importance; by these and other means the plot became known to lord Harrowby, and to the government of the country. On the following day, Hiden saw Wilson again in the street, and Wilson then told him that they had fixed to meet that evening in Cato-street; he solicited Hiden to join them, detailed to him more fully the objects they had in view, and requested he would not fail to attend between six and seven o'clock.

In consequence of their plan being thus known to my lord Harrowby and the government, means were taken to prevent its execution, by the apprehension of these persons in Cato-street, on the evening of the 23rd. Between seven and eight o'clock there were assembled in Cato-street, Brunt the prisoner at the bar, Thistlewood, Ings, Harrison, Davidson, and others to the number of about four or five and twenty. I should here state to you, that the prisoner (who like the rest of his associates was anxious to increase their numbers, and to procure the assistance of as many persons as possible) had, on the preceding day, the Tuesday, applied to a man of the name of Monument, a shoemaker, to whom he had been introduced two or three weeks before, by Thistlewood; he told him he should want his aid on the following day, he imparted to him the watch-word by which they were to make themselves known to each other at Tyburn turnpike, the place of meeting at Cato-street not having at that time been fixed upon. On the 23rd after they had procured this stable, Brunt again saw Monument, and told him that he was to accompany Tidd; that he was to go to Tidd's house, in Hole-in-the-wall passage, who would take him to the place of rendezvous on that evening. You will have it proved to you, that Monument did accordingly call at Tidd's, and that he walked with Tidd to Cato-street, and that he found Brunt there on his arrival.

At Cato-street, the execution of their plans was brought under consideration. They had there collected a quantity of arms and a number of those destructive instruments, grenades, the use of which I will now state to you. It was intended that Thistlewood should knock at lord Harrowby's door, under pretence of having a note to convey to his lordship, and access into the hall being thus obtained, others of the party were to follow him, secure the servants, enter into the room in which the cabinet ministers were sitting, and there execute the murderous plan which they intended to effect. For that purpose they had prepared these grenades, which are balls of considerable size, in the centre of which is a quantity of gunpowder, about three ounces, inclosed in a tin-case; round the case are placed pieces of iron; some of those grenades which have been opened contained long nails, of that description which is used to fix the tires of cart-wheels to the wood work to which they are attached. About eight or ten of these nails are fastened as tightly as they can be round the tin-case holding the gunpowder, with tow dipped in a composition of pitch tar and resin. From the gunpowder a fuse communicated with the surface of the ball, which, being lighted, would produce an almost instantaneous explosion, the pieces of iron would be dispersed around in all directions, and the consequences would be, that any person who should unhappily be struck by them would be deprived of existence, or be left wounded, maimed, and lacerated. Between seven and eight o'clock they began to prepare themselves for the execution of their designs; and doubts being entertained by some of the party, whether their number was quite adequate to all the objects they had in view, Thistlewood, in order to allay their apprehensions, stated that they had men enough there for the accomplishment of the assassination in Grosvenor-square, and that there were other parties in different parts of the town for the accomplishment of the duties assigned to them. This statement of Thistlewood was founded in fact, for it will appear that after the party had taken their departure from Brunt's house, other persons were expected to call there; amongst them was a man named Potter, one who was deep in their schemes, and was the intended leader of a band upon that night. From Brunt's, these persons were to be directed to proceed to the White Hart, from whence they were to move in divisions to the execution of the various tasks they had to perform. Palin was to be at the head of the fire party, and Cook was to command the detachment that was to take the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane and the Artillery-ground.

After this had been stated by Thistlewood, he proposed that a selection should be made of fourteen to enter the room at lord Harrowby's, to destroy his majesty's ministers. Among those who were to go into that room, were Harrison, who had been formerly in the Life-guards; Adams, who had some years ago served in the Oxford-blues; Ings, the butcher, who had prepared himself for the bloody scene in which he was to be an actor, in a most remarkable way, the prisoner Brunt, and Thistlewood. At the moment when they were separating themselves, the officers entered the stable below, and discovered Davidson, one of the persons included in this indictment, a man of colour; he was armed with two pistols in a belt, a blunderbuss in his hand, and a cutlass at his side, and was standing as sentry, at the foot of the step ladder which led from the stable to the loft above; Ings was also stationed in the stable; he had a black belt round his body, in which were inserted a brace of pistols, and also a remarkable instrument, which will be exhibited to you, a large butcher's knife; he had stated upon the preceding day, and also upon the evening of their meeting in Cato-street, that with that knife he himself intended to enter the room in which the ministers were sitting, and that he had provided himself with it for the purpose of mutilating the bodies of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth; he had also furnished himself with two bags or haversacks, which he had fastened over each shoulder; in these he intended to carry off the heads of those two distinguished persons, in order that they might be exhibited on pikes in the street, to infuriate the people and to excite them to insurrection. The leading officer directed his followers to lay hold of those two persons, in order to secure them; but the officers being anxious to get into the loft, Davidson and Ings were not taken into custody at the moment, although the knife was taken from Ings. The first of the police who went up was Ruthven; and it will appear, that while he was ascending the ladder, either Ings or Davidson gave an alarm from below to their associates above. On Ruthven's gaining the loft, the first object that struck his notice was Thistlewood, whose person was well known to him, Ruthven having been acquainted with it for some years. Thistlewood, on seeing Ruthven, seized a sword which was on a carpenter's bench before him, and on which other arms were ranged, and retired into a small room adjoining, fencing with his sword, in order to keep off Ruthven and his supporters, who were advancing, and who announced to the persons assembled that they were officers of justice, and that they were come to apprehend them. Ellis was immediately behind Ruthven, and he was followed by an unfortunate man named Smithers.—Smithers, observing Thistlewood in this attitude in the small room, passed his companions, and advanced to apprehend him. On his approaching, Thistlewood came forward and thrust the sword into his heart; the lights were extinguished; a cry was raised of "Kill the thieves, throw them down stairs!" a rush was made to the ladder; the officers were precipitated into the stable; Thistlewood followed close behind them, discharged a pistol, as he descended, at another of the officers, then made his way through the stable and escaped. Several of the persons succeeded in eluding the vigilance of the officers on that night, others of them were apprehended; amongst them Davidson, after a very desperate resistance on his part; and I only call your attention to him now, in order to state his conduct and expressions when he was taken into custody—conduct and expressions evincing most clearly, if there could be the least doubt upon the mind of any man, what was the object of this conspiracy. On his being apprehended, he immediately exclaimed, "who would not die in liberty's cause?" that "he cared not for his life, that the cause in which they were embarked was that of freedom, and who would not perish in that cause?" These expressions must convince you that the object was to overturn the government, and that the assassination of his majesty's ministers was only the first step to the accomplishment of that object.

The prisoner Brunt made his escape; he returned home about nine o'clock, or a little after, and Hale, his apprentice, happened to be in the house on his arrival; he came back with his coat and boots extremely dirty; he told his wife (and this is a part of the case which it is most material for you to attend to) that it was all over, that they had been attacked by the officers, and he had escaped only with his life. Presently after another man came in, who, it should seem, had been one of the party in Cato-street, and had effected his escape, but had received in the contest some considerable blows and wounds; he stated, that he had been knocked down and hurt; they both appeared to be glad to find themselves again in the society of each other; and the prisoner Brunt stated, that though they had been thus dispersed in Cato-street, "all was not yet over," alluding, undoubtedly, to the different bodies collected in other parts of the town. And he said to the other man, "come along;" and they went then out together; he was absent from that time till near eleven o'clock, when he returned again to his house. Before he retired to rest, he directed Hale to get up on the following morning to clean his boots; and he himself at an early hour awakened him, and then asked him, whether he knew a place called Snow's-fields, in the Borough. The lad replied, "he did not:" the prisoner told him where it was; and then went into the back room (that room which had been hired under the false pretence of being a lodging for Ings, but in which, as I have stated, the meetings of the conspirators were held, and their preparations were made) and from the cupboard in that room, he took out several hand-grenades and some fire-balls; these he packed up in two baskets, covering one of the baskets with an apron belonging to his wife, and which had been used as a window curtain to that room, telling the apprentice, he was to take them and their contents, to a man of the name of Potter, in Snow's-fields. He had just finished, when Taunton, the officer, arrived at the house to apprehend him. Taunton found the prisoner in his own room, and you will hear the conversation he had with him. Brunt affected not to know who it was that had taken the back room; said, that he had nothing whatever to do with it; pretended to be wholly ignorant of the two baskets which he had just been preparing, and denied any knowledge whatever of any thing in that room. An iron pot was standing there belonging to the prisoner, in which they had prepared their pitch and resin, and other combustibles; of this also he said he knew nothing, and persisted in his denial of being acquainted with the contents of the baskets, although he had immediately before been engaged in the act of packing them, for the purpose of being sent off. Upon this he was apprehended, and he now stands here for trial before you.

Thistlewood also made his escape on the night of the 23rd; he did not return to his own home, but fled for concealment to the house of one Harris, in a street near Moor-fields; and on the morning of the 24th, at about ten o'clock, was apprehended there in bed, with some of his clothes on.

I believe I have now detailed, as briefly and as clearly as I have been able, the main facts which will be adduced in evidence against the prisoner at the bar. I can anticipate, perhaps, some of the observations which will be made to you on his behalf by his counsel, when the period arrives at which they will have to address themselves to this case. I anticipate that it will be argued before you, that the plan which this person had conceived was wild and visionary, was impracticable, and that therefore you are to pay no attention whatever to the evidence which shall be given to you to prove its existence. Let me caution you as to the application of that observation to the present case: whether the plan was practicable or not; whether they had over-rated their force and their means of accomplishing it or not, is not a matter for your inquiry. The only question is, does the evidence which will be adduced to you, satisfy you, that the scheme I have detailed was harboured in the mind of the prisoner at the bar; if it were, and he acted in furtherance and execution of it in the manner I have stated, however wild, however visionary, however impracticable it may have been, the guilt which is imputed by the present indictment will be established and fixed upon him.

But even in our own experience, other plans of a similar nature, equally wild, have been conceived and formed; without adverting to any particular case, you will recollect, that, in estimating the practicability of this plan, you are not to reason upon it in the manner in which you or myself would judge of it coolly in our closets, but you are to remember that these men had long entertained this project; that they had brooded over it till they overlooked all the difficulties which intervened between its conception and its execution; that they imagined a blow once struck by them, would excite the disaffection which they vainly imagined prevailed in this large metropolis among a great number of its inhabitants; that they should be joined by an overwhelming force, and that with that force they should be able to overturn the existing government, leaving to the book of chance what other institution might be substituted for it. The evidence will shew you what were their preparations, preparations wholly inconsistent with the idea that the assassination of his majesty's ministers was the only crime they meditated. You will find that at Tidd's house was seized on the day after their meeting in Cato-street, no less a quantity than twelve hundred rounds of ball-cartridge; they had procured, as I have stated, a great number of grenades; they had cartridges for the purpose of loading cannon; and, in addition to these things, they were provided with fire-balls, intended to be used in burning the different buildings which had been fixed upon, and amongst others the barracks near Portman-square, well known to Harrison, who had been quartered there. These preparations and this ammunition shew plainly, that the work they meditated was not to terminate in the assassination of his majesty's ministers, but that these conspirators had ulterior objects in contemplation, and that they were bent upon the overthrow and destruction of the government.

But let us for a moment consider that part of the scheme to which your attention will be very much directed in the course of this inquiry, I mean the assassination of his majesty's ministers. With what view could these conspirators meditate their destruction? Were they persons against whom, individually, these men had conceived revenge? Was it against lord Liverpool, was it against the duke of Wellington, was it against the lord chancellor, personally, that their hostility was directed? Who were the parties to make the attack? Were these twenty or five-and-twenty persons united by any common bond of interest? I ask you, as men of sense and understanding, whether you can doubt that that part of their plan was more than a preliminary step? that their swords were not to be raised against his majesty's ministers, as individuals merely, but as distinguished personages filling the highest offices in the state, and possessing the confidence of their sovereign. In that character alone, had the illustrious guests of lord Harrowby become the intended victims of the instigators and supporters of this horrible plot. This assassination was to have been the first act of the tragedy; the overthrow of the government was to have been last.

It will perhaps be said that in a case like the present, the testimony ought to be such as to leave no doubt on your minds of the truth of the story which is narrated—that it should come from unpolluted sources, from witnesses untainted by crime. Undoubtedly, in all cases submitted to the consideration of a jury, it is their duty to be satisfied that the evidence is clear and conclusive before they pronounce a verdict against the prisoner. But the secret machinations and designs of conspirators, planning and acting in a scheme like the present, can only be developed to their full extent by the evidence of some of those who have been participators in their guilt. An accomplice in these cases is, generally speaking, the only witness that can be produced fully to discover and make known to the court the plans and machinations of his associates. That the testimony of such a person ought to be watched with the utmost anxiety and jealousy I most readily admit; and unless it receives confirmation from uncontaminated sources, a jury is never advised to come to a conclusion unfavourable to the accused. Upon his evidence alone, in this case, however, I think you will agree, when you have heard the story which the accomplice Adams will tell, and the confirmation which will be given to you of that story—confirmation of the strongest and most impregnable kind, not as to one or two particular circumstances only, but I might say as to almost all the leading facts which he will relate; I say, I think you will be satisfied that he is the witness of truth. To produce confirmation of every part of his testimony would be impossible, and if it were possible, it would render the evidence of the accomplice altogether unnecessary, because the account he is to give might then be proved by witnesses liable to no objection. The confirmation which you ought to require in this instance should be such as to convince you that the general tenor of the narrative of Adams is true. Such confirmation you will receive from witnesses upon whom there is not the shadow of an imputation—witnesses upon whose veracity you may with confidence rely.

But the case will not rest upon the testimony of an accomplice, though fully confirmed. A witness will be called before you, who was not an accomplice, and who, if his account be not true, was a man endowed with the spirit of prophecy; I mean Hiden; because he, before the transaction took place, communicated it to lord Harrowby, at a time when he had no interest whatever operating upon his mind to induce him to make the disclosure, except a desire of averting that evil which he saw impending over the person of that nobleman and his colleagues in office. Against Hiden no charge could have been or can be preferred, because, although in words he appeared to assent to the scheme of the conspirators, he never acted in a single part of the plot. If you receive from this person not only an account of the scheme, but one completely confirmatory of the testimony of the accomplice, it appears to me that it is no longer possible for you to hesitate on the conclusion to which you are to arrive. I do not advert to the testimony of Monument, because the observations which apply to Adams apply equally to him. I ought, however, to remark, that although Monument was undoubtedly found in Cato-street, and had agreed to meet Brunt and Tidd there that evening, he does not appear to have been fully informed of the extent of the scheme till his actual arrival in the room, and does not seem therefore to be so deeply implicated in the transaction as Adams.

Such being the case, it will be your duty, after you have heard the evidence, calmly and deliberately to weigh the effect of it. If, after the observations which I have made to you, you shall think that the proof adduced does not fully satisfy your minds of the guilt of the prisoner at the bar, and you shall entertain a reasonable doubt respecting it (but it must be a rational and a well-founded doubt), give the prisoner at the bar the benefit of it; but if on the contrary, however wild in your estimation, and however impracticable the scheme may have been, still, if upon considering the whole of the evidence, you shall be convinced that it was formed, and was on the eve of execution, then, gentlemen, it is a duty you owe to yourselves and to your country to act upon that conviction, and, without hesitation, without regard to the consequences to follow from your decision, to pronounce a verdict of guilty.

Lord Chief Baron.—Bring into court the other prisoners named in the indictment who have not been tried.

[William Davidson, Richard Tidd, James William Wilson, John Harrison,

Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist and Charles Cooper were placed at the bar behind the prisoner on trial.]

EVIDENCE FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Robert Adams sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.

I believe you are a prisoner in custody?—Yes.

Where did you live before you were apprehended?—No. 4, Hole-in-the wall passage, Brook's-market.

What are you by trade?—A shoe-maker.

Were you ever in the army?—Yes.

In what regiment?—The royal regiment of Horse-guards.

How long is that ago?—Eighteen years.

Do you know the prisoner John Thomas Brunt?—Yes, I do.

Where did you first become acquainted with him?—At Cambray in France.

How long since?—In 1816.

By what name did he then go?—Thomas Morton.

Was the British army at that time stationed at Cambray?—Yes, the head quarters were at Cambray.

What were you doing there?—Following the occupation of my trade.

With the army?—Yes.

Do you remember calling on Brunt early in the present year?—Yes.

Where?—At his lodgings in Fox-court, leading into Gray's-inn-lane.

He is a shoe-maker, I believe?—A boot-closer.

Did the prisoner at the bar introduce you to Thistlewood?—He did.

Do you recollect about what time?—On the 12th of January, a Wednesday.

Where was that?—By Clare-market; Stanhope-street I think it was,

At Thistlewood's lodgings?—Yes.

Did Brunt go alone with you, or was there any other person?—Ings was with us.

Tell us what passed upon that occasion?—On entering the room of Mr. Thistlewood, Brunt said to Thistlewood, "here is the man I was speaking to you about." Thistlewood said, "You belonged to the Life-guards formerly, did not you?" I told him I did not, I belonged to the Oxford blues, that was the name I expressed. "No doubt you are a good soldier," he said; I told him "once I was;" "and can use a sword well?" I told him I could use a sword sufficiently to defend myself, but I was out of practice; I could not say I could use a sword so well as I formerly could, for I had not used a sword or any arms for a considerable time. On this Mr. Thistlewood turned his discourse on the different shopkeepers in London, saying they were a set of aristocrats altogether, and were working under one system of government, and he should glory to see the day when the shopkeepers should have their shops shut up and well plundered; he next turned his discourse upon Mr. Hunt, saying that Mr. Hunt was a man that was no friend to the people, and he had no doubt could he enter Whitehall, and overlook the government books, he should find his name there as a spy to the government; he next alluded to Mr. Cobbett, saying that he, with all his writings, was a man that was no friend to the people, and he had no doubt he was the same as Mr. Hunt, a spy. Brunt here told him he had a couple of other men to call upon towards Carnaby-market, and asked Mr. Thistlewood whether he would walk with him to see the men.

Did he go?—No; there was a word or two dropped from Mr. Brunt to Thistlewood respecting the attending of a raffle.

Has that any thing to do with this?—This raffle was to raffle for a blunderbuss with a brass barrel; I do not recollect that Mr. Thistlewood said he should go, but we left the room.

You, and Brunt, and Ings?—Yes.

And left Thistlewood there?—Yes.

I believe sometime after this, you were in prison for debt in the Whitecross-street prison?—I was.

When did you come out of prison?—The day after the death of our late king.

The 30th of January?—Yes.

After you came out of prison, did you see the prisoner at the bar?—I saw him on the Monday.

What day of the week was the 30th of January, when you came out of prison?—The Sunday.

Where did you see him?—The first of my seeing him was at Hobbs's, the White Hart.

Did you afterwards see him at any room?—I saw him in the evening at a room taken on the same floor, the back room, where he lived.

Did you collect from the prisoner who had taken that room?—I heard him say himself, that he had taken the room for Ings.

Did you attend any meetings at that room?—Several.

Up to what time did you attend those meetings?—Up to the 23rd of February.

From the time you came out of prison?—Yes.

How often were the meetings held?—They were held twice a-day.

Who were the persons that usually attended?—The persons that usually attended were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Harrison.

Harrison had been in the Life-guards, I believe?—Yes: Davidson.

Davidson is a man of colour, I believe?—Yes: Wilson.

James Wilson?—I did not know his christian name, I only knew his person and his name: Edwards, Tidd.

Where did Tidd live?—In the next house adjoining that in which I lived.

Where is that place?—Hole-in-the-wall Passage.

He is a shoe-maker?—Yes.

Do you know a man of the name of Palin?—Yes; Palin was not so regular; he attended from the Sunday.

From what Sunday?—Sunday the 20th of February; that was the first time I saw him there.

Had you seen Potter there?—Yes, I had seen him before that; but I cannot charge my memory with the time.

What was Hall?—A tailor by trade.

After you came out of prison, which was on the 30th of January, will you tell us what passed at those meetings?—I called up on the evening of the Monday, and there I found several of them; I cannot charge my memory that any thing particular passed that night.

Direct your attention to some meeting where you remember what passed?—On the Wednesday-night following I attended there.

Was Thistlewood there then?—Yes.

Brunt?—Yes.

Davidson?—Yes.

Harrison?—Yes.

Edwards?—Yes.

What did you see in the room at that time?—I saw a number of pike-staves.

Was there any furniture in the room?—At the time we were there, there were some chairs brought in.

Was there any furniture belonging to the room?—No, only the stove that was fixed.

When you used the room, where did you get chairs?—They were brought from Brunt's room, the adjoining room.

What sort of things were those pike-staves you have mentioned?—They were rough, just as if they had just come from the country, quite green.

What passed as to these pike-staves?—I saw Bradburn cut the ends of the staves off, and knock the ferrules on.

Lord Chief Baron.—You did not mention Bradburn as being there?—He was there.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you mean the end of one, or the ends of more of them?—One end of each pike staff; after they were all knocked on this first dozen, it was considered, in consequence of the ferrule being too small, that in boring the hole and cutting the stick down to it, the end of the pike staff would not be strong enough to support it: that is all I can speak to respecting that time.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was any thing done afterwards to alter them?—Yes; they were cut off again, and some ferrules put in.

By Bradburn?—Bradburn had instructions to get the ferrules, but he did not get them, and afterwards Brunt bought the ferrules larger and deeper.

Do you know whether Bradburn is a carpenter?—I suspected he was a carpenter, but I was not certain.

Were those new ferrules put on in the room at that place?—They were.

Lord Chief Baron.—Were the new ferrules brought in that evening?—No; Brunt brought those ferrules in the course of the day, and put them on.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Do you mean the same day?—No; I saw them afterwards.

Do you remember being there a short time before the funeral of the king?—Yes.

Whom did you find there at that time?—I found Thistlewood, Harrison, Davidson, and Wilson.

Tell us what passed at that meeting?—At this meeting Harrison told Thistlewood that he had seen one of the Life-guards, and he had learnt from him that every Life-guardsman that could be mounted, was to attend the funeral of the late king, as well as all the foot-guards that could be spared from London would be there, and the police officers that could be spared from London, were to be there at the same time.

Harrison, who made this communication, I think you say had been in the Life-guards?—Yes.

Do you know how long he had left the Life-guards?—I cannot say; I have heard him say he had been in the Life-guards.

Having made this communication, as coming from the Life-guardsman, what did he say further?—He said that after he had left the Life-guardsman, it occurred to his mind, that this might be a favourable opportunity to collect what men they had amongst themselves together on that night, with an intention to kick up a riot in London, as he thought all the officers, soldiers and what not, would be out of London, that there would be nobody left in London that could protect it scarcely; on his coming into the room, seeing Thistlewood, he communicated his thoughts to Mr. Thistlewood.

He said that had passed in his mind, in consequence of the communication of the Life-guardsman?—Yes.

And on Thistlewood coming into the room, he communicated those ideas to Thistlewood?—Yes, he did, it meeting with Thistlewood's ideas: Thistlewood immediately improves upon the plan how it should be done; he proposed that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane should be taken, and the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground were to be taken on the same night; after this was done, they thought it highly necessary to send a party up to Hyde-park corner, in order to prevent any orderly being sent from London to Windsor, to communicate what was going on in London; at the same time he proposed that the telegraph over the water should be taken, in order to prevent this telegraph communicating any intelligence to Woolwich of what was going on in London; he thought at the same time it would be necessary to cut trenches across the road, in order to prevent any cannon from Woolwich entering London.

Who said that?—Thistlewood.

The whole of what you have now been stating, was said by Thistlewood?—Yes; on doing this, he thought the soldiers, being so far distant from London, in coming up from Windsor, they would not be able to come up to London time enough to render the country assistance, that they would be so knocked up and fatigued that they would not be able to do any thing. Here Mr. Thistlewood, for the first time that I can vouch for, said that there must be an offer made to the soldiers, in order to bring the soldiers over to them; and if they found that the soldiers were determined to act against them (Harrison was the man that proposed the hand-grenades, that were made for the destruction of human creatures), they were to enter the houses in the streets, and fling these hand-grenades in among the soldiers in the streets to destroy them as fast as possible.

Was any thing said about the ports?—It was proposed by Thistlewood, that there should be men sent to the different sea-ports, such as Dover, Brighton, Margate, and those different places, with an express order, that, if any persons were suffered to leave the country without an order from the provisional government, their towns were to be blown down over their heads; he mentioned particularly that they ought as soon as they could collect force enough, which he had no doubt they should, to send a very strong force down to Brighton, in case the new king should be there after the riot was kicked up, which he did not suppose he would in consequence of his indisposition; they were to plunder Brighton, and as for his being crowned as king, Thistlewood said that was all nonsense, for that we did not intend that should ever be; this finishes the subject, I believe.

After that conversation had taken place, did the prisoner at the bar, and any other person, come into the room?—Yes.

Who?—Ings and Brunt came into the room.

Was the subject of the previous conversation communicated to them?—It was communicated to them both by Thistlewood.

Can you tell us what Brunt said?—Brunt and Ings expressed themselves both together, that there would be nothing short of the assassination of the ministers should satisfy them.

Had Brunt at any time before that, told you any thing about any plan to assassinate his majesty's ministers?—On the 2nd of January.

Was that before he had introduced you to Thistlewood?—It was.

At the meeting to which you spoke when I first asked you the question?—In his own room.

When you called upon him?—Yes.

Was it at that meeting?—There was no meeting then.

When you and he met upon that occasion, did he communicate that plan to you?—He communicated this plan to me on the 2nd of January in the street, as we were walking along.

Then upon this occasion to which you have now been speaking, he said that nothing would satisfy him except the assassination of his majesty's ministers?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You do not ask him as to the particulars of that conversation.

Mr. Solicitor General.—No, my lord, not the details of it. Did any thing further pass at that meeting after he and Ings had said that nothing would satisfy them but the assassination of his majesty's ministers?—This was the night when Ings expressed himself in the room, that he had been to the Park, with the sole intention to shoot the Prince Regent, as he was at the time.

Did he produce any thing?—He produced a pistol from his pocket, and said that was the pistol that he had taken; he pulled the pistol from his left pocket, held it out in that way, and said "Damn my mortal eyes, but that is the pistol that I took;" that was the very expression.

Upon what occasion was it he said he went into the Park to shoot the Prince Regent?—It was the time that the Prince Regent went to open the Parliament.

When Brunt had originally communicated to you this intention to assassinate his majesty's ministers, did he say when that was to be done?—It was to be done the first time the ministers assembled together for a dinner.

What dinner?—What they call a cabinet dinner.

Do you remember a meeting that took place on Saturday the 19th of February?—Perfectly well.

Who was present at that meeting?—I saw Thistlewood, Brunt, Harrison and Wilson; and Ings was there.

What passed at that meeting? was that in the forenoon or evening?—It was between eleven and twelve o'clock.

Was Davidson there at that time?—I cannot positively say.

Tell us what passed at that meeting?—On my going into the room, they sat with their heads together, as if they were in a consultation about something; I pretty soon found out what.

What was it?—They got up all on the sudden, Thistlewood said, "Well, it is agreed; if nothing transpire between this and Wednesday-night, we intend to go to work, as we are all so poor we cannot wait any longer." Thistlewood proposed directly, that there should be a committee sit at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, in order to draw up a plan to act upon.

Was that agreed to?—Yes; he gave orders to Brunt at the same time to tell the men that were to come by his instructions, to come armed. Here Brunt expressed himself, saying, "it is a parcel of nonsense," with an oath.

"to think of any officers coming here;" if they were, he would execute them in the room, or murder them: he expressed himself in a different way, language that it is not proper to use here.

That if they came to the room, they were to be murdered?—That he would take care they should be murdered; and he would take good care that it should not be found out.

Prisoner.—My lord, can the witness look me in the face, and the jury, and state that?

Witness.—I can, with a good conscience.

Prisoner.—Then you are a bigger villain than I took you for before.

Lord Chief Baron.—You will be at liberty to say any thing you choose by and by, but you should not interrupt the examination.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Look at the jury, and state whether that is a fact?

Witness.—It is the fact, and you know it yourself Brunt.

Lord Chief Baron.—Do not get into any conversations with the prisoner.

Mr. Solicitor General.—If the prisoner desire it, look more towards the jury, so that the prisoner may see you. After this did they separate?—Then they separated.

You spoke of some pike-staves, had you seen any other arms of any description before the Saturday?—I had seen a sword; I had seen those hand-grenades; some of them were then in the room.

One sword, or two?—One sword, and some hand-grenades which were made in the room; and I have seen pistols pulled from their different pockets.

Were those things that you saw from time to time in the room kept there, or were they carried on to some other place?—They were removed from there to Tidd's lodgings in Hole-in-the-wall-passage.

What was that place called?—The dépôt.

Was any reason given why they were not kept there?—The reason given by Mr. Thistlewood that he wished them to be removed from that room to the dépôt was, that they might be there safe, in case any body should come into the room who did not know any thing of their intentions, that he should not have any suspicion what their intentions were.

Did this meeting take place in pursuance of the arrangement on the Sunday-morning?—Allow me one moment, as Mr. Brunt has denied what I have said. Brunt was the man who carried the principal part of those hand-grenades to Mr. Tidd's, for I followed him there myself; I followed him into the room of Tidd, and saw them lie on the floor; and I saw Tidd's daughter put them into the box under the window with my own eyes.

Did this meeting take place on the following morning?—Yes, the Sunday.

Who was there?—There was Thistlewood,

Ings, Hall, Brunt, Harrison, Davidson, Bradburn, Edwards, Cook, and there were three others, that came afterwards; there were twelve in all.

Tell us what passed at that meeting?—Between eleven and twelve o'clock, on the 20th January, Thistlewood looking round the room, seeing twelve men——

Do you mean January or February?—February; Thistlewood seeing twelve men, said, "Well, gentlemen, we may as well proceed to business; here is enough to form a committee;" Tidd was proposed to take the chair.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—He had not mentioned Tidd as being present at this meeting?

Witness.—On Tidd taking the chair, with a pike in his hand——

Lord Chief Baron.—Was he there when you went in, or did he come in afterwards?—He was there among the first. I might, gentlemen of the jury, possibly, not charge my memory as to all that might be in the room, at the different times I was there. Though I have not mentioned Mr. Tidd being in the room, he certainly was there, for he was the first that spoke to me in the room. On order being called, Mr. Thistlewood, standing on the left hand side of Tidd, said, "Well, gentlemen, as we are all met here, we have no occasion," turning his head to the door, "to make mention of any names; I suppose you all know what you are met for, and as we have all waited so long, with an expectation of the ministers dining together, finding there is no likelihood of their coming together, we have come to the resolution, that in case nothing occurs between this and next Wednesday-night, we intend to take them separately;" he then begins to state his plan. He proposed then the west-end job; he called the job that was intended to assassinate, "the west-end job." He proposed after this was done, or at least at the same time, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane should be taken and the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground should be taken, and that Mr. Palin should take the command of another party, in order to set fire to the different buildings; Cook was the man that was appointed to take the lead of taking the six cannon in the Artillery-ground.

Mr. Solicitor General.—To take the command of the party that was to take them?—Yes.

Was Cook at that meeting?—He was, I mentioned him. As to the time, he said we could not come to the exact time, for the present, but we should have an opportunity between that time and the time of its being to be executed, to fix the time, but he thought forty men would be enough for the west-end job, and more if he could get them, of which he said he had no doubt, and as to further proceedings on the plan, that would be too at another time.

That further particulars, as to the execution of the plan should be settled at another time? —Yes; as Mr. Brunt was coming forward with a motion respecting the assassination, how it was to be done, Brunt came forward to address what were in the room, but was put a stop to by Thistlewood saying that the motion he had made ought to be put from the chair; that if any person had any thing to say upon it they should state it; the motion being put and agreed to by all in the room, Brunt came forward and stated what he had to say. Brunt proposed, that as there was no signs of getting them all together, they should be taken separately, and that it should be done in this way, as many men as could be raised, or rather as many as they thought they could assassinate, they were to divide what men they had got into as many parties as they thought they could get men to assassinate; if they had forty men, they were to divide them into so many parts.

How many was each party to consist of?—That was not said; when these men were so lotted out, he proposed that a man from each lot should be drawn out for the purpose to assassinate whoever they might be appointed to do; that it should be done regularly by drawing lots; if that man that was drawn did not execute his duty from any signs of cowardice, he was to be run through on the spot; upon this I gets up myself, and told him I wished to ask him a few words on what he had dropped, whether it was not possible for a man to make an attempt in a thing like that and fail, says I, “do you mean to say, that a man so failing, is to be run through upon the spot whether or not?” “Certainly not, unless there is proof that the man is a coward.” I sat down; this motion directly after was put from the chair, and it was agreed to in the same way as the other; directly after this in came three other men.

What were their names?—Palin, Potter and Strange.

Upon these persons coming in, were the matters that had previously passed communicated to them?—They were communicated as before to them.

They were communicated as they had passed?—They were.

Did either of those persons make any observation?—Palin.

Was that the man that was to head, as you say, the fire party?—Yes.

What observation did he make?—After Mr. Palin had consented to the plans, he got up and addressed himself to the chairman on the subject of what had been dropped, saying, “agreeing as I do with what has been said, and I have one amongst the rest agreed to it, I wish to know how these things are to be done, as there are so many objects you talk of at one time provided;” he said, they could all be carried; he thought that it would be a great acquisition to what they had in view; “this is what I wish to know,” he says, “you talk of taking forty men for the west-end job; you talk of taking the two pieces of cannon in Gray’s-inn-lane, and six at the Artillery-ground and then propose me with my men setting fire to the different buildings, but you ought to know better than myself what men you can command. I for my own part can give no satisfaction what men I can bring forward, unless I may be intrusted from this committee to state to them what has passed in this room this morning. If I can have that power to tell the men I may have to call upon what it is they are going about, and when they will be wanted, I should better know how to act.”

Upon his stating this, what was said to him? —Upon his stating this, it was stated by Mr. Thistlewood, Brunt, and Tidd, that if Mr. Palin had men that he could place that confidence in, they did not see where the harm would be in making the communication to them; upon this Mr. Palin sat down satisfied, and nothing particular occurred to the chair afterwards to the best of my recollection.

After the chair was left, what then passed? —After the chair was left, Thistlewood turned himself round on a sudden, and said, “Oh! Brunt, now as Palin is here, you can take him to this place which is close by, and let Palin see whether the place is practicable to do or not.”

Upon that, did Brunt and Palin go out of the room together?—Brunt and Palin went out of the room together to examine this place, and see whether it was practicable for Mr. Palin to do.

How long did they remain absent?—To the best of my recollection, about ten minutes.

When they came back what was said?—Mr. Palin gave in word, that the place was a very easy job, and would make a good fire.

Was the place mentioned?—This place was Furnival’s-inn-buildings.

Was it mentioned?—It was not mentioned at that time; I heard Brunt tell Mr. Thistlewood of it before that time; it was Brunt and Tidd found out the place.

That was mentioned at a previous meeting? —Yes.

The building was going on at the time; it was not finished?—The back part of the building is not finished now, I believe.

I believe this place, Fox-court, is very near the back of Furnival’s-inn?—Very near.

What further passed at that time?—Some of them began to separate, saying, they had men to call upon, and to acquaint them when they would be wanted; after this, Thistlewood dropped a word to this effect to Brunt, “I think we had better, between this and the time of going to work, collect what men we can together, in order to give them a treat;” Thistlewood said, he did not know how that was to be done, for they were all so poor; upon this, Brunt was the man that turned round, walked from the fire and back again, “Damn my eyes, I have a pound note, though I have done little or no work lately, but I have a pound note that I have reserved to treat my men, and I will do it."

What further passed?—There was some other communication.

Was any thing said about any communication to Hobbs?—Yes; Thistlewood was the man that said, he did not know where we could take them to, after Brunt expressed himself that he would spend the pound note; he said, "I suppose we could have the room up stairs at Hobb's."

That was at the White Hart?—Yes.

Was that the place where some meetings were held, before they got the room in Fox-court?—The very house, but not the room.

It is not a part of the house, but a back room, in which you used to meet?—A back room in the yard. Brunt said, he did not like to go there, in consequence of what I had dropped.

As to the communication that had been made?—Yes; Brunt said, "never mind, as time gets so near; I do not see what we have to fear, for if any officers come into the room, we will take care of them."

Did you, shortly after this, separate?—Shortly after.

This you have mentioned was Sunday?—It was.

Was there any meeting held on the Monday?—Yes, there was.

Was there any meeting held on the Tuesday morning?—Yes, there was.

What time was the meeting held on Tuesday morning?—At about ten o'clock.

Was the prisoner Brunt there?—Yes.

Thistlewood?—Yes.

Tidd?—Yes.

Ings?—Yes.

Hall?—Yes.

Yourself?—Yes; Wilson and Harrison and Edwards; there were Bradburn, Palin, and Potter there besides.

After they had met on the Tuesday-morning, was any communication made as to a dinner?—Yes; on Mr. Edwards coming into the room, Mr. Edwards was the man that communicated to Thistlewood, there was an account in the paper of the prime ministers being to meet to dine together on the Wednesday-night.

Mr. Gurney.—Where was that to be?—At lord Harrowby's, Grosvenor-square.

Was any observation made by any one, upon that communication with Edwards?—Thistlewood made an observation.

What did he say?—He said he had seen a paper that morning, and he did not see any account of it; in order to satisfy the men that were then in the room, Thistlewood proposed that the paper should be fetched.

Did Edwards say how he came to know it?—Seeing it in the paper.

That was the communication he made, that he had seen it in the paper?—Yes.

Was the paper sent for and brought?—It was; Hall was the man that fetched the paper.

What paper was it?—The New Times.

Upon the paper being brought, how did it turn out?—Exactly as Mr. Edwards had said.

Upon that, what passed?—On this information being communicated from this paper, it was proposed by Thistlewood, that there should be another committee sit to alter the plan of assassination, as it had been proposed on the Sunday.

Did Thistlewood say any thing more at that moment?—No; but in the interval of this time there is one circumstance I wish to state; Harrison and Davidson came into the room in the interval of the paper being fetched; Harrison brings a bag of musket balls, Davison brings the balls, Harrison brings in the powder; with this Thistlewood calls me to the chair, as I was not very well.

Before you were called to the chair, do you remember any observations being made by Ings?—Ings, in the interval of the paper being fetched, pulled out three daggers; those daggers, he said, he had prepared with the sole intention of assassination by themselves.

You mean for separate assassination?—Yes; taking one in his hand at the same time, he expressed how he intended to do it.

How he had intended or now intended to do it?—How he had intended to do it making use of a very coarse expression, which I will not repeat.

Do you remember his saying any thing more?—Not at that moment.

Any thing about lord Castlereagh?—In the course of the day.

Go on and relate what took place next?—The chair was taken by myself, and I called to order.

Before you took the chair, do you remember Brunt saying any thing after the paper was brought in and read, and it was found there was a meeting?—Yes; on the news that was communicated in the paper, Brunt expressed himself—"Damn my eyes, now I believe there is a God, in calling these thieves together; it has often been my prayer that they would all meet together, now God has answered my prayer."

Then you say Thistlewood proposed there should be a committee, and that you should take the chair?—Yes.

Did you do so?—I did.

What passed next, upon your taking the chair?—Upon Mr. Thistlewood coming forward to express the plan he had then to propose, I called to order, and said, "gentlemen, before we proceed any further in this business, I hope you have given a due consideration to what fell from my mouth yesterday morning."

What was it you had mentioned on the morning of the day before?—The account that Mr. Hobbs, the landlord at the White Hart, had given me.

Something that Hobbs, the landlord at the White Hart, had said to you?—Yes.

What was that something?—Hobbs told me privately, by myself, that there had been two officers there, saying that there was something in hand more than there ought to be; that they had got information at Bow-street, and at lord Sidmouth's office.

You referred to that which you had stated upon that subject?—Yes.

Upon your bringing this up what took place?—Upon my bringing this up, Palin was in the room; I had seen him before; Thistlewood was going to speak again.

I am not asking now all which took place on the morning before; but, on your saying "gentlemen, I hope you have considered what I said yesterday," what passed?—I wish to state that transaction, word for word as it occurred.

You have given me enough of the communication you before made; will you now go on with what passed at the meeting, when you were in the chair, when you said you hoped they had given a due consideration to what had fallen from you the day before; who took that up?—Palin took it up, and said he wished for some explanation of that before the business proceeded any further; upon this Brunt gets up, saying, "you shall have an explanation;" he gets up and communicated to the whole room nearly the same as I had to them; after he had done this he proposed, in order to do away this, that there should be a watch set on lord Harrowby's house.

Did you remain in the chair at this time, or were you put out?—I was in the chair at this time; this watch was to begin at six o'clock that night, two were to go on at that time; those two men were to go off at nine, and to be relieved by two others, who were to remain till twelve, and the watch to commence again the next morning at four o'clock, and to continue till the evening, when they intended to go to work; those men on watch were to look to see who entered the house of lord Harrowby, such men as police officers or soldiers; if they entered the house they were to communicate it to the committee; if there was nothing of this kind seen to go in, he was determined that the work should be done to-morrow night.

Who was he?—Brunt.

What did Thistlewood say?—On this being done, men were picked out for that purpose.

Who picked them out?—Brunt himself.

State in what manner they were picked out; what was said?—They were picked out for the purpose, but I cannot give you sufficient satisfaction who all those men were that were appointed; Davidson was one of the first of them that was to go on; Brunt and Tidd were the two next that were to relieve them.

Davidson would be from six to nine, and Brunt and Tidd from nine to twelve that night?—Yes.

Was any arrangement made as to the manner in which this should be done the next night?—The assassination; yes.

What passed upon that?—Thistlewood upon this came forward: "As to what has fallen from Brunt's mouth, respecting what has been said, if there is a proof that there has nobody entered the house, such as soldiers or police officers, I shall propose a plan in order to take them altogether!" He proposed himself to go to lord Harrowby's door with a note in his hand, to deliver to the servant, saying, he must have an answer to this note; on his going into the house he was to be followed.

By how many?—The others were to rush in directly after him, seize upon the servants, present a pistol to them, and threaten them with instant death if they made any resistance; at the same time others were to go and take the command of the stairs.

How many to take the command of the stairs?—Two to take the command of the stairs leading to the upper part of the house? two to take the command of the stairs leading to the lower part of the house; each man of these were to have a hand-grenade and pistols and a cutlass. If any attempt were made to retreat from the upper part of the house, this hand-grenade was to be thrown among them; and if any attempt by the servants from the lower part, a hand-grenade to be thrown among them.

Was any thing to be done with respect to the area?—There were two men to be placed there; one with a blunderbuss, and the other with a hand-grenade.

What was to be done with respect to the dining-room?—After these men had secured the servants and stairs, Ings proposed himself to enter the room first; he was to be followed by two swordsmen.

Who were they to be?—Myself one, and Harrison the other.

Did Ings say what he should say on going in?—Ings said, that on going in, he should say "Now, my lords, I have as good men here as the Manchester yeomanry; enter citizens and do your duty."

What were the others to do?—On this word of command from Ings, they were to rush into the room, to be followed by Ings with his broad knife, swearing that he would cut their heads off as fast as he could get at them.

Did he mention the heads of any persons in particular?—The heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth he was determined to bring away with him in his bags, and one of lord Castlereagh's hands. There is another circumstance I have not stated before; this hand he intended to cure, as he said that would be thought much of in a future day; I wish to state this one circumstance, for fear it should slip my memory, as I believe I have not stated it, what Ings himself at a subsequent meeting to this had proposed.

Do you mean by subsequent, before or after?—Before this he had expressed himself, after he had got the head of lord Castlereagh and Sidmouth, that he would exhibit those heads upon a pole about the streets; Thistlewood improved upon this plan; he thought it better to put them on a pike, place them behind the cannon, and carry them about the streets, in order to terrify the people.

After doing this at lord Harrowby's, what was it proposed you should do?—I have not finished yet; on Thistlewood saying this, Bradburn improved it immediately, saying, he would immediately after it had been exhibited here inclose the head in a box, and send it to Ireland.

After you had done at lord Harrowby's, what was to be done next?—The next thing that was to be done after leaving the house, was to be done by Harrison.

What was he to do?—He was to go to the Horse-barracks in King-street, and set fire to the shed.

With what?—A ball prepared for the purpose.

Who was to support Harrison?—Wilson.

From thence where was that party to proceed to?—They were to proceed from thence to Gray's-inn-lane.

To what place in Gray's-inn-lane?—The City Light-horse barracks.

What to do?—To take the two cannon from there.

Was it said whether the party were to go from thence, or whether they were to meet any body else?—There was to be somebody in waiting there.

After getting those cannon at the Light-horse Volunteer barracks, to what place were you to proceed next?—They were to proceed from there to the Artillery-ground, unless things occurred afterwards to the contrary.

Whom were they to meet there?—Cook.

Whom besides?—That I do not know.

What were they to do at the Artillery-ground?—To take the six cannon from there, and after they had got them, they were to load them, and bring them into the street loaded.

What to do?—If Cook found himself sufficiently strong by people, as it was supposed, coming over to them, if he thought himself capable of advancing to the Mansion-house, he was to do it.

If the Mansion-house was taken, what use was to be made of it?—It was to be the seat of the provisional government.

Was any arrangement to be made of the cannon that were there?—The cannon were to be arranged in this way; there were to be three placed on one side of the Mansion-house, and three on the other.

For what purpose?—For the purpose, if they refused to give up the house, of firing into it on each side.

After that, was any place near the Mansion-house to be attacked?—The Bank of England was to be attacked, and taken if possible.

What was to be done there?—To plunder the Bank, but Thistlewood said not to destroy the books.

Did he assign any reason?—He assigned the reason to secure the books, in order that they might be enabled to see some of the proceedings of government before that, that they were not then in possession of. There are some few words I believe I have not stated yet in court, with respect to the finishing of the concern; Mr. Thistlewood and Cook agreed between themselves that if he, Cook, found himself so situate as to go to the Mansion house, he was to send an orderly man forward to stand against the door of saint Sepulchre's church, to wait the arrival of an orderly to be sent by him, Thistlewood; on this being done, they were to return to their separate parties, to give instruction to the different parties how they were situated.

Do you remember Harrison making any proposition about any sign or counter-sign?—Yes.

What was it?—Harrison proposed that there should be a countersign agreed upon, to give to those men that had to go round to tell the men that they would be wanted to-morrow night.

What did he propose that should be?—He proposed that the countersign should be button, in this way b, u, t.—t, o, n.; there was to be a man fixed at the end of Oxford-street, that the party who should go up and say b, u, t., was to be considered as one of the party, and he was to answer t, o, n., to shew that he belonged to the party too.

This was on the morning of Tuesday?—Yes; on this being done, Harrison would procure a place between this and the time; and the men that were to come up so, were to be conducted from the end of Oxford-street to that place.

Did you go to Fox-court again in the afternoon of that day?—Yes; I did.

Did you perceive any thing as you entered the room?—On my going up stairs, I perceived a strange smell; on my going into the room I saw Ings, Hall, and Edwards.

What was Edwards doing?—Edwards was making fuses for the hand-grenades.

What was Ings doing?—Ings was dipping those things for the fire balls into an iron pot, into ingredients that were mixed for that purpose.

What was Hall doing?—Hall was laying the paper on the floor in order to receive those balls after they were dipped into the pot.

Did you leave the room and call again?—I left the room, and called again in the evening.

Whom did you see then?—I found Thistlewood there, and two strange men that I had not seen before.

Any other that you had seen before?—In the course of the evening they were pretty well all there.

Davidson you have said was to go on watch at six?—Yes.

And Brunt and Tidd to relieve him?—Yes.

Did Brunt and Tidd go to watch at nine?—They started for that purpose.

After they had started, did any thing occur?—After they had started, they called at a house to meet a man that Tidd was to have met before, and finding this man, he (Brunt) came back again to take another, and he pitched upon me to go with him.

Did you go with him in Tidd's stead?—Yes.

When you got to Grosvenor-square, did you find Davidson on the watch?—Yes.

And you relieved him?—Yes; we did.

You went about nine I suppose?—Yes.

From nine to twelve was your time?—Yes.

While you were on the watch, did you and Brunt go into any public-house to take refreshment?—We did.

Where is that public-house situate?—It is at the corner of a mews, directly at the back part of lord Harrowby's house, but the name I do not know.

How long do you think Brunt and you staid in the house?—Till about eleven o'clock.

What time did you go in?—I suppose a quarter or twenty minutes past nine.

You staid there about an hour and a half?—Yes.

Did either of you play at any game with any person there?—Brunt played at dominos with a young man that was there.

At about eleven, did Brunt and you leave the public-house, and return to your watch in the square?—We did.

About what time did you leave your watch?—Turned of twelve.

Did you stay in the house the whole of the hour and a half, or go out occasionally?—I went out twice myself.

On Wednesday, did you go to Fox-court?—I did.

At about what time?—About two o'clock, to the best of my recollection.

Did you first go into the back room, or into the other room?—I first went into Brunt's own room.

Did you find him there?—I did.

Did any persons come into that room to you?—Strange came in first, and two other strangers, whom I did not know.

Did you see any weapon in Brunt's room?—I saw pistols.

Was any thing done with them?—They began to try to put the flints into them.

Did they go on with that?—On those two other strange men coming in, Brunt proposed to go into the other room.

Do you remember, whether any observation was made while they were putting the flints in, before he desired them to go into the other room?—I cannot charge my memory.

However, he proposed they should go into the other room?—Yes, he did.

And Strange and the two strange men did go into that room?—Yes.

Did you go into the back room too?—Yes.

Did Brunt?—Yes.

Did you see any weapons there?—I saw pistols, cutlasses, and blunderbusses.

Did any persons come?—Just afterwards, Thistlewood came.

Did any others come after him?—Yes.

Who came in next after Thistlewood, as well as you can remember?—To the best of my recollection, Ings and Hall came afterwards, and other strangers after that.

When Thistlewood came in, do you recollect what he said?—When Thistlewood came in, he looked round and said, "now my lads, this looks something like; it looks as if we were going to do something."

Did he address you?—He clapped his hand upon my shoulder, and said, "how do you do Mr. Adams?" I told him I was not very well, and I was very low in spirits. He said, "what is the matter? you are not low spirited in consequence of what we are going to do." I told him I wanted some refreshment.

Did Brunt send out for any thing?—By the orders of Thistlewood he did.

What did he send for?—Some gin and some beer.

What passed next?—Mr. Thistlewood said, he wanted some paper.

For what purpose?—In order to draw up some bills; he wanted such paper as the newspapers were printed on, but he did not know how to ask for it; what was the name of it.

By bills, what kind of bills do you mean?—Large posting bills.

Did you propose any paper to him?—I told him cartridge paper would answer his purpose.

Upon that, did Brunt say any thing?—Upon this, Thistlewood gave Brunt some money to fetch this paper, he saying, that either his apprentice or his boy should fetch it.

Did Brunt send for it?—Yes.

Was it brought?—It was.

When the paper came, what did Thistlewood do?—He sat down to write the bills, after a table and a chair being brought in.

From what place?—From the front room; Brunt's room.

Did he write?—Yes, three bills.

After he had done that, did he say what he had written?—He read it to those that were in the room.

After those three copies were written, what was done with them?—After the bills were written, I saw them laid down to dry; and then afterwards I saw one in the hands of Thistlewood, and another in the hands of Ings.

Mr. Gurney.—We have given them notice to produce them my lord.

Mr. Adolphus.—I admit the notice my lord.

Mr. Gurney.—Give us the words he pronounced?—"Your tyrants are destroyed; the friends of liberty are called upon to come forward as the provisional government are now sitting. James Ings, secretary, February 23, 1820."

Did Thistlewood write, or attempt to write, any more than those three?—No; Thistlewood expressed himself, in writing the last bill, tired; he did not know what was the matter with him.

What appearance did he exhibit?—He seemed to be rather agitated.

Were those written small or large?—In largish letters; writing letters.

Writing letters, but large?—Yes.

Was it said in any part of the conversation where they were to be placed?—They were to be placed against the different buildings that were set on fire, in order to let the people, who came to those fires, know what was done.

After that, did Thistlewood propose for any other person to write?—He proposed to Hall to take the pen.

Did Hall do it?—He refused it.

Upon that did any other person take it?—Upon that another person took it; he had at first refused it.

Do you know who that was?—No, I do not.

He wrote something, we will not ask what?—He did.

Who dictated to him?—Thistlewood.

After this, did you see Ings do any thing?—Yes.

Did he accoutre himself in any way?—He accoutred himself; he first put a black belt round his loins; after that he hung another over his shoulder; this belt round his loins was to contain a brace of pistols, the one over his shoulder was for a cutlass.

Did he put any thing else over his shoulder?—He put a couple of bags over his shoulder in the shape of a soldier's haversack.

What did he then say?—On viewing himself, he perceived he had not got his steel; he said he thought himself not complete without his steel.

Did he produce any thing else he had?—He produced a very large knife.

What kind of a knife?—A knife with a very broad blade, and a handle with wax-ends wound round it.

Did he mention what was the use of those wax-ends?—To keep his hand from slipping.

Did he say what he would do with this knife?—That this was the knife he had procured for the sole purpose of cutting off the heads of lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth.

Did the others who were in the room, do any thing with respect to the weapons that were there?—They all took an active part in procuring themselves pistols and cutlasses, and different things.

Do you remember any coming in late in the meeting?—Palin came in.

Did Thistlewood and Brunt stay after that, or did they go away?—They left the room after this.

About what time did they leave the room?—It could not want a great deal of five o'clock; it might want twenty minutes or half an hour.

Do you recollect Palin saying any thing to the party that were there?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said he hoped that all present knew what they had met there upon; he hoped if they knew what they were met upon that they had given it a consideration what they were going to do; in the first place he wished them to inform themselves, whether the assassination of the ministers was likely to be a benefit to the country, "if you find, or if you think that it is likely to be a benefit to your country, and the people will come over to you in consequence of doing it; you ought to come to the determination between yourselves, for every man to stick true one to another; if it should be proved that any one of you is in danger from the opposite party, the others ought directly to go to his assistance."

If any man flinched, did he say what should be done with him?—That if any man flinched, that man ought to be run through; he was here interrupted by a tall man, that was in the room, saying, he could see the meaning of his speech; but he spoke as if all in the room, he thought, knew what they were met there for.

The tall man said that to Palin?—Yes.

"I see pretty well the meaning of your speech; but you seem as if you thought all in the room knew what we were going to do?—Just so.

What was said next?—That was what he wished to know himself, and some others.

"That is what I, and some others, want to know?"—Yes; "I myself am not afraid of myself, nor ought any man that turns out on a thing like this."

To be afraid of what?—To be afraid of his life; there were some other words that I cannot charge my memory with, but Palin was going to speak again, but Brunt came in.

What did he say?—Seeing, as I thought, an alteration in the countenances of the men, he wished to know the cause.

Did he say that he observed an alteration, or what did he say?—No, he did not say that.

Give us his words; "what is the matter," or what?—He asked, what was the matter.

Upon his asking what was the matter, who answered him?—This tall man.

What did he say?—He said there were some in the room, and himself, who wished to know further, what they were going to do.

What answer did Brunt give?—He told him this was not the room where they were to know that; that if they would go with him to a room in the Edgware-road, there they should know.

What did Brunt say then?—He said, that all that went along with him, he would take care they should have something to drink to put them in spirits.

What did the tall man say to that?—The tall man said, he hoped that no man, going on such a piece of business as this, would get drunk; for, in so doing, the man who placed himself in the hands of his enemies would be of no use to nobody.

Did any thing further pass before you left the room?—Not that I recollect.

Was there a cupboard in that room?—There was.

What was kept in that cupboard?—I have seen a sword in it.

Any thing else?—I have seen tar and pitch, and some of this oakum stuff.

The materials for the fire-balls?—Yes.

Any thing else?—Those hand-grenades were kept there till they were removed.

With whom did you go away?—I went down stairs by myself; I was followed by some strange men.

Did you, that evening, go to Cato-street?—Yes.

What did you take with you?—I took a blunderbuss, and a broomstick that was prepared to receive a bayonet, that was Brunt's.

Who showed you the way to the stable in Cato-street?—Thistlewood and Brunt.

Where did you meet with them?—In the Edgware-road.

When you got to the stable, whom did you find there?—On going through the stable, I found Davidson and Wilson; Davidson sitting down, and Wilson standing up.

Did you go up into the loft?—Yes.

Whom did you find there?—I found several men there.

This stable is the first building in Cato-street?—Yes.

Cato-street is a little street turning out of John-street?—Yes.

You enter it under an archway?—Yes.

When you get through that archway you turn to your right, and directly enter that stable?—Yes.

At the further end of the stable you found a ladder, by which you got up into the loft?—Yes.

And in that loft there was a carpenter's bench?—There was a bench in the loft.

Were there any weapons upon that carpenter's bench?—There were.

Of what kind?—I saw pistols and cutlasses.

Was there any light?—Yes, a candle on the bench.

Before any persons came, who afterwards added to your numbers, do you recollect any thing being said about your numbers?—Yes.

What was said?—On Thistlewood looking round, he said, "There were eighteen in the room, and two below stairs."

What did you do with your blunderbuss?—Laid it on the bench.

Can you give me the names of those who were there, or many of them; Thistlewood you have mentioned was one?—Thistlewood was one, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Bradburn, Davidson, Wilson, Harrison, Stranger, Cooper, and Tidd.

Tidd was not there in the earlier part?—I am stating them all now, all that I have any knowledge of by name.

You stated, that Thistlewood said, "There are eighteen of us now in the room, and two down stairs?"—Yes.

How were any of them employing themselves?—They were all preparing themselves with their different arms.

Did Thistlewood remain in the loft or did he go down after you went up?—He went down.

Did you go down?—Yes.

On going, whom did you find below?—On going down, I found Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, and Wilson.

Was Ings there?—I cannot charge my memory whether he was below at that time.

Do you remember any thing being said on your going below, or, perhaps, it was when you returned?—Below stairs, when they perceived that I was coming down the ladder, and coming into the stable, they turned themselves round, and expressed themselves all on a sudden what good news they had got; that there were six or seven carriages seen already coming to lord Harrowby's house, and Brunt expressed himself, saying, "What a rare haul we shall have to-night!"

At this time had Tidd arrived?—No.

Did any thing pass about Tidd before we came?—Up in the loft.

You and the others went up into the loft again?—Yes; but Brunt proposed before we went up again, that there should be a double sentry put upon the stable door, and that no one should be admitted unless he could give the counter sign.

Did any thing pass about Tidd not having come?—Up in the loft.

What was said about him?—Some fear was expressed lest Tidd should not come, which Brunt noticed; he came up to the bench, and said there was no occasion of any fear on account of Tidd's not coming, for he would venture his life on Tidd's coming.

Do you recollect Ings saying any thing about dropping or not dropping the plan?—Ings expressed himself like a madman upon this; he said he would rather hang himself or cut his throat, if they talked of giving up the plan now.

Did Thistlewood say any thing?—Thistlewood said, he hoped they would not drop the concern; if they did, it would turn out another Despard's job.

Did Tidd come?—Just after that.

Any body with him?—I do not know; I did not see him come up the ladder.

But you found him among you?—Yes.

Did Thistlewood, after Tidd arrived, mention to you how many there were?—After he had had some little conversation with Tidd, he goes to the stable, and expresses himself by saying, "Supposing lord Harrowby to have sixteen servants in the house, what is that; they would not be prepared, and we should."

Did he say how many there were of you?—This was the time he looked them over.

How many did he make?—Eighteen in the room, and two below stairs.

That was what he said before Tidd came?—Yes.

How many did he make out after Tidd came?—He said there were twenty in all.

Did he say how the business was to be done?—He proposed that there should be fourteen men picked out of the twenty to go into the room.

Did he begin picking out?—The men were begun to be picked out by Thistlewood and Brunt.

When this was doing did you hear any thing below?—After this, on this being done, Brunt introduced a gin bottle, he offers me a glass, and called me among the fourteen. Sometime before this, on Brunt finding the men rather apprehensive they had not sufficient strength, Brunt came up to the table and addressed them in a few words.

What did he say?—He alluded to those persons that were in the room that did not know exactly the preparations they had got; he said, "we have got things here along with us that we can take that will blow their house down over their heads; so bent am I on doing the job, that if there were only eight or nine men, I am determined to go and do it;" he says again, "if there are only five or six that will go, I will be one" and should he find himself in danger, he would take those things with him and set fire to them, and blow the house over their heads all together, and perish all together; just at the time where we left off before, I heard a noise below stairs.

That was after the men were picked out and the gin bottle handed round?—Yes.

All the fourteen men were picked out?—Yes.

Did you hear any words?—Some one comes to the bottom of the ladder, and cries, "Holloa, show a light!" Thistlewood takes a light got from the bench, comes to the stairs and looks down, and seeing who they were, sets the candle down again.

Did you remark any thing in his appearance at that time?—He seemed rather confused.

Upon that who came up the ladder?—The officers ascended the ladder and came into the room.

Do you recollect what either of the officers said on entering the loft?—On entering the loft, to the best of my recollection, they said, "here is a pretty nest of you gentlemen, we have got a warrant to apprehend you all, and as such, I hope you will go peaceably."

After this did either of the officers do any thing in particular?—At this time an officer that was on the ladder, behind the man that had entered the room, cried out, "let me come up."

Did he go forward?—He came forward.

Did you then observe any room going out of the loft?—Those that were on that side of the room, sidled off into a little room that there was.

Did that officer, who came forward, go towards the little room?—I did not perceive him advance into the room.

Did he go towards the door?—No; to the best of my recollection, I think not.

Was Thistlewood one of those that went into this room?—Yes; I saw him go into this room.

What passed upon that?—On this officer coming into the room, the others rushed towards the doorway; at that moment I saw an arm rush forward; at that moment I saw a pistol, and this pistol fired off immediately.

VOL. XXXIII.

What became of that officer?—I cannot say that I saw the officer fire; for no sooner was the pistol fired, than the candle was out directly.

I suppose there was a good deal of confusion?—A great deal of confusion.

In the result, did you get down the ladder and into the stable?—Yes.

Did you get away?—Yes.

Did you go home to your lodgings that night?—Directly.

When were you taken up?—On Friday the 25th.

The day but one after?—Yes.

Did you go out after you went home till you were taken?—After I left Cato-street, I went into my room; never did I lay my hand, to the best of my recollection, even on the latch of my door, nor was I out till the officer took me out.

And you have been in custody ever since?—I have.

*Robert Adams cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.*

I have very little to say to you. I think you told us the last time you were here, that after you had escaped and got home, then it was that you repented of your iniquities?—I did.

And that was the fact, was it? you repented when you got home?—I certainly did; and before that my mind was convinced that I was wrong: I was afterwards more convinced of that, and my mind received a conviction of it.

Did you receive that conviction after you returned to Christianity, or before?—I received it after I had received a conviction of the error of my ways: I can acknowledge Christianity, but before that I could not do it.

You told us the other day that you studied religion a little, and that made you a deist?—I can tell you, that until the time that I received that infernal publication, which I did from Tidd, and I will speak of that before I have done, I had been as careful, I will not say always, but I had been very particular in those things.

And you mean to say you were a good christian till you received that infernal publication, which corrupted you?—I cannot say I was so good as I ought to be.

But you were a christian in profession?—Yes.

Then that book made you a deist?—Yes, it did.

Then, when a halter got about your neck, you became a christian again?—That book, and the principles, Mr. Brunt, the prisoner at the bar, wished to instil into my mind: the sole intent of Mr. Brunt was to knock down the pillars of Christianity altogether, and I can prove it.

And you at one time lent him your aid to knock down the pillars of Christianity?—More to my shame.

You admit that, do you?—I do.

More than I expected. What age were you when you changed your religion?—Between forty-five and forty-six, and now I am between forty-six and forty-seven.

You are sure you are entirely convinced of your religion now?—I am convinced of this; I have felt an inward satisfaction from what I have done.

You find an inward satisfaction from having slipped your neck out of the halter?—Not on that account; I find a satisfaction in the atonement I have made to my maker, in acknowledging the error of my ways.

In the worst state of your religion, did you feel it morally right to murder any man in cold blood?—I never had an idea of murdering any man, and I thank my maker it was not my wish.

You acknowledge that you were one of a party to do this?—I acknowledge that. Do you wish to know —

Mr. Gurney.—Answer questions, but do not ask them.

Mr. Curwood.—I have no objection to it.

Witness.—I will answer you.

In the worst state of your reprobation, did you think it morally right to murder any man?—I never did; I thought it inconsistent with reason altogether.

Inconsistent even with your reason?—Yes.

Then how came you to join any party that had that for its object?—Well, I do not know that that might not make it worse for the prisoner, it might bring out some unpleasant concerns for his family, and I do not want to load the man further than he deserves, or than is necessary.

It is mercy to the prisoner that restrains you?—I think of them that may be left behind him.

You may have some meaning but I cannot understand it.—To tell you the truth in a few words, I will not pretend to say it was that altogether, my mind was very curious upon Mr. Brunt; I had a doubt upon my mind that that man was not as he ought to be.

What do you mean by that?—After this going from Thistlewood to Carnaby-market, this man substantiated the supposition I had of him; he candidly told me there in Leicester-square, that he met a friend, as he said an acquaintance, this acquaintance came up to him to shake hands, and in pulling his hands from his pockets he grasped his hand, he had got his hand full of pound notes; this was a likely thing; when he gets home he finds himself seven pounds the better; I think if I shook hands with a man I should not find myself seven pounds the better for that; if you wish me to go further, I will do it.

Mr. Gurney.—Confine yourself to the questions asked you.

Mr. Curwood.—The first time you saw Thistlewood was the 12th of January?—Yes.

Before that you have told us there was a design to murder his majesty's ministers?—As I have not told you all that passed between me and him, I will explain it.

Was it or not on the 2nd of January that the prisoner, in an interview with you in the street, told you of a design to murder his majesty's ministers?—Yes.

And on the 12th of January you were introduced to Thistlewood?—Yes.

You, with ten days consideration, thought proper to join the people that were to commit this nefarious deed?—I joined them from the motives I have told you, and that day convinced me that Brunt was a rogue.

You have told me no motive?—I had a motive, but for the sake of his family I would wish not to enter into it.

How came you to join Thistlewood on the 12th of January to aid in a plot which was communicated to you on the 2nd?—Through the insinuations of Brunt, I joined them.

And you continued until you were taken into custody?—I did.

Attending meetings sometimes twice a-day?—Sometimes twice a-day, I will admit.

Yourself being occasionally the chairman?—Once in the time.

And as you told us, communicating to them that their design was suspected at lord Sidmouth's office?—Yes.

Therefore you did all you could to defeat detection?—I went that morning with three others, to aid me to put a stop to it, with Palin, Potter and Bradburn, one of the prisoners at the bar; if the man had candour enough to acknowledge it, he would say it was so.

Did you not say the other day, that you told them, that you felt it your duty to all to tell that which concerned all?—Yes.

And added, "What would you have thought of me, if I had suffered you all to be taken?"—Yes.

All this you did, meaning honestly to have nothing to do with such a business?—They would not enter into any thing, but Palin wanted to protect me upon it, and to say a word upon it, but as soon as I mentioned this, they were all like a set of madmen upon me.

Palin was a particular friend of yours?—I never saw Palin till the Sunday before, and you never heard me say so.

Do you recollect Mr. Edwards?—Yes; he was there from the beginning, and I have seen Mr. Edwards pull a pair of pistols out of his pocket, and say, he never went without them.

And you saw him very busy in manufacturing the grenades?—Yes.

Was there any regular committee, as you have mentioned a committee?—There was no committee regular, till the Sunday morning, the 20th.

What did you call yourselves?—If there was any particular name given to them, it is more than I heard.

You were chairman of the committee, but you do not know what was the name of it?—Yes, I was very careless of it at the time; I knew I should, on my plan, be very soon be put out of it.

"You were careless of it?—Yes, I wished to put a stop to it.

How came you not then to report it at proper places?—I wished to save the trouble of being exposed in this sort of way.

You wished to save the trouble of these trials here?—Yes.

And you wished to save the interference of the officers?—Yes; you do not believe I am such a fool as not to wish that.

Mr. Curwood.—No, I do not take you to be a fool I assure you.

Robert Adams re-examined by Mr. Gurney.

You spoke of certain publications which had perverted your mind; what publications were those?—Paine's Age of Reason, and the publications of Carlile.

Eleanor Walker sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

I believe you are the niece and servant of Mr. Rogers, of No. 4, Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

Has the prisoner Brunt lodged in your house for any length of time?—Yes; a twelvemonth it would have been at Easter.

What rooms did he occupy?—The two front rooms on the two-pair of stairs; he lived in one and worked in the other.

Do you remember any back room, two-pair of stairs, being taken by a man of the name of Ings?—Yes.

Who introduced that man to you?—Brunt.

The prisoner at the bar?—Yes.

Was it a furnished room?—Yes.

Did Ings say any thing to you about furniture?—He said he might bring his goods in, in a week or better.

Did he ever bring any goods in?—Not to my knowledge.

Your master keeps a shop?—Yes.

Do your lodgers enter at the shop door, or a back or side door?—A side door.

Does that door lead to the staircase?—Yes.

Can persons, therefore, go up and down those stairs without you in the shop knowing any thing about the matter?—Yes.

Mary Rogers sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

We understand you live in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

Do you recollect a man of the name of Ings taking a lodging in your house?—I recollect it now; I did not know his name then.

You afterwards found his name to be Ings?—Yes.

How many weeks did he pay you?—Four or five, I cannot be positive which.

One was left unpaid?—Yes.

He paid you four, or possibly five?—Yes.

How much a week?—Three shillings a week.

Do you recollect any evening when you were about putting your children to bed, seeing, any men go up stairs?—Yes, three men.

Was there any thing particular in the person of either of the three?—The middle one I perceived was a black man.

During the time that Ings had this lodging, did you inquire of Brunt who and what he was?—I did.

What account did he give you of him?—He said that he knew nothing of him, only seeing him at the public-house, and hearing him inquire for a lodging.

Did he tell you what he understood him to be by trade?—A butcher.

No furniture was brought in, I believe?—Never to my knowledge.

Lord Chief Baron.—He never slept there, did he?—Never, to my knowledge.

Mr. Gurney.—No bed was ever brought?—No, nothing of the kind.

Joseph Hale sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You, I believe, are apprentice to the prisoner Brunt?—Yes.

Did you live with him in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

We understand he had two rooms there, one a living-room, and one a workshop?—Yes.

You slept in the workshop, and he and his wife in the living-room?—Yes.

Do you remember a person of the name of Ings coming there, and taking a room?—Yes.

What room was that?—A two-pair back room.

Who looked at it with him?—Brunt.

After they had looked at it together, did you hear Brunt say any thing to Ings?—Yes.

What?—He said, "It will do, go down and give them a shilling."

How long before that day had you known Ings?—About a fortnight.

That was the first time you remember to have seen him?—Yes.

In whose company had you seen him before that time?—He was with Thistlewood, in Brunt's room.

The evening upon which Ings had taken it, did he come again?—Yes.

Did he go into your master's room?—Yes.

What did he ask for?—He asked Mrs. Brunt for the key.

She had the key then?—Yes.

Did she give it to him?—Yes, I believe she did.

Did he go into it?—Yes.

Who was with him?—A man of the name of Hall, a tailor.

Did they go into it?—Yes.

In the course of that evening, did you hear other persons come into that room?—I believe there were.

Not having seen them, did you hear them come and go into that room?—Yes, I did.

From that time, until your master was taken up, were there meetings held in that room?—Yes.

Can you give me the names of some of the persons whom you saw resort to it?—Yes.

Who were they?—Thistlewood, Ings, Tidd, Hall, Davidson, Bradburn, Strange, Edwards.

Did you see Potter?—Yes.

Did you see Adams?—Yes.

Besides those you have named, were there many others?—There were others at different times in this room, and coming up and down?

Did your master use to be with them?—Yes.

Always, or generally?—Generally.

Upon any occasion, when you passed that room, was the door open?—Yes.

Did you see any thing in the room?—Yes.

What did you see?—I saw some long poles, like the branches of trees, rough-cut.

You mean not trimmed, but with the bark on?—Yes.

How many should you judge?—There were about twenty.

At what time of the day were those meetings that you observed?—Mostly in the evening.

Did you ever hear any work going on in that room?—Yes.

What sort of work?—Hammering and sawing.

Do you mean that you have heard that once, or several times?—I have heard that more than once, I believe.

Your master, I believe, was taken up on Thursday the 24th of February?—Yes.

Did those people call each other by their names, when they were there?—Sometimes.

By what name did they usually call Thistlewood?—Sometimes T. and sometimes Arthur.

On the Sunday-morning before your master was taken up, was there any meeting in that room?—Yes.

Was that a larger or a smaller meeting than usual?—Rather larger.

Were all the persons you have named to me there?—Yes.

Did they go away all at once, or not?—One or two at a time.

Was your master with them?—Yes.

After the meeting was over, did you see any of them in your master's room, with your master?—Yes.

Who was that?—Strange.

Was there another meeting on the Monday?—Yes.

And on the Tuesday?—Yes.

In the afternoon of Wednesday, was there another?—There were several people up there.

Did all of them go into the back room, or any into the front room?—Some of them came sometimes into the front room.

Do you remember the name of any who came into the front room?—Yes, Thistlewood; and I remember Ings came in once.

Do you remember Strange being there?—Yes.

About what time?—About two o'clock.

Were any persons with him?—Yes.

Which room did they come into?—They came into Brunt's living-room, and then into his workshop.

Do you remember Strange and the others with him doing any thing in the workshop?—Yes, they were flinting pistols.

Do you know who those were that were with him?—No.

How many pistols were they flinting?—There were five or six.

Did they finish them?—No.

What prevented their finishing them?—One of the men said there were persons overlooking them from the opposite house, and Brunt told them to go into the back room.

And they did so?—Yes, they did.

In the course of the afternoon did Thistlewood come out of the back room and ask you for any thing?—Yes.

For what?—He asked me if I could get him a piece of writing paper.

Did you give him some?—I did.

To what place did he take it?—Into the back room.

After that, did Brunt come into the front room to tell you to get any thing?—Yes.

What?—Some cartridge-paper.

How much?—Six sheets.

Did he give you the money to buy it?—Yes.

Did you go and buy it?—Yes.

To whom did you give it?—To Brunt.

What did he do with it?—He took it into the back room.

At about what time, to the best of your recollection, did Brunt leave the back room finally, and come into his own room?—About six.

Was there any person with him?—Yes, there was a person, but I did not know him.

Did he and that person go away together?—Yes.

Before that, had you heard others go down stairs?—Yes.

After he was gone, had your mistress occasion to make tea?—Yes.

Where was her tea-table then?—In the back room.

What did she desire you to do?—She told me to go and get it.

What did you do?—I went and knocked at the door, and got it.

Who gave it you out at the door?—A man of the name of Potter.

When the door opened, did you perceive whether there was any other person there besides Potter?—Yes.

How many do you think?—There were four or five.

Was there a fire?—Yes.

After that, in the course of the evening, did Tidd call?—Yes.

Did he come into your room?—Yes.

Did any thing pass between him and Mrs. Brunt?—Yes.

What?—Mrs. Brunt took him to the sup-board, and showed him a pike-head and a sword.

What did she ask him about them?—She asked him what she could do with them.

What did he say?—He said if she would give them to him, he would take them away.

Where did he take them to?—Into the back room.

These were in your living-room, were they?—Yes.

After that, did you hear any person go down stairs?—Yes.

As from the back room?—Yes.

To the best of your recollection what time was this?—It was near eight o'clock.

It was after seven, you are sure?—Yes.

After that did any person come and give Mrs. Brunt any message?—Yes.

What was that message?—He told her, that if any persons came, they were to be sent to the White Hart.

Shortly after did any persons come?—Yes.

Were they sent to the White Hart?—Yes.

Did they know their way?—No.

Who showed them?—I did.

Upon your return from the White Hart, did you find any persons at the door?—There was a person came up after I had been at the door a few minutes.

Any body with him?—Yes, some others.

Did you send them to the White Hart?—Yes.

You did not go to show them the way?—No.

Did they appear to know the way?—Yes.

At about what time did your master come home?—About nine o'clock.

Was his dress in the same state as it was when he went, or in what state?—It was dirtier than when he went out, particularly his boots and his great coat.

Did he appear to be in a composed state?—No.

How then?—He seemed rather confused.

What did he say to his wife?—He said, that where he was a lot of officers had been.

Can you give us his exact words; did he tell her any thing, in short, as to the result?—He said it was all up, or words to that effect; that where he had been a lot of officers had come in, and that he had saved his life, and that was all.

Directly after this did any other person come in?—Yes.

You do not know that person's name?—No.

Upon his coming in, what did Brunt say to him?—He shook hands with him, and asked if he knew who had informed.

What did he say?—He said "No."

Did the other man say what had happened to him?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said he had had a dreadful blow on the side, and was knocked down.

From the manner of their speaking to each other, did it appear to you as if they had been together?—Yes.

After that, did Brunt say any thing?—He said "there is something to be done yet."

Upon his saying that, what did Brunt and the other man do?—They went away together.

After they were gone, did your mistress and you go into the back room?—Yes.

What did you find there?—There were several rolls of brown paper in the cupboard, with tar in them.

Any other things?—Yes, there were four large balls made of string, with tar on them.

What do you now understand them to be?—I have heard since they are called hand-grenades.

Any iron pot?—Yes.

To whom did that belong?—To Brunt.

Did you find any bags?—Yes.

Of what?—Made of bits of flannel.

Full or empty?—Two of them were full of something.

Was there any pole or stick in the room?—There was a long pole.

Did your mistress leave them there?—Yes.

About what time did your master come home?—About eleven o'clock.

Did he give you any directions what to do in the morning?—Yes; he told me to get up, and clean his boots.

Did you get up early, and clean his boots?—Yes.

Did he then ask you, whether you knew any place?—Yes.

What place did he ask you whether you knew?—He asked me whether I knew the Borough; I told him "yes."

What did he ask you next?—He asked me if I knew Snow's-field's; I told him "no."

That is a street in the Borough?—Yes.

What direction did he give you?—He directed me to go to Kirby-street, Snow's-fields.

To whom?—To a person of the name of Potter.

What did he tell you you were to take there?—He said he had got some things in the back room for me to take.

Did he and you go together into the back room?—Yes.

Taking with you what?—We took each a rush basket.

What did he do, or direct you to do with respect to those baskets?—He told me to put the things that were in the cupboard into the basket.

Were all the things put into the two baskets?—Yes.

Except the pole which was too large?—Yes, and the iron pot.

After that, was any thing done with either of the baskets?—Yes.

What?—One of them was tied up in a blue apron.

Belonging to whom?—To Mrs. Brunt.

What use had been made of that blue apron before?—It had been made use of as a curtain to the window of that room.

Was the other tied up?—No, we went into Brunt's room to look for something to tie it up, and two officers came in,

And took him?—They did.

Did the officers go into the back room and take the things?—Yes.

Thomas Smart sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

Are you one of the watchmen of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square?—Yes.

Were you on duty on the night of the 22nd of February, in Grosvenor-square?—Yes, I was.

Did you observe any persons there?—I observed four about the square.

Was there any thing particular about those men that made you recollect them?—I thought that they were after no good, and I went up to them; two were very tall men and one was a man of colour.

Do you mean a black man?—Yes.

Charles Bissir sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You are a watchman of St. George's?—I am in Grosvenor-square.

Were you on duty in Grosvenor-square on the night of the 22nd of February?—I was.

Was your attention called to any persons particularly?—As I was calling half-past eight o'clock, that would be a quarter before nine, there were two men passed me, one was a man of colour.

What were they doing?—Taking particular notice of the houses.

Of what house?—They took particular notice of lord Harrowby's, and likewise of Mr. Maberley's in Grosvenor-square.

Henry Gillan sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You live at No. 15, Mount-street, Berkeley-square?—Yes.

Do you know the Rising Sun public-house?—Yes.

Where is that?—The corner of Adams Mews, in Charles-street, Grosvenor-square.

Were you in that public-house on the 22nd of February last?—Yes.

While you were there did you see any persons come in?—Yes.

Who were they?—Two men; Brunt was one, and Adams was the other.

Had they any thing to eat and drink?—Yes; a pot of beer and some bread and cheese.

Did any thing pass between you? did you amuse yourselves in any way?—No, nothing more than while we were playing; there was no particular conversation.

What did you play at?—Brunt challenged me to play at dominos, and I played him two games.

What time did they go away?—I do not know; I went away first.

At what time did you go?—I went about ten o'clock.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You mean ten at night I suppose?—Yes.

Edward Simpson sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You are corporal-major of the 2nd regiment of Life-guards?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner Harrison?—Yes.

Was he in that regiment?—Yes.

Was he ever at the barracks in King-street?—Yes.

Was he quartered there?—It is not a barrack for men, it is only for horses.

Was he acquainted with those barracks, and the interior of them?—Perfectly so.

Have you any windows, or had you any windows which looked out into the Mews?—Yes; into Gloucester-mews.

Are they walled up?—Yes; they have been since the affair in Cato-street.

Are those windows so situate, that fire-balls could have been thrown into them?—Yes, into one of them particularly.

Was there any hay or straw there?—There was some quantity of straw within about two feet of the window.

Mr. Adolphus.—What do you mean by some quantity?—Perhaps two or three waggon loads.

John Hector Morison sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

Are you a journeyman to Mr. Henry Thomas Underwood, of Drury-lane, a cutler?—Yes.

Were you so at Christmas last?—Yes.

Do you recollect any of the prisoners coming with a sword there?—The prisoner Ings brought one to be ground at Christmas.

What sort of a sword was it?—A small one; a scimitar.

Have you seen that sword since?—I have.

In the possession of the officers?—Yes.

What direction did he give with it?—It was to be ground sharp from the heel to the point, and likewise the back of the point to be ground.

Who called for it?—The prisoner Ings called for it, about three days after he left it.

Did he approve of the manner in which it was ground?—Yes.

Did he bring you any one after that?—Yes; in about a fortnight afterwards, he brought me a very long one.

Who called for that?—He called for it himself.

What directions did he give as to that?—He said the first one was ground to his liking, and I was to grind that in the same manner.

Did he leave any name?—He left a name, as I understood him, Eames; the second time I did not ask him his name.

James Aldous sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You are a pawnbroker, I believe?—I am.

Do you know the prisoner Davidson, the man of colour?—I do.

Did he ever pawn with you a brass-barrelled blunderbuss?—He did.

Do you recollect on what day he pawned it?—In January.

Did he redeem it; and if so, when?—On the 23rd of February.

Have you seen that blunderbuss since?—I have; Mr. Ruthven shewed it to me; I believe it to be the same that was pledged and redeemed.

John Monument sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are at present a prisoner in the Tower of London?—Yes.

What are you by trade?—A shoemaker.

Where did you live before you were confined?—No. 8, Garden-court, Baldwin's-gardens.

That is near Brook's-market, I believe?—Yes.

Do you remember, at any time, seeing Thistlewood at a person of the name of Ford's?—Yes.

As nearly as you can tell, how far back is that from the time when you were apprehended?—I suppose near three months.

In consequence of your meeting Thistlewood at Mr. Ford's, did Thistlewood afterwards call upon you?—Yes.

How long was that after you had seen him?—I believe about a fortnight or three weeks.

Did he call alone, or in company with any person?—In company with Brunt.

The prisoner, John Thomas Brunt?—Yes.

Were you at home alone at that time, or in company with any person?—My mother and my brother.

What is your brother's name?—Thomas Monument.

After Thistlewood had been in your room for some little time, did Thistlewood make any proposal to you to go out?—He said he wished to speak with me.

In consequence of that, did you and Thistlewood go out of the room?—Yes.

Leaving Brunt in the room with your brother Thomas Monument?—Yes.

When you went out of the room with Thistlewood, will you tell us what Thistlewood said to you?—Yes; he said that great events were at hand, that people were everywhere anxious for a change, that he had been promised support by a great many men who had deceived him, but now he had got men who would stand by him.

What further did he say?—He then asked me whether I had any arms.

What did you say to that?—I said, "no;" he said that every one ought to have arms; "all of us," says he, "have got arms; some," says he, "have got a pistol, some have got a pike, and some have got a sabre." He said I could buy a pistol for about four or five shillings. I told him I had no money to buy pistols; he then said he would see what he could do.

Do you recollect any thing more that passed?—I do not recollect any thing more.

Did you return again into the room?—Yes.

Did you find Brunt there?—Yes.

Did Thistlewood and Brunt go away together?—Yes.

Do you recollect Brunt calling upon you on Tuesday the 22nd of February?—Yes.

Did he call alone, or in company with any person?—In company with Tidd.

Were you alone in your room when he called, or in company with any other person?—My brother was with me.

Thomas Monument?—Yes.

What did you say?—I said, on his coming, "I thought I had lost you;" and he said "the king's death has made an alteration in our plans."

What did you say to that?—I asked him what plans; he said there was to be a meeting the following evening up at Tyburn-turnpike, where I should hear all the particulars; he then turned to Tidd, and asked him whether he should give me the word.

What said Tidd to that?—Tidd said, yes, he supposed there was no danger.

Upon that did he give you the word?—Yes; he told me when I came to the place, if I saw any people about to say b, u, t.

What was the place?—Tyburn-turnpike; he did not tell me any particular place, and if they were friends they would answer t, o, n; he said he should be at our house again in the morning to tell me more about it, and at what time it was to take place.

By the morning, do you mean the next morning?—Yes, the Wednesday morning.

Did he call again the next morning?—No, he did not call till about half-past four o'clock.

Did he come alone?—Yes.

What did he say when he came there?—He called me down stairs.

Was your brother Thomas Monument, there?—Yes, he called me down stairs, and told me I must go with him in half-an-hour; I told him I could not go so soon as that; he asked me "why?" I told him I had got some work to do that must be done; he asked me at what time it would be done; I told him about six o'clock; he said he could not wait so late as that, so that I must go with Tidd, the person whom he brought the day before, and he told me where he lived.

Where was that?—In Hole-in-the-wall Passage, leading to Dorington-street.

Did you, in consequence of this, go to Tidd's house?—Yes.

About what time?—About half-past six.

Did you find Tidd at home?—Yes.

What did he say to you?—He said he had been waiting for some more people to go with him that he expected would be there, but if no one else came before seven o'clock, we should go together.

Did any persons arrive before seven o'clock?—No.

Then when seven o'clock came, what did

Tidd do?—He went to a corner of the room, and took a pistol.

What did he do with it?—Put it in a belt that he had got round his body, underneath his great coat.

What else did he do?—He took about six or eight pikes, wrapped up in brown paper.

Do you mean pike-handles or pike-heads?—Pike-heads; and a staff about four feet long, with a hole in one end of it.

Was that hole adapted to receive one of the pike-heads?—Yes.

After he had equipped himself in this way, what did he do?—He went down stairs.

Did you go with him?—Yes, into Brook's-street, and from Brook's-street into Holborn, and along into Oxford-street.

Did he tell you what you were going to do?—No.

What passed between you?—When we were in Holborn, he gave me the pike-handle, and told me to carry that; as we were going along Oxford-street, I think it was, I asked him to tell me where we were going to; he said I should know when I got to the place; I had asked him before we came out of the room what place it was up at Tyburn-turnpike we were going to; he said it was at a mews up by the Edgware-road.

In going up Oxford-street, he told you you would know what you were going to do when you got to the place?—Yes; I asked him whether we were going to the House of Commons; he said no, there were too many soldiers there; I then asked him again where we were going to, and he told me we were going to Grosvenor-square.

Did he say to whose house in Grosvenor-square?—No, he did not; I asked him whether any one in particular lived in Grosvenor-square; he said there was to be a cabinet dinner there.

Did any further conversation that you remember, pass between you before you got to Cato-street?—No, I do not recollect any.

Did you go under an archway?—Yes.

Were there any persons under that archway?—Two persons stood under that archway.

Had they any conversation with Tidd?—There were some few words passed which I could not understand; he was before me.

How far is the stable from the archway?—It is directly under the archway; you turn to the right hand.

Did you go into the stable?—Yes.

What did you see when you first went into the stable?—There were three or four men there.

Did Tidd go into the stable with you?—Yes.

Were those men in the stable armed?—I cannot say.

Was there any light in the stable?—Yes, one.

Did you go up the ladder?—Yes.

That is at the further end?—Yes, on the left hand.

You went up into the loft?—Yes.

Did you find people there?—Yes.

How many might there be in the whole, do you suppose, below and up stairs?—I should have supposed, from the appearance, two or three-and-twenty; but some one spoke soon after I got in about counting them, and Thistlewood said there was no occasion for counting them, there were five-and-twenty.

Was there any thing like a table or carpenter's bench?—Yes.

What was upon that?—A quantity of swords and pistols.

Was there a light there?—Yes, there was one light; I do not know whether there were any more.

You observed but one light?—No, I do not recollect any more.

Was that light on the bench?—Yes.

After you got up into the loft what passed?—There was a man in a brown great coat, sitting on a low bench, on the other side of the carpenter's bench.

Near the ladder?—No, on the other side; he was speaking of the impropriety of going to lord Harrowby's; that was the first time I heard the name I think; he spoke of the impropriety of going to lord Harrowby's with so small a number as five-and-twenty men. Thistlewood said, that number was quite sufficient, for there only wanted fourteen men to go into the room, and supposing that lord Harrowby had sixteen men servants, that number would be quite sufficient; the man in the brown coat said, "When we come out, of course there will be a crowd of people round the door, how are we to make our escape?" Thistlewood said, "You know the largest party of us are already gone." Davidson then said,—

Davidson, the black?—Yes; he told him not to throw cold water upon their proceedings, for if he was afraid of his life, he might go, they would do without him; and Brunt said, sooner than they should go from the business they were about, he would go into the house by himself and blow them all up, if he perished with them; says he, "you know we have got that that can do it," and after that the man in the brown great coat said, that though he did not like going with so small a number, yet as they were all for it, he would not be against it; he then proposed that they should all put themselves under the orders of Thistlewood.

That man proposed?—Yes; Thistlewood then said, that every one engaged in it would have the same honour as himself; he then proposed that the fourteen who were to go into the room should volunteer from the persons that were there assembled.

In consequence of that proposal of Thistlewood's, what was done?—About twelve or thirteen in a few minutes volunteered, and those that were to do that were to go to the other side of the room; the right hand side going in.

Can you give us the names of some of those that so volunteered?—Tidd, Brunt—

Brunt, the prisoner?—Yes; Davidson, Wilson—

Ings?—No; I do not recollect seeing him there.

Hall?—I do not know Hall's person.

Do you know Harrison?—I was brought to the Tower with him, but I did not know him before, till I saw him at the Secretary of State's office.

These you have mentioned were among the twelve or thirteen?—Yes.

What took place about this time?—Thistlewood stepped down stairs, and he came up stairs again, and said, that they had received intelligence that the duke of Wellington and lord Sidmouth had just arrived; I do not recollect any thing more passing till the officers came up.

When the officers came up, what took place?—They came into the room; I did not see them till there were two or three in the room; they told them to surrender, that they were officers; they told them there was a guard of soldiers below.

You yourself were taken into custody when the soldiers came?—Yes, I was taken into custody up stairs.

*John Monument cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.*

Have you been reading Paine's Age of Reason?—I have read it.

Did that turn you from Christianity?—No, it did not, because the bishop of Llandaff's answer was with it.

You had, then, an antidote?—Yes; after I had read that, I got a person to lend me the bishop of Llandaff's answer, which I have now.

Then you mean to represent yourself as having been a Christian all along?—I cannot say but that that book shook my faith; but I kept on reading the bishop of Llandaff all along with it, till I saw that he completely answered him.

And it had no ill effect upon your principles?—No.

What political society have you belonged to?—I have not belonged to any.

You never mixed at all in those political meetings?—Yes, I was at two.

You took no part with them?—Yes, at two meetings.

And at only two?—At only two.

How long have you known Brunt?—I never saw him till Thistlewood brought him.

How long have you known Thistlewood?—I never saw him, except at the public meetings, till I saw him at Mr. Ford's.

Having known very little of Thistlewood, and nothing of Brunt, you consented to go with Brunt and Tidd, not knowing what you were going about, as I understand you?—No, I did not.

You saw Tidd arm himself?—Yes.

And you accompanied him?—Yes.

As you went up Oxford-road, you asked him whether you were going to the House of Commons?—Yes.

VOL. XXXIII.

Seeing him going armed, and to meet others, and supposing you were going to the House of Commons, what did you suppose you were going about?—I naturally thought they were going to attack it.

You thought they were going to murder the members of the House of Commons, that is a delicate way of putting it; did you think they were going to murder the members?—I did not know; that was the reason I asked.

Still you went with him?—Yes, I did.

Having reason to believe that something was intended?—Yes.

But you had no reason to believe what was going to be done till you got to Cato-street?—No.

Now, remember what you told me the other day, "He told me it was a cabinet dinner and then I knew what he was going about?"—I certainly thought it could be for no other purpose but to destroy the persons there.

And you, a Christian, whose principles had never been shaken, joined them in it?—I was forced to join it, I could not get away.

What forced you to Tidd's, and forced you along the streets?—Fear.

You told us just now, that a man in a brown coat was told he might retire; why did not you retire?—I should have been loth to take him at his word.

It was fear brought you into it, and fear kept you in it?—Yes, it was.

*Thomas Monument sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.*

You are the brother, I believe, of the last witness?—Yes.

Do you remember Thistlewood at any time coming to his house?—Yes, he did; he came one evening.

Did he come alone, or in company with some person?—He came in company with Brunt.

With Brunt the prisoner?—Yes.

After they had been some little time in the room, did your brother go out with Thistlewood? what did Thistlewood say?—He asked if he could speak with him.

In consequence of that, did Thistlewood and your brother go out?—Yes, they did.

Did Brunt remain behind in the room?—Yes, he did.

About how long, as well as you can recollect, were Thistlewood and your brother out of the room?—I do not suppose they were out above two or three minutes.

After they returned into the room, did Brunt and Thistlewood go away together?—Yes, they did.

Do you remember on Tuesday the 22nd of February Brunt calling again upon your brother?—Yes.

Did he call alone, or in company with any person?—He called in company with a man of the name of Tidd.

Tell us what passed when he came in; what did your brother say to Tidd?—When Brunt came in, my brother said, "I thought I had lost you;" there was something passed concerning the king's death. Brunt said, that the king's death had made some alteration in their plans. My brother made answer, and asked him what plans; he said, they had different objects in view.

Do you recollect any thing further?—No; I recollect Brunt asking Tidd, whether he should give us an outline of the plan; I do not know whether Tidd made any answer, I did not hear; but Brunt then said he would give us the pass-word, which consisted of the letters b, u, t; that we were to meet on the following evening at Tyburn turnpike at six o'clock, and if any of their party were there, they would answer t, o, n.

Were you asked to go?—Yes; I was asked to go.

Did you refuse or consent?—I did neither the one nor the other; I suppose they expected me, but they chiefly directed their discourse to my brother; I suppose they did not know me.

Do you remember on the following day, the Wednesday, Brunt calling again on your brother?—Yes, he called between four and five o'clock; he could not go just then.

Tell us what passed; what did Brunt say?—He only asked him if he was ready to go; we were busy at work; my brother told him he could not go then; and Brunt told him when he was ready to go, he was to call in Hole-in-the-wall Passage on Tidd, and he would take him.

After Brunt had said this, did he go away?—Yes, he did.

What time did your brother go out?—It was nearly seven o'clock, as nearly as I can recollect.

Did you yourself go?—No, I did not.

Your brother did not come home again?—No; I never saw him afterwards, till he was in custody.

Mr. Solicitor General.—If your lordship will permit me, I will ask John Monument one question which I forgot.

Lord Chief Baron.—If you please.

John Monument called again.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

Do you remember being taken to Whitehall?—Yes.

Were you secured in any way?—I was kept with about two or three officers.

Were you handcuffed to any person?—When I was taken to Whitehall the first day?

Either day?—I cannot exactly say; I know I was put into a room by myself.

Did any conversation pass between you and Thistlewood?—Yes, that was the last day; I thought you were asking as to the first day.

Was Brunt in the room then?—Yes.

Were the other prisoners in the room?—Yes.

They went for the purpose of being examined?—Yes; we were all put in the room together.

Can you recollect what Thistlewood told you?—He told me, when I came to be examined before the privy-council, I was to say that it was Edwards led me into the meeting, that it was through Edwards I came there.

What did you say to that?—I said, how can I tell that falsehood when I never saw the person; he said it was of no consequence; if you are asked what sort of a person he was, you may say that he was not much taller than yourself, of a sallow complexion, and dressed in a brown great coat.

Do you remember being seated round the room at Whitehall?—Yes.

What did Thistlewood say?—He told me that Edwards was the person that betrayed them, and to pass it round among the other prisoners; I did not like to do it; I told him I should be noticed, and he leaned over to another prisoner.

Who was that?—Bradburn was sitting next to me, but Bradburn would not take notice of what Thistlewood said.

Did he lean past for the purpose of communicating it beyond?—Yes.

Did you ever see Edwards?—No.

Thomas Hiden sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

I believe you have carried on the business of a cow-keeper and dairyman, in Manchester-mews?—I have.

You have now the misfortune to be in prison for debt?—I have.

When were you arrested?—A week ago, last Wednesday-morning.

You were taken in execution for debt?—Yes; I had a law-suit, and lost the cause.

Do you know the prisoner Wilson?—Yes, I do, perfectly well.

Did Wilson make any proposition to you to be one of a party to do any thing?—A few days before the 23rd, he asked me if I would be one of a party to destroy all his majesty's ministers.

Did he say where they were to be destroyed?—He said at a cabinet dinner; he told me they had got all things ready, and were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and that they had got such things as I never saw.

Did he say what sort of things?—He said, large things bound round with tarpaulin and cords, and filled full of nails and iron and other things, and that the strength of them was very strong.

Did he say what effect they would have?—He said if they were lighted, they would heave up one of the walls of the houses on the other side of the way in the street that we were walking in.

Did he say what more they intended to do?—He said they were waiting for a cabinet dinner; that they meant to set fire to some houses, and by keeping the town in a state of confusion for a few days, it would become general; he said those things were to be put into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner.

The things with the tarpaulin?—Yes; and they meant to set fire to lord Harrowby's house.

What did they say would be the effect of putting them into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner?—He said that all who escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon.

Did he mention to you the names of any persons whose houses were to be set fire to?—The duke of Wellington's, lord Harrowby's, lord Sidmouth's, lord Castlereagh's, the bishop of London's, and one more that I cannot remember.

Did you tell him you would be one?—He told me they should depend upon me for making one, and I told him I would.

Before the 23rd, did you write a letter to my lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Did you go to his house?—I did.

You did not get access to him?—I did not.

After you had done that, did you go and watch lord Harrowby out of his house to Hyde-park?—I did; I went two or three times; at last I saw a gentleman mount his horse, and go towards the park.

Did you deliver to him the letter you had written to lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Is that the letter? (showing a letter to the witness.)—This is the very letter.

I do not ask you what passed between his lordship and you; the next day did you see Wilson again?—Between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, I was going up Manchester-street with one of my little girls, he said, "Hiden, you are the man I want to see."

What more did he say?—I said, "Wilson, what is there going to be?" and he said, there is a cabinet dinner to-night at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square; I asked him where they were going to meet; he told me I was to go up into John-street, and at a public-house the corner of Cato-street, the sign of the Horse and Groom; and there I was to stop in the public house, or to stop at the corner at the post till I was shoved into a stable close by.

What did you ask him next?—I asked him what time I was to meet him, and he said I was to meet them at a quarter before six, or by six o'clock at furthest; and if I did not make haste, the grand thing would be done before I came.

Upon this, did you ask him any further questions?—I asked how many there were to be, and he said between twenty and thirty; I asked him if that was all the party that was in Cato-street, and he said there was another party; one party in Gray's-in-lane, another party in the Borough, another in Gee's-court, or in the city, I am not certain which.

Did he say any thing more about Gee's-court?—He told me I had no occasion to be alarmed, all Gee's-court was in it.

What description of persons live in Gee's-court?—I believe them to be almost all Irish, what I know of them.

It is in Oxford-street?—One end of it runs into Oxford-street.

Did he say any thing about the Irishmen?—He said the Irishmen were all in it, but they would not act till the Englishmen began first; as the Englishmen had so often deceived the Irish, they would not begin before the English had.

Did he mention what places those parties were to go to?—He said our party was to go to lord Harrowby's, and do the grand thing, and then all parties were to retire and meet some-where about the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house.

Did he mention what was to be done in other places?—He told me there was two pieces of cannon that would be very easily taken by knocking in a small door.

Did he mention any others to be got elsewhere?—He said there were four others, at some Artillery-ground—I do not remember where—which were easily to be got at by killing a sentry.

Did you then leave him?—I then, I believe, left him.

Did you go to John-street that evening?—I did.

At about what time?—Between six and seven o'clock, I believe it to have been near seven when I got there.

When you got near the gateway by the Horse and Groom, whom did you see?—When I got near the gateway, I there met Wilson and Davidson the coloured man standing near a post.

Had you known Davidson before?—Yes.

And conversed with him?—Yes, many times.

I do not, at present, ask you what had passed between you; what did Wilson say?—Wilson said, "You are come;" I said, "Yes, I am come, but I am behind my time;" I told him that I had to get some cream, which I was obligated to go and get.

Did Davidson then say any thing?—Davidson asked me if I was going in; he said if I was going in, Mr. Thistlewood was in there.

Did you ask them any question?—I asked them what time they would go away from there, as I must go and get some cream; and he told me they meant to leave that place about eight o'clock.

Did he tell you what you were to do, if they should be gone?—They told me, if they were gone from there before I came back, I must follow them to Grosvenor-square, the fourth house from the corner, at the bottom, on the other side, I should find them.

Thomas Hiden cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

How long have you known Wilson?—Four, or five, or six months.

You must have been very intimate with him, I should think?—I have been a good deal with him, at a master tailor's, a friend of mine that worked for me, Mr. Clarke's.

I observed, the very thing he asked you was, whether you would be one of a party to kill his majesty's ministers?—He did; he asked me, whether I would be one of a party to destroy his majesty's ministers.

And you told him you would?—I did.

Had you been at those political meetings?—I had never been to any but two; I went to what they called a shoemakers' club twice.

I do not ask as to shoemakers' clubs?—I was induced by my friend Mr. Clarke to go with him to it on a Sunday-evening.

And you found yourself mistaken when you got there?—There was nothing particular that evening.

You went again?—Yes, another Sunday night; and those were the only two times I was ever there.

You never did attend those private meetings?—I never was at a private meeting in my life.

You will swear that?—Yes.

Do you know a man of the name of Bennett?—I do, perfectly well.

What is the Bennett you know?—I know one Bennett a bricklayer.

Did you ever persuade him to attend those meetings?—I never persuaded him; I said one evening, when Mr. Clarke called on me, "I dare say Mr. Bennett will go with us."

Did not you tell him something was to be done for the good of your country, and persuade him to go?—I said perhaps he would go; there was Mr. Clarke as well as me.

Did you not persuade him to go, and tell him something was to be done for the good of this country?—I cannot swear that I did, nor that I did not; I asked him to go down to the shoemakers' club with us.

Look at the jury?—I can look at them.

Did you not persuade him to go, and tell him that something was to be done for the good of the country?—I cannot say positively that I did.

Will you swear you did not?—I asked him, whether he would go down with my friend Clark and me to a club; we were all neighbours together.

He will be called to contradict you if you deny it; did not you persuade him to go and tell him that something was to be done for the good of the country?—I cannot say; I asked him if he would go with me.

Will you deny that you told him something was to be done for the good of your country?—Upon my oath, I do not think I did.

Will you deny it, or admit it?—I can say no more than I recollect.

You will not deny it, nor admit it?—I cannot say further.

The first time that you saw Wilson was the 23rd of February?—It was, till I came into this court.

It was not till the 23rd that you knew the meeting was to be in Cato-street?—Yes, it was before the 23rd I knew there was to be a meeting.

Was it told you where till the 23rd?—No, it was not.

You did not know it till the 23rd?—I did not, till the afternoon of the 23rd.

And you made your communication to Lord Harrowby on the 22nd?—I have not said that.

Mr. Gurney.—No, he has not fixed the day.

Mr. Carwood.—It was before the 23rd?—Yes.

You did not communicate to his lordship the place where the meeting was to be?—I did not.

You wrote the letter yourself?—I did.

Take a pen and write a word or two?

Mr. Gurney.—It should be at the table.

Mr. Carwood.—I am told he cannot write at all; I may be misinformed.

Witness.—There is my name—(handing in the paper)—is that enough? I am not much of a scholar.

Mr. Carwood.—Yes; it is a mistake certainly; I was told he could not write.

Brunt.—My lord, I desire that witness may leave the court.

Wilson.—Turn him out of court.

[The prisoners hissed the witness as he passed the bar.]

The Earl of Harrowby sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

You are a privy councillor, and one of his majesty's ministers?—I am.

Be good enough to enumerate the noblemen and gentlemen who compose what is called the cabinet?—My lord chancellor; the earl of Westmoreland, lord privy seal; the earl of Liverpool, first lord of the Treasury; Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the Exchequer; my lord Castlereagh, secretary of state for the foreign department; lord Sidmouth, secretary of state for the home department; my lord Bathurst, secretary of state for the colonial department; lord Melville, first lord of the Admiralty; the duke of Wellington, master-general of the Ordnance; Mr. Robinson, president of the Board of Trade; Mr. Bragge Bathurst, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Canning, president of the India board; Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the Mint; and the earl of Mulgrave.

Has it been usual for those noblemen and gentlemen to give what are called cabinet dinners?—It has.

In consequence of the death of his late majesty, had those dinners been suspended?—They had.

Had your lordship intended to give a cabinet dinner on the 23rd of February last?—Certainly.

How long before that day had the cards of invitation been issued by your lordship?—I believe on the Friday or the Saturday preceding; probably on the Saturday.

Did your lordship, before the 23rd of February, see the witness who has been just examined, Hiden?—I saw him in the Park, near Grosvenor-gate; he is the same person whom I have just seen examined.

On what day was it?—On Tuesday, the 22nd of February.

At what time of the day?—I believe between two and three o'clock, but I am not quite positive.

Did he give you any letter addressed to my lord Castlereagh?—He did.

Is that the letter? (showing a letter to his lordship)—That is the letter.

Had your lordship any conversation with him at that time?—I had.

Did you ask him for his name and address?—I asked him whether he had put his name and address in the letter, as he had expressed a wish to have further communication with me; he told me he had not, and he then gave me his card, containing his name and address.

When did you see this person again?—I saw him again by appointment the next morning, in the ring in Hyde-park.

You appointed to meet him there to avoid observation?—As he appeared to me to be afraid of continuing the conversation with me when I met him at Grosvenor-gate (having appointed to meet him at Grosvenor-gate), when I came there I told him to go on to the ring, and I met him there on the Wednesday-morning.

Was the dinner given at your lordship's house on the Wednesday?—It was not.

Did the preparations for the dinner go on until the evening of the Wednesday?—The preparations for the dinner went on as if it had been to take place.

At what hour did your lordship apprise your servants that it would not take place?—I wrote a note from the earl of Liverpool's, where I was dining, between seven and eight o'clock on the Wednesday-evening, to inform my principal servant that the dinner would not take place.

I forgot to ask your lordship whether those noblemen and gentlemen, whom your lordship has named, are privy councillors?—They are.

They are all principal servants of his majesty in the administration of the government?—Yes, they are privy councillors, and form what is called the cabinet council.

*John Baker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.*

I believe you are a butler to the earl of Harrowby?—I am.

Do you remember, by his direction, sending out cards of invitation to a cabinet dinner to be had at his house on the 23rd of February?—I do.

On what day were those cards of invitation issued?—The 18th or the 19th; I believe on Saturday the 19th.

When did you first receive intimation that the cabinet would not dine at lord Harrowby's house?—About eight o'clock on the Wednesday-evening, or it might be ten minutes after eight.

Up to that period, had the preparations for the dinner gone on in the expectation that the cabinet would dine there?—Every thing entirely; nobody had an idea to the contrary.

Do you remember whether on that night there was any party at the archbishop of York's, whose house adjoins lord Harrowby's?—I believe there was; I saw carriages stopping at the door.

About the dinner hour?—It was rather before the dinner hour that was to be at lord Harrowby's; it was between six and seven o'clock.

Lord Chief Baron.—The archbishop of York lives the next house to the earl of Harrowby's?—Yes, the next house coming out at the door.

*Richard Munday sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.*

Where do you live?—At No. 3, Cato-street.

Do you know a stable in that street?—Yes.

Do you remember, on the 23rd of February last, seeing any body go into that stable?—Yes.

What time of the day was it when you first saw any body go there?—About three o'clock in the afternoon.

Whom did you see then?—I saw Harrison in the stable.

Whom did you see afterwards?—I came home from work about half after four, or twenty minutes after four, and I saw Davidson walking up and down the archway that leads to the stable.

Where did he go to after he had been walking up and down?—I do not know; I went in and got my tea, and came out again; and I had occasion to go to the chandler's shop to get some coffee, and after that I returned and got a pint of beer, and after that I had occasion to come out opposite to the stable, and I saw Davidson pass with two candles in his hand.

What time might this be?—A quarter after six.

Did he do any thing with those candles?—Yes, he went and lighted one of them, and took it into the stable.

How many people did you see go in and out of this stable?—I saw two going in and three coming out as I passed for the coffee and back again.

Did you see more people than those at any time?—Not at that time; after Davidson, I saw two go in, and then one go in.

Did you observe, in the course of the day, whether any thing had been put up?—Yes; when I came home to watering in the afternoon, I heard a knocking, and looked up, and they were nailing up a coarse bread bag, or something of that kind, to prevent any person looking in; I thought it was to keep out the coldness of the weather.

Do you know whether that stable had been occupied shortly before that?—Mr. Firth removed his cows just before Christmas.

Had it been unoccupied from that time?—Yes, it had.

George Caylock sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—At No. 2, Cato-street.

Did you see any person on the 23rd of February, who attracted your attention?—Yes; a man of the name of Harrison.

Where did you see him?—I saw him go into the stable.

Did he say any thing about the stable?—He said he had taken two chambers, and was cleaning them up.

Did you see any persons go into that stable that evening?—Yes; I suppose from twenty to twenty-five I saw go in and out.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

You are a constable at the public office at Bow-street?—I am.

Were you directed, on the 23rd of February last, to go to Cato-street, Edgware-road?—I was.

At what time did you get there?—About six o'clock, when I first went.

Did you go alone, or with any party of police officers?—I had three then.

Were you afterwards joined by more?—I was.

Did you go to the Horse-and-Groom public-house, when you first went?—I did.

When you were in that house, did you see either of the prisoners at the bar come in?—Cooper and Gilchrist.

Did Cooper bring any thing with him?—A stick.

What sort of a stick?—A mop-stick.

Did he leave that stick?—He did.

Did you take possession of that stick?—I did.

You have it?—I have it.

After this did you go into any stable?—I did.

At what time did you enter the stable?—About half-past eight, as near as can be.

Upon going in, what did you observe?—I observed a man with a gun on his shoulder, and a sword by his side.

What was he doing?—Walking backwards and forwards, appearing as a sentinel.

Do you know at all who that man was?—I do not.

What did you do?—I called on the party following me to seize that man, and take care of him.

What did you yourself do?—I went up a ladder in the stable.

There was a ladder from the stable communicating with the room above?—There was.

When you reached the top of the ladder, what presented itself to you?—I saw several men; I saw a bench, and heard the clattering of arms.

Did you perceive any arms?—I did.

Of what description?—Swords and pistols.

Did any of the officers go up with you?—

They did.

Which of them?—Ellis and Smithers.

Did you see any body in the room whom you knew?—Yes.

State who that person was?—Thistlewood.

Where was Thistlewood?—He stood on the right of the bench, as we went up stairs.

Had you known Thistlewood before?—I had.

Did you say any thing on having gained the loft?—I did; I said, "we are officers, seize their arms."

Did Thistlewood do any thing upon that?—He did; he drew a sword from the table, and retired into the small room on one side.

With his sword in his hand?—Yes.

Was there any light in the first room, in the loft?—There was.

Was there any light in the small room?—There was.

What did Thistlewood do with that sword?—He stood fencing with it; shaking his arm round in that sort of way.

Whilst he was so fencing with it, did Smithers advance towards him?—He did.

On Smithers advancing to him, what did Thistlewood do?—He put his arm forward in that manner (describing it), and stabbed him.

What became of Smithers?—He fell back, saying, "Oh, my God!" or, "Oh, I am done;" I do not know which.

He was killed?—He fell against me, he died directly, I believe; I heard no more.

What further passed?—A pistol was fired, and the lights were put out.

What happened after the lights were put out?—In the room where Thistlewood was, I heard a voice cry out, "Kill the b——rs, throw them down stairs."

What did you do upon hearing that cry?—There was a rush towards the stairs; I joined in the cry, and got down with them.

You joined in the cry, "Aye, kill them all," and got down with them?—Yes.

On going out, did you meet the soldiers?—I did, in John-street.

Did you return?—I did.

Upon your return, did you see either of the prisoners at the bar?—I did; Tidd.

Where was Tidd?—He was then about eight or ten feet, I should think, not much more from the stable-door.

What was he doing?—He appeared to me endeavouring to get away.

Had he any thing in his hand?—I did not observe it then, till I said to somebody "Seize that man;" he then lifted his arm as if to fire, and I saw he had a pistol in his hand.

Did you seize him?—I laid hold of the arm in which he had the pistol, and swung him round, and fell upon a dung heap, and he upon me.

Did any one release you from that situation?—The soldiers were up directly, and the pistol went off.

Was Tidd taken into custody?—He was.

Did you search him?—I did.

State how he was accoutred, and what you found upon him?—He had a light-coloured leather belt round him, and two ball-cartridges.

Where were they?—In his pocket.

Did you go to the Horse and Groom?—It was in the Horse and Groom where I searched him.

Was Bradburn brought in?—He was.

Did you search him?—I did.

How was he accoutred?—He had a string tied round his waist four or five times, and he had six ball cartridges in his pocket, and three loose balls.

A string was tied round his waist as a belt or sash?—It would act as a belt to carry any thing in.

Where were the ball cartridges?—In his breeches pocket.

Where were the bullets?—In his breeches pocket.

Was Davidson brought in?—He was.

Was Davidson searched in your presence?—He was searched, while I was searching the other, I believe.

Was Wilson brought in?—He was.

Did you search Wilson, or not?—I did not.

Did Davidson say any thing when he was brought in?—He did; he damned and swore against any man that would not die in liberty's cause; he gloried in it; he likewise sung part of the song, "Scots, wha ha' wi' Wallace bled."

Did Wilson say any thing?—He said it was all up; they might knock him on the head now.

Did you return to the loft after this?—I did.

In what state did you find the loft?—I found several soldiers there, and some of the police there.

Any of the prisoners?—Four of the prisoners.

After the candle had been put out in the loft when you made your escape, was there any firing in the road or from the loft?—Many shots, I should think between twenty and thirty.

From the loft, and in the road?—Some of the shots appeared fired out of the loft; the noise was not similar to those within.

Out of the window?—Yes.

Did the shots proceed from the party that you saw in the loft?—I have no doubt of it.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Not from your party?—Certainly not.

Lord Chief Baron.—Did they shoot into the stable, any of them?—I am not aware.

Had any of your party gained the loft besides yourself, Ellis, and Smithers?—I was not aware myself of any more.

Did you fire any shot?—I did not; I attempted, but the pistol missed.

Ellis did fire once?—I have understood he did; I do not know it myself.

And Smithers not at all?—Certainly not; I can answer for him, for he was rather before at this time on my right.

James Ellis sworn.—Examined by

Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are a conductor of patrol at the public office in Bow-street?—I am.

Did you go with Rathven on the evening of the 23rd of February to Cato-street?—I did.

Were you with him when he entered the stable?—As close to him as I could possibly follow.

When you came into the stable, did you see any men in the stable?—I did.

Where did you see any one?—There was one man between the foot of the ladder and the door, with his face towards the door.

Did you observe whether he had any belts on?—He had two belts across his shoulders, white ones.

Had he any thing in his hand?—In his right hand he had a carbine or short piece, something of that kind; and at his left side, a long sword.

Did you observe, whether he was a man of colour or not?—On passing him, I turned him half-round, and looked in his face, and observed he was a man of colour.

What sized man?—A tall stoutish man.

Have you seen the prisoner Davidson?—I have; I believe it to be him.

Did you see any other person in the stable?—There was another near the manger, in the furthest stall.

Near the ladder?—Between the foot of the ladder and the manger of the further stall.

Did you observe what sort of person that was?—I had a very slight view of him, but he had a brown coat on, and appeared shorter than the man of colour, at least a dark-coloured coat.

I believe Rathven mounted the ladder first?—He did.

And you followed him?—I did.

As you were going up the ladder, did you hear any person from the stable say any thing by way of alarm to the persons above?—I did; I heard some person below say, "above men;" the last words were men, but I cannot be certain to the expression.

What did you observe, when you got up the ladder into the loft?—I observed a number of men falling back between the bench that stood in the room, towards the wall on the side of the room.

Did you observe what was upon that bench?—I observed there were lights upon it.

Did you observe any thing else; were there any arms?—There were some arms, but what I cannot say.

Do you know Thistlewood?—I knew him now.

Did you see him in the loft when you got up?—I did; he was at the end of the carpenter's bench, with two or three men, near the door leading into the little room.

Had he any thing in his hand, or did you see him take any thing in his hand?—He had a sword in his hand.

Did he move from the place where he was when you came?—Not in the first instance; not materially so; he held the sword at me, and shook it in his hand in a threatening attitude.

What did you do upon that?—I desired him to desist, or I would fire at him, at the same time presenting my pistol.

What did he do upon that?—He backed into the little room.

He retreated backwards into the little room?—Yes.

Did you see Smithers?—Yes, at that time he gained the top of the ladder.

Smithers followed you then?—Yes, up the ladder.

And by that time he gained the top of the ladder?—Yes.

Did Smithers advance towards Thistlewood?—He went straight forward, to the door of the little room.

In the direction of the little room?—From the top of the ladder to the little room is straight.

He was advancing towards the door?—Yes.

Upon his advancing, what did Thistlewood?—Made a push with his sword, and stabbed him in or near the right breast.

What happened upon that?—Upon that, I saw Smithers throw his hands up in this way [describing it], his head fell back on his shoulder, and he exclaimed, "Oh, my God!"

What did you do?—I instantly fired at the person who did it, Thistlewood.

Your fire did not take effect?—It did not.

Upon that were the lights extinguished?—At the moment that I fired, the lights were putting out; the flash of my pistol was the last light that I saw.

What ensued upon that?—Smithers fell past me, slightly against me; and a rush was made towards the ladder, and I was forced down the ladder.

Upon your getting down the ladder, did you go down by the stable into Cato-street?—I went to the door, when two shots, I believe, were fired from some part of the stable, and passed me in the door-way.

They were fired towards the door?—Yes.

And passed you as you were gaining the door?—Yes.

Was there any firing from the window of the little room?—Yes, there was; but after I saw those two shots, I saw a man fire from under the ladder in the stable up towards the manger.

In what direction did he fire?—Up towards the manger of the furthest stall; I observed he was a tall man, but I could not see any more.

Was he coming down the ladder?—He was standing with his side under the ladder in this direction, and firing into the stall.

Lord Chief Baron.—Towards your men?—Towards the manger in the stall; I do not know who were there.

Mr. Attorney General.—On your gaining the stable-door, did you find any firing from the small room?—Yes; some shots were fired out of the window of the small room.

In what direction?—Towards the stable door, as if they were pointed at me.

Did you assist in taking any of the prisoners?

—I heard the cry of "stop him," and saw a man of colour, and pursued him, and took him.

He ran in the direction towards Queen-street?—He did.

Was that Davidson?—That was Davidson.

Did he make any resistance?—He made a cut at me on my first closing in upon him, but afterwards he made no resistance.

What had he upon his person when you took him?—He had a carbine at his side, and a sword in his hand.

Was that carbine slung to him, or had he it in his hand?—I do not know whether it was or not; I almost think it was slung to him.

What did Davidson say upon his being taken?—I do not recollect any precise words at that time.

I believe you assisted in taking some of the other persons?—When I went back to the stable, after leaving Davidson with two of our people, I tied three or four of them together in the stable.

Do you know who those were?—Wilson and Monument were two of them; but the others I am not any way acquainted with.

William Westcott sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are a Bow-street officer, I believe?—I am.

On the night of the 23rd of February, did you accompany the other officers to Cato-street?—I did.

We understand that Ruthven and Ellis and Smithers went up the ladder?—Yes, they did.

Did you observe any person in the further end of the stable?—I did.

Who did that turn out to be?—Ings.

I believe you had some conflict with Ings?—Yes, I had.

While that was taking place, did you hear a confusion and firing in the loft?—I did.

And the officers came tumbling down?—They did.

After they came down, did you observe any person come down that you knew?—I did.

Who was that?—Thistlewood.

What did he do, or attempt to do to you?—He presented a pistol at my head.

Did he fire at you?—He did.

Did you throw up the pistol he had at all?—I put up my left hand to save my head.

Did the ball go through your coat?—Yes; and wounded my hand, and went through my hat.

Did he do any more to you?—I made a thrust to seize him as he fired, and I received a blow on the right side of my head, and I fell, and he made a blow at me with a sword, and rushed out of the door, and escaped.

You afterwards went up stairs, and found poor Smithers dead, and the arms there?—Yes, afterwards.

John Wright sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are a Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

You accompanied the other officers to Cato-street?—Yes.

I will not go through the particulars; did you afterwards assist in securing Ings?—Yes.

Did you search him?—No, I did not.

Did you see him searched?—No, I did not.

Had you any conflict with any man in the stable?—Yes, with the prisoner Ings; I took a knife and a sword from him.

Was that while your brother officers were in the loft?—It was.

What kind of knife?—A butcher's knife.

Any thing particular with the handle?—Tied round with wax end.

After that, I believe you were knocked down, and he escaped from you?—I was knocked down, and received a stab in my side.

He was taken shortly afterwards?—He was taken that night.

Joseph Champion sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

I believe you are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Were you in Cato-street on the evening of the 23rd of February?—I was.

Amongst others, do you remember seeing Ings there?—I do; he was standing at the foot of the ladder when we went into the stable, and as Ruthven was going up the ladder, he cried out take care above.

Was Westcott endeavouring to secure him then?—Yes; and as I was proceeding up the ladder I saw Westcott knock him down; and, as I was going up the ladder I looked behind me, and saw the lower part of a man's body in the hay-rack.

At this time, were there any shots fired?—Several from up stairs; and imagining this person was going to fire at us, I proceeded to the rack to beat him on the legs, to drive him back into the loft again.

Who was that?—I do not know.

After this, did you see any body in Cato-street with a sword?—I saw Thistlewood running up Cato-street waving his sword as he went along; during this time Ings had escaped, and I pursued him up John-street into the Edgware road, where I found Ings in the possession of Brooks and the watchman; I assisted in securing him, and took him to Mary-le-bone watch-house, there we searched him.

What did you find upon him?—On taking off his great coat, he had two haversacks across his arms, one on each arm, slung by cross-belts.

What did you find in his pockets?—There was a tin case with some loose powder in it: three pistol balls, a pistol key, and the case of a large knife.

Lord Chief Baron.—In one of the haversacks you found something?—A tin case of loose powder.

VOL. XXXIII.

Lieutenant Frederick Fitzclarence sworn.—

Examined by Mr. Bolland.

You are in the Coldstream-guards?—I am.

On the 23rd February were you applied to, to go with a picquet to Cato-street?—I was.

What time did you reach it?—About eight o'clock.

What did you first perceive on arriving there?—In John-street I met a police-officer, who cried out, "Soldiers, soldiers! the doorway, stable!" I ran on, and met two men at the door, one of whom presented a pistol, and the other made a cut at me; I parried his cut, and exchanged several cuts, but seeing the body of the picquet coming up, he ran into the stable; I followed him; and on entering the stable, I ran up against a man who cried out, ["Do not kill me and I will tell you all;"] I gave him over to the picquet, and went into the stable into one of the stalls, where I took another man, I gave him also to the soldiers; I then led the men up the ladder into the hay-loft, where I found three, four, or five men, and a quantity of arms on the table; the soldiers came up and took them all into custody.

Did you see any person lying upon the floor of the loft?—Yes, I did, he was rising; half lying and half rising.

Did you find any person?—Yes, I did; on lifting my feet, I touched the feet of poor Smithers.

Samuel Hercules Taunton sworn.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are an officer of Bow-street?—Yes, I am.

On the morning of Thursday the 24th of February, did you go to the lodgings of the prisoner Brunt?—I did.

Did you apprehend him?—I did.

At about what hour?—Between seven and eight in the morning.

What room did you find him in?—In a front two-pair of stairs room.

You had, I suppose, another officer with you?—There was.

Did you leave him in the front room in custody of that officer, and go and search the back-room two pair of stairs?—Yes, I did.

I need not take the enumeration of that now, but did you find a quantity of fire-balls, grenades, gunpowder and other things?—I did.

In two baskets?—In two baskets.

Did you, upon that, return to his room, and question him upon the subject of these things?—I did.

What did he say?—He denied having that lodging; he said he had nothing to do with that room.

Did you ask him about these things?—I did; he said he did not know any thing of them.

Did you ask him who had had that room?—No, I did not at that time; I sent down for the landlady, Mary Rogers,

She came up?—Yes.

Did you ask her any questions in his presence?—I did.

What did you ask of her?—I asked of her, who occupied that room; she answered, that some man had taken it in company with the prisoner, Brunt; I inquired of the prisoner, who is that man; he denied having any knowledge of him; he had only seen him once in a public-house.

Did he say any thing more about him?—No; that was all that passed.

You took him into custody and took him away?—Yes, I did.

Did you then proceed to the lodging of Tidd?—I did so.

Did you there find some more grenades, and cartridges, and bullets?—I did.

Mr. Gurney.—That is all I propose to ask him at present; the enumeration we need not go through twice.

Lord Chief Baron.—No.

Daniel Bishop sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are an officer of Bow-street?—I am.

Did you apprehend the prisoner, Thistlewood?—I did.

When?—On the 24th of February.

That was Thursday, the morning after the Cato-street affair?—Yes.

At about what time?—Between ten and eleven.

Where?—At No. 8, White-street, Little Moorfields.

At a house kept by whom?—Kept by Mrs. Harris.

Where was his own lodging?—In Stanhope-street, Clare-market.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Does his family reside there?

Mr. Gurney.—Did his wife and son live in Stanhope-street with him?—I understand they did.

Mr. Gurney.—That will be all, except the production of the ammunition and the arms.

Lord Chief Baron.—Gentlemen, there is no other evidence to be produced but the arms, and as we cannot possibly conclude to-night, and you must necessarily therefore be kept for the night, it is better to rise now than have the arms and a great deal of powder produced now; we shall meet to-morrow morning at nine. [Adjourned to to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock.]

SESSIONS HOUSE OLD BAILEY.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25th, 1820.

The Prisoner was set to the Bar; William Davidson, Richard Tidd, James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper, being placed behind him.

George Thomas Joseph Rathven called again.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Do there now lie upon the table the arms found at Cato-street?—There do.

Except some of the pike-staves?—That dozen of pike-staves.

I observe these pike-staves are ferruled; except some from which, owing to the greenness of the wood, the ferrules have fallen off?—Yes, they were all ferruled at the time they were found.

And holes bored for the purpose of receiving something?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Were they taken in the loft?—In the loft, or in the stable.

Mr. Gurney.—Did you also find these pike heads, some of them being bayonets, and some of them old files?—The soldiers found them.

Mr. Gurney.—We have here, my lord, every person who found each article, but my learned friends do not exact our calling them. These holes are made for the reception of such things as the pike heads?—Yes. [One was screwed into a staff.]

What quantity of other things were there?—I have not the list.

This is the list; thirty-eight ball-cartridges, fire-lock and bayonet, one powder-flask, three pistols and one sword, with six bayonet spikes and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet spikes and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet spike and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades, two fire-balls, one large grenade and bayonet, rope ladder, one sword-stick, forty ball-cartridges and one bayonet, three loose balls: all these things were found in the loft?—Yes.

Found in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball-cartridges, three balls and some string put round him to act as a belt; a pistol that Tidd fired, a pistol that Wilson attempted to fire, blunderbuss in the stable, sword, belt and scabbard in the stable, one pistol in the stable, another pistol in the stable, one sword in the stable, twelve sticks with ferrules; in the pocket of Tidd, two ball-cartridges, and round him a leathern belt; two ball-cartridges facing the stable, and ten ditto in Newnham-street, one musket cut down; and one sword from Davidson, one haversack, cross belts, one pricker, bayonet, scabbard, cartouche-box and a belt round his body; two haversacks, one belt, and tin powder case from Ings, four pistol balls, one pistol key, and a knife case from Ings; one haversack, containing seventeen ball-cartridges, three balls, one pistol flint, one pricker, one worm for drawing cartridges, one knife and a turn screw, one stick cut to receive a bayonet, left in the public-house?—Yes; that is correct.

Have you the knife?—That is it. [producing it.]

Has that the appearance of a butcher's knife?—It has.

Do you find the handle worked round with wax-ends?—It is.

Have you also the knife case?—Yes.

Put that also into the knife-case. [It was done.] Does that belt appear to be of the same cloth as the case for the knife?—It does.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—This is not a case made by a cutler, but a cloth case?

Mr. Gurney.—Yes, my lord, it is made of blue cloth; the witness seeing it by dark took it for black. [Several of the articles were handed to the Jury.]—Produce the two haversacks found on the person of Ings, and slung to his shoulders. [They were handed to the Jury.] Produce now the hand-grenades? [The witness produced the same.]—This is the large one.

That has a fuse in it, like the other, I believe?—It has.

Three have been opened?—Yes.

And you now produce the remainder here?—There have been four opened.

John Hector Morison called again.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You have spoken to two swords having been brought by Ings to you to be ground and sharpened; look at that, and state whether that is one of them?—Yes, that is one.

What were the instructions he gave you respecting it?—To grind it at the edge from heel to point, and likewise at the back of the point.

And you had it done?—Yes.

That was at Christmas Eve?—Yes.

Samuel Hercules Tamnton called again.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You mentioned yesterday, that upon searching the two-pair back room in the house in which Brunt lodged, you found two rush baskets?—Yes.

Produce those two rush baskets?—These are the two baskets. [producing them].

What does that basket contain?—Nine different papers of tar, rope-yarn, and things of that description.

Are they what you call the fire-balls?—They are; and there were some steel filings.

Lord Chief Baron.—For what purpose were the steel filings?

Mr. Gurney.—We suppose them to have been the result of the filing which had taken place. Supposing files had been filed to a sharp point, would that operation have produced the filings you have before you?—I should think it would.

Have you now the basket which was tied up in a blue apron?—Yes.

What have you in that basket?—There are four grenades, three papers of rope-yarn, tar, and more ingredients, two bags of gunpowder, of one pound each.

Produce those bags of gunpowder?—These are they; and five empty bags, a paper of powder, one leathern bag with sixty-three balls in it [producing them].

Those were all you had in the basket?—Yes.

Besides that, was there an iron pot?—Yes.

Does that iron pot appear to have been used for the boiling of tar?—It does.

Did you also find a pike-handle?—I did, this is it [producing it].

These were all the things you found in Brunt's?—Yes.

Are the four grenades you found there the same as those which are upon the table?—Exactly the same.

You stated yesterday, that after you had apprehended Brunt, and found those things, you went to the lodgings of Tidd?—Yes.

Produce the things you found at Tidd's; in the first place give me the haversack [It was produced.]—What articles are there in that haversack?—There are 434 bullets, 171 ball-cartridges, 69 ball cartridges without powder, a brown paper parcel with three pounds of gunpowder.

Produce the coarse canvas cloth. [It was produced.]—In that what did you find?—Ten grenades.

Are they of the same description as the other?—They are.

All fitted with fuses?—Yes.

Eleven bags of powder, one pound each?—Yes.

How many empty bags?—Ten.

What else?—A small tin powder flask, with powder; sixty-eight bullets; four flints, and twenty-seven pike handles, which are these [producing them]; and these, all of them, had iron ferrules round them the same as this, but some have dropped off in consequence of the greenness of the wood.

Besides that, did you find a trunk?—Yes, this is it.

What did that trunk contain?—965 ball cartridges, done up in parcels of five each.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven called again.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

When these several fire-arms were found in Cato-street, were they for the most part loaded?—They were.

Were the charges drawn, in order to produce them here?—They were.

Were they loaded with ball?—They were; one of the guns with largish shot.

Edward Hanson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You, I believe, are serjeant in the Royal Artillery?—Yes.

Take in your hand some of these flannel bags of powder; what do you call them?—They are in imitation of a six-pound cartridge.

A cartridge for a six-pounder?—Yes.

For a piece of Artillery to carry six pounds?—Yes. This is gunpowder. I have examined some of these before, and there was exactly a pound of powder in each bag.

Is it very good powder?—Yes; it is exactly the same as the hand-grenades were made of.

In the Artillery you make up those bags, not in flannel?—No, it is a twilled serge; it is rather stronger.

This would answer the same purpose?—It would.

Look at these fire-balls; have you examined them before?—Yes.

Of what do they appear to be composed?—There is a difference in some of them; they are in general oakum, tar and rosin; one I have examined I found without brimstone; all the others I have examined were with brimstone.

Would any admixture of steel filings increase the effect of those fire-balls, by increasing the heat?—No; the steel filings would be part of the composition of the priming of the fuse.

Would these fire-balls, if they were thrown into a window of any house or building of any kind, be likely or certain to produce fire?—Yes; they would set any wood on fire.

What length of time would they burn?—Three or four minutes, according to their size.

If thrown into the hay-loft of the King-street barracks, do you think they could possibly avoid being burnt?—If there was forage there, it would have produced a conflagration most undoubtedly.

Take one of these grenades to pieces; there is an outer coating of rope-yarn?—Yes.

[The witness opened one of them in the presence of the Jury.]

A Jurymen (Mr. Aldersey).—Is that the usual outer coating?—Yes, they are all the same.

Mr. Gurney.—Is that the usual outer coating of hand-grenades of military men?—No, not of ours; that is iron metal.

Have these the appearance of having been made by military men?—No, by no means.

But though not so constructed, are they so constructed that they would have a great effect?—Yes; the more hard they are bound the greater will be the explosion and the effect resulting from it; this I have come to is a piece of paper cemented; here are some nails; here are a number of pieces of iron.

What is that you have come to?—Dry oakum.

Cemented at the bottom?—Yes.

Now you have come to a tin box, or case?—Yes.

There is a fuse to it?—Yes.

Is that fuse brazed in?—Yes.

Break it off and see whether the case is filled with gunpowder?—[The witness took out the fuse and poured out the powder.]—Here is a number one round shot in it, with the gunpowder.

What quantity of gunpowder does that contain?—One I before opened contained three ounces and a half, and this appears to be the same.

That is as much powder as you use for a nine-inch shell?—Yes, rather more.

Would it be sufficient to explode the grenades you have taken to pieces?—Yes, it would.

Do you find several pieces of iron in that?—Here are twenty-five pieces in number.

In the event of explosion, would those pieces of iron fly about a room like so many shot?—Yes they would.

And if thrown into a room in which there were fifteen gentlemen at dinner, in your judgment, would it most likely prove destructive to the lives of many?—Yes, it would, no doubt.

What length of time would it take from the lighting of that fuse to the explosion?—Nearly half a minute.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, that is the case on the part of the prosecution.

[The Solicitor General handed up a note to the Court, and their lordships consulted together.]

Lord Chief Baron.—Mr. Solicitor-general; we shall certainly take an opportunity of noticing this circumstance of the sheriffs concerning the students, who are not allowed to come to the place which ought to be kept entirely for them.

Sheriff Parkins.—Certainly, my lord, it is my desire that it should be so; I have wished it should be so from the commencement; it is not my fault.

Lord Chief Baron.—I do not say there has been a fault any where.

Sheriff Parkins.—Yes, there has been a fault; an authority has been exercised, but not with my authority at all, but against my authority.

Lord Chief Baron.—This box is for them, and you find it so laid down in Mr. Justice Foster's publication, and also by Mr. Justice Kelynge; we must insist that it shall be attended to; accommodation must be made for those gentlemen.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I was very many years ago in the habit of attending here when a student, and it occurred to us that we were interrupted, on which I had conference with other gentlemen, and we proposed this regulation, which was immediately made,—that every gentleman who presented himself with his certificate that he was a student of one of the Inns of court, and in his gown, should be admitted, and no other person admitted, unless there was ample room for the students. I remember one occasion on which an application was made to the court, and I was the author of that application.

A Student.—We are very much obliged to your lordship.

Lord Chief Baron.—It is of great public importance, that gentlemen who study the law should have access to the court.

[All who were not students were immediately compelled to retire from the students-bar.]

DEFENCE.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen of the jury: If you had been secluded for the last week from a knowledge of what has been passing in this court, some at least of the observations which I shall feel it my duty to make to you, would be unnecessary. But as you know well, not only from your knowledge, but from what has been proclaimed to all the world through the medium of the public press, that this is the third time that it has been my duty to rise to address juries, on nearly similar occasions; the Court and you must feel, that however oppressive the duty was in the first instance, it has become more oppressive by what has since taken place.

In reviewing (and I assure you I have done it with anxious consideration) my own conduct in these causes, the course that suggests itself as fit for me to pursue in this particular case (and I adopt it upon the best consideration I am able to give the matter) appears to me to be not to attempt to address you in what may be called a speech, but rather to consider myself in your situation, as a jurymen, and calmly, deliberately, and with the utmost care and attention, weigh the evidence that has been given in this case, and see how far it applies to the issue which you have to try. Whatever may have passed on former occasions, whatever former verdicts may have been, I am sure I need not tell you, that you are to judge of this case according to the impression which the evidence in this case shall make on your minds; and it is not without some degree of confidence, that I hope, upon a due consideration of the evidence, you may find yourselves justified in giving a verdict of not guilty in favour of this prisoner. Because I confess that when I first heard the evidence which has been now thrice repeated, detailed, it produced a conviction in my mind, which upon more serious consideration (and I have turned it over in my mind repeatedly) I do not think it deserves. And if any of you should think as I do, notwithstanding what has passed on former occasions, you will be bound to act upon your present amended judgments, and not upon your former. However, before we can apply the evidence, it is necessary that you should consider the charge to which that evidence is to be applied; and you will consider (I will not go now into the details of the indictment), that the charge you have to try, is whether the prisoner is guilty or not guilty of facts which amount to high treason; it is not enough for you to be convinced that he meditated to commit a very atrocious crime; it is not enough for you to be convinced that he meant to raise a great commotion in the town; it is not enough even for you to be convinced that he meditated that most horrid crime, as every man must feel it to be, the assassination of all his majesty's ministers. If you believe all this, and still do not believe there is evidence in the case which satisfies your minds that he meditated rebellion, or in the language of the record, that he conspired to levy war against his majesty in his dominions, for the purpose of compelling him by force to change his measures, you will, notwithstanding all the horror you must feel at his conduct in other respects; in the discharge of your duty to your country and to yourselves, find him not guilty of this charge.

The two charges in the indictment which we now understand are relied upon, are, that the prisoner conspired to depose his majesty; and that he conspired to levy war against him. Those are the charges in question, and are both made treason by a late statute, the 36th of his late majesty's reign. For many, very many years, the law of treason did not include those offences; for by a statute, to which all Englishmen have looked up with veneration as the best protection of their liberties, I mean the famous statute of Edward the 3rd, treason was so correctly defined, as consisting in acts and not in intentions, that my lord Coke, in commenting upon that statute, calls it a blessed statute, because it defined men's duties as to treason so clearly and so accurately, that no man could fall into the guilt of treason by any thing like implication or inference; and that statute also contained another very important provision, for it declared, not only that there must be specific facts to constitute the guilt of treason, but a man must be provably convicted thereof. And the same learned writer expends a whole section in commenting upon the word provably, which word means, as he says, that he must be clearly, unequivocally, undeniably, by evidence that cannot be doubted, convicted of their offences, and not by the testimony of foul and guilty accomplices, or by that sort of testimony which juries do and must and ever will receive with the greatest doubt; but he says, it must be by testimony clear and unequivocal: and although this indictment is not framed upon that statute, yet you will bear in your minds the spirit of the law upon that subject; and though you have a most serious charge (founded, it is true, upon another statute) to try, yet you will expect the treason to be proved according to the spirit of the treason law in this country, namely, by evidence, pure, unequivocal, uncontaminated, and by witnesses on whose testimony no suspicion can be thrown; or if you are obliged to resort to a witness of that sort, you will expect him to be confirmed by witnesses who are pure and unsuspected.

Although at various times since the passing of that admirable act (in the diseased times of the state I may say) subsequent laws have produced many enactments of new treasons, yet it has ever been the effect of the British constitution, when it has revived from those convulsions, and has recovered the vigour of health, to sweep away all the new-fangled treasons, and to revert to its ancient and wholesome law on this subject, and I trust it may again.

But to the law as it is. Now, as the charge upon this indictment is the levying war, or rather a conspiracy to levy war, it is your duty to consider first (supposing you believe all the evidence), whether the facts there stated would amount to a levying of war, if the intention had been carried into effect. What shall or shall not be said to be levying war is a pure question of fact, which is entirely in the judgment and discretion of a jury to decide upon. I do not know, except in some few cases, that it has been decided precisely what shall or what shall not amount to a levying of war. But this I know, that a very great and a very learned judge, and one most eminent not only for his legal knowledge but for his piety, his honour, and his wisdom in all respects, has given an opinion upon it; I mean lord Hale, and his opinion ought to have great weight, for he, gentlemen, was a judge of such great integrity, as well as learning, that living in the time both of Cromwell and of Charles, he was employed by both of them. His learning was so extensive, and his integrity so valued, that even the usurper called him into his employ, although he had the boldness to tell that usurper, that he doubted the legality of his commission, and constantly refused, on that ground, to sit on the crown side of the court at the assizes. But even with that protest, and in those times, Cromwell would not lose his services, and thought his character would add lustre to his judicial bench. And afterwards, when he was called into the service of his legitimate monarch, he equally opposed himself to the tyranny of the monarchy, and was the fast and firm friend of the liberties of his country. That learned judge, in commenting on constructive treasons,—and here perhaps I should explain a little more what the law has called constructive treasons; and I take leave to say, that constructive treason is a departure from the common sense and the plain language of that admirable statute of Edward the 3rd:—Constructive treasons are the inventions of servile lawyers in bad times (I must of necessity recur to things I have said before); to support the oppressive designs of wicked statesmen. While we adhered to the letter of that famous statute of which we have been speaking, no man could raise a question what was levying of war, or what was not; the facts themselves would speak for themselves; but when you come to constructive levying of war, you do not know whether in time every common riot may not be considered as a levying of war.—Lord Hale goes through a great number of instances, which have been held to be constructive levyings of war; and many of which, in common sense, would amount to nothing more than great and enormous riots; and he has these remarkable expressions: he says “Every riot is not a levying of war, because if so a great number of acts of parliament would be useless; but” he says “these last” (alluding to certain instances which he quotes) “have been decided to be a levying of war; but we ought to be very careful indeed how we let in constructive treasons, for no man knows where they will end;” indeed, gentlemen, no man does know where they will end; “those circumstances,” he says, “have been decided to be a levying of war, and being so decided we must acquiesce in them.” Now I pray you, mark that expression, we must acquiesce in them; when a man says he acquiesces in a thing, he means that he gives a reluctant consent to it; it is not convincing to his mind, but the circumstances compel him to give a reluctant assent; and he says, “if any new case applies, it is safer to go to the wisdom of parliament, than further to extend constructive treasons.” Now the way in which I mean to apply the doctrine of that great man, who in the words of wisdom thus lamented the extension of law by construction, is this: if my learned friend, the Attorney-general, cannot show you a precedent exactly in point, where the courts of law have ruled that a riot, or an attempt of this kind, has been distinctly held to be a treason and a levying of war; then, I say, you will follow the advice of that great and learned judge, and not for the first time enlarge constructive treason, by declaring the circumstances in evidence to be a levying of war, which never before, that I know of, has been so held. For if this be so, every resistance to lawful government may be considered a levying of war; and every riot in a play house, where the guards are called in, and a resistance is made to them, may be held to be high treason, by resisting the king's troops. Such being the destructive consequences of constructive treason, whatever you may think of the moral conduct of a person, do not enlarge the law of constructive treason, but fulfil your duty and say, it is not treason.

Having considered what the charge is, which you are to try, of course the next thing is, that you should consider the character of the evidence by which it is supported. And my learned friends on the other side admit that they are obliged to resort to the evidence of accomplices. And here in order that I may set myself and my learned friend right in one respect in which we have been misrepresented, it may be said and supposed (because it has been supposed already) that we have argued, an accomplice is not to be believed under any circumstances; that we have asserted, that an accomplice is totally incredible in every thing he states. Now, I never meant so to argue, nor did I understand my learned friend so to argue; but we said in discriminating the evidence of an accomplice, you will consider how far you can believe him; it does not follow that every fact that he has stated from beginning to end is false; but we say, if he is not confirmed in any of that part of his testimony which applies to the charge of high treason, and in which he ought to be confirmed, to substantiate the charge on this indictment, although he may be confirmed as to some circumstances, and you believe him to be so confirmed, still you will be warranted in pronouncing a verdict of not guilty, unless you felt that he was confirmed up to that point where the crime of treason begins. Perhaps no accomplice that ever came into a court of justice, invented a story false in all its particulars; and if he is to be believed in every particular, because he is confirmed in some particulars, why then the necessary consequence would be, that an accomplice may build upon a narrow foundation of truth, a proof of the grossest system of falsehood. And yet, if one or two of his immaterial facts are confirmed, you are therefore to believe him in all the system of falsehood he builds upon that narrow foundation. What therefore I would have you most particularly to bear in mind, will be to search whether you can find the accomplice confirmed by pure testimony, in any of those facts from which you can infer the crime of high treason: if you find him confirmed in other respects, and do not find him confirmed in any one of those respects which go to the guilt of treason, then our argument is, that he is not confirmed in that necessary and material part, which would warrant you in returning a verdict against the prisoner.

In considering how far an accomplice is confirmed, it is not immaterial also to consider how far he might have been confirmed, supposing that he spoke the language of truth; and if from any source or means whatever you see and know that there are other witnesses, who might confirm him, and who are not called to confirm him, that of itself must necessarily raise in your minds a strong suspicion that if those witnesses were called they must have told something which would detract from or perhaps totally destroy his credit. If, therefore, you should see that there are other witnesses on the part of the Crown that could confirm him as to that which is most material, namely as to those facts which constitute the guilt of high treason, and they are not put into the witness-box, judging safely and wisely, you will say you will not convict on evidence which is unconfirmed, and which might be confirmed if true.

It may be said there are also witnesses who might be called by the prisoner to contradict the accomplice if his evidence be false; and if they are not called, it must be taken that his evidence is true.—If you do not find those witnesses called, I admit you will ask yourselves why are they not called? Is it in the power of the prisoner to call them? Could he easily obtain them? But if in answer to that question, you find that he could not bring his witnesses here without a halter about their own necks, is it probable, you will say, that he could use sufficient influence to induce witnesses to come forward under those circumstances to give evidence in his favour? It is not to be expected that any process of the court, or any process that is issued to bring witnesses, or even any inducement of friendship will prevail upon men to come forward and put themselves into so perilous a situation. I observe my learned friend, the Solicitor-general, makes a note of what I now say, from which I suppose he feels the argument may be easily answered; it might be so, if these were witnesses of perfect innocence, but I do not put them as witnesses of perfect innocence though they may not have been guilty of high treason, they may have been guilty of enough to make it a fearful thing for them to appear here. And they will not come here either to disclose their own crimes, or hazard their personal safety; though if they had come and had admitted their own crimes, they might safely swear they had participated in nothing which amounted to the crime of high treason. There is that peculiarity in this case—and it is the misery and wretchedness of the thing—that a man standing here in my situation, as advocate for the prisoner, cannot go to the jury as in a case of perfect guilt or perfect innocence, but here I am bound to admit there is proof of much guilt and enormous crime, at least a meditation of guilt and enormous crime, though I think I am justified in contending, as I do contend, that it is not the guilt of high treason.

As I said before, in the execution of my duty to-day, I shall endeavour to reason upon the evidence as though I were one of yourselves. I hope I shall not be betrayed even to raising my voice from that pitch necessary for you to hear me. You will consider if you please what the plot is, that is, the plot of treason, and who it is that states the main parts of it, indeed all of it which constitutes the treason. All the particulars which relate to treason are stated by the witness Adams alone. You have had before you three witnesses, who speak distinctly to certain parts of the plot, and of certain things to be done: Adams, Monument, and Hiden. I admit they all speak to so much of the transaction as is confirmed by the state of things in Cato-street; but there is a material distinction to be taken between what passed at Cato-street, and what is supposed to have passed in the course of the prior deliberations at Ings's committee-room. I hope I shall be able to convince you that all that passed at Cato-street is confirmatory only of so much of the supposed deliberations as related to that horrid deed, the assassination, which I am afraid was in contemplation; all that passed there is confirmatory of that statement only, but I say is not confirmatory of the supposed deliberations to overthrow the government; that I say rests solely upon the testimony of Adams. Now who is Adams?—Let us pause, and consider the manner in which he represented himself. I take his character according to his own account of it. That he was implicated in the whole of the plot whatever it was, cannot for a moment be denied; he avows that he unhesitatingly mixed with those conspirators whose object was cold-blooded assassination (when I speak of the thing I always tell you I want words to express the degree of horror every man must feel at that dreadful plot of assassination of which we have heard so much); but he, without remorse, joined in it; he next betrays his companions. That does not add much, I think, to his recommendation, for amongst the most depraved of mankind there is such a contempt of treachery, that those who have lost every other bond, still have something like a sort of feeling of honour to those who have embarked with them even in a common cause of wickedness, that it is the greatest reproach to such a man that he betrays his companions. What is he in religion? A man who at the age of forty-five avows to you that he forsook his religion and disbelieved the truths of Christianity; then you have before you a traitor to his king, the betrayer of his companions, a man who has apostatized from his religion, and denied his God; this is the man upon whose testimony the whole of the facts which constitute the treason rest.

Then what is the story which such a witness tells you? always bearing in recollection that you are the judges of how far he is to be credited. Why the plot which he tells you for effecting rebellion is one so very ridiculous, that it could do nothing more than excite laughter and ridicule in the minds of sensible men, if it were not mixed up with so much horror in other respects, as bears down all inclination to laugh, and stifles all propensity to ridicule. But if it were not mixed up with other matters of more serious aspect, the thing is so ridiculous, that if it were told upon the credit of the most unexceptionable witness living, you would not believe it for a moment, you could not receive it with a grave countenance, and yet you are required to believe it because it is told you upon the testimony of a man against whom I do not say too much when I say that he is one of the most base of mankind. As far as relates to the treason of this case, he tells you that their first deliberation, as I have taken it, was a few days before the burial of the late king. There they first broached this idea, and nowhere do they state that they expect to have above forty men. It was then he says they first broached the ridiculous story that they were to take the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane. Now as to that, all the use it is possible they could make of them must have been very small indeed; because it does not appear that they had any balls or any ammunition;—they had half a dozen flannel bags, which it is said were meant for cannon cartridges;—they are to take six other pieces of cannon from the Artillery-ground;—they are to assassinate his majesty's ministers;—they are to fire the town;—they are to surround London;—for that is part of their plan;—for, you recollect, not an orderly was to go to Windsor to recal the troops;—they were to prevent even one orderly, by any rout, reaching Windsor, or giving notice to the soldiers there;—and even if he did get there, they were of opinion that the soldiers would be too tired to return to rescue this great city, and they should easily hold

London;—they were to send to the sea-ports;—and then he throws in that which he has somehow or other found to be very necessary, they were to take the Mansion-house as the seat of provisional government! I have not written the evidence three times over, but I think it was on this occasion he said they were to dig a trench round London to impede the march of cavalry. If such a plot as this were told you, could you believe it to be adopted by men out of Bedlam. My learned friends, the Attorney and Solicitor-generals, both feeling the ridicule which must fall on such a statement, say, men of ardent minds (I do not affect to use their exact expressions, and therefore I shall not do it so forcibly), bent on their ultimate objects, overlook all intermediate difficulties. I give my learned friend credit for the truth of that observation. I admit men bent on ultimate objects, will overlook intermediate difficulties, but they must be objects which come within the reach of probability or possibility. Men who walk about the town without a strait waistcoat cannot overlook some things. There are certain difficulties which men with even the glimmerings of an understanding cannot overlook. If the prisoner and his confederates had been stated to have met and conspired to batter down Newgate with pea-shooters, it is not a whit more ridiculous! for they might as well attempt to batter down the massy walls of that prison with pea-shooters, as they could attempt to attain their supposed objects with the force and means detailed in evidence.

Now, gentlemen, the inference is that the thing is not only improbable and impossible, but so improbable and so impossible, that you cannot believe it to be true. And you cannot believe it to be true, more particularly coming out of the mouth of such an infamous witness. You may very well conceive that a witness of this sort, coming up with a halter about his neck, and with the terror of his own guilty conscience appalling him and disordering his understanding, may invent all kinds of absurdities and fictions, because (however erroneously) he may conceive it is the wish of those who employ him to convict certain persons of high treason. I say however erroneously he may conceive it; for do not let it be supposed that I am myself insinuating any thing of that sort; I firmly believe, indeed I know and am satisfied that neither of my honourable and learned friends would appear here to ask a verdict from you which they did not conscientiously think the benefit and advantage of the country called upon them to demand. They have done right to lay the case before you; they have done right to lay all the evidence they had, such as it is, before you; and you will do right, and will discharge your duty if in judging of that evidence you shall decide that it does not prove that which they charge to be the legal effect of it, if you shall think, upon due deliberation, it falls short of its intended object.

I do not think it will be necessary for me to go through all the absurd details which this man has given: when I have taken this general outline of the case, you may say it is very absurd; but is there such evidence as compels us to believe it, however absurd it may be? I ask the same question, is there such evidence as compels you to believe it, however absurd it may be? Surely if it rest solely upon the testimony of such a witness as Adams, you will not believe it. Then you will ask, whom is it confirmed by? is it confirmed by Monument? is it confirmed by Hiden? Now, both these two witnesses stand implicated, to a certain degree, in something; in what they are implicated, we shall see by-and-by; both stand implicated, at least in so much moral guilt, that you cannot look to them as witnesses fit to confirm an infamous witness; then recollect, gentlemen, neither of those witnesses were present at the consultation, a little before the king's funeral, at the consultation on the 22nd of February, at the consultation on the 23rd of February, and it was at those three consultations that all that could make this plot high treason, is said by Adams to have taken place; all that could convert their guilt into the guilt of high treason, took place only at those three consultations. Then if neither of those witnesses were there, so much of the plot as gives it the character of being a plot for the purposes of high treason, rest upon the sole and unconfirmed testimony of that witness Adams. Now, let us see what confirmation Adams receives; and here I will not go into the details of the evidence, but just look at the facts as they are confirmed. Permit me to remark to you upon one part of the case, where you might have expected confirmation, if he spoke true, and find none. He comes here certainly, to prove a case of high treason, that is, to prove a case of intention to overturn the government, and exciting to insurrection against the constitution and the government; and therefore he says, that at one of their meetings, I think on the morning of the 28th, Thistlewood sent out for some paper, for the purpose of writing certain proclamations; now first, as to the absurdity of writing a proclamation; he sends out for three or four sheets of paper; three or four proclamations were to be written, and stuck up in different parts of the town; conceive the absurdity of such a measure. This was to be the mode of informing the whole of this great town of London, that the government was overthrown, and that a provisional government was sitting; to be universally diffused by three or four written hand-bills. But what was the motive of the witness in this piece of absurd evidence? his motive here was, to give a character to the meeting, other than it really was; he is here erecting their scheme, whatever it really might be, into a scheme of high treason, and therefore he gives you this bill. "Your tyrants are destroyed. The friends of liberty are called upon to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting. James Ings, secretary." Now, gentlemen, observe this bill; if it had really been in contemplation, or if it were distinctly proved to your satisfaction, it would give a decided character to the meeting, and would certainly implicate them all in the guilt of high treason. But have you a tittle of confirmation of this important document; have you a tittle of evidence of the existence of it, except as far as Adams chooses to state it? It is supposed there is a confirmation of this fact, because at one of those meetings, indeed at the very meeting a lad was sent out to get six sheets of cartridge paper; but the mere fact of procuring six sheets of cartridge paper I apprehend you will not consider as confirmation of what was afterwards supposed to be written upon that paper; if a trace of one of those bills had been found in existence,—if there had been the slightest fragment left, so that it could appear to have been written on,—if you found the name of "James Ings, secretary," or the words "provisional government," or one word of the kind, I would have said the witness was confirmed; but when there is not the slightest evidence of confirmation as to what was written on this paper, this bill being almost the only piece of evidence to give a character to the meeting, when you find this to be the only piece of decisive evidence, and that resting solely on the testimony of such a man as Adams, what can you say to it?

There are other parts of his evidence, which if he had spoken truly, must have been confirmed. If there had been rebellion as well as assassination in the plan, there must have been a greater number of men engaged; it was not the twenty or forty men that were to go to lord Harrowby's that were to take the cannon at Gray's-inn-lane, next to take the cannon at the Artillery-ground, from thence to go to the Mansion-house, &c. But, if he is to be believed, there were to be simultaneous operations by other bodies than the Cato-street assembly; and this was so near their time of action, that the others must have begun their action also. Now, is there a tittle of evidence to show, that either at Gee's-court, at the Borough, at the Artillery-ground, or any where else, any bodies of men were in motion, that any attempt was made to take the cannon, or that they were acting in any other part of the town, or that any suspicious movement was observed any where? Here is confirmation wanting, where, if the story told had been true, most probably there would have been some confirmation; I infer, therefore, from this also, that so much of his story is a fabrication. And remember, and never let it pass from your minds, that it is not the believing part of Adams's story which will convict the man at the bar of high treason. You must believe this story to its whole extent; you may believe it to be confirmed in every part of the assassination plot, and yet, if you believe no further, you cannot find the prisoner guilty of high treason.

After his evidence is finished, three witnesses are called who confirm him merely as to the fact, that a room was taken in Fox-court. Now, I admit he is confirmed as to the fact, that these conspirators (for so I will call them) took a room in Fox-court; but do not forget, gentlemen, that that fact is not decisive of the question. It is not that these men met in a room in Fox-court; it is, what was the subject of their deliberations when they were there assembled, that you have to investigate; that is what you must take into your consideration before you can arrive at a conclusion of guilt. Now, I will put this question: Suppose they had met for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, and one infamous witness had come and stated that in their deliberations they were consulting on certain specific matters (say matters of high treason); could it be any confirmation of this story to prove these men had met together? What would be the situation of mankind? A club of the most innocent of men may be the subjects of an information to government. You and I may be all members of a club; one infamous man may say that our deliberations are all treasonable, and the confirmation of that fact is, that true it is we were members of a club, and the club did meet there; now, is it confirmation at all of what passed in the room that men went there? Then, the next head of confirmation applies certainly to so much of the statement as goes to the plot to be executed at lord Harrowby's. The watchmen in the square are called, and they truly prove (for there is no imputation upon their evidence) that four of those men were seen watching about the house; is that a confirmation of the purpose for which they were alleged to be watching? What is that purpose? That purpose, it is stated, was the destruction by violence of some of the highest and most valuable men of the country; but base as that act is, it is not high treason. Then, if those two facts, confirmed as I admit by unsuspected witnesses, do not go to confirm that part of the case on which alone your verdict can be founded, see whether it can be confirmed by any other evidence.

The next witness called was Monument; and he was put forward, I suppose, as a witness to confirm the former witness, Adams. The observation I before made to you upon his testimony, you will bear in mind. Monument was at none of those deliberations, and therefore neither then nor now does he affect to relate what passed at those deliberations; but he says that he is a shoemaker in Baldwin's-gardens, that he met Thistlewood, and had a conversation with Thistlewood—there is nothing very important in that conversation. Afterwards Brunt, the prisoner at the bar, called upon him with Thistlewood, and Thistlewood at once told him they had something great to do, and asked him if he would be one; that he had been promised support by a great many men who had deceived him, but now he had got men who would stand by him.

Brunt called again in the afternoon; and he not being then ready, went to Tidd's house about half-past six o'clock. Tidd said, he had been waiting for some more people to go with him that he expected would be there; but if no one else came before seven o'clock, they should go together. When he came to Tidd's, he saw Tidd arming himself; he put a brace of pistols into his belt; and as they were going along, he desired to know where they were going to; were they going to the House of Commons? Tidd told him, no, they were not going there, for there were too many soldiers there. Now, what do you think of this witness, who avows that he went out with an armed man, and thought he was going to the House of Commons? for what purpose you are left to guess. But he says, Tidd at last told him there was a cabinet dinner; and then he adds, he was fully aware what was meant—he being fully aware what they were about, joins them in this nefarious scheme. Now, I should like to ask my learned friend, whether they mean this witness to confirm the witness Adams? Is not this rather a man who wants confirmation himself? Then do they call him to confirm another infamous witness? Can you consider a man a pure uncontaminated witness, who, according to his own avowal, is going out to commit murder? and then when he is cross-examined as to what he thinks of his own conduct, he says, to be sure he acted very foolishly! that is the tender way in which he speaks of his own atrocious conduct. But, gentlemen, you heard him further cross-examined. If an accomplice be sincerely contrite and repentant of his crimes, and comes to tell a story of truth, at least his conduct and demeanor should be such as to convince you, that he is so repentant that every tittle that he speaks is consistent with the most rigid truth. When I asked him, whether he himself did not attempt to seduce another man, whose name I do not now recollect, you heard the manner in which he answered that question. He shuffled; he would give me no direct answer, he could not recollect. Do you believe he could not recollect? he dare not deny it; and I will tell you why he dare not deny it, because that man might be called.

A Jurymen (Mr. Goodchild).—I believe you are mistaken, sir; you will pardon me, I believe that came from Hiden.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen of the Jury; I hope—

Mr. Solicitor General.—It is merely accidental.

Mr. Curwood.—These witnesses have been changed; they have not come in the same order as they did in the last case, which led me into the error of supposing that what applied to the first witness applied to the second.

Mr. Goodchild.—I am perfectly aware of that; you will excuse the interruption.

Mr. Curwood.—I am obliged to you, sir, for it. But this he said, that being informed there was a cabinet dinner, he was perfectly aware what they were about. When he was asked, why he did not desert these men, the common and flimsy answer presents itself, "I was afraid." Could a man be afraid of leaving his companions in the middle of the streets of London, and going to the first magistrate forthwith, and instantly disclosing such a horrible scene? Do you believe he retired from fear, or do you not rather believe, that he came forward to speak what he says, because the halter is about his neck?

What he says is not however so very important in my view of the question, because he does not speak to that which constitutes the guilt of high treason; it is true, he gives confirmation to so much of the story as relates to the assassination of his majesty's ministers; but as to all that which makes high treason, namely, the deliberations to overturn the government, and the proclamation, there he, bad and infamous as I may call him, gives no confirmation to that part of the story.

The next witness, Hiden, is put up as one on whom you may rely, because he is the witness who told lord Harrowby. I ask, must not this witness, from his own account, be deeply implicated in the iniquity of some plan; because he represents to you that Wilson came to him in the open street, and without any hesitation, without any veil or disguise, at once addressed him upon the subject, and asked him, whether he would be one to assassinate his majesty's ministers? That they were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and all things were ready. He showed no horror and no aversion to this plan; but, on the contrary, according to his own account, he readily assents. The use I make of this avowal of his, is this, that he at least must be so infamous a man, who could so conduct himself, that he is not fit to be set up to confirm the testimony of another infamous man; he is not that pure and unsuspected witness, who ought to be called to confirm an absurd and ridiculous story coming out of the mouth of another infamous witness. Thus much appears upon the testimony of one of those two men (I do not immediately recollect which) that in a conversation Thistlewood had with him, Thistlewood told him it would be necessary for them to get arms (I understand this was Monument), for all his friends got arms. This will be stated as evincing hostile intentions against the government of the country. Gentlemen, be it so; take that fact as proved, that Thistlewood desired them to get arms; does it prove the fact of a deliberation and consultation to levy war against the king? For such is the language of the indictment, to levy war against his majesty. Are there not other known circumstances to account for this desire to procure arms? You cannot blot out of your minds all the knowledge that you have acquired in your intercourse with mankind; it is a melancholy thing, but it is no less true than melancholy, that there was a great ferment in the country, and particularly among the lower orders of the people, who unfortunately for themselves and for the country, have taken to the—study it would be absurd to say—but have taken to the consideration of politics. You cannot fail to recollect, that in August last, in Manchester, where there was one of those meetings of which we have had so many, a very singular scene took place, of which, standing here, I would refrain from speaking in any terms that might be likely to excite feelings of irritation in any breast; but this is very certain, that it was a transaction on which the feelings of mankind were very much agitated and much divided, and many persons, well-wishers to government, thought that an unarmed mob (however much they might disapprove of the proceedings of that mob) having been attacked by an armed force, it was a matter of serious regret, and they altogether did not unite with government in considering as proper certain votes of approbation they had given before inquiry had taken place; but, on the other side, there were many of the lower orders of people who were quite outrageous, who gave it a name of great opprobrium, "the Massacre at Manchester;" and it was publicly given forth, that inasmuch as the military had attacked an unarmed force in their deliberations, they would in future go armed themselves. This will serve as a clue to explain this part of the conversation; it is not denied that Thistlewood was deeply embarked with those persons who evinced, I admit, a determined intention to resist certain laws against such meetings; and it was natural, with their feelings, that they should procure arms to prevent their dispersion; but still that does not amount to the crime here charged on the prisoner, namely, high treason; and that explains satisfactorily why those parties should have been so anxious to procure arms, without the necessary consequence being that all those arms were for the purpose of overturning the government.

I have said something upon the absurdity and ridicule that must necessarily follow any supposed plan of overturning the government with such forces as these men could raise. You see before you pretty nearly the whole armoury; formidable I admit it is for the purposes of mischief, but for the purpose of overturning the government—a government supported by the revenues of all the world I may say, and by thousands of armed men—the parish watch would have been sufficient to have put them all down; not but that they might have done a great deal of private mischief much to be deplored; but still it comes back to the question, was it meditated to overturn the government? You cannot overlook the evidence that their means were so very inadequate as to throw a contempt and to fasten ridicule on any plan of the kind, and therefore it is not likely that they really had such intentions; and so fully am I convinced, that if this imputation had not been mixed up with much at which the heart revolts, there are hardly twelve men to be found in the British empire, who, if put into a jury-box, would not have disbelieved the whole tale.

I have now endeavoured, and I intreat you to do the same, to look through the evidence; some amongst you have heard it before; reconsider whether you, like myself, have not in your first impressions given it too hasty belief, and a credit, which, on minuter examination, it did not deserve. And here let me observe also, as I stated in the outset, it is necessary to consider how far the evidence might have been confirmed. Ask yourselves, who else might have been called? You have in evidence before you, that among these conspirators there is a man of the name of Edwards, who was one of the most active; he is stated to you to have been a man peculiarly busy in making those hand-grenades. The government have given him to the prisoner among the list of witnesses, but he is not called. Now he is a man that could not only have confirmed all that Monument and Hiden have told you, but he would have told you all that passed in those secret deliberations which now rests solely on the testimony of Adams. If he is not called, ask yourselves, why he is not called in a case of high treason, where it is most desirable that every man should be called that could by any possibility support the case? And I do not say too much, when I say, that in the great learning and discretion that existed in the learned gentlemen on the other side, they did not call him because they feared that in calling him something might have come out that would have discredited or totally destroyed all their other evidence.

There is also another man, of the name of Dwyer, who is given us in the list of witnesses; and I may state it because I can prove it in evidence to you if necessary. Dwyer was called upon a former occasion; and Dwyer was represented as a witness on whom the jury might safely rely, because he disclosed to a major James immediately what was told him. Why is he not called to-day? Because to-day there is evidence in court that would show you he is a witness wholly unfit to be put into the witness-box; my learned friends, therefore, in their discretion did not call him; so that now they rest their case, as far as it relates to high treason, solely upon the testimony of that infamous witness, Adams.

Many other observations present themselves to my mind, which I forbear to state, as they will equally strike you. I hope I have observed my promise; I have endeavoured strictly to keep my mind cool and calm; I have not attempted anything that looks like declamation; I have met the evidence fairly as it presents itself to my mind; I entreat you to do the same; and, even if there should be some amongst you, as I said before, like myself, whose first impression was, that the evidence was stronger than, upon a reconsideration, you now find it to be: I do not entreat you, because I know you will do it without my entreating you—I say so from what I have seen of you upon former occasions—I know you will not hesitate boldly to do your duty: and if to-day, with the variation there is in the present case from further circumstances, or if you think the evidence weaker than you formerly thought it; or if you do not think, upon more mature deliberation, that the evidence establishes the case, I know you will have the manliness, notwithstanding former opinions, to find a verdict of, Not Guilty.

John Bennett sworn.

Mr. Gurney.—Will my learned friend state to what point he proposes to examine this witness? I am not aware of the point on which his evidence can apply.

Mr. Curwood.—To prove that when Hiden invited him to the meeting, he told him something was going to be done there; he denied that he said that.

Mr. Gurney.—No, I beg your pardon; I have my note here. “I asked Bennett to go, and said, perhaps Mr. Bennett would go with me and Mr. Clarke, being a neighbour of mine. I cannot say that I told him something was to be done there; he and I were neighbours together. I asked him if he would go with me; I do not think I could say so, but I will not swear I did not;” how his statement is to be in contradiction of that I do not apprehend.

Lord Chief Baron.—It is consistent, certainly, with his saying, that he could not swear that he did not say so.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It was pressed upon him, but he would not say that he did not say so; he declined doing that.

Mr. Curwood.—Then, my lord, we do not offer any other witness.

Mr. Adolphus.—Gentlemen of the jury; the case for the prisoner having closed without the calling of any witness on his behalf, it nevertheless falls to my lot to address to you a very few observations, and that arises from the peculiar benevolence of the law on the subject of high treason; and when I refer to that benevolence of the law, I am quite sure that addressing myself to such a jury as I have now the honour of speaking to, the goodness of the legislature in forming the statute which grants me such a privilege, will not fail to extend itself to your bosoms; and in proportion as you see our wise ancestors were anxious that the prisoner should have every means of defence, you will afford him every benefit of that defence, and will assist him as much as you can, consistently with your oaths, in giving effect to the deficiency of proof on the part of the prosecution, or to whatever you shall perceive favourable in his case. The privilege, of which I am now availing myself, undoubtedly was intended as a barrier against the influx of convictions from any cause whatever in a case of treason, much more than in any case of felony.

If, as my learned friend observes, you, living amidst mankind, and your powers of observation, and your experience not being circumscribed, may be supposed to have entertained, even as members of the British public, some pre-conceived notions of the merits of the present case, if, I say, in that general character, by whatever means, you must have some opinions, and have acquired some knowledge on the matter about which you are shortly to pronounce your verdict—I know the majority of you have, in a more particular manner, the means of forming such opinions, you having before sat on the trial of some individuals implicated in these very treasons; and being aware that the evidence now brought before you varies but little from that which has been produced on the former occasion; and knowing perfectly well what was then adduced, and which has not been so now—to such a jury, even if it were my inclination to make a speech of any great length, it would be fruitless and unavailing;—those who have been present on the former trial, know how much I laboured, and perhaps if I can avail myself so far of their goodness, I may pray of them, if there were any argument upon those occasions which can be made use of with advantage to the prisoner on this, that they will import it into the present cause, and give him the benefit of it.

Gentlemen, when I say that I shall follow the example of my learned friend in addressing you very shortly, it is not because I shun taking upon myself any trouble which the exigency of the case may require; but I have not lived to my present age without learning, that he who desires that his efforts shall be useful to any considerable number of his fellow-creatures, must learn to proportion his exertions to something like the probability of effect,—that he who shows himself equally ready at equal length, and with equal earnestness, to urge every topic, may be censured as deficient in judgment,—and that we do not advance our hope of convincing others, by showing that we are incapable of being convinced ourselves. Now, although I entertain the same opinions that I held before, still, as I know that my two learned friends, the Attorney and Solicitor generals, have made observations upon them—as I know what observations have been made elsewhere upon some parts of them—I shall not advance all those arguments again, not because I do not entertain in my own mind the principles on which they are founded, but because after a certain time I may despair of using those arguments with the effect I have always wished, and at one time sanguinely expected. But let me not be understood by that to abandon the cause of my client; you know the case as well by your attention on this as on the former occasions; and you know that every tittle of evidence which has now been brought forward as applicable to this prisoner, has been used against his two unfortunate predecessors, and will equally apply to all the other eight, who remain to be tried under the present indictment. To make, therefore, certain observations, supposing they are applicable to each; would be of little or no avail, if you remember all which has been said upon the former occasions, and make the distinctions which my learned friend has made to-day, and which it will be my endeavour to enforce by a very few observations.

The nature of the offence being pointed out to you, leads to the single consideration by which you can be influenced in making up your judgment; is there in this case consistent, positive, supported evidence of an intention to commit high treason, that is to say, to depose the king, either virtually or personally, or to levy war against him for the purpose of compelling him to change his measures? Is there evidence upon that subject so clear and broad, that you can rely and stand firmly upon it, discharging from your minds (and so I pray you to do) all the horror you must feel about that which I take, for the purpose of this case, to be indisputably proved, an intention to do a guilty act, but of a different nature from high treason? I am almost afraid I ask an impossibility, when I ask a jury of Englishmen to discharge from their memories, for the purpose of this cause, that there was a conspiracy to murder fourteen men of the first eminence and character in the state, in cold blood; and that in the progress of the events arising out of that design, one man, in the execution of his duty, lost his life; but in order to determine whether this is high treason or not, it is necessary you should discharge that from your minds, so far as it may operate in convincing you that there was an intention of high treason; for if they fail in proving that by other means, whatever your detestation or horror of the crime may be, yet of high treason the man at the bar will remain not guilty, whatever you may think of other offences with which he is charged.

Although I shall not dwell upon all the points in this case, yet I implore you to take the whole of the matter fully into your consideration; to reflect upon the sort of witnesses this case is proved by; and to consider whether those witnesses, unsupported by others as to any treasonable act or intention, are such as entitle themselves to your belief to the extent which the indictment charges, and to which your verdict is required to go.

When I have said on former occasions, that this plot, of which Adams is the witness, destroys itself by its improbability, I mean only to say, that improbability alone, if the fact should be distinctly attested, is not a ground for disbelief; but that when a man tainted to the degree Adams is (and he alone speaks of the plot); when he alone, tainted to such a degree, is brought forward, it behoves a jury to consider whether they can, upon his evi-denca, decide the fate of twelve, or sixteen, or five-and-twenty men, who are supposed to have conspired; or whether they have only the fictions of a man, who as the means by which he shall best secure his own safety, and most surely recommend himself to the protection of others, has invented a story so grossly improbable that no one can believe it.

I am not insensible to the effect of an observation which has been made in the course of these trials, that when you are to try a proposition of this kind, the rule of probability is a very fallacious test, because, says the person I allude to (I will not say who it was), if it were put to me, do I or do I not believe that twenty-five Englishmen met for the purpose of assassinating fourteen or fifteen Englishmen, in cold blood, I should say the improbability is such, that I am obliged to reject it from my mind; and if I can believe that on the evidence given (and it does not appear to be met by any attempt at contradiction), I can also believe any other improbability; at least I cannot reject it from my mind only because it is improbable. I know that I am not giving the very words in which these observations were delivered; I am incapable of doing justice to the speaker; but, on the other hand, I am not purposely diminishing their force, merely because they make against my interest. It is impossible for any man who heard this argument, not to feel it deserving of the highest consideration, were it only for the respect due to the individual who produced it, who adorned it not by studied elocution, but by a beautiful simplicity which has never been exceeded, and which has all the effect of labour without its effort. This argument it became necessary for me to take seriously into consideration, as it proceeded from the highest authority in this court; I admit the weight of it, but yet I think it is possible for men goaded by personal feeling, misled by writers of the very worst description, by arguments the most atrocious, to have conceived the rash and detestable project of removing certain persons as obnoxious to public opinion; that they may have wrought themselves up to the pitch of believing, that by so doing they should execute a great act of public justice, and render a meritorious service to the present age and to posterity, and yet never have meditated that which is so improbable, so destructive of itself, and so incapable of execution as the plot charged upon them. Gentlemen, what is the cause? My learned friend has pointed it out to you exactly; the transaction which had been publicly and rashly denominated, "the Massacre at Manchester," was particularly thrown out for the discussion of the lower orders, and when they had been thus inflamed, every particle of discontent or disaffection that could be found any where was brought together and practised upon by designing intriguers, who inflamed and seduced those whom they intended afterwards to betray. One was peculiarly fitted to be a leader, and that was Thistlewood—a man who was known for years to have been expressing his unceasing dissatisfaction against government—a man who, for the share he took in certain great and notorious public meetings, was the subject of prosecution for high treason—a man who had been recently liberated for having threatened the life of one public minister, and sent a challenge to another.

Mr. Gurney.—The same.

Mr. Adams.—I believe it was so, and that lord Sidmouth was the subject both of the threat and of the challenge. It is not necessary to go into the particulars further; but these were the elements on which those practices could be effectually used; and accordingly you will see, when you come to examine a little the testimony of the witness Adams, how Thistlewood and the wretched ignorant elements of that conspiracy have been practised on by a perpetual instigator, and have been watched by a perpetual spy. The evidence in the present case rests entirely, as I hope to show, on men who are to a certain degree implicated in the conspiracy, and who have only this most extraordinary merit of having no one of the mock or inferior virtues which distinguish persons on similar occasions. If men enter into a conspiracy, fidelity to each other (how much soever a crime in itself); seems a virtue if there is a quality requisite in a conspirator, it is that courage which shall lead him through the undertaking in which he is embarked. Now the recommendation of the witnesses who come before you to-day, is, that they have been conspirators, and therefore as bad as those whom they accuse; but they want even the latent sparks of courage or of honour, by having been cowards in action and traitors to each other, for the purpose of securing their safety.

With respect to the witness Adams, he alone has given you the secrets of his conscience; but his character has been drawn by my learned friend, and I shall attempt to add a little to it. You who have had that man called before you, have heard that which it is important for you to take into your consideration to-day, that he, at the age of forty-five, renounced his Redeemer, and rejected the Book of Life; it is by his swearing upon that book alone, that you are to give him credit; let me not hear it said, that on him, as on many other persons, suffering has wrought contrition, and that he has become penitent in proportion as he has perceived himself in danger. Where is the evidence of that in his conduct? Where is there any thing that shall induce you to believe in him who professes that he did not believe in his God, and gives no reason to believe that he has returned to his faith? In the first place, contemplate his treachery to those whom, at the moment of his infidelity, he seems to have seduced into many of their actions, and whom he now comes forward to betray. Were he an infidel, he was at least a subject of the realm, and had been a soldier; for him to join in such a conspiracy, shows he had neither the valour of a soldier, the loyalty of an Englishman, nor the virtue of a man; and that when he renounced his Redeemer, he anticipated only that sacrifice of himself for which his conduct through life had been preparing him. What reason have you, then, for believing the incredible story he tells, when out of his mouth he ranks himself among the most infamous of mankind, unless it is to be said, that your conclusion is to be aided by the very incredibility of the witness, who comes to tell you a story having no recommendation but its incredibility? Gentlemen, of Mr. Adams it is impossible to speak without horror; and if I ever saw an instance in which infamy was carried to its utmost, it was, when refusing a question put to him by my learned friend, he used the most extraordinary expression, "I abstain from saying what induced me to do such a thing, because I do not wish to do the prisoner, Brunt, more mischief than my evidence must do; I consider his family." Good God! Gentlemen, a man with whom he had been walking about arm-in-arm, eating and drinking with him, and sharing the morsel his poverty could ill afford for months together, comes here to-day to lay upon him every aggravation that can be laid upon the name and character of man, to swear to a most incredible discourse of his about not believing in God, and yet praying to God (a circumstance totally unnecessary in the present case, and a fiction introduced only to give countenance to the rest of the story); and then affecting to compassionate the case of that woman whom he will make a widow if he succeeds, and those babes whom he will at the same time make orphans; while he is engaged in the task of wholesale destruction, and will bring to the gallows eleven individuals, with eight of whom he professes to have had some acquaintance, with more as he would make you believe; although, with respect to one whom he has represented as having been present at two of their meetings, when he is presented before his face, he is obliged to confess that he does not know him. Adams's story has been already dissected, and its improbability—its impossibility indeed—pointed out, and it is upon faith in his story that the whole case rests.

If Adams wants confirmation in any fact, you naturally and necessarily ask yourselves, can that confirmation be given to him? It has been already observed to you that according to Adams's account, there is in the list a witness of the name of Edwards, who has been not only present, but a material adviser and active agent in every thing done, and Edwards stands the most prominent man in the whole transaction. You see "him first, him last, him midst, him without end." Whatever is said, Edwards has a share in it; whatever is done, Edwards has a hand in it; and yet the incredible Mr. Adams alone is called. Edwards, as Adams has expressed himself, had the title of aide-de-camp, and yet he is not called to support Adams. Will my learned friends say any thing upon the subject?—I have no reason to believe they will from any thing which has passed. Will they merely say, that Edwards would only add to the number of accomplices, and therefore only add to the number that want confirmation? Then let us see whom have they brought to us? Is Monument less an accomplice, do you believe, at this moment, however he may have stood on former occasions? or is Hiden less an accomplice? Let us see how that is, and then we shall prove to demonstration who are accomplices. Is Monument an accomplice? That is beyond a doubt, for he admits he did enter into the scheme; and he has shown no one virtue to induce you to believe him upon his oath, except his excellent care for his own preservation, which, when the conflict had begun at Cato-street, led him to hide himself in the manger, that he might be prepared to give information. Mr. Adams pursued the same conduct; for whether we are to believe him sincere, or to believe as I believe him, a spy from the very beginning, who obtained confidence only to betray it, and entered into those plans merely for the purpose of disclosing them, still his care for his own preservation was such, as to lead one very much to believe that his escape was favoured by those who made the assault upon the place. Then does Mr. Monument, if he could do it, support Adams, or is he himself supported in that which he advances? Monument is brought to support the evidence of Adams, by showing that it was part of the plan of the conspirators to be armed, and that they had declared that all their adherents were so, or ought to be so, for that Thistlewood had made that declaration. When did he make it? Why, when they were going to the public meeting at Finsbury-market, where it was to be part of the design of the day, to show, that the meeting at Manchester equally legal, with supporters equally respectable with their own, was attacked and dispersed; this was long before Adams gives the date of the supposed conspiracy, which you are called upon to try; it was in October, long before the taking of the room or the meeting of parties; it was at a time when their operations seem to have been confined to the holding of a meeting.

It has been argued, and perhaps may be hereafter, that however improbable the plan which Adams has disclosed, still it was formed; for that they, being such rash enthusiasts, conceived that the British public entered into their schemes, and that they would adopt them, and bear down all opposition by accumulated force; and this, too, is to be supposed the opinion of men who had called and held the meetings in Smithfield and Finsbury, where they were hooted and derided, and made a sport of by that very populace who would, it is supposed, afterwards aid and assist them in the carrying into effect the ill-judged and preposterous plans which have been imputed to them. Gentlemen, rashness and enthusiasm will not go so far; no one can be an enthusiast after a conviction that his plans must necessarily fail for want of support; and no man would expect, with twenty pike-staves, to arm men sufficient to overawe the metropolis, when, after having assembled in a pool and a quagmire, after retiring from their meeting pelted with mud, their ensigns defaced, and their persons insulted, it was impossible they could expect numbers to support them, who had never seen numbers assemble but for the purpose of deriding them—that they could expect men to risk their lives in their plans, who had risked nothing but rotten apples and eggs to evince their hatred and contempt for their persons. That such men may have entertained a project of murder; that they may have furthered it by a plan of plunder, I can readily conceive, and readily believe; the depravity of human nature does not permit me to withhold that admission from you; and that disclosed in the case not by Adams, but by all the circumstances connected with the case, and by the information collected in various quarters. I do believe that much mischief was intended to be done, and much terror intended to be excited, and many houses to have been burnt to further those plans of vengeance and of plunder which they had formed; but that a thought so foolish as that of overturning the government entered their minds, I cannot believe; you have no evidence of it but from Adams, and his evidence is refuted by his own infamy, by the experience the supposed conspirators had already had, by the impracticability of the plot, and the utter want of combination or support adequate to the purpose.

I will merely, in passing, touch upon the plan stated by Adams; here are twenty or thirty men, who choose to suppose they have adherents in the Borough; who choose to suppose they have adherents in the city; who choose to suppose forty or fifty Irishmen inhabitants of Gee's-court will rise and support them; and they are hence to proceed on this project to murder the ministers. I am afraid that personal vengeance, and the desire of assassination, which had been too long fostered in their minds, have wrought them up to that; to burn houses may also have been a part of their plan: but observe what is fixed upon that by Adams;—one witness, called expressly upon that subject enumerated the houses which it was proposed to burn, and to which their numbers and their preparations might be somewhat commensurate; lord Harrowby's, my lord Castle-reagh's, the duke of Wellington's, the bishop of London's, and one or two other names, to which the witness added there was one more, but that is all. There is no high treason in that, however atrocious the act may be; but how do they attempt to make it high treason? why they get the story of the Portman-street barracks, invented by Adams, who had as good reason to know what he was talking about as Harrison, together with the burning of Furnival's-inn, which no one besides himself seems to have known; for he who enumerates the places one by one, does not include that, and yet it could not have escaped the observation of any man; but that which is merely fiction cannot be the subject of proof; and that which Adams invented, of course no other man could either attend to or observe: such is the ground on which a charge of treason is erected.

We next come to the ridiculous story of the cannon to be seized without force, to be conveyed without horses to besiege the Mansion-house, and then to take the Bank, in which a guard is always placed, more than sufficient to destroy ten times over such a paltry force, even if they had twenty times the number. Twenty soldiers, standing in the form in which they would stand, with stone walls before them, and muskets in their hands, would have sent them scattered to every part of the town; just as was done in the year 1780, when a similar attempt was made: the narrative was given me once by a noble lord, who had been the officer commanding a division of troops on the occasion, in beautiful simplicity. On the first firing of the guns, a wonderful stillness succeeded to antecedent clamour; you could see your way all down the streets, which had the moment before been crowded; and there was not a murmur to be heard, except of the multitude seeking their retreat; so that the first fire from the Bank would have dispersed them just as effectually as the appearance of that brave young gentleman, lieutenant Fitzclarence, did at Cato-street, when all the arms and ammunition served only for a rash attempt on the lives of one or two individuals. There was nothing which developed that combination or consistency which would constitute high treason, but a rash and ill-digested predatory attempt, totally distinct from the efforts of those who seek to subvert a government. This is the plan which Adams would have you believe, on his single testimony, the Crown not calling those who were present at these consultations; not producing, above all, the active, intrepid, and persevering Mr. Edwards, who could best of all, if there were any truth in it, give you an account of every thing projected, and every thing transacted.

With respect to Monument, I believe I have made the necessary observations; but I will remark on one part of his evidence, which may be relied on. It is said that when Monument had his interview with Thistlewood, Thistlewood made use of these expressions—"Great events are at hand; the people are every where anxious for a change; I have been promised support by a great many, who have deceived me, but now I have got men who will stand by me;" he then asked whether Monument had any arms, and added, that they all had arms; "Some," says he, "have a pistol, some have a pike, and some have got a sabre; he said I might buy a pistol for about four or five shillings; I told him I had no money to buy pistols; he then said he would see what he could do; I do not recollect more of that matter." Now, gentlemen, all this was for the Finsbury meeting: and he says, that on Brunt first accosting him, he, Monument, said, you have been absent so long I thought I had lost you. This related to certain meetings which were expected to be general all over the kingdom; but they are assumed as the plots of an after-formed conspiracy, and as supporting the testimony of Adams, who at that time did not know the parties, nor had even seen the face of Thistlewood. Then how does it stand? why thus: in October or September, for I do not know exactly when the meeting was, before the meeting in Finsbury-market, these great events and great changes had been announced; the meeting in Finsbury-market had taken place, and the people who attended it had been completely discouraged; their connexion had been dissolved; so much so, that when they came together again, Monument said to Brunt, I thought I had entirely lost you; and now he seems to connect the two plans, that for the meetings, and this for the assassination of ministers, which I am sorry to say was prepared, and thus it is that Adams is sought to be supported.

We have before us next, a most material witness, Hiden, who, it is said, is not an accomplice, and therefore ought to be believed. I was not present yesterday, for a reason which it is unnecessary to state, when my learned friend cross-examined him; but I understood he did not deny, at least, having been so far implicated in transactions of this kind—and I beg to be corrected if I mis-state, because, when I avow that I am speaking of a time at which I was not present, I cannot be supposed intentionally to misrepresent; I had rather be set right now than replied to hereafter; but I understand that witness, being pressed upon the subject, did not go to the extent of denying—that he had invited one other person, or other persons, to join a meeting of this kind.

Mr. Solicitor General.—To go to a meeting of a shoemakers' club, where it was said something was to be done for the good of the country; he will not undertake to say that something of that kind was not said.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am very glad to have the very words from the Solicitor-general; this man was inviting another upon the very eve of the execution of this conspiracy; he does not deny upon his oath, that he was the inviter of some other persons to join a meeting which has been described to you as a pretended club of shoemakers, that is a club where shoemakers and tailors and others went. When shoemakers and tailors have great matters in agitation for the reform of the state, the state is much obliged to them, it is doing the state much honour to devote their hours to tobacco, porter, and reform. But this man does not show that he is incapable of inviting another person; he is not therefore that innocent disinterested person which I supposed him to be from his evidence as first delivered, who took the earliest and readiest means of disclosing all he knew to the individual intended to be sacrificed by it, namely, to lord Castlereagh, but failing him lord Harrowby.

Gentlemen, does he not appear under considerable suspicion of being one of those who would wait till he had got something which he could carry to an effectual market? Does he support any plot or plan except by the conversation with Wilson, arranged so as to bear upon that part of the subject? Does he tell you of any thing relating to a plot beyond the scheme of the assassination of ministers? Let us examine his conversation with Wilson. I have given you already an express enumeration, not to be departed from, of the houses that he pitched upon; they were lord Harrowby's, lord Castlereagh's, the duke of Wellington's, the bishop of London's, and one other, which he did not recollect; now, when he sees Wilson first, he reports him to have asked, "would I be of a party to destroy his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner, they were waiting for one, and all was ready, and they had such things as I never saw, they called them hand-grenades; they are, I believe, such things as nobody ever saw; they were to light up some fires; they depended upon me for making one; and I told him I would; he said, those things were to be put into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner, and they who escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon; they were to set fire to some houses, and keep the town in a state of confusion for several days, then it would become a general thing;" now these are the particular words and expressions upon which this treasonable conspiracy is attempted to be fixed. Is there any pretence that he disclosed to lord Harrowby, any thing like this? Is there any pretence for saying that the matter went further, from his declaration at least, than that there was a plot to destroy his majesty's ministers? And here let me set myself right with respect to a supposition once put, as founded on some unconsidered expression of mine, certainly not arising from a desire or wish to misrepresent, which I consider it my duty to deny at the moment, and which I now deny again; I never did say, nor think, nor have I any intention now to say, that lord Harrowby in particular, or his majesty's ministers in general, ever had the least thought, by the encouragement of reward, or the hope or promise of advancement of any kind, to induce this man by any endeavour whatever, to strain his conscience to swear to one particular more than he actually knew, or more especially to invent any plot or conspiracy for the purpose of furthering their views, or that this might have any effect on the king's subjects. Perhaps I may be going further than my former statement might seem to warrant, but I will make this qualification; I still believe that the operating motive on Hiden's mind when he made a disclosure to lord Harrowby, was reward from lord Harrowby or some one else, and that therefore that motive would have an influence on the mind of the witness, although not inspired or encouraged either directly or indirectly by the noble individual with whom he communicated; that I did believe, and that I do believe; you have heard he is a man in beggarly circumstances; that he is a prisoner for a very small debt in the prison of the Marshalsea.—I am told that is not proved in this trial, but that he is a man in some difficulties, and I believe I am at liberty to state, that appearing here by virtue of a habeas corpus, he is indisputably a prisoner confined for debt; such a man, under such circumstances, would therefore indulge hopes which his majesty's ministers may not feel themselves disposed to excite, or at least would not excite by promises, or foster by any declaration of theirs; but the influence upon his mind is the same, and we must consider what his actual expectations were, not what his reasonable expectations might have been; but I go further, if his majesty's ministers were not apprised of it, and he was the first person who gave them that information, I do say, as a member of the community, this man has a right to expect the remuneration which he ought to receive, who has saved their lives; at what time, or under what circumstances it is to be made, it is not for me to divine, but I have no hesitation in saying, it ought to be made; I do not press this into the cause, as having an influence upon ministers, but as having a possible influence upon the mind of the witness himself, and therefore as being not unworthy of your best attention.

Now, gentlemen, what is the confirmation of this witness? How do the others each require confirmation for themselves, namely, Adams and Monument, and a third, as I humbly suggest, not sufficiently clear from imputations of this kind, to stand as an unimpeachable and irreproachable witness? Let us see what further support they receive, principally from Monument's brother, who knows nothing of the conversation with Monument, but only corroborates the facts of his being called out of the room, and of their entering into conversation, such as he has described, but not going into the particulars. He says, "Brunt called with Tidd; when Brunt came in, my brother said, I thought I had lost you; there was something passed concerning the king's death; Brunt said, that the king's death had altered their plans; my brother asked what their plans were; Brunt said, they embraced many objects; Brunt said to Tidd, shall we give them the pass-word, which consisted of the letters b, u, t, and they told us we were to meet at the turnpike;" and then he tells you the curious sign and countersign, by which they have learned to spell the word batten. That is the confirmation which Monument has received from his brother, who does not pretend to know what the plan was, but that the king's death had altered some plan; to what degree or extent he does not say, except that it had altered their plans to this extent, that the cabinet dinner being given up, they could not expect to meet the ministers together at a cabinet dinner; this being before Mr. Edwards had found the advertisement in the newspaper, and when they were to go to three or four of their houses, and take off the most obnoxious separately.

With respect to the conspiracy Monument receives no support from his brother, even if his brother were disposed to support him to that extent. The witness relied on as entirely innocent, and entitled to complete credit, is Hale, the apprentice, and we shall see how far his confirmation goes. It is beyond all doubt and dispute—I mention the landlady only for the purpose of saying her confirmation leaves it proved—that there was a room taken, in which certain consultations were held; but the apprentice does not tell you the subject of those consultations, and he supports his own credit by not saying that levity or drunkenness on the part of his master had ever induced him to drop a single word as to the object; but he says, he was told to direct any persons who called on the fatal night, to go to the White Hart, and that he sent one man, of the name of Potter, to the White Hart, and that is supposed to be a confirmation of their plans. That is no confirmation of their plans, because it appears that there were twenty or thereabouts, at Cato-street, of whom twelve or thirteen only have been named, and therefore there is still room for Potter and his friend to have been there, and they may have received an intimation at the bar of the White Hart where they were to go, a secret which it was not thought fit to entrust this apprentice with. It is said, that when Brunt came home in his tattered, dirty, and miserable condition, he expressed himself in these terms, "all is not over yet," to one person with whom he was conversing, and that he went out with that man. Gentlemen, all was not over; he might seek to promote the escape of some others, whom he knew well where to meet, with the intent to bring them together again; but as to re-uniting the scattered parts of this conspiracy, every body must know that that was utterly and clearly impossible; for take the evidence such as it is, if one party had obtained success, they were to send an orderly to St. Sepulchre's church door, who was to meet another orderly from the other party; this we hear from Mr. Adams; and so a communication was to be made. Was there any thing importing that those persons were engaged at that time in any operation? Nothing like it. Brunt's declaration, therefore, amounts to no more than this; there is a wreck, some fragments of which we must seek to save; there are arms, which Mr. Edwards, or some worthy person, has brought, which we must remove; and part of these were carried back on the morning after this attack, to the place whither most especially they ought not to have been taken, to Fox-court; Edwards takes the grenades, and they were (in a manner that would not be believed, while there was the Thames flowing near London, or any place to conceal them) brought back to the very place where they had been previously deposited, they were there again deposited, and information given for them to be found, to weigh down the case against this unfortunate prisoner.

These are the principal circumstances of confirmation which the evidence of this man receives. As to the circumstance of the watchman seeing Davidson watch; as to the circumstance of the spelling of the word button, and the game of dominos, and so on, which have been given in evidence, they are so light and unimportant, that confirmation of that nature will not attach crime either to the most innocent man, or to men whose guilt up to a certain point was admitted.

Gentlemen, I may have failed; and I know I have failed: it is impossible I should view what has been transacting on former trials, without knowing that I have failed in directing your attention to many parts of this evidence. I know you will be told, that for the purposes of murder, fire-balls were not necessary, and poles of this kind: gentlemen, how much villainy may have added to that project which I conceive to have been originally entertained, it is not for me to define; but it is quite as probable that twenty pikes should be used in killing fourteen ministers, or in guarding the spot where that crime was to be perpetrated, as in overawing the whole of this vast metropolis, and overpowering the military to be brought against them. If the probability is to be weighed in the one scale or the other, I say it is quite as probable that they should mean to arm the men attending them on this one object, as that they should by means of such weapons dig a trench to take the metropolis.

I have no doubt that I have omitted many subjects; but I trust to your excellent memory, and to the summing-up of the court, to inform your minds and direct your attention; still I do again implore you to consider how this case is made out, and how it is supported; to give the best attention you can to all the evidence, but without too much disposition to believe these informers; who, if believed, will form a precedent by which prosecutions may be extended to the most alarming degree: you have it already in evidence that there are other branches in this conspiracy to which, perhaps, the same efforts may be directed, and other persons brought to trial, on the very same testimony of these very same men. You have it as a declaration, that a gentleman's servant had supplied money and means to this conspiracy; if you believe informers of this kind, some gentleman high in public estimation, or some nobleman high in rank and illustrious in connection, may be the next victim at whom this sort of surreptitious credibility will be aimed. If they can, by such swearing, take the lives of the humblest class of victims, it wants but the vigour which will be derived from repeated success, to bring home the same conviction to any individual in the community, who happens to stand high in rank, reputation, or fortune, whom it may be thought desirable to destroy, or convenient to remove.

Juries cannot exercise too much prudence: we are often told that the policy of verdicts ought to be remote from the minds of juries; and so it ought, when the consequence ends with the subject before them; but in a case like this, where the parties present may not be alone implicated, but where hundreds of whom we think not, may come to trial on the same testimony, eked out as this is, not knowing where such things may stop, it is not too much to ask of juries to exercise a very vigilant caution and consideration. Besides, as this trial is not an affair of individual felony, but an affair of state—an affair on which, when judgment is exercised, opinion is not to be suspended—which enters into history, and forms one of the land-marks of the times—which is to be a precedent for the present and future days—it is not too much for me to say to you (and I know, too, you would do it if I did not say it) watch cautiously, examine attentively, be not too prone to listen to spies, but give every circumstance your utmost consideration; and particularly do not, because you think these men to be bad men—because you think them atrociously wicked, proceed on slight evidence to find them guilty of high treason; but weigh well, deliberate, and if your consciences point out a verdict of guilty, I know you will acquit your consciences; but unless you can do so, for God's sake, for the sake of yourselves and posterity, reject and totally discredit a spy, exercise caution, in thinking how he might have been supported, how he has been and how he has not been supported; and then determine whether you are so free from doubt as to be under the necessity of pronouncing that verdict to which I have adverted, or whether you will not feel yourselves called upon to say that the prisoner is not guilty.

A Jurymen (Mr. Goodchild.)—My lord, there is one circumstance impressed on our attention by the learned counsel, which (if my memory does not fail me) I think is not borne out; for we have it not proved on this trial, that the ammunition was returned to the dépôt, as it is termed, on the 24th; I submit myself to your lordship to correct me, if I am in error; my memory may fail me.

Lord Chief Baron.—It was not proved on this trial, certainly.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am sorry I should have fallen into the mistake; I thought it had been otherwise.

Lord Chief Baron.—And there are some other things which have not been proved on this trial; I shall endeavour to set these matters right in reading my notes.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am sure the gentlemen of the jury will believe I did not mean to mislead them.

Mr. Goodchild.—I am satisfied of that.

Lord Chief Baron.—It is impossible that any body who knows Mr. Adolphus, should imagine that to have been his intention.

Mr. Goodchild.—It is impossible, my lord, to suppose that Mr. Adolphus had any such idea.

Lord Chief Baron.—John Thomas Brunt, your learned counsel have concluded their very able addresses to the gentlemen of the jury; if you wish to add any thing to what they have said, this is the opportunity for doing so, and the jury will be very happy to hear you.

Brunt.—My lord, I have had a defence put into my hands but a few minutes ago; I have not had time to peruse it over yet; but I shall make two or three observations respecting the evidences who have appeared against me, particularly respecting the evidence of Monument. It is quite useless for me to attempt to deny being in the room in Cato-street, I do not intend to deny any thing of the kind; but immediately on the arrival of Monument at the room in Cato-street, he approached me; he asked me what was going to be done, when he saw the arms on the bench which has been described; to which, my lord, I replied, that I was not aware that any thing was going to be done, for that Edwards had not brought so many men by thirty as he had stated he could bring there; and it was much against my intention endeavouring to do any thing with so few men, for I would not be led by any individual. Accordingly, perceiving, my lord, that Monument betrayed a great deal of fear, I persuaded him to go away.

My lord, there has been a considerable stress laid upon a number of men volunteering to go to my lord Harrowby's house; this, my lord, I totally deny. I will admit, my lord, that when Thistlewood, as it has been stated, addressed himself to the few men in number (for he saw the men would not act when he addressed them) urging the necessity of going to act, as one of the witnesses stated, or it would be a Despard's job, some few men went into the small room, but they never had come to any agreement or determination (this I solemnly protest) to go to the house; they were endeavouring to see whether they were able to find fourteen or fifteen men desperate enough to go to the square, which they never could have done. I never was so deprived of my reason as to go to meet instant death.

I wish to call the attention of the jury to two circumstances that contradict themselves. My lord, in the first place, Adams states to implicate me more deeply than any other man except Thistlewood, that I declared, were there six men in the room, I would go to the house and blow the house about their ears; this, my lord, is false. Very soon after comes forward Monument, my lord, and he makes a declaration to you, my lord, and the gentlemen here, that I declared, I would go by myself and bury myself in the ruins. Is this, my lord, consistent evidence; is this sufficient evidence for my life to rest on, or to deprive me of life, my son of a father, and my wife of a husband? My lord, I should wish to advert to another circumstance: while a prisoner in Cold-bath-fields (I was there, I believe, my lord, for nearly three days, and scarcely out of the room even to wash myself) when I came down out of my room to the fire, I saw Monument, I saw Strange, I saw Cooper and Bradburn. Monument, my lord, came to me closely, sat himself down by me, and whispered in my ears these words: "What did you say when you came before the privy council?" says I, "I said I knew nothing of the matter." This, my lord, induced me to ask Monument what he had said; says I, "What did you say?"—"I could say nothing," says he, "you told me nothing; why did not you tell me more? you told me nothing." Says I, "Were it possible for me to tell you what I did not know myself? you knew very well, when you saw the men called on, it was declared every one should volunteer into the small room that would go on such a desperate affair." Though, gentlemen of the jury, you observed, no doubt, that Adams has declared, I was the man that nominated the men to go to the house, and him among the rest; a man whom I knew to be a villain, and who has constantly come to my place twice a day, in company with Edwards, to deprive me of my life. But I am no traitor; I was determined, though I had engaged in this base plot, that my life I would forfeit sooner than betray an individual; I would be racked on the wheel sooner than betray a fellow-creature. This is my principle, my lord, and this shows an intention, my lord, of Monument to betray me.

Now, my lord, I should wish to advert to a circumstance which occurred to me at Cambray, in France. Certainly, my lord, as I am placed here, and my life is placed in the hands of those twelve honest men, it becomes me to state any thing that will be of the least service to me or beneficial to my fellow-prisoners. While I was in France, my lord, I met with Adams, on the first Sunday when I came from Paris, me and my son. I had worked in the capacity of a boot-closer. Adams was a man possessed of no judgment in the trade, though he worked for a number of officers; this man, my lord, I assisted in cutting out boots for the officers, and learning him what I had attained by art in my business. The man became jealous of me, and threatened to take my life; and declared to his wife, if she did not make an open declaration to me, that if ever she spoke to me her life was not safe, he would be the death of her; accordingly, I was obliged to leave the house, which I did immediately, and never worked for him again. I went there, my lord, to work in the cavalry barracks with the Coldstream guards; and I believe, that if trouble is taken to inquire, they will find nothing treasonable or any thing disloyal about me during that time. I could bring, if I had an opportunity, a number of men in the Coldstream guards who worked in the barracks with me, particularly one Mr. Marsden who is in Westminster now; I worked for him a length of time. After this, my lord, I went from Cambray to Lisle, where I worked for a space, I suppose, of about eighteen months; I worked for an English master who then worked there, a man of the name of Pulsford, two or three months, till I obtained a little money, and then came to England. I knew nothing of Adams. I settled myself when I came home. My wife heard that me and my son were assassinated in France, and she had lost her senses, and I found her in St. Luke's when I came home; but, however, as that is not to the purpose, I shall not proceed with it. My wife, shortly after that, came out; I obtained a seat of work from a master whom I had worked for before, and who, unfortunately for me, turned out to be a relation of this very apprentice who has come here to take my life. Trade was very bad, extremely bad indeed. This Mr. Hale, who lives in Castle-street, Holborn, worked chiefly for families in the West Indies; and, my lord, as it has been held up to this court, that he is such an undeniable and respectable witness, and that his relations are master tradesmen, I will advert to some few circumstances which come within my recollection concerning his family. It must be well recollected by several gentlemen in this court, that John Hale (the brother of this very man, who put this boy an apprentice to me), some years ago, under a false name, took a large warehouse in Ironmonger-lane, and after that decamped with a ship load of goods, and swindled the merchants of London out of 100,000*l*.

Lord Chief Baron.—You should not go into the character of persons who are not before the court; there is no evidence of this.

Prisoner.—I beg pardon, my lord, for intruding on your indulgence, or that of the gentlemen of the jury; it is only to prove to you of what descendants this boy is; he has been a villain to me, which I can bring evidence in the court to prove, but I will pass over that. This relation of his that I worked for, I would wish to impress upon your mind, wished me to take the boy apprentice; I had the boy on liking; I wished to avoid taking him, but I could not without losing my bread, and even if I should be discharged from this place, I do not know where I shall get work, that is the reason I took this boy, with a promise of seven years work with him, as he had numbers of relations masters; but shortly after I had taken him, after he had been bound a short time to me, I was thrown out of work; this relation curtailed my wages; I put up with it once; he wished to curtail me again, which I could not put up with any longer. I was obliged, my lord, to leave my work, and go into another neighbourhood to live; this landlord will come forward if it is necessary, but I have not an opportunity of bringing any one forward, or I would bring numbers forward. I went to live in the neighbourhood of Fox-court; before I lived in Shoe-lane; however I was fortunate enough to obtain pretty well of work, but the worst of it is, that this boy has lost it for me; he spoiled it for me; positively I can bring men into this court, masters, particularly Mr. Smith of Southampton-buildings, who works for Mr. Birnie, and who has been had up I know, for my wife told me he has been had up, and he will give me a good character for work, and every thing he knows of me. This has caused my apprentice and me to have frequent disputes, his spoiling my work.

My lord, about eighteen months ago my wife was not very well, and she had a separate lodging out of town, and this boy went and robbed her of a book, which I detected in his pocket. I did not punish him, but only gave him an admonition; since that he has been in the habit of going about to take the lives of such individuals as me; he has been in the habit of going about and thieving, which I can prove to your satisfaction, I could bring two boys into the court now, who lived upon the same spot with me, but they are afraid of implicating themselves; and my wife, poor creature, has never been well since she was out of her mind, and is quite out of ability to come here. He went to a butcher's shop and stole a steel, and sold it to a master for whom I worked, (and who will appear with the steel), to a Mr. Bacon, in Kirby-street, Hatton-garden; this can be proved, my lord, beyond doubt. Not content with this, my lord, he was at other kinds of robbery; he was charged in Gray's-inn-lane with robbing a gentleman of his watch, and he was taken into the Guy earl of Warwick public-house; the landlord knew me very well; he directed the gentleman to take him there, being an artful boy, and I knowing the landlord, the landlord persuaded the gentleman that he must be mistaken for that he knew his master well, and he got liberated by that means. My lord, I do not know that it is altogether to the present question for me to name it, but two years and a half ago he had a brother died under sentence of death here, in this very prison; this is nothing to his credit, but what I have stated to your lordship before, I can prove; I can bring the people forward to prove it. My wife went to the butcher's, but he hesitated, and would not acknowledge to any thing of the sort, but the steel can be produced, and could the boys be promised that they would not be punished, they would come forward; and not only this, but he is a villain to his associates, for he sold the steel for 3s. 6d. and he told the boys that he sold it for half a crown, and robbed them of a shilling; this I hope, my lord, the gentlemen of the jury will weigh.

Then, gentlemen, as to Hiden, I know nothing of him; I never saw him in my life to my knowledge; that, my lord, is all I wish to say, except reading a part of this defence which I have not looked over at present [refers to the written defence]. I beg your pardon my lord, I wish to advert to a person of the name of Edwards, who is the first individual who ever drew me into this snare; this Mr. Edwards, my lord, I first saw in company with Thistlewood at the White Lion in Wych-street, Clare-market, or Drury-lane; it runs into Drury-lane; this Edwards shortly after called upon me at my lodgings in Fox-court; I was very short of work, and he used frequently to call upon me, twice or three times a day, long before this room was taken which has been so much the subject of the present trial; this room which was unfortunately a back room on the same floor as I lived; this Edwards, even if I was not at home, would call again; if I went to a shop after work, he would even come and wait for me till I came out, which I can prove by Mr. Smith, who said "Is that a person waiting for you, why do not you call him in?" This man, my lord, harassed me, and even at times supplied me with money; he told me, which I can bring other people to prove, could they be called in evidence before you, who have been had up at Bow-street by his suggestion, whom he endeavoured to implicate, but could not; he told them, that if he could get a thousand such persons as me, he knew I was not a man of disloyalty, and he knowing me to be a staunch man, thought me fit to be made a prey of; he has taken persons with me to treat them with eatables and drink; this was his constant practice, my lord, day after day continually, so I may say, for two months, if not more, before I was arrested; this I solemnly declare before God, that he is the individual who has seduced me, and not Thistlewood; I shall advert, my lord, as I stated before, to what passed when I was in Cato-street; I called that evening and before, I will state nothing but the truth; my lord, from the different favours which I had received from Edwards at different periods, I certainly had a good opinion of the man; I will candidly acknowledge, when the officers came up into the room in Cato-street, I made my escape in the best manner I could, though, my lord, I do not say I made my escape as a coward, that I ran off and went to bed, nor as a traitor deceived my fellow comrades; I went immediately down to Grosvenor-square, where I knew this villain was who probably will be the means of my being sent into another world very shortly; I went to that villain, and told him what had happened, at which he seemed very much surprised, but left the square with me; shortly after, up came Thistlewood and another person, who was in the room, but who has not been taken, nor he never will, I dare say, my lord; however, we proceeded from Grosvenor-square; he took us into several wine-vaults to drink, merely, I believe, my lord, for some persons to identify us, as I have thought since; we went into a house in Frith-street, and from there we proceeded to Holborn, when I proceeded home; I had not been long home, before a man came in, as the apprentice has asserted, and said he had received a violent blow in the side, but the apprentice forgot to tell you that Mr. Edwards was the man who came on the stairs and told us to come out, and we went out to Holborn, and there we met with Palin by chance in Holborn, and three other individuals, and with them I went into Thompson's wine vaults, opposite St. Andrew's church; I drank a small glass of liquor; Edwards came in last, and I believe if I recollect right, that I paid for three glasses of liquor, one for Palin, one for myself, and one for another individual, who was with him; I came out of the shop, and was followed very quickly by Edwards, who called me on one side and told me he wished to speak to me; on hearing what he had to say, he began to find fault with me very much for drinking with Palin, declared that he was the man that had betrayed us all, and that he was unworthy to live; declared that he had prevented ten or twelve men whom he depended on from coming to Edgware-road; that he had sent Potter to Grosvenor-square to watch his movements, and that he was a villain. On that, my lord, we walked, I believe, as far as Little Britain, I think somewhere thereabouts, I am not much acquainted with that part of the town, but when we came into a dark place, near where as he said Cook lived, (but I never was at Cook's place), he urged me again respecting Palin, as Palin was very much intoxicated, he said to me that the safest way will be for us to put Palin out of the world; he urged me, my lord, several times to assassinate Palin; he told me, says he, "you have got nothing I dare say about you," but he put his hand to his pocket, and pulled out a brass-barrelled loaded pistol, and offered it to me to assassinate Palin, and he likewise offered me the sword stick in his hand, saying "if you put him out of the world, every thing will be safe;" he likewise shewed me a constable's staff; says he, "I will act in the same capacity I have been acting in all the evening, in Grosvenor-square, and all will be safe; should there be any alarm given, I will officiate as an officer, and you may depend upon it there will be no discovery." Finding him urge me to commit murder, I made him this reply, "If you are convinced that Palin is a villain, the weapons are in good hands." Finding, my lord, that he could not prevail on me to do the murder, he says to me, "I must bid you good night, for I am going to conduct Mr. Thistlewood to some secret place." As he had always been, my lord, as it were, pinned to the coat tail of Mr. Thistlewood, I thought him a most proper person certainly, and knowing I had no evil intentions myself against any individual, I was determined not to know where they went, and consented to bid him good night, but not first without an admonition from him; he came on one side again, my lord, and whispered to me, and told me that those things which had been entrusted to Palin and Potter, and some of the individuals, they had done nothing with, and they were taken into the back room my lord, in the house where I lodged. This was a plot to take my life, I have no doubt; he asked me if I would be so good as to tie those things up in the morning, and send either my apprentice or my own boy with a part of them to Palin's, and a part to Potter's in the Borough, with an intent, my lord, as I have conceived since to take their lives, I have not the smallest doubt of it; accordingly, my lord, I got up in the morning, and those things which have been produced here I put in those baskets, as has been given in evidence here by my own apprentice, and tied them up, my lord, but altered my mind respecting sending them, thinking that if they wanted them they might fetch them. This, my lord, is all that I wish to say respecting what I know of the plot; this is all I know; I know that Edwards is the man that always found money; he is the man that went about at the old iron shops and different places, buying pistols, swords, and other things for individuals who could not get money or afford money to buy them; this I declare before that God whose awful tribunal I shall probably be called to attend; and should I die in this cause for having been seduced by the villain who has been employed by government, or he could not get the money, if I die, I will die not unworthy of a descendant of the ancient Britons; sooner than I would betray my fellow men, I would suffer a thousand deaths; this, my lord, is all I have to say.

REPLY.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Gentlemen of the Jury; I rise for the purpose of making some observations, not in reply to the case which has been set up on the part of the prisoner, because no evidence on his behalf has been presented to your attention, but in reply to the observations and arguments which have been so ably and forcibly urged by the counsel assigned for his defence. Jaded as my mind must necessarily be by a continued repetition of the same facts, and a recurrence to the same topics and the same arguments, you will feel that I have upon this occasion a most irksome duty to perform. But we are not assembled here for the purpose of amusement; we are met to discharge one of the most grave and solemn duties that can be cast upon any members of civilized society, and I trust therefore, however tedious this inquiry may prove, if I should be compelled to recur to the same arguments already so frequently urged, you will—for the sake of the public—for your own satisfaction and peace of mind, when you may look back at some future period to the events of this day—and above all, for the sake of the prisoner at the bar, give me a patient and attentive hearing.

It is in consequence of the privilege which the law has given to the prisoners of severing their challenges, and of course separating their defences, that it has become necessary to recur thus frequently to the facts of this case. I am not complaining of this; it is a right that the prisoners have by the law of the country, and if they conceive that the exercise of it can be of any benefit to them, I should be one of the last men to wish to deprive them of such a privilege. In a case of this description, to think of our own personal convenience or inconvenience, would be in the highest degree selfish and contemptible, and however painful and distressing may be the sacrifice which we are called upon to make, I am sure it will be made with cheerfulness and alacrity.

My learned friend who has just spoken said nothing on the law of the question, but my learned friend who preceded him made many remarks—remarks with which I have no disposition to quarrel—on what he called constructive treason. But we are not here engaged in considering a case of constructive treason. The charge preferred against the prisoner is of a very different character. He is charged, not with constructive, but with plain and direct treason. Disrobing the accusation of all technical terms, it is shortly and plainly this, that the prisoner conspired with other persons to move an insurrection, and stir up rebellion in the country; that he endeavoured to effect his object by means of a most extensive plan of assassination which is not now disputed by his counsel, which is admitted by the prisoner himself in the most distinct terms, and which (with their ultimate object) was to be accomplished by those other means which have been stated in evidence in the progress of this trial.

Now, gentlemen, with respect to the manner in which this case is made out against the prisoner. Mr. Curwood has stated, that before a charge of this kind can be brought home against the accused, he must, according to the language of the statute of Edward, be proveably attainted. I beg leave to subscribe to that opinion, to the full extent to which the learned gentleman would press it. I say, unless you are, by the evidence which is laid before you, clearly convinced that the case is brought home to the prisoner at the bar, it is your bounden duty to acquit him; he must, according to the language of the statute and the commentary of lord Coke, be proveably convicted. It will be for you, then, considering the evidence laid before you unopposed as it has been by any testimony on the other side, to say whether in the proper and fair construction of the terms, the prisoner is proveably convicted of the offence with which he is accused.

A most extraordinary course of argument has been pursued on the other side, and a most extraordinary assumption adopted. The witnesses for the prosecution, have proved to you that a plan of assassination was formed, which constituted one step towards the accomplishment of a treasonable project. My learned friends say we believe your witnesses; we believe your evidence up to a certain point; we admit that such a plan of assassination, wicked and monstrous as it is, was really formed; but we disbelieve all your evidence beyond that point. This is, indeed, a most extraordinary course of argument, pressed for the first time, I believe, to grave and reasonable men, in a court of justice that up to a certain point (establishing that which is almost incredible in itself, namely, that these persons had combined together to assassinate so many eminent and dignified characters, with whom they had had no personal intercourse, and of whom they had no personal knowledge) you will believe the witnesses; you will give credit to their testimony as far as this point, and all the rest you will reject as fiction and fable. But in pursuing this inquiry we shall see whether my learned friends are entitled to reject the evidence, so far as it relates to the ultimate object which these parties had in view. And when we speak of this being an improbable fiction, to which no reasonable man can give credit, allow me to ask, whether that which my learned friends have admitted, and which the prisoner at the bar has not disputed, is not infinitely more improbable, standing by itself as the ultimate object at which they are supposed to have aimed, than as forming a step towards the accomplishment of that treason which they meditated. For, I do declare, in the language (or rather in the spirit, for I cannot imitate the language) of the learned judge to whom I allude, that it is infinitely more incredible that the prisoner should have engaged in a conspiracy for the mere assassination of his majesty's ministers, than that they should have united in a treasonable design, using the assassination of his majesty's ministers as a step to promote an insurrection and rebellion in the country. I think the assumption on the other side is infinitely more void of probability than that which we state, and which at the same time is proved by the evidence in the cause, whereas the other rests upon mere assertion; you are requested to reject the evidence and to consider all this as fiction merely on the gratuitous statement of the counsel for the prisoner.

Let us, then, look at the evidence as it applies to the case, and see whether, as sober men, judging upon the testimony given upon oath before you, and upon those striking facts which cannot be distorted or denied, this case is or is not brought home effectually to the prisoner at the bar. We have called before you an accomplice:—Not but that the case is made out in its general character and plan without his evidence. I have already, to some of the gentlemen I have now the honour of addressing, stated what I take to be the just principle by which the evidence of an accomplice is to be examined. First, I consider the previous character of the individual. This man has been known to the prisoner for a long period of time. The prisoner is now, in his defence, casting imputations on his conduct: but is there any evidence to impeach the character of Adams? The name of Adams was in the list of witnesses delivered to the prisoner upwards of four weeks from this time; witnesses might have been called for the purpose of discrediting him, and of saying that he was not a man to be believed upon his oath. Nothing of that kind, however, has been attempted; but it is said that he has been a disbeliever in the Christian religion, and his having renounced those errors at a late period is supposed to throw a doubt upon his evidence. That observation, if my learned friend will give me leave to say so, shews a deplorable ignorance of human nature and of the character of the human mind. That this man was led astray from his faith by the pernicious writings of Paine he admitted, the moment the question was put to him. But we all know that when principles of religion are early in life implanted in the mind they never can be entirely eradicated. In moments of distress—when the illusions of life are withdrawn—when sickness, calamity, and particularly when the danger of death stares men in the face,—then it is that they fall back again to the consolations of religion;—then it is that they see the folly of the errors which they have committed;—then it is that they cling again to that faith which is man's best hope and security in the season of distress and sorrow. Is it unnatural, therefore, that Adams,—who is now designated by my learned friend for the first time as a spy (but of which there is not the slightest evidence in the cause), who is supposed to have been employed by government, for the purpose of attending those meetings (but of which there is not any proof, or the slightest foundation in fact; for he was not apprehended till the Friday, nor was his name known to the government till he was so apprehended)—Is it at all surprising that such a man, when he was apprehended, and when he foresaw the consequences of the situation in which he was involved, should have perceived the error of his ways, and that regret and repentance should have followed? What my learned friend, therefore, ridicules this change as inconsistent and improbable, he ridicules that which a moment's reflection must have suggested as the natural consequence of the prisoner's situation; and he shews that, in this respect at least, he is unacquainted with the workings of the human mind.

Again, as to Adams, what is his interest in the cause? A man does not come into a court of justice to commit perjury, unless he has some motive of interest actuating and swaying his mind. Bad and degraded as a man be, he will not commit perjury for the sake of the crime; and still less will he do so when it is to lead to consequences of such a nature as would follow upon the present occasion. He is apprehended, he is conscious of his guilt; he is told he may be a witness for the Crown; terms are not made with him, because that is never done; he is merely informed, that he may be a witness for the Crown. Of course he expects his pardon; but it is upon one condition only: That he falsifies the fact? that he states that which is untrue? that he aggravates the charge against his associates and himself? no: but that he states with truth all that he knows. What motive then has he to come forward for the purpose of stating that which is untrue? He blackens his own character in the same proportion in which he criminales his associates. He was one of the willing partners of their crime; why then should he state the offence to be of a different nature from that which was really committed? I can understand that he may have a motive in lessening the atrocity of the crime; but I cannot understand any motive operating on his mind which would induce him to represent it as of a blacker and more infamous character, than it really deserved.

Again, when you are considering the evidence of a man in the situation of Adams, you will inquire, could he, if he has spoken false, be contradicted? Over and over again that challenge has been thrown out to my learned friends; they might have called witness after witness for the purpose of contradicting him if the story he has told were untrue. There is a witness of the name of Hall now within their reach who attended all these meetings; there are other witnesses who have been named, whom he has stated to have been present at many of those meetings, and who might have been called either for the purpose of disproving this fact, or of proving, if they really did attend the meetings, that the object of the meetings, and that what took place at them, were different from what Adams has represented. Why, then, are not those witnesses put into the box? If the story told by Adams is false, why does not the prisoner at the bar call his own associates for the purpose of showing, that he is not guilty of the charge imputed to him, and that the account given by Adams, of what passed at the meetings, is false?

But let us look to another part of the case, to the confirmation of the story which he has told. When you are desirous of knowing, whether an accomplice is speaking the language of truth, you examine his evidence by this test; you say, "if the account be true, it may be confirmed in such and such particulars. It cannot be confirmed in all, because there are circumstances to which the witness and the prisoner, could alone be parties." Let us then see, whether he is confirmed in those things in which his evidence admits of confirmation. Try his evidence by that test, and you will see it is confirmed, not in trivial particulars, but in those which constitute the very essence of the crime imputed to the prisoner at the bar.

Gentlemen, I am desirous of sparing you—I am desirous also of sparing myself—the fatigue of going through this detail. We have adverted again and again to these facts, and I shall touch as lightly upon them as possible, knowing that the evidence will be summed up, and that you, from the attention you have given to it, will apply the general observations to the facts as they arise, and see how they are borne out by the evidence in the cause.

A witness has been called of the name of Hale who was unassailed until you heard what fell from the prisoner at the bar; to whom not a question was put on cross-examination, and who told his story in a manner calculated to raise no suspicion as to his veracity. But when the examination is over, and the witness has left the court, the prisoner at the bar, relying upon his own assertion only, states that the witness upon some former occasion had disgraced himself, and that he is not worthy of credit, nay, more with an injustice peculiar to this case, endeavoured to load him with the supposed guilt of his relations and his friends. But if the imputations attempted to be cast upon him were well founded, why were not those imputations communicated to my learned friends, that the questions might have been fairly propounded to him, and that he might have had an opportunity of denying or admitting the correctness of the charges made against him? I am sure that the assertions of the prisoner, made at this late moment, will not in the slightest degree detract from that attention which I am sure you will be disposed to pay to the evidence of Hale. You observed the mode in which he gave his evidence; was there any thing in it to lead you to suppose that he was influenced by any malicious feeling towards his master? Did he not give it in the most becoming and proper manner? And may I not repeat again, that no man, attending to that evidence, could entertain a particle of doubt as to its truth?

Then, how does that evidence confirm the testimony of Adams? It appears, that the room was taken—that the parties assembled there for a period of five weeks—that the persons so assembling were correctly described by Adams. Adams states, that it was proposed that a more numerous meeting than usual should be held on the Sunday, to arrange some plan, in consequence of the suspension of the cabinet dinners. Hale confirms this. He says, that a meeting, more numerous than usual, did take place on the Sunday, and though he was not admitted into the room to be able to explain what passed at this meeting, is it possible you should not consider this as confirming in the strongest manner the testimony of Adams? How could Adams, when he told his story, know that the facts stated by Hale would afterwards come out in corroboration of the truth of it? He has had no communication with the witness Hale—he has been in custody. Hale of course has been at large. Adams—therefore could not have invented the facts which he has stated, with a view to create a correspondence with the evidence of Hale, since he could have no knowledge of what that evidence was to be.

There is another circumstance to which I beg your attention. Adams states, that on the afternoon of the day when the blow was to be struck, some persons came into the room of the prisoner, in order to prepare their arms. Hale states that he was in the room at the time, and he describes all the particulars, exactly in the same manner in which they had been previously stated to you by the prisoner, Adams.

Now, gentlemen, give me leave to direct your attention to that remarkable fact to which my learned friend, Mr. Curwood, has adverted, namely, the proclamation; and I direct your attention particularly to this, because it is of such infinite importance in the cause. There were no materials prepared for writing the proclamation. Application was made by Thistlewood to Brunt, and Brunt was desired to procure cartridge paper for the purpose. Adams says, Brunt went out of the room, and in a short time the paper was brought in, and the proclamations were written. The apprentice tells you precisely the same story; it is true he was not in the room to know how the paper was to be applied, but he got the paper at the desire of his master, and it was carried into the room. Thistlewood wrote the proclamations. They are in these terms: "Your tyrants are destroyed. The friends of liberty are called upon to come forward. The provisional government is now sitting." The prisoners were not taken by surprise as to this proof. Notice was given to them to produce the proclamations, but they in answer suggest that no such proclamations ever existed. Let me recall to your attention the particular facts, and see how decisive they are with respect to this part of the case. First of all, observe the manner of Thistlewood. While he is in motion, and in a state of excitement, he betrays no want of firmness. He fixes his attention to write the proclamations, and after he finishes three of them his spirits subside, from the nature of the employment in which he was engaged. Now mark the effect. Adams never could have invented it; it was the natural result of the situation in which this unhappy man was placed. He became all at once extremely agitated, so much so that he could not complete what he had undertaken. No man could have invented a circumstance of this nature, though, when it is stated by the witness, it appears so natural and obvious, that it at once carries conviction to the mind as to the reality of the story. It speaks volumes upon the subject. In consequence of this uneasiness, what did Thistlewood do? Hall stood by; he desired Hall to take the pen, and Hall refused. Is this story true, or a fabrication by Adams? If it be false, Hall might have been called for the purpose of contradicting it. I ask you, Hall not being called by the prisoner at the bar, whether you can entertain a doubt that the story told by Adams is in this particular true. My learned friend says, Hall would be in jeopardy if he were called. That is incorrect; he would be exposed to no risk. If he was not at the meeting, he would contradict Adams; if he was present, the question being asked him, whether such a proclamation was written, he would answer no, if in point of fact it was not written. If any question were asked tending to criminate himself, he might refuse to answer it; but if in reality such a proclamation was not written, he might have so stated, and in so doing could run no possible risk, by questions from the counsel either for the Crown, or the prisoner. Is this or is it not then confirmation of the most convincing nature, with respect to a fact decisive of the case spoken to by Adams, confirmed by the apprentice, and not disproved by Hall, as it might have been if it were untrue.

Let us go further. The parties proceed to the meeting in Cato-street; Brunt effects his escape, Adams is not taken by the officers. The prisoner at the bar confirms this by his own statement in the course of his defence. Nay, he does more, he confirms also the account given by Hale. He tells you that he went out, and returned at nine o'clock in the manner Hale has described, covered with mud, and that another person came to him. Now, gentlemen, as to the preparations in Brunt's lodging. On that very evening and on the following morning are found materials, not for the execution of the plot in Grosvenor-square, for every thing to be made use of in Grosvenor-square had been removed to Cato-street; but in Brunt's lodgings are found fire-balls—in Brunt's lodgings are found cartridges for the cannon—in Brunt's lodgings are found grenades, none of which were to be used in Grosvenor-square, but all of which were evidently intended for some other operation. The officer who finds these proceeds immediately afterwards to the dépôt at Tidd's, and there he sees what puts an end, as it appears to me, to every doubt as to the nature and extent of the design. You may disbelieve Adams, you may disbelieve Monument, but you cannot escape the inference to be drawn from these preparations. Upwards of 1,200 rounds of ball-cartridges are produced to you. It is said that there was a conspiracy to assassinate his majesty's ministers. Were these 1,200 rounds of ball-cartridges prepared for that purpose? res ipsa loquitur, the thing speaks so strongly, that it is impossible any man can entertain a doubt upon the subject. But it is said this is so extravagant a project, that it is utterly incredible. But did the prisoner consider it to be a visionary project? I am sure you have not forgotten what was passing in the mind of Thistlewood. He told Monument that the people were everywhere desirous of a change. It was afterwards said by Tidd to the prisoner Brunt, that if they could but throw things into confusion for a day or two the measure would become general. The precise expression I do not at this moment recollect, but he said it would become general. They did not rely, therefore, upon their own strength, upon their own resources, upon their own numbers for the purpose of accomplishing the ultimate object they had in view; but they looked to that feeling and disposition which they believed to exist among the labouring classes in this metropolis. In this I believe in my conscience they were mistaken; but they imagined that if they struck this great blow, that if they excited a momentary confusion, and suspended for a short time the functions of government, a general rising would be the result, and disorder would be everywhere prevalent; and they hoped that they might "ride on the whirlwind, and direct the storm." I have no doubt that was the object which these parties had in view; and we are ourselves feeble reasoners, we are visionary men, if we estimate the nature and character of their plan solely by the extent of their own numbers, and the immediate means they had prepared for the accomplishment of their object.

When we are raising an argument founded upon the visionary character of this project, we cannot look to what has been passing within these few weeks in our own country, without perceiving how utterly unsound such reasoning must appear. If we look to the north of this island, and to the events which have recently occurred there, or if we only call back to our minds what took place in the county of Derby, in the year 1817, where a plan was formed infinitely more wild than the present, but the reality of which was distinctly proved by the most unequivocal and satisfactory evidence, we cannot say that it furnishes any argument against the truth of the evidence, that to prudent calm and reflecting minds the ultimate purpose of this scheme must appear wild and visionary.

If in the course I am pursuing, I should fatigue your attention, you will consider the infinite importance of the question to every one of us, and in particular to the prisoner at the bar. I beg then to advert again to the evidence of Monument; I do it for the sake of Monument himself. Admirable is the institution of trial by jury; the witnesses are not examined in a corner; they give evidence in the presence of the prisoner, and in the face of those who are to decide upon the credit due to their testimony. I ask you, then, to recollect the manner in which that witness gave his testimony; I ask you, whether you can doubt for a moment from the manner in which he gave his evidence, the truth of the story which he told: he told you that when Thistlewood called, he mentioned to him that great events were at hand, that the people were dissatisfied with the existing order of things, and that every thing portended change. When, therefore, my learned friends say that all that these parties had in view was the assassination of his majesty's ministers, or that the further object was merely plunder, is not this directly negatived by the evidence? That every body was desirous for a change! a change in what? evidently a change in the constitution and laws of the country. Gentlemen, he tells you, that he was induced to attend this meeting in Cato-street; he tells you what passed at that meeting, and in so doing, he confirms in every respect, as far as he had an opportunity of observing, the testimony of Adams.

There is another fact which my learned friends have treated as a very light circumstance, but on which I would say a few words; for it is from circumstances which arise accidentally in the progress of a case of this kind, and which are accidentally confirmed, that the firmest support is given to the evidence they are intended to maintain. You recollect it was a mere accidental circumstance occasioned by something which Adams had stated at the meeting, that the watch was appointed at lord Harrowby's. It was no part of the original plan. He stated who the parties were that first composed that watch, and by whom they were afterwards relieved, and you find this confirmed by the watchman, and by what took place at the public-house, where the lad played at dominos with the prisoner. Every step that we take in this case tends to confirm the story told by Adams. Did he invent this tale? If so, we should have found him contradicted throughout; but the more we sift and search and examine, the more completely and fully we find him supported and confirmed.

I pass over a great deal, because I will not fatigue your attention. My learned friend reminds me of Monument's brother. He confirms Adams, and he also confirms the testimony of his brother. He tells you that Brunt called at his lodgings. Now mark the conversation, for this is a most material circumstance. "Our plans," the prisoner said, "have been suspended, in consequence of the death of the king;" have they had any communication with Adams? none whatever. But Adams tells you the same fact, that the plan of general assassination had been interrupted by the circumstance of the death of the king, which had suspended the cabinet dinners. Thus, every thing as it happens accidentally to occur tends to confirm the testimony of Adams.

Then, we come to the evidence of Hiden. My learned friend would persuade you that Hiden was an accomplice; one of the most extraordinary and unfounded assertions I ever heard made. On what ground does he assert that Hiden is an accomplice? Because he attended two meetings of a shoe-makers' club in Round-court. I will admit, that those meetings were held for the purpose of reform. He went with a man of the name of Clarke, and invited a man of the name of Bennett, and if my friend pleases, I will admit that he told Bennett something was to be done for the good of the country. Hiden might be a friend to reform. Is that to be a subject of reproach? Through what means was it to be accomplished? Does it appear that there was any thing criminal to be transacted at the club? There is not the slightest proof to that effect, and yet if any thing had been done or intended in which Hiden was implicated, my learned friends were in possession of abundant evidence to establish it. God forbid that a man should be considered as an enemy to his country because he is a friend to reform—to reform to be effected by lawful means. But a communication was made to Hiden, and why was that communication made? because Wilson had known him for some time. He had intelligence no doubt that Hiden had attended those meetings, and conceiving he was a friend to reform, conceiving there was some disposition lurking in his mind adverse to the institutions of his country, when the plan is just ripe for execution, and when he conceives there can be but little danger in the communication, he acquaints him with the scheme. How does Hiden conduct himself? Does he bury the secret in his own bosom? does he adopt it? he tells Wilson indeed, that he will be one of them. But why? because, knowing the desperate character of the individuals concerned in the enterprise, he knew he should have been exposed to personal risk and danger if he had refused. He therefore assented to it; but to shew by what spirit he was actuated, he immediately wrote the letter to lord Castlereagh, and made that communication to lord Harrowby, to which his lordship has spoken, and yet after all this he is to be stigmatized as an accomplice, and as such undeserving of credit. He is desired by lord Harrowby to meet him on the following day. Such was the alarm and terror created in his mind, that he was afraid of meeting him. It was proposed therefore that he should attend in a retired and sequestered part of the park, and there he renews the communication, and details the particulars of the plan. He afterwards sees Wilson at about four or five o'clock, and Wilson then lets him further into the project. He enumerates some of the circumstances to you. He tells you there were to be four divisions; that the cannon in the Artillery-ground were to be seized; that the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane were to be taken; that the parties were to proceed to the Mansion-house; and he relates all the leading particulars of the plot. If this be a fable, it is one of the most extraordinary coincidences that ever existed. Had Hiden ever seen Adams? had he ever had any communication with him? Adams tells you the story which, as it turns out, corresponds precisely with the story communicated by Wilson.

Now, gentlemen, reflect upon this strong body of confirmatory evidence. Do you or do you not believe the truth of the story? do you or do you not believe the evidence of these witnesses? Look to what took place in Cato-street; look to the preparations at that place; they were directed to the accomplishment of a part of the object; look to the preparations in other quarters; they were directed to the execution of the further objects of the conspiracy. Look to the conduct of the parties in Cato-street, and to the resistance they made. Do you or do you not believe the story? "Yes, say my learned friends, we believe the story, but we believe it only as to the plot of assassination. The prisoner at the bar, and about twenty of his associates, combined together for the purpose of murdering his majesty's ministers, without any further object, without any assignable motive, not knowing the greater proportion of the individuals who were to be the victims of their treachery and cruelty." Can you believe such a thing? I can easily believe, when men are pursuing criminal purposes in the way of resolution, that human life becomes comparatively unimportant; that they do not allow such sacrifices to be any impediment to the execution of their designs; the end at which they are aiming, in their view, sanctifies the means by which it is to be accomplished. But I cannot bring myself to believe, that a number of men could unite together, to murder in cold blood, for no object that can even be suggested, but from malignant feelings alone, such a body of distinguished individuals. As a means to accomplish revolutionary designs, I can understand it; but I have not a mind capable of understanding how such a conspiracy for the purpose of murder alone, could possibly have been formed. We have been told of their feelings of enmity and revenge, against whom? against the nobleman whom you saw giving evidence yesterday. In what way had he given offence to the prisoner at the bar and his associates? they knew him only by name. If they had inquired further, they would have heard only of the virtues and talents by which he is adorned. My learned friend, the Attorney-general, mentioned the name of the distinguished individual at the head of his majesty's government, who, as if by common consent, has been uniformly spared amidst all the bitterness and rancour of party and faction. Again, gentlemen, that illustrious commander, who had so frequently led our armies to victory—he to be an object of enmity and revenge to Englishmen, he who had so raised and exalted the name and character of our country, who had thrown into the shade the glorious deeds of past times, and realized whatever of glory our wishes or our fancies had conceived; that private hatred and revenge should have influenced the minds of the prisoners to such a deed, I should have supposed it impossible even to state in the presence of men of sense and reflection, still less could I have supposed that such a suggestion could have been made without even the semblance of proof, to support it.

But again it is urged (and that is a new supposition) that all this was for purposes of plunder: were such preparations ever made for such an object? But let me ask, what is there in the character of the men engaged in this affair, that should lead you to suppose plunder was the object. Let me recall your recollection for a moment, to that unhappy man the leader of the whole design, Arthur Thistlewood. Is there any thing in his character to induce you to suppose, that he intended merely a scheme of plunder? Is he not only to be convicted as a traitor, but is he to be stigmatized as a felon and a thief? Fallen as he is, let us not sink him still lower; we know the feelings by which he was influenced, that he was inflamed by strong political passions, and we know therefore, that he might have headed a band of men with a view to revolutionary objects; but there is nothing in his character or conduct, to lead you to suppose that he would have become a leader of banditti for the mere purposes of general plunder.

Gentlemen, I beg your pardon, for having detained you so long by my remarks upon the evidence in this case; but it is a case of infinite importance, for though the inquiry into this conspiracy has been pursued twice before, yet the prisoner at the bar is not to be prejudiced or affected by the result of former verdicts. He must be tried by the evidence which you have yourselves heard in this cause, and is entitled to the benefit of those observations which you have heard so eloquently urged by my learned friend. His fate must depend upon the impression made upon your minds by that evidence, without reference to what you before knew or may have heard upon the subject; and it is for this reason that I have gone through this case at some length; it was my duty so to do; I have been heard with patient attention; and as far as we are concerned, our duty is at an end. A part, an important part of yours is still to be performed. You stand between the prisoner on the one side, and the Crown, the prosecutor, on the other. Sworn to administer justice impartially between them, sworn to do justice to the prisoner, sworn to do justice on the other hand to the public, I have no doubt whatever that you will do so, and whatever may be the issue of your verdict, I for one shall be content.

SUMMING-UP.

Lord Chief Baron.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—It now becomes my duty to request your patient attention; and I proceed to address you in the perfect confidence that you will discard from your minds every impression that has not been made in the course of the present trial. By the indictment the prisoner is charged with the crime of high treason. Gentlemen, you find four counts; I shall take the liberty of drawing your attention to only two of them. The first is that the prisoner, with others, compassed, imagined, invented, devised and intended to deprive and depose our lord the king of and from the style, honour, and kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm. The other to which I shall beg leave to call your attention is the third count, that the prisoner, with others, compassed, imagined, invented, devised and intended to levy war against our lord the king in his realm, in order, by force and constraint, to compel him to change his measures and counsels.

The crime of high treason imputed by these counts, consists in the imagination and intention, and that intention is to be proved by what are called overt acts, which are stated in the indictment; and if those overt acts or any material parts of them are proved to your satisfaction, there is no doubt but that they support the charge of high treason in each of those counts.

I am happy to relieve you from the notion that was attempted to be thrown in your way, that there is in this case any question of constructive treason;—there certainly is none—the question here is merely whether these imaginations and intentions, which are in themselves treason, are proved by the evidence; and I think I may go further and say now, that the question before you is entirely free from any legal perplexity, and that it depends entirely upon whether you believe the evidence or not.

That there has been a conspiracy is not only indisputably clear from the evidence, but it is admitted distinctly by the learned counsel for the prisoner, and by the prisoner himself—it is admitted, and it is also proved, to have been a conspiracy formed for a most nefarious purpose—it is admitted that it was a conspiracy founded in the diabolical intention to destroy his majesty's cabinet council;—fifteen of those persons who transacted the principal affairs of government, and who, in their individual characters, are perhaps some of the most honourable and most amiable of his majesty's subjects, against whom there had been no personal indignation on the part of any body. If, however, this terrible purpose was the only purpose which this conspiracy embraced, there is no high treason in it, because the object is confined to the destruction only of those fifteen noble lords and gentlemen; but it is contended that this particular purpose formed one of the steps to the general scheme of subverting the constitution; and, gentlemen, in the consideration of the evidence, you will have to decide to which side that evidence is to be applied.

I will now proceed as carefully as I can to read to you all the material parts of the evidence. I shall begin, of course, with Robert Adams, and proceed with the witnesses in the order in which they were presented to you. But before I read the evidence of Robert Adams, I will detain you for a few moments upon the subject of his particular character. He is, beyond all doubt, an accomplice contaminated by the crime, whatever it may be, of which the prisoner at the bar was guilty; for the prisoner at the bar admits that he was guilty of a crime, but not of high treason; the accomplice being a partaker of that guilt, whatever it may be, ought to be looked at with that care and jealousy, which are necessarily excited by a person of that description; but, in point of law, he is an admissible witness. Whether he is to be believed is another question, and will depend upon other circumstances. I shall first state the testimony which he has given, and then in proceeding with the other witnesses, you will see how far you will be of opinion that credit is due to him. At present, however, we must consider his evidence with great attention; because, if it be believed, it is of very great importance indeed in this very important case.

Robert Adams says, he is a shoemaker, that he is at this time a prisoner in custody, that he lived before he was taken prisoner, at No. 4, Hole-in-the-wall passage, next house to Tidd's; that he was in the army eighteen years ago, in a regiment of horse-guards; that he knows the prisoner Brunt, he is a boot-closer, he became first acquainted with him at Cambray in France, in the year 1816, at that time Brunt went by the name of Thomas Merton; they were both at the head quarters of the British army, and there the witness followed his business of a shoemaker, serving our army; that early in the present year, he called at Brunt's lodgings in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane; Brunt and Ings on the 12th of January, introduced the witness to Thistlewood. Thistlewood lived in Stanhope-street, Clare-market; on entering the room when Brunt and Ings introduced him, "Brunt said to Thistlewood, here is the man I spoke to you about; then Thistlewood said to me, you belonged formerly to the Life-guards, did you not? I said, no, to the Oxford-blues; he said, no doubt you are a good soldier? I said, I was once; he said, you can use your sword well? I said, I knew how to use a sword formerly, but for want of practice I cannot use it so well now, but I can use a sword sufficiently to defend myself. Thistlewood then turned his discourse upon the shopkeepers of London; he observed, they were a set of aristocrats altogether, they worked under one system of government, and he should glory to see the day when they should have all their shops shut up and well plundered; then he turned his discourse towards Mr. Hunt; he said he was not a friend to the people, and he had no doubt, that could he enter Whitehall and overlook the government books, he should find Hunt's name as a spy of government; and then he spoke of Cobbett, that he with all his writings was no friend of the people; and he said, I have no doubt, if I could see the same books, I should find he was a spy as well as Hunt; then Brunt said, he had a couple of other men to call upon, towards Carnaby-market, and asked Mr. Thistlewood whether he would walk with him to see the men; Thistlewood, however, did not go; there was a word or two between Brunt and Thistlewood, about attending a raffle for a blunderbuss with a brass barrel. I do not recollect that Mr. Thistlewood said he should go, but I and Brunt and Ings left the room, leaving Thistlewood behind. I was soon afterwards taken to prison for debt, I staid in prison until the 30th of January, which was the Sunday, the day after the late king's death; the next day, Monday, I saw Brunt at the White Hart, which is kept by a man of the name of Hobbs; in the evening I saw him again, in the house in which he lodged, in the back room up two-pair of stairs on the same floor with his own rooms, he occupies two, one of which he works in and another he lives in; I had heard him say, that he had taken that back room for Ings; I attended several meetings in that room, down to the 23rd of February, from the time I left the prison; the meetings were held there generally twice a day; those who usually attended them were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Harrison who had been in the life-guards, and Davidson a man of colour, and also Wilson, Edwards and Tidd, who lived in the next house to mine. Tidd was also a shoemaker; Palin attended sometimes, but not regularly; I have seen Potter there also; Hall was a tailor by trade. When I came out of prison, I attended the first meeting on the evening of Monday, the 31st of January, that was in this back room.

"On the Wednesday night following, I went again to a meeting in this back-room; Thistlewood, Brunt, Wilson, Davidson, Harrison, Edwards, and Bradburn attended; I saw then in the room a number of pike-staves; there was no furniture in the room of any description except a fixed stove; when we wanted chairs they were brought from Brunt's room; on the same floor; the staves I saw there were rough and green, as if they had just been cut, and just come from the country; Bradburn was cutting the ends of the staves off, and putting on ferrules; after they were all knocked on, it was considered that the end of the pike-staves would not be strong enough to support the pike heads; then they cut the ends off a second time, and Brunt got some larger ferrules, and they were put on; I saw them afterwards put on. A short time before the king's funeral I was there, and I saw Thistlewood, Harrison, Davidson, and Wilson there; Harrison told Thistlewood that he had seen a life-guardsman, and heard from him that all the guards that could be mounted would be at Windsor at the king's funeral, and that as many of the foot-guards and police-officers as could be spared, would be there also; and Harrison said he thought it would be as favourable an opportunity as could be to kick up a riot in London, as he thought the soldiers and officers would be out of London, and there would be scarcely any body in London to protect it. This he mentioned to Thistlewood, when he came into the room. Thistlewood improved upon it in this way; he proposed that two pieces of cannon, which were in Gray's-in-lance, and six other cannon in the Artillery-ground should be taken on the same night." Gentlemen, you know the question is, whether this was a particular purpose of destroying the ministers, or a more general purpose. The cannon could hardly be wanted to destroy gentlemen in the house at dinner; if, indeed, you believe the evidence concerning the cannon. The witness proceeds to state that "Thistlewood said, that after this should be done, he thought it would be necessary to send to Hyde-park-corner, to prevent any intelligence being sent by an orderly from London to Windsor, to communicate what was going on in London. At the same time he proposed that the telegraph on the other side of the water should be taken to prevent a communication to Woolwich of what was passing in London; and Thistlewood said, he thought it would be necessary, at the same time, to cut trenches across the road to prevent cannon being brought from Woolwich, and he said that the soldiers at Windsor would be so knocked up and fatigued that they would not be able to come from Windsor to London; or if they did come they would be unable to do any thing. Thistlewood proposed that an offer should be made to the soldiers in order to bring them over to us; or if they were determined to act against us, Harrison, who was an old soldier, should employ the hand-grenades to destroy the soldiers. Thistlewood then proposed to send to the different sea-ports, Dover, Margate, Brighton, and I think other ports, with an express order, that if any person was permitted to leave the country, without an order from the provisional government, those towns should be blown down over their heads; that as soon as they could collect force enough, which he had no doubt they should, they should send a very strong force down to Brighton, in case the new king should be there after the riot was kicked up, which he did not suppose he would, in consequence of his indisposition; that they should send this force down in order to plunder Brighton, and as to the new king being crowned as king, Thistlewood said it was all nonsense, for he did not intend that that should ever be. After this Ings and Brunt came into the room, and Thistlewood communicated to them all that had passed, and Ings and Brunt both expressed themselves, that nothing short of the assassination of the king's ministers would satisfy them." The witness then said, "On the 2nd of January, before I was introduced to Thistlewood, as we were walking down the street, Brunt spoke to me about assassinating the ministers." Then he says, "When we began to talk of the assassination of ministers, Ings said, he had been in the park to assassinate the prince regent before his majesty's death; he pulled a pistol from his pocket, and said, that was the pistol that he had taken; he pulled the pistol from his left pocket, and held it out, saying, damn my mortal eyes this is the pistol; he said it was the time when the prince regent went to open the parliament. When Brunt spoke to me about the assassination, he said, that it was to be done the first time that the ministers assembled at a cabinet dinner.

"On the 19th February, the Saturday, there was another meeting, at which were present, Thistlewood, Brunt, Harrison, Wilson and Ings; this was between eleven and twelve o'clock in the morning. I cannot be sure whether Davidson was there or not; on my going into the room, I found those persons I have named, except Davidson, as to whom I do not know whether he was there or not; I found them sitting with their heads together in consultation. I soon found what they were consulting about, for they got up altogether, and Thistlewood said, it is agreed; if nothing transpires between this and Wednesday night, we will go to work, as we are all so poor we cannot wait any longer; and then Thistlewood proposed that a committee should sit on Sunday morning to draw up a plan to act upon; this was also agreed to. Then Thistlewood told Brunt to tell the men that were to come under his care to come armed; here Brunt said, it is a parcel of nonsense, that if any officer came there, he would execute him in the room, or murder him; he expressed himself in a sort of language not proper to be used, but the purport of it was, that they should be murdered if they did come; Brunt adding, I will take care that it never shall be found out, or to that effect." Then the witness says, that he left them all in the room and went away. Then he says, "before the Saturday, I had seen in the room a sword and some hand-grenades, some of which had been made up in the room; and I had seen pistols pulled from their different pockets; the things were removed to Tidd's lodgings in Hole-in-the-wall passage, which they called the dépôt. Thistlewood wished them to be removed to that dépôt to conceal them from any person who might come into the room, and Brunt carried the principal part of the hand-grenades to Tidd's; I followed him into the room at Tidd's; I saw him place them upon the floor, and Tidd's daughter put them into a box under the window.

"On Sunday morning the 20th, Thistlewood, Ings, Hall, Brunt, Harrison, Davidson, Bradburn, Edwards, Cook, and three other persons, strangers to me, came to this back room; there were twelve of them in all. Between eleven and twelve on that day, Thistlewood looking about and seeing there were twelve men of us, said, there are twelve of us, that is enough to make a committee, and Tidd, was desired to take the chair; he took the chair accordingly, with a pike in his hand. Thistlewood, who stood on Tidd's right hand, said, gentlemen as we have all met here, we have no occasion (turning his head to the door) to mention any names; I suppose you all know what you are met for, and as we have all waited so long with an expectation of the ministers dining together, finding there is no likelihood of their coming together; we are resolved, if they do not meet before Wednesday-night to take them separately. He then proposed this plan; he called the project to assassinate, the West-end job. He said, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six pieces of cannon at the Artillery-ground, should be taken; and that Palin should take the command of another party to set fire to different buildings of the town; Cook was to take the lead in taking the cannon in the Artillery-ground; as to the time, Thistlewood said he could not then fix the precise time, but there would be opportunity enough to fix before Wednesday-night; that he thought forty men would be quite enough for the West-end job," that was the assassination of ministers, "if we can get so many; and as to further proceedings on the plan, it should be settled another time, for that Brunt was to come forward with a project about the assassination, and to state how it could be done. Brunt then stepped forward." This, gentlemen, is given to you in the way in which the man states it; he stated it with great particularity, but it is material only as shewing how the business was carried on, and how they conducted themselves in the room. The witness says, "Brunt then stepped forward; but Thistlewood stopped him before he spoke, and said his own motion should be put first from the chair; that if any body wished to speak to it he wished them to speak; the question was put, and Thistlewood's motion carried. Then Brunt came forward, and proposed his plan, which was this—As no signs of getting the ministers all together appear to us, we must take them separately, and it shall be done in this way; our men must be divided into parties, according to the number of ministers to be murdered. The men were to be lotted, and he proposed, that a man from each lot should be drawn out for the purpose of assassinating the particular minister, and if the man to be drawn out did not execute his duty from any signs of cowardice, he should be run through the body on the spot." On this, the witness Adams says, he got up and asked whether a man might not fail in the attempt, and if so, whether he was to be run through on the spot? "Brunt said, certainly not, unless there is proof of the man's being a coward;" then Adams says, he himself sat down. "The question upon Brunt's proposition was put from the chair, and agreed to, in the same manner as Thistlewood's motion was. Directly after this, three other men came in, namely, Palin, Potter, and Strange; what had passed before they came in, was communicated to them; then Palin got up, and asked how the things were to be done, as they had so many objects talked of at the same time; saying, I believe, provided they could be all carried, they would be a great acquisition to what we have in view; but this is what I want to know, you talk, of taking forty men for the West-end job; you talk of taking the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and six at the Artillery-ground; and you propose me with a few men to set fire to the different buildings; but you ought to know better than myself what men you can command; I, for my own part, cannot satisfy you what men I can bring forward, unless I am intrusted by this committee to state to them what has passed in this room this morning; if I can have that power to tell my men what they are going about, and when they will be wanted, I shall better know how to act with them. Then Thistlewood, Brunt and Tidd said, they thought no harm would arise in giving Palin that authority which he proposed, if he had men in whom he could place confidence; on this Palin sat down, and nothing particular passed afterwards whilst Tidd was in the chair. When Tidd left the chair, Thistlewood turned round on a sudden, and said, Brunt, as Palin is here, you can take him to the place close by, and let Palin see whether that place is practicable to do or not; Brunt and Palin then went out together, and returned in about ten minutes. Palin said it was a very easy job, and would make a good fire. This," Adams says, "was Furnival's-inn-buildings; Brunt had mentioned this at a previous meeting, as a building to be set fire to; the building was at that time not finished; Fox-court is very near; the people began to separate, saying they had men to call upon. After this Thistlewood still remaining, he said to Brunt, I think that between this and the time we go to work, we had better collect the men together and give them a treat; but I do not know how this is to be done, we are all of us so very poor. Brunt turned round and said, Damn my eyes, though I have done little or no work lately, I have got a one pound note, which I have reserved for the purpose of treating my men, and I will do it. Thistlewood said, he did not know where we could take them to; I suppose we can have the room up stairs at Hobbs's. Brunt said, he did not like to go there, in consequence of what had been dropped from my mouth, of what had been said by Hobbs; then Brunt said, never mind, as time gets so near, I do not see what we have to fear, for if any officers come into the room, we will take care of them; shortly afterwards they separated." Gentlemen, you know what Hobbs had told Adams and Adams had told them was; that officers had been to his house suspecting a radical meeting to be there; this was on the Sunday.

The witness proceeds to state that "there was another meeting held on the Monday, and another on the Tuesday morning about ten o'clock. Brunt was at this meeting, so were Thistlewood, Tidd, Ings, Hall, the witness Adams, Wilson, Harrison, Edwards, Bradburn, Palin, and Potter. On Edwards coming into the room, he told Thistlewood that on the next day (Wednesday) there would be a dinner of the ministers at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square, for he had seen it in the news-paper. Thistlewood doubted this; he said, he had not seen it in the newspaper he read; he proposed to send for a newspaper, Hall fetched it; it was the New Times; it turned out that Edwards had given them true information; Thistlewood read the paragraph aloud; then it was proposed by Thistlewood to have another committee to alter the plan; Harrison and Davidson came into the room in the interval of the paper being fetched. When Harrison and Davidson came in, Davidson brought a bag of balls, and Harrison some powder; before the newspaper came in, Ings pulled out three daggers; these daggers he said he had prepared with the sole intention of a separate assassination, and he shewed by his action how he intended to cut the heads of the ministers off, using some very coarse expression. After the paper was brought and read, from which it appeared that the ministers were to meet on the Wednesday, Brunt exclaimed, Damn my eyes, now I believe there is a God, in calling those thieves together; it has often been my prayer that they would all meet together, now God has answered my prayer; Thistlewood then proposed there should be a committee, and that I should take the chair; I did so; upon Thistlewood coming forward to explain his plan, I called him to order, and said, before you begin, I hope you have given due consideration to what I communicated to you yesterday morning;" that was what Hobbs had said to him, namely, that there had been two officers there, saying there was something wrong going on in his house. "On my saying this, Palin took it up, and said he wished for some explanation, and that before the business proceeded any further. Upon this, Brunt got up, saying you shall have an explanation, and then he stated what had been said before about Hobbs's information; then Brunt, to obviate any risk, proposed that a watch should be set to observe lord Harrowby's house, the watch to begin at six o'clock that same night; two to go at six and stay till nine, then to be relieved by two others to stay till twelve, and to commence again the next morning at four, and the watch to continue until the next evening, when it was proposed we should go to work; those men were to watch whether soldiers or police officers went into the house at any time, and if so, they were to give notice to the rest; if not, Brunt said the work should be done the following night (Wednesday night). Brunt picked out the men to watch. Davidson was one of the first; he was to watch from six to nine, and Brunt and Tidd to watch from nine to twelve. On this, Thistlewood came forwards as to what fell from Brunt's mouth, and said, if no soldiers or police officers enter the house, I shall propose a plan to take them all together; he proposed to go himself to lord Harrowby's door with a note, to deliver to a servant, saying he must have an answer, and on his being admitted into the house to wait for an answer, he was to be followed by the others, who were to rush in directly afterwards; they were to seize upon the servants, to present pistols to them, and threaten them with instant death if they made any resistance; at the same time four were to take the command of the stairs; two men to take care of the stairs that went to the upper rooms, and two to take care of the stairs that went to the lower rooms, and each of those four men was to have a hand-grenade in his hand, and a pistol and cutlass; if any attempt was made from the upper part of the house, a hand-grenade was to be thrown amongst them, and in the lower part of the house also, if any resistance was made; two men were to be placed in the area, one with a blunderbuss, and the other with a hand-grenade; after this was done, the others were to rush into the dining room; Ings proposed to enter the room first; he was to be followed by two swordsmen, who were to be Harrison, and Adams; then Ings said he would say this, Now, my lords, I have as good men here as the Manchester yeomanry, enter citizens and do your duty. On this word of command, they were to rush into the room to be followed by Ings with his broad knife, and he swore that he would cut off their heads as fast as he could get at them. The heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth he was determined to bring away with him in his bags and he also was determined to have one of lord Castlereagh's hands which he intended to pickle; this hand, he said, would be thought much of on a future day. Ings had said before this, he would exhibit the heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth upon a pole in the streets. Thistlewood improved upon this plan, and said, he thought it would be better to put them on a pike, place them behind the cannon, and carry them along the streets, and that they would more terrify the people. On this Bradburn said, that after they were exhibited in this town sufficiently, he would enclose their heads in a box and send them to Ireland. After the business was done at lord Harrowby's, they were to go to the Horse-barracks in King-street, and set fire to the shed with a ball or balls prepared for that purpose. Wilson was to go and support Harrison in that project; from thence they were to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane to the City Light-horse-barracks, to take two cannon from thence; and there was to be somebody there waiting to assist them; they were then to proceed to the Artillery-ground, unless something occurred to the contrary, and to meet Cook at the Artillery-ground; they were to take the six cannon from thence, and after they had got them, they were to load them and bring them into the street loaded; and if Cook found himself sufficiently strong by the accession of people, or otherwise, he was to advance to the Mansion-house, which was to be taken and to be made the seat of the provisional government. The cannon were to be placed, three on one side and three on the other side of the Mansion-house; and if the inhabitants of the house refused to give up the Mansion-house, they were to force their way in, and to make it the seat of the provisional government. Then they agreed that the Bank of England was to be taken and plundered, but Thistlewood said, he meant not to destroy the books but secure the books, in order that we may be able to see some of the proceedings of government that we are not now in possession of. Thistlewood and Cook agreed between themselves, that if he, Cook, found himself so situated as to be able to go to the Mansion-house, he was to send an orderly man forward to stand against the door of St. Sepulchre's church, to wait the arrival of an orderly to be sent by him (Thistlewood), and these two men were to return to their respective parties with the information they were to give the one to the other; then Harrison said, there should be a counter-sign; the word should be button; one man should say b, u, t, and if he addressed his friend, that friend should say t, o, n; there was to be a man fixed at the end of Oxford-street; one man should say b, u, t, another t, o, n, and then they would each shew themselves to be of the same party. Harrison said, he would secure a place for the men to go somewhere about the end of Oxford-street. In the afternoon I went to Fox-court again; as I was going up, I perceived a strange smell; on going into the room I saw Ings, Hall, and Edwards; Edwards was making fuses for the hand-grenades; Ings was putting the ingredients for the fire-balls into an iron pot, and Hall was laying paper on the floor in order to receive those balls, after they had been dipped in the pot, to prevent their dirtying the floor. I called again in the evening, and found Thistlewood and two persons who were strangers to me there. In the course of the evening the party were pretty well all there; Davidson went to watch at six, and Brunt and Tidd started about nine o'clock to relieve him; as they were going, I understood Tidd was detained by some other circumstance, and Brunt returned; and as Tidd could not go to lord Harrowby's house, he took me with him in Tidd's stead; we found Davidson on the watch, and relieved him. I went about nine o'clock; whilst we were upon the watch, Brunt and I went to a public-house to take some refreshment at the corner of the Mews, directly at the back of lord Harrowby's house. I do not know the name of the sign; Brunt and I went about twenty minutes past nine, and staid there about an hour and a half. Brunt played at dominos with a young man there." You will see, gentlemen, the materiality of this evidence presently. "About eleven we returned to our watch, and left the place on the turn of twelve; I went out of the public-house once or twice occasionally. On Wednesday I went again to Fox-court about two o'clock in the afternoon; I first went into Brunt's own room. Strange one of the prisoners came in first, then two or three whom I did not know. I then saw pistols in Brunt's private room; they began to try to put flints into them; when the strangers came, Brunt proposed we should go into the other room, and he and I went there with Strange and the strangers; I saw pistols, cutlasses and blunderbusses there; just after we came in Thistlewood came, and after him Ings and Hall; when Thistlewood came in, he looked round and said, now my lads this looks something like; it looks as if we were going to do something; he clapped his hand upon my shoulder, and said, how do you do Mr. Adams; I said, I am not well, I am low spirited; not on account of what we are going about; says Thistlewood. I said, I wanted some refreshment; and Brunt, by Thistlewood's orders, sent for some gin and beer; and Thistlewood said, he wanted some paper to draw out some bills, large posting bills, such as the paper on which newspapers were printed, but he did not know the name. I proposed cartridge paper; I told him that would answer the purpose; upon this, Thistlewood gave Brunt some money to fetch this paper; Brunt sent for it, and it was brought; then a chair and table were brought in from Brunt's room, and Thistlewood sat down to write on this paper so brought; he wrote three bills; he read what he had written, and the words were these: Your tyrants are destroyed. The friends of liberty are called upon to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting. Signed, James Ings, secretary, February 23, 1820. Thistlewood, after writing these, expressed himself tired, and seemed to be rather agitated; the bill was written in largish letters; they were to be placed and posted up against the different buildings which should be on fire, or near them, in order to inform the public who might come to the fires what had been done; he then asked Hall to take the pen and write more bills, which he refused; a stranger was then asked; he refused at first, but afterwards did it; afterwards Ings accoutred himself, he first put a black belt round his loins; after that, he hung another over his shoulder; his belt round his loins was to contain a brace of pistols; the one over his shoulder was for a cutlass; he put a couple of bags over his shoulders, in the shape of soldiers, haversacks; on viewing himself, after he had thus dressed himself, he said he thought himself not complete without his steel; he then produced a very large knife, with a very broad blade, and wax-end wound round the handle; he said the wax-end was to keep his hand from slipping; this knife he said, is to cut off the heads of lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth; all the rest took an active part in preparing themselves with pistols and cutlasses, and other things. Then Palin came in; Thistlewood and Brunt left the room a little before five; Palin said, he hoped that all persons knew what they had met there upon; he hoped if they did, that they had given consideration to what they were going to do; he wished them to inform themselves, whether the assassination of ministers was likely to be of service to their country, and the people would come over to them; before doing it, you ought to determine with yourselves to be true to one another; if it should be proved that any one of you is in danger from the opposite party, others of us should immediately go to his assistance, and if any man flinches, he ought to be run through; he was here interrupted by a tall man whom I do not know, who said, you speak as if all the men in the room knew what they were going to do, but that is what I wish to know myself, and some others; I myself, am not afraid of my life, and no man who turns out on such a thing ought to be afraid of his life. Palin was going to speak, but Brunt came in, and seeing, as I thought, some alteration in the countenances, in consequence of what this tall man and Palin had said, he told him, that he and the others wanted to know what they were going to do. Brunt said, this is not the proper place where you ought to know it; but if you go to a room in the Edgware road, there you shall know all; Brunt added, all those who went with him should have something to drink to put them in spirits; the tall man said, he hoped that no man going on such a piece of business as this, would get drunk; the man who does so puts himself in the hands of his enemy, and is of no use to any body." Then Adams proceeds, and says, "there was a cupboard in the room, in which I have seen a sword, and tar and pitch, and oakum, which are materials for fire-balls, and hand-grenades were kept there till they were removed; I went down stairs alone, and was followed by a stranger; I went to Cato-street that evening; I took a blunderbuss, and a broomstick prepared to receive a bayonet; I met Thistlewood and Brunt in Edgware-road, they took me to the stable in Cato-street; in going through the stable, I saw Davidson and Wilson; Davidson sitting down, and Wilson standing up."

Brunt.—My lord, I beg pardon, but as there are several evidences in the court, and it may operate to the prejudice of my fellow prisoners, I wish to know whether they may not withdraw?

Lord Chief Baron.—Oh, yes, certainly.

Mr. Gurney.—My lord, they are the persons who the counsel for the prisoners consented should remain; they are the officers in custody of the arms.

Lord Chief Baron.—Your counsel know the persons very well.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It has been made matter of express consent, or they would have retired as the other witnesses have done.

Lord Chief Baron.—Adams then says; "I went up into the loft, I found several men there; the stable is the first building in Cato-street; Cato-street is a little street running out of John-street; you enter it under an archway, and when you get through that archway you turn to your right, and directly into the stable. At the further end of the stable there was a ladder, by which I got up into the loft; in the loft there was a carpenter's bench, and upon it I saw pistols and cutlasses, and there was also a candle on the bench. When I went first, Thistlewood, on looking about, said, there were eighteen in the room, and two below stairs. I laid my blunderbuss on the bench; there were present then, Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Bradburn, Davidson, Wilson, Harrison, Strange, Cooper and Tidd. They were all the persons whom I knew by name; there were other persons there; they were all preparing themselves with their different arms. After I came, Thistlewood went down stairs, and I afterwards went down stairs myself, and found Thistlewood, Brunt, Davidson, Harrison and Wilson in the stable. When I went down, they turned themselves round and expressed themselves all on a sudden, what good news we have; there are six or seven carriages already come to lord Harrowby's house; and Brunt said, what a rare haul we shall have to night. Tidd had not arrived at that time. We went up into the loft again; but Brunt proposed before we went up again, that there should be a double sentry at the stable-door, and that no one should be admitted unless he would give the counter-sign. When we went to the loft, somebody expressed a fear that Tidd would not come; Brunt said, there is no occasion at all for any fear upon that subject; I will pledge my life that he will come. Ings behaved like a madman, and said he would either hang himself, or cut his own throat, if we did not go through with the plan. Thistlewood said he hoped they would not drop the concern; if they did, it would be another Despard's job. Just after that, Tidd came in. After some little conversation with Tidd, Thistlewood came to the table, and said, suppose lord Harrowby to have sixteen servants in the house, they will not be prepared, and we shall be; and Thistlewood proposed fourteen to be picked out of the twenty men to go into the room. Thistlewood and Brunt then began to pick them out. On this being done, Brunt introduced a gin bottle; he offered me a glass, and he called me out among the fourteen. Some time before this, on Brunt finding the men rather apprehensive that they had not sufficient strength, Brunt came up to the table, and addressed them in a few words; he alluded to those who were in the room, that they did not know exactly the preparations they had got. He said, we have got things here that will blow the house down over their heads; so bent am I on doing the job, that if there were only eight or nine, I am determined on going in and doing it; then, he added, if there were only five or six that will go, I will be one that will do it, and if we find any danger, we will take those things with us, and destroy the house, and perish all together with it. Just at that time, as the gin was going round, after the men were picked out, I heard some noise below; some body came to the bottom of the ladder, and cried, holloa, show a light! Upon this, Thistlewood took a candle from the bench, and looked down the stairs, turned round, and put down the candle on the bench again, and seemed rather confused. Then some officer ascended the ladder, and came into the room; the first word he spoke, to the best of my recollection, was, here is a pretty nest of you gentlemen; we have got a warrant to apprehend you all, and as such I hope you will go peaceably. At this time two officers had entered, and another officer was behind them on the ladder; he cried, let me come up; he came up, and came forward on one side of the room. Those that were on that side of the room sidled off into a little room that there was on the left. I did not observe the officer advance into the room; I went into this little room, and I saw Thistlewood among the men in the little room. On this officer coming into the room, the other rushed towards the door-way. At that moment I saw an arm in the act of rushing forward, and a pistol was fired off directly. I cannot say that I saw the officer fall; the moment the pistol was fired, the candle was out; a great deal of confusion followed; I got down the ladder into the stable, and got away; I went off to my lodging directly; I was taken up on Friday, the day but one after this happened. After I left Cato-street I went home, and never went out afterwards till I was taken; I have been in custody ever since."

He is cross-examined; he says, "the first time I was here, I said when I got home I repented of my iniquities, it was so, I did repent of my iniquities, and before that, I was convinced I was wrong; when I saw the error of my ways, I embraced Christianity again; I had been a Christian down to the time when I read the infernal work of Thomas Paine, which was given to me by Tidd; he was examined further, and at last he got a little warm, and he said 'Brunt contributed to destroy my belief as a Christian; his plan was to destroy the pillars of religion.'" Then he adds "I found a satisfaction in making an atonement to my Maker, for my errors;" then he goes on, and states, "I never intended to commit murder; I thank my Maker I did not commit any; I never thought it morally right to murder any man. On the 2nd of February I heard of a conspiracy to murder the ministers, and on the 12th of February I was introduced to Thistlewood, and joined him to aid in the plot which was communicated to me on the 2nd; it was done through the insinuation of Brunt; but on Tuesday morning before the Wednesday, I went to the meeting, with three others to stop the business, but as soon as I mentioned it by way of throwing any objection in the way, they were all like a set of mad men against me, except those three I had got with me, and though I disapproved of their plan, I did not wish to bring any of them to punishment"

He is re-examined, and says, "Paine's Age of Reason and Carlile's publications perverted my mind;" that, gentlemen, is a disclosure in such a transaction as this, which ought to make very great impression.

Such is the evidence of this man; the question will be, whether you can give him credit; he is, as I said before, an accomplice; he is to be listened to with great jealousy; but a man is not supposed always to tell an untruth upon his oath because he happens to have been an accomplice in a most nefarious transaction; but you will expect to find a good reason for setting up his credit, standing as he does in the circumstances of a participator of that guilt which is imputed to the prisoner. We will now, gentlemen, proceed to see what the other evidence is; I believe there is no great difficulty in saying, that if this evidence be true, it proves, as far as one witness can prove, the charges made against the prisoner by the indictment now under your consideration.

The next witness is Eleanor Walker; she is the niece and servant of Mrs. Rogers, in Fox-court, at the house where Brunt lodged with his wife and child and apprentice, and in which the back two-pair of stairs room we have heard of was; "Brunt," she says, "lodged nearly a twelvemonth in our house; he occupied the two front rooms in the two-pair of stairs floor; he lived in one, and worked in the other; the back room two-pair of stairs was taken by Ings; I did not know the man's name at the time Brunt introduced him; the room was quite unfurnished." This is what the other witness, Adams, told us; "he said, perhaps he might bring his goods in a week or better, but he never did bring any goods there; my master keeps a shop; the other lodgers enter in at the side door, and they go up and down the stairs without our knowing any thing of their motions."

Mary Rogers is the landlady, and the aunt and mistress of Eleanor Walker; she says, "I did not know Ings's name when he took our lodgings; he paid me for four or five weeks, I do not exactly know which, at 3s. per week;" but observe, Ings took the room at 3s. a week, certainly not to live in. "One evening, when I was about putting my children to bed, I saw three men go up stairs, the middle one I perceived was a black man;" who that man was, she was left to conjecture; "I inquired of Brunt what Ings was; Brunt told me, he knew nothing of him, except that he saw him at a public-house, and heard him inquire for a lodging; he said that he understood he was a butcher by trade;" these lodgings, after they were taken, were never slept in by Ings, and he never had an article of furniture in them, except that there was a stove, which was the property of the landlord; so far, you see, there is an agreement between Adams and these two persons with respect to these lodgings.

Joseph Hale is next called; he says, "I was an apprentice to Brunt, and lived with him in Fox-court; he had two rooms in front, one was his work-shop, the other he lived in: I remember Ings coming and taking the two-pair back room. Brunt went with him to look at it, and when he had seen it, Brunt told Ings it would do, and said, go down and give them a shilling," that was to bind the bargain, I suppose. "I had known Ings about a fortnight before that day, I had seen him with Thistlewood in Brunt's room;" so that it appears here, that Brunt and Ings were acquainted about a fortnight before Brunt told Mrs. Rogers that he knew nothing of him, except seeing him at the ale-house on the morning of the day when he took the room. "Ings came, and asked Mrs. Brunt for the key; she gave him the key. Hall was with him in the course of the evening; I heard other persons go into that room. From that time, until my master was apprehended, divers meetings were held in that room. I have seen there Thistlewood, Ings, Tidd, Hall, Davidson, Bradburn, Strange, Edwards, Potter, and Adams and others; they were at different times in this room, and coming up and down; my master was generally with them. When I have passed, I have seen the room door open, and, by that means, have seen some long poles, like the branches of trees, rough cut; I saw about twenty of them; the meetings were mostly in the evening. I have heard hammering and sawing in the room; I heard it more than once; they went by their names; Thistlewood was called sometimes T., and sometimes Arthur; then, he says, on the Sunday evening before Brunt was taken, there was a meeting rather larger than usual; all the persons I have named were there, and went away one or two at a time; Brunt was with them. When the meeting was over I saw Strange with Brunt, in Brunt's own room. There were meetings also on the Monday, and on the Tuesday," as Adams had said; "on the afternoon of Wednesday several people came; some of them came in the front room. Thistlewood came, Ings came, and Strange was there also about two o'clock; they went first into Brunt's room where he lived, and then came into his work-shop; their employment was flinting the pistols. I did not know some of them; they were strangers; they had five or six pistols, which they were flinting; they did not finish them; one of the men said, the people were overlooking them from the opposite house; Brunt told them to go into the back room, which they did. In the course of the afternoon Thistlewood came out of the back room, and asked me if I could get him a piece of writing paper? I gave him some, and he took it into the back room; after that Brunt came out, and told me to get six sheets of cartridge-paper, and gave me money. I brought it and gave it to him, and he took it into the back room;" this also Adams had told us before; "about six o'clock Brunt left the back room, and came into his own room for the last time, with a stranger, and then they went out together. I heard others go down stairs. After Brunt went, my mistress had occasion to make her tea; her table was in the back room;" and Adams told us the same; "she told me to go and get it, I went to the door and knocked; a man of the name of Potter opened it, and gave me the table; when the door was opened, I observed four or five more people in the room, and they had a fire; in the course of the evening Tidd called, and came to the front room; Mrs. Brunt took him to the cupboard and showed him a pike-head and a sword, and asked him, what she could do with them? And he said, give them to me, I will take them away; he took them into the back room. After this I heard some persons go down from the back room; this was after seven, and I believe near eight; after this a person came and told Mrs. Brunt, if any person comes here, and inquires for any of us, send them to the White Hart. Shortly after some persons came; they did not know their way to the White Hart, and I went with them to show them the house. On my return from the White Hart, after I had been at the door a few minutes, some other persons came, and they were told to go to the White Hart; I did not go with them, as they appeared to know the way. Brunt came home about nine o'clock in the evening; his dress was disordered, and his great coat and his boots were very muddy; he seemed rather confused; he told his wife that, where he was, a lot of officers had been; he said it was all up, or words to that effect." There is no doubt he was in Cato-street, that is not only proved by the witness, but admitted by himself. "He said, that he had saved his life, and that was all. Directly after this, another man came in, who was a stranger to me. Brunt shook hands with him, and asked if he knew who had informed; this man answered, he did not know. The stranger said, that he had had a dreadful blow on the side, and had been knocked down; and from the manner of speaking to each other, they appeared to have been in the same place. Brunt said, there is something to be done yet, upon this they both went out again together; then, after this, he says, Mrs. Brunt and I went together into the back room; we found in the cupboard several rolls of brown paper, with tar in them, which I have since understood were hand-grenades; also an iron pot that belonged to Brunt;" this is also stated by Adams; "there were some bags there made of flannel, two of them were full of something; in the room there was a long pole also; Mrs. Brunt and I left them there. Brunt came home about eleven o'clock; he told me to get up early, and clean his boots, which I did; he asked me, whether I knew the borough? I told him, yes; he then asked me if I knew Snow's-field's? I told him, no; he directed me to go to Kirby-street, Snow's-fields, to a person of the name of Potter; he said there were some things in the back room; we went together into the back room; we took each a rush basket; he told me to put the things that were in the cupboard into a basket, which I did; one of the baskets was tied up in a blue apron, belonging to Mrs. Brunt, which had been made use of as a curtain to the window of that room; the other was not tied up; we went into Brunt's own room to look for something to tie that up, and two officers came in and took Brunt?"

Thomas Smart is a watchman of St. George's, Hanover-square; he says, in taking his walk on that night, the 22nd of February, he saw a person of colour, and three other persons, in Grosvenor-square, they looked suspicious; this is with a view to lead to the opinion that Davidson was there, according to what Adams had said of the direction given to him to go there.

Charles Bissix is also a watchman; he says, he saw two men taking particular notice of the houses in Grosvenor-square, about half-past eight or a quarter before nine, on the 22nd of February last; one was a man of colour; they took particular notice of lord Harrowby's house.

Henry Gillan is a young man, a servant of an apothecary, living in that neighbourhood; he says, "I know the Rising Sun public-house at the corner of Adams'-mews, in Charles-street, Grosvenor-square; I was there on the 22nd of February last;" he describes it as Adams had done; he says, "Brunt and Adams came in, they had porter and bread and cheese;" Adams said they had refreshment there. "Brunt challenged me to play at dominos; I stayed there and played two games, and left them both there at ten o'clock;" so that this is confirmation of the fact stated by Adams.

Edward Simpson is a corporal-major of the 2nd regiment of Life-guards; he speaks of the barracks in King-street; he says that Harrison knew them perfectly well; that he had been a soldier connected with them, and that there were some windows, which have been since shut; that the barracks would have been very easily burnt by any fire-balls thrown in at those windows, which would have reached the hay and straw deposited there. That is to show something of a coincidence between Adams's account of the proposed burning of the barracks with the evidence that they might easily have been burnt.

John Hector Morison is a journeyman to Mr. Underwood, a cutler of Drury-lane; he says, "I remember the prisoner Ings coming with a sword to be ground, about last Christmas;" here it is—a small one; "he directed me to grind it sharp from the heel to the point, and likewise the back of the point to be ground; the prisoner Ings called for it about three days after he left it, he approved of the manner in which it was ground, and in about a fortnight afterwards he brought me a very long one; he said the first one was ground to his liking, and I was to grind that in the same manner; he gave me his name, as I understood him, Eames, the first time." Morison has looked at it, and says, that was the sword which he so ground by the direction of Ings.

James Aldous is a pawnbroker; he says "I know the prisoner Davidson; he pawned with me a brass-barrelled blunderbuss in January, and redeemed it on the 23rd of February;" he says, that he has seen it since, that Mr. Ruthven showed it to him, and that he believes it to be the same that was pledged and redeemed.

John Monument comes next; his evidence requires great attention; he is a prisoner in the Tower;—"I am by trade a shoemaker; I lived, before I was a prisoner, at No. 8, Garden-street, Baldwin's-gardens, which is near Brook's-market; I saw Thistlewood at the house of a man of the name of Ford, three months before I was apprehended; afterwards Thistlewood called upon me in about a fortnight, he came with Brunt; my mother and brother were with me; my brother's name is Thomas; after Thistlewood and Brunt had been in the room some time, Thistlewood said he wished to speak to me; I went with him, leaving Brunt with my brother. Thistlewood said, great events are at hand; people were every where anxious for a change; I have been promised support by a great number of men, who have deceived me, but now I have got men who will stand by me. He then asked me if I had any arms; I said no; he said, every man ought to have arms; all of us have got arms, some a pistol, some a pike, and some a sabre; you can buy a pistol for about four or five shillings. I told him I had no money to buy pistols; he then said I will see what I can do. We returned again into the room, and found Brunt there; and then Thistlewood and he went away together. On Tuesday, the 22nd of February, Brunt called upon me in company with Tidd; my brother Thomas was with me at that time. I told Brunt I thought I had lost him; he said, the king's death has made an alteration in our plans; I asked, what plans; he said there was to be a meeting the following evening, up at Tyburn-turnpike, where I should hear all the particulars. He then turned to Tidd, and asked whether he should give me the name; Tidd said yes, he supposed there was no danger; he then told me that if I came to the place, and found any people about, I was to say b. u. t., and that if they were friends, they would answer t. o. n.; he said he should be at our house again in the morning, to tell me more about it, and when the thing was to take place; he did not call the next day till about half-past four; he then came alone; my brother was with me; he called me down stairs, and told me I must go with him in half an hour; I told him I could not go so soon as that; he asked why; I said I had got some work to do, that must be done; he asked me at what time it would be done, and I told him about six o'clock; he said he could not wait so long, and that I must go with Tidd, whom he had brought with him the day before; and he told me where Tidd lived, which was Hole-in-the-wall-passage, leading to Dorrington-street; in consequence of that, I went to Tidd's about half-past six o'clock, and found him at home; he said he had waited for some more people; that he should not wait after seven o'clock; and that if no one else came before seven, we should go together; no one else came; and at seven o'clock, he went to the corner of the room, and took out a pistol, which he put in a belt that he had got round his body under his great coat; he took about six or seven pike heads wrapped up in brown paper, and a staff about four feet long, with a hole in one end of it adapted to receive a pike head; then we went down into Brook's-street and up to Oxford-street; when we came to Holborn, he gave me the pike-staff to carry; as we were going along Oxford-street, I think it was, I asked him to tell me where we were going, he said I should know when I got to the place; I had asked him before we came out of the room, what place it was up at Tyburn-turnpike we were going to, and he answered at a mews up by Edgware-road; I asked him, whether we were going to the House of Commons? he said no, there were too many soldiers there; I asked him again where we were going, he said, to Grosvenor-square; I asked him whether any one in particular lived there; he said there was to be a cabinet dinner there; no other conversation passed between us that I remember, till we got to Cato-street; we went under an archway; there were two persons under the archway; there were some few words passed between them and Tidd, which I could not understand; he was before me; the stable is directly close to the archway, you turn to the right hand; we went into the stable; I saw in the stable three or four men, whether they were armed I cannot say; there was a light below; I went up a ladder at the further end, on the left hand into the loft, and found the people up stairs, I suppose about twenty-two or twenty-three; somebody asked Thistlewood how many there were, and he said there was no occasion to count them there were five-and-twenty; there was a carpenter's bench there, and on the bench a quantity of swords and pistols; there was only one light that I observed, and that was on the bench; there was one man in a brown great coat, who spoke of the impropriety of going to lord Harrowby's, with so small a number as five-and-twenty men; that was the first time of my hearing lord Harrowby's mentioned as the house to which we were to go; Thistlewood said, that number was quite sufficient, for he only wanted fourteen men to go into the room, and supposing that lord Harrowby had sixteen servants that number would be quite sufficient; the other man said, when we come out, there will of course be a crowd of people about the door, how shall we make our escape? Thistlewood said, you know that the largest party were already gone; Davidson then told him not to throw cold water upon the proceedings, but if he was afraid of his life, he might go away, they could do without him; and Brunt said, sooner than they should go from the business they were about, he would go into the house by himself, and blow them all up, even if he perished with them; you know we have got that says Brunt, that we can do it with; after that, the man in the brown great coat said, though I do not like to go with so small a number, yet as you are all for it, I will not be against it; he then proposed they should all put themselves under the orders of Mr. Thistlewood. Thistlewood then said, every one who engages with me will have equal honour with myself; and he proposed that the fourteen men who were to go into the room, should volunteer from the persons that were there assembled; about twelve or thirteen men immediately afterwards volunteered, and among them were Tidd, Brunt the prisoner, Davidson and Wilson. About this time, Thistlewood stepped down stairs, and he came up again, and said he had received intelligence that the duke of Wellington and also lord Sidmouth had just arrived at lord Harrowby's; I do not recollect any thing more that passed till the officers came up; they came up into the room, and told them to surrender; that they were officers, and that there was a guard of soldiers below; I was taken into custody up stairs." This, gentlemen, is the evidence of an accomplice; but if it is believed, it supports the case proved by Adams.

Then upon his cross-examination, he says, "I have read Paine's Age of Reason, and I have also read the bishop of Llandaff's answer to it; Paine's certainly affected my mind, but the bishop's answer prevented its whole effect; I never saw Brunt till Thistlewood brought him to me; I went there first without knowing what they were going about; I saw Tidd arm himself; I followed him; I thought they were going to attack the members of the House of Commons; still I went with him, having reason to believe something was to be done, but not knowing what was to be done till I got to Cato-street; when he told me there was to be a cabinet dinner, I was convinced that their object was, to destroy the persons there; but though I was a Christian as I profess to be, I was too much afraid to retreat after I had been engaged in this plan."

Thomas Monument is produced to shew, that that which his brother swears is correct, so far as it is within his knowledge; he states, "I remember Thistlewood coming to my brother's house one evening, in company with Brunt the prisoner; Thistlewood asked to speak to my brother; in consequence of that they both went out; Brunt staid behind in the room; they were out about two or three minutes, and after they returned, Brunt and Thistlewood went away together; and again on the 22nd of February, the Tuesday, Brunt and Tidd called on my brother; when Brunt came in, my brother said, I thought I had lost you; there was something passed concerning the king's death; that his death had made an alteration in the plans; my brother asked him what plans; he said they had different objects in view; I recollect Brunt asking Tidd whether he should give us the outline of a plan; whether Tidd made any answer or not, I do not know ; but Brunt told us the pass-word ;" and he gives the same account of that as the brother had done before. "On the Wednesday, Brunt called again on my brother between four and five o'clock ; my brother could not go just then ; Brunt asked him if he was ready to go ; we were busy at work, and my brother told him he could not go then ; Brunt told him, when he was ready to go, he was to call in Hole-in-the-wall passage on Tidd, and he would take him ; Brunt then went away ; my brother went out about seven o'clock, as nearly as I can recollect ; I did not go myself ; I had never seen my brother from that time till he was in custody." Now, gentlemen, this young man swears positively to every thing which his brother John has sworn to, except the parts which his brother only was present at ; the question is, whether, when a narrative is made in several parts of which another person agrees, you do not believe the accomplice in the other parts ; the two agreeing in the principal part, you will ask yourselves whether you do not believe him in the other things also.

John Monument is called again ; he says, "I was taken in custody to Whitehall ; I cannot exactly say whether I was handcuffed to any person ; I know I was put into a room by myself, but on the last day of examination some conversation passed between me and Thistlewood ; Brunt and the other prisoners were there ; we were then all put into a room together. Thistlewood told me, when I came to be examined before the Privy council, to tell them that Edwards brought me into the meeting,—that it was through Edwards I came there. I said, how can I tell that falsehood, when I have never seen Edwards. He said, that is of no consequence at all ; you must describe him as a man not much taller than yourself, of a sallow complexion, and that he wore a brown great coat. We were sitting round the table, and Thistlewood told me that Edwards had betrayed us ; and he bade me send that round to the other prisoners. I did not like to do it ; I told him I should be noticed ; he then leaned over, and desired somebody else."

Then, gentlemen, Thomas Hiden is called ; I shall not make any apology for reading the whole of the evidence. I feel that I am trespassing very much on your time, but the occasion is so important, that I am sure you will not feel it to be too long. Thomas Hiden says ; "I have carried on business as a cow-keeper and dairyman in Manchester-mews ; I have now the misfortune to be in prison for debt ; I was taken in execution last Saturday se'nnight. I know Wilson very well. A few days before the 23rd of February he asked me to be of a party to destroy all his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner ; that he and the party had all things ready, and were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and that they had such things as I had never seen—large round things, made of tarpaulin and cords, and filled full of nails and iron and other things, and that their strength was very great ; he said if they were lighted, they would heave up one of the walls of the houses on the other side of the street ; he said they were waiting for a cabinet dinner, and then they meant to set some houses on fire, and, by keeping the town in confusion for some days, it would become general ;" that is not the particular mischief of setting fire to the houses, but that would become general ; "those things were to be put into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner ; that they meant to set fire to lord Harrowby's house. He said that all who escaped the explosion were to die by the edge of the sword or some other weapon. The houses he named were those of the duke of Wellington, lord Harrowby, lord Sidmouth, lord Castlereagh, the bishop of London, and one other house that I do not recollect ; he said that they would depend upon my making one ; I told him I would ; before the 23rd," he does not remember the time, but that time is made up by another witness, "I wrote a letter to lord Castlereagh ; I tried to see him, but I could not get access to him ; I went to watch lord Harrowby's going out of his house to Hyde park ; I went two or three times to lord Harrowby's ; at last I saw a gentleman by his house mount a horse. I did not know the earl of Harrowby then ; I followed him into the park ; I met him, and delivered to him the letter I had written to lord Castlereagh." He looks at the letter, and says, "that is the letter." It cannot be in evidence, because it passed between two persons, the prisoner not being there. "The next day, between four and five o'clock, Wilson met me, and said, you are the man I want to see ; he said there was to be a cabinet dinner that night at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square. I asked him where they were going to meet ; he told me I was to go up into John-street, and to the public-house at the corner of Cato-street, the sign of the Horse and Groom ; and there I was to stop in the public-house, or to stop at the corner of the post until I was showed into a stable close by. I asked him when they were to meet ; he said a quarter before or at six o'clock ; if you do not make haste, he said the grand thing will be done before you come. I asked him how many men were to meet ; he said between twenty and thirty ; I asked if that was all the party that was in Cato-street, and he said there was another party in Gray's-inn-lane, another party in the Borough, and another in Gee's-court or the city, I do not know which. He told me I had no occasion to be alarmed, all Gee's-court was in it ;—they are most of them Irish in that court. Wilson told me the Irish were all in it, but that they would not begin till the English began first ; the English had behaved so ill, and disappointed them so often, that they were determined not to begin till the English had begun ; he said one party was to go to lord Harrowby's, and do the grand thing, and then all the parties were to retire, and meet somewhere about the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house." That is consistent with what Adams said. "He said there were two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, which would be very easily taken by knocking in a small door; four pieces more at some Artillery-ground, he does not know where, which were to be got easily by killing the sentry. I then left him, and went to John-street that evening, between six and seven o'clock. I believe it to have been near seven when I got there. When I got near the gate-way I met Wilson and Davidson, the man of colour, standing near the post. Wilson said, you are come; I said, yes, I am come, but I am behind my time; I told him I had to fetch some cream, which I was obligated to do. Davidson asked me if I was going in, and said, Thistlewood was in; I asked him what time they would go away from thence, as I must go and get some cream; and he told me they meant to leave that place about eight o'clock, and if they were gone before I came back, I must follow them to Grosvenor-square, and I should find them at lord Harrowby's house," describing the place where it was.

He is cross-examined; and he says, "I went to a club, called the shoemakers' club, twice; I went first on a Sunday night; I was induced by a friend of mine to go; I went another time on a Sunday, but I never went once to a private meeting; I know Bennett; I asked him if he would go with me and my friend Clarke, who was the person who invited me to go. I never persuaded him to go; I asked him if he would go to the shoemakers' club with Clarke and me; I did not know till between four and five, that the meeting was to be held in Cato-street. I wrote the letter myself."

Then the earl of Harrowby is called; he is a privy councillor, and one of his majesty's ministers; he says, "it was usual to have cabinet dinners, but the dinners were suspended in consequence of the king's death. I determined to have a cabinet dinner on the 23rd of February last; on the Friday or Saturday preceding, cards of invitation were issued for that purpose. I saw the last witness Hiden in the park, near Grosvenor-gate, on Tuesday the 22nd of February." His lordship is not quite positive, but thinks it was between two and three o'clock he saw him; he gave his lordship a letter, and upon the letter being shown to him, he said; "that is the letter" his lordship then says, "I had some conversation with Hiden; I asked him if he had given his name and address in the letter; I desired to have his name and address, and he gave it me; on his expressing a wish to have some further communication with me, I saw him again by appointment the next morning in the ring in Hyde-park; I appointed to meet him, as he seemed to be afraid of continuing the conversation with me; I went to Hyde-park, and met him at Grosvenor-gate; I told him to go on to the ring, and I went on among the plantations in order to avoid his being seen. The dinner did not take place; but I had given directions to the servants to provide it as if it was to take place; a little before eight I was dining at the earl of Liverpool's, and I sent a note to inform my principal servant that the dinner would not take place, and the dinner was of course put aside."

VOL. XXXIII.

John Baker, his lordship's principal servant, says, at a little after eight o'clock, he received information, that his lordship and the privy council would not dine there; he says, "up to that period every preparation for the dinner was going on; nobody had an idea to the contrary; I believe there was a party that night at the archbishop of York's, whose house is next door; as I saw carriages stopping at the door, I thought there was to be a dinner there that day, and that some gentlemen had come there; it was rather sooner than lord Harrowby's dinner hour; it was between six and seven o'clock."

Richard Munday says, he lives at No. 3, in Cato-street. He says, "I know the stable in Cato-street; on the 23rd of February last I saw persons go into that stable; the first was about three o'clock in the afternoon; I saw Harrison in the stable. I came home from work about twenty minutes or half an hour after four, and I saw Davidson walking up and down the archway that leads to the stable; I went into my house, and I saw Davidson again about six o'clock, with two lighted candles in his hand." It is said that one candle was in the stable and another up stairs; it is very probable that they had but two candles; however that is of little consequence. "I saw two going in and three coming out, and moving backwards and forwards;" that does not appear to be very material, for there is no doubt that they were there, and he saw them hovering about and going in and out.

Then George Caylock says, he saw Harrison go into the stable; Harrison told him that he had taken two chambers and was cleaning them; he saw five-and-twenty people go into the stable that evening.

Then George Thomas Joseph Ruthven is called; he gives you a description of what passed in Cato-street. I do not know that it is necessary for me to trouble you with an account of the transactions there; he found them in the place; he and Ellis went up first; the other poor man, Smithers, full of courage, pushed himself forwards and was killed by Thistlewood. With respect to the arms and ammunition, I will state to you presently of what they consist. A very serious remark, no doubt, arises on the circumstance of their being all found there and the outrageous resistance which was made—the bloody resistance which was made, and which was attempted to be made a great deal more bloody than it turned out—whether that is evidence of a purpose beyond the destruction of ministers (the mere conception of which is not a capital crime, though a very great offence in a moral point of view) you will consider.

4 Q

Then James Ellis says, that the moment that he saw Smithers stabbed, he fired his pistol; the pistol did not take effect, but missed the man, the candles were then extinguished; the flash of his pistol was the last light that he saw. Ruthven says there were several candles. Adams says there were only two; and when you consider that the only fire he saw after that, was the flash of his pistol, it should seem that there were not many candles in the room; however, as to that contradiction between Ruthven and Adams, it is of little consequence. Ruthven said there were four or five on the bench, and two or three in the little room. It appears that there was great confusion; and, perhaps, that may account for a good deal of inaccuracy. Ellis says there were two or three; one says there were certain words spoken from below; and another says there were other words to the same purport. You will see, whether that is such a contradiction as affects, in your minds, the credit to which the other parts of the case may entitle Adams.

Westcoatt, Wright, and Champion, who are also officers, are called to prove facts of the same nature.

Then Lieutenant Fitzclarence gave his evidence in the way in which you saw and heard; his conduct, and that of his men, was most gallant; he states what they found on these persons.

Samuel Hercules Taunton is then called; he states that he went to Brunt's lodgings the following morning, and found those things which he produces.

Then Ruthven is called again, and he enumerates the things, and states where they were found; if it is necessary that I should read them to you, I will do it with great pleasure; but the great object is, to show that there was an assembly of these men armed with a great number of arms, and that they made a most bloody and outrageous resistance. You must, of course, draw your own inferences from the nature of that resistance, as it can be applied to the case of high treason.

The quantity of things found seems to be a considerable ingredient in the evidence. You see the defence is this; we intended to assassinate the ministers, and to commit plunder afterwards. With respect to the plunder, there is no evidence of that; with respect to the killing his majesty's ministers, the prisoner, as well as his counsel, admits the intention, and the evidence proves it; in the loft they found thirty-eight ball-cartridges, a fire-lock and bayonet, one powder-flask, three pistols, one sword, six bayonet spikes and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, one pistol, fourteen bayonet spikes, and three pointed files, one bayonet, another bayonet spike and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades, two fire-balls, one large grenade and bayonet, one rope ladder, one sword-stick, forty ball-cartridges, one bayonet, and three loose balls. They found, in the stable, in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball-cartridges, three balls, and some string put round him to act as a belt; the pistol that Tidd fired, the pistol that Wilson attempted to fire; a blunderbuss, sword, belt, and scabbard in the stable, a pistol in the stable, another pistol in the stable, a sword in the stable, twelve large sticks with ferrules; in the pocket of Tidd they found two ball-cartridges, and round him a leather belt; two ball-cartridges facing the stable, and ten ditto in Newnham-street; one musket out down, and one sword from Davidson; one haversack, cross-belts, one pricker, bayonet, scabbard, cartouch-box, and a belt round the body of Davidson; two haversacks, one belt, and 'tin powder-case, from Ings; four pistol balls, one pistol key, and a knife-case from Ings; one haversack, containing seventeen ball-cartridges, three balls, one pistol flint, one pricker; one worm for drawing cartridges, one knife, and a turn-screw; one stick cut to receive a bayonet, left in the public-house; these were found in the stable and the loft above, except the stick left at the public house.

I will now read, gentlemen, what was found in Brunt's house:—"In a rush basket, nine papers, with rope-yarn, tar and other ingredients; some steel filings in a paper, about half an ounce." The serjeant told us the use of the filings which I did not know before. "In another rush basket were found four grenades, three papers of rope-yarn, tar and other ingredients; two bags of powder, one pound weight each; five flannel bags, empty, one paper of powder, one leathern bag containing sixty-three balls, one iron pot, one pike handle." These were left at that house; they were not wanted, certainly, for the assassination of the king's ministers, because they were not with them. Then, at Tidd's, which you know has been described as the dépôt, they found, "in a haversack, 434 balls, 171 ball-cartridges, 69 ball-cartridges without powder; there were three pounds of powder in paper; also, in a coarse canvas cloth, ten grenades, eleven bags of powder, one pound each, ten empty bags, into which powder might have been put, a small bag, with tin powder-flask with some powder, sixty-eight balls, four flints, twenty-seven pike-handles; also a box, containing 965 ball-cartridges."

Serjeant Hanson is then called; he opens one of those hand-grenades for your inspection, and you see, from the inspection of it, its nature and the terrible consequence which might arise from such an instrument as that. He says, that the flannel bags, with the powder in them, are in imitation of cartridges for a six-pounder, so that something was in view, as it may be supposed, besides the assassination: cannon were hardly to be expected to be taken to lord Harrowby's dinner-room. The witness states, "I examined them; they contain exactly a pound of very good powder; we do not use flannel, but serge, in the army; but this would answer the purpose perfectly. I have examined the fire-balls; there is a difference in some of them, but they are generally composed of oakum, tar, and resin, and generally brimstone; but I found one without brimstone; the steel filings would be part of the composition of the priming of the fuse, the fire-balls would set any wood on fire, and would burn three or four minutes, according to their size; if thrown into barracks, with hay and straw, they certainly would occasion a conflagration. He says, the grenades in the army are covered with iron; these grenades do not seem as if they had been made by a military man; but they would effect a great deal of mischief." Then, he says, "the more hard they are bound, the greater will be the explosion." Then he took the fuse out of one of the hand-grenades, and poured the powder out; he says, "those he weighed contained three ounces and a half of powder, and this appeared to be the same; that quantity was more than would be sufficient for a nine-inch shell, and quite sufficient to explode the grenade in which it was. In this grenade there were 26 pieces of iron; they would fly round the room like so many shot, and were quite sufficient to destroy or maim fifteen persons in a room; they explode within half a minute after their being a-light."

Gentlemen, this is the evidence for the prosecution: for the prisoners, you heard the two eloquent speeches of the learned counsel; you have heard also the prisoner state his own case. I am sure you paid all the attention which was due to it, and perhaps it did not make the impression upon you which you wished the prisoner's speech to make upon your minds; but you are to deal with it, gentlemen, as you feel to be proper; you heard it, and will consider it. There is no evidence offered for the prisoner; the case lies entirely upon the evidence for the Crown, and the arguments on both sides, which arguments you had the goodness to attend to, and I am sure they made the impression upon you which they ought. With respect to comment, I see very little to trouble you with; indeed, hardly a word. As I said before, there is here proved and admitted a conspiracy to do a most nefarious act: it is broadly stated to us, that the object of the prisoner and his associates were to destroy fifteen of the king's ministers as they sat at dinner, in the unsuspecting hour of cheerfulness, by a degree of violence, and in the prosecution of a plan which one cannot think of without shuddering; that is admitted. Is that all the purpose? If that is all the purpose of these men, the prisoner is not guilty of high treason; but you are to ask yourselves, gentlemen, whether that could be the sole purpose: why are the fifteen principal ministers of the king to be destroyed in this way? If you attend to the evidence of Adams, and many of the others, there is no question at all that there was an ulterior plan and intention, and that ulterior plan and intention proves directly, if you believe the evidence, the treason charged against the prisoner at the bar. It is stated, that it was an absurd project; so absurd, that it is not only improbable, but impossible, that it should be ascribed to any reasonable being: it has been said, very truly, that the attempt or the project to destroy the king's ministers is such, that one knows not how to deal with the supposition of it, but it is proved—it is true; the prisoner has stated it, and his counsel are obliged, by the force of evidence, to admit it. But then they contend, that they entertained no other project: you will judge whether that is the case. The question is, not whether these people were likely to succeed in their atrocious plans, but whether they entered into them? Did they compass, or imagine or intend those crimes with which the indictment charges the prisoner at the bar?

Does the evidence prove it? if not, there is no question, gentlemen, how the verdict ought to be given. If with all the great attention with which I have observed you consider the evidence and the addresses of the prisoner's counsel and the prisoner himself—if, I say, you have a reasonable doubt upon the subject, you ought, as in all criminal trials, to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt; but if, giving your attention gravely to this important subject, you are satisfied that the charge is proved, I need not tell you, gentlemen, that it is your duty to find him guilty. You will now consider, and give your verdict. I am sure you will give it according to the best of your judgment, and according to the necessary inference to be drawn from the evidence you have heard.

A Jurymen (Mr. Goodchild).—My lord, I have a doubt in my mind on a point of law. I conceive, as a juror, I am bound to receive the law from your lordship. Your lordship has called our particular attention to the first and third counts; I am sure your lordship has most conscientiously done it; but at the same time, I wish to ask the opinion of your lordship, whether should the evidence bear the construction, that an actual arming had taken place, that a resistance has been made to the civil authority, that in law constitutes a levying of war?

Lord Chief Baron.—I wish clearly to understand you; have the goodness to state the question again.

Mr. Goodchild.—Whether, if the evidence should bear out the opinion that an actual arming had taken place, and that a resistance had been made to the civil authority, that actual arming, and that resistance, constitute the crime of levying war?

Lord Chief Baron.—Not resistance merely to the civil power, unless you are of opinion it is an arming with the view stated in the indictment.

Mr. Goodchild.—The question is intended to include that, it being an arming with a view to oblige his majesty to change his measures by force of arms.

Lord Chief Baron.—That is a conspiring to levy war.

Mr. Goodchild.—I do not, my lord, ask whether that is a conspiring to levy war, but whether that becomes a levying of war under the fourth count.

Lord Chief Baron.—I thought it best to submit to your consideration the first and third counts, because I think there is less difficulty upon those subjects than any others; the first and third counts, beyond all question, charge high treason under the act of his late majesty.

Mr. Goodchild.—At the same time I should feel it my duty, as a juror, to give a verdict on the whole indictment if I may ask your lordship's opinion upon the law.

Lord Chief Baron.—I shall be very happy to give you any assistance in my power; if there is, in your opinion, evidence of a levying of war, it will be under that count; do I make myself understood?

Mr. Goodchild.—Perfectly, my lord.

[The jury retired at twenty minutes before four, and returned into court in twenty minutes, with a verdict, finding the prisoner Guilty on the third and fourth counts.]

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, I yesterday* called the attention of the Court to a publication of the trial of Arthur Thistlewood in a Sunday newspaper, called The Observer, in violation of the order which had been made by the Court previously to that trial. I was not then in a situation to bring this matter formally before your lordship, not having been furnished with the documents necessary to bring the matter in such a shape before the Court as that they might be enabled to deal with it. I have now an affidavit, stating the purchase of one of the Observer newspapers, at the shop of the proprietor, Mr. Clement, in the county of Middlesex, on Monday the 24th of April. I am also furnished with a certificate from the Stamp-office, accompanying a copy of the original affidavit filed at that office by Mr. Clement, in which he states that he is the publisher and sole proprietor of that paper. I apprehend, therefore, that your lordships have evidence now before you, not only that Mr. Clement is the proprietor and publisher of the paper in question, but that he actually sold this paper; and (if it were necessary) that he sold it with a full knowledge of the injunction of the Court, for I have only to call your lordship's attention to a passage in the newspaper itself, to satisfy you that he has done it with a full knowledge of the order made previously to the trial, for he states, that after the jury were sworn, the lord chief justice then present thus delivered himself:—"As there are several persons charged with the offence of high treason by this indictment, whose trials are likely to be taken one after the other, I think it is necessary, in furtherance of justice, strictly to prohibit the publication of the proceedings of this or any other day until the whole of the trials shall be brought to a conclusion; it is highly necessary to the purposes of justice that the public mind, or the jurymen who are hereafter to serve, should not be influenced by the publication of any of the proceedings which may take place until the whole of those proceedings shall be finished; it is expected that all persons therefore will attend to this admonition."

I deem this to be a most flagrant, wilful, and daring violation of the order of the Court; and considering the benevolent motive which actuated the minds of your lordships upon that occasion, I think it would be unbecoming in me, having this fact brought to my notice, not to bring it under the consideration of the Court, that they may deal with this person as they in their wisdom shall think fit. I shall therefore move that these affidavits be received, and that your lordships may proceed to punish this person for his contempt in such manner as the Court may think proper.

Lord Chief Baron.—Let the affidavits be read.

The affidavit of George Holditch, of Yeat's-court, Carey-street, newsman, and Elijah Litchfield, of Lincoln's-inn, gentleman, was read; George Holditch stating, that he had on the 24th instant purchased the newspaper in question, at the shop of William Innell Clement, No. 169, Strand, from a person acting as servant in the shop, and that he paid one shilling for the same; and Elijah Litchfield stating, that he saw the person whose name is subscribed to the certificate annexed sign the same.

The certificate annexed was read, containing a copy of the affidavit of William Innell Clement (sworn at the Stamp office on the 22nd of January 1816) that he was the printer, publisher, and sole proprietor of a certain newspaper; that the printed newspaper was proposed to be printed at his office at his dwelling-house, No 169, in the Strand, and that it was intitled The Observer.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—Mr. Attorney General, have you looked at the act of parliament to see that the copy of the affidavit, so certified, is evidence in all cases?

Mr. Attorney General.—I apprehend so my lord; the 9th section of the 38th Geo. 3rd cap. 78 directs that the affidavit shall be filed, and certified copies shall in all proceedings, civil and criminal, touching any newspaper and so on, be received and admitted as conclusive evidence; we add to that evidence the actual sale of the paper at the shop of the person against whom I apply.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—Do you make any distinct motion?

* See the commencement of the present trial.

Mr. Attorney General.—That he may be punished for his contempt in such way as the Court may think right.

Mr. Justice Richardson.—It will be proper to direct the attendance of the party, that we may see whether he has any excuse to offer.

Mr. Attorney General.—I will apply in the first instance for a rule to shew cause, if your lordship pleases.

Lord Chief Baron.—This is undoubtedly a very grave accusation; the order was certainly made after great consideration by the Court: with a view to prevent mischief and injustice; nothing can be more prejudicial to justice than to publish proceedings of this description in the course of an inquiry. The person must be ordered to attend here on Friday morning, at the sitting of the court. *

* See the further proceedings upon this subject on Friday April the 28th at the conclusion of the trial of William Davidson, and Richard Tidd, infra.

705. The whole Proceedings on the Trial of WILLIAM DAVIDSON and RICHARD TIDD, for High Treason, before the Court holden under a Special Commission, for the Trial of certain Offences therein mentioned, on the 26th and 27th days of April: 1 GEO. IV. A. D. 1820.*

SESSIONS HOUSE, OLD BAILEY,
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26th, 1820.

Present

The Hon. Mr. Baron Garrow.

The Hon. Mr. Justice Best.

The Common Sergeant,

And others, his Majesty's Justices, &c.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen of the Jury, it may perhaps have surprised you that, as we are sitting and you are in Court, we should not have proceeded to business. The Court are so anxious to show that we attend with the greatest solicitude to your convenience, that I think it proper to state, that the pause is at the solicitation of the learned counsel for the prisoner. I am sure that you will feel it proper, that we should wait a few moments to give effect to that solicitation.

Mr. Curwood.—My lord, the prisoner Davidson, has no objection to uniting in his challenges with the prisoner Tidd, whose trial the Attorney-general had proposed to take next.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen, I have now to communicate that to you to which it would have been improper to advert before. The learned counsel for the prisoners (whose exertions have been witnessed more than once) have thought it necessary to communicate with them, whether it would be necessary to pursue the course of severing their challenges, or whether two of them would take their trial by the same jury. We have in effect gained time by the pause, for he has communicated to me, that the two next prisoners are content not to sever their challenges, but to be tried together.

* See the preceding trials of Thistlewood, Ings, and Brunt.

[Richard Tidd and William Davidson were set to the Bar.]

The Jury Panel was called over, commencing with No. 145.

Edward Cherill, stonemason, challenged by the prisoner.

John Mayne, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

David Pain, esquire, challenged by the prisoner.

Richard Tucker, cheesemonger, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Beachamp, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

Robert Ceeley, rigger, challenged by the prisoner.

Thomas Fagg, esquire and coach-master, challenged by the Crown.

Matthew Belcher, vintner, excused on account of illness.

Benjamin Watson, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

George Burrows, silversmith challenged by the prisoner.

Edward Ellis, gentleman and stock-broker, challenged by the prisoner.

Benjamin Blyth, organ-builder, challenged by the prisoner.

William Clare, feather-dresser, challenged by the prisoner.

John Jackson, glass-cutter, challenged by the prisoner.

John Beck, gentleman and seedsman, challenged by the prisoner.

Felix Booth, esquire and distiller, challenged by the prisoner.

Charles Benham, market-gardener, challenged by the Crown.

Samuel Littlepage, baker, excused on account of illness.

Thomas Hobbs, silversmith, challenged by the Crown.

Francis Dorill, esq., challenged by the prisoner.

William Percy, plasterer, sworn.

John George Holmden, fuse-cutter, sworn.

Archibald Ritchey, stone-mason, challenged by the Crown.

John King, gentleman, sworn.

Charles Elton Prescott, esquire, sworn.

Benjamin Rogers, farmer, sworn.

Richard Laycock, esquire and cow-keeper, challenged by the prisoner.

George Fox, sawyer, challenged by the Crown.

William Acock, plumber, challenged by the Crown.

Edward Cuel, carpenter, challenged by the Crown.

George Golding, surveyor, sworn.

Robert Roberts, oilman, challenged by the Crown.

William Bound, founder, challenged by the Crown.

Charles Page, esquire and merchant, sworn.

William Cole, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

John Lewis, watch-maker, challenged by the Crown.

Edward Flower, esquire and schoolmaster, challenged by the prisoner.

John Balm, gentleman and tallow-chandler, challenged by the Crown.

John Young, gentleman and scale-maker, sworn.

Stafford Price, gentleman and currier, challenged by the prisoner.

James Cary, joiner, challenged by the prisoner.

William Edgecombe, joiner, challenged by the prisoner.

Richard Emery, cooper, challenged by the Crown.

Stephen Gaurd, bricklayer, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Brayne, mason, challenged by the Crown.

William Butler, baker, sworn.

William Benn, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

John Roper, gentleman, challenged by the Crown.

William Norton, sawyer, challenged by the prisoner.

William Blason, gentleman, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Lester, bookseller, challenged by the Crown.

Mr. Lester.—My lord, as this is the third time that I have been challenged, * may I request to be dismissed.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I can only assure you, in the language of the lord chief baron, that though the objection has obtained the name of challenging the juror, it ought not to be considered as giving any offence to him. Particular reasons may occasion an objection to a particular individual, but I cannot take it for granted that on a future trial you might not be called upon to serve with a ready assent on both sides, therefore I cannot dispense with your attendance on this occasion; I wish I could.

* He had been challenged in the previous cases of Arthur Thistlewood, and John Thomas Brunt.

Mr. Attorney-General.—There are several gentlemen sworn on the present jury, who have been challenged on one side or the other, on preceding trials.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—From circumstances of a private nature I have not been able to attend in the early part of the proceedings here, but that which I stated as the result of practical experience is exemplified on the present occasion; for gentlemen who have been challenged on former trials, are sworn to try the prisoners now at the bar: if they arose out of any supposed incapacity or party principle, those objections would continue; further information may induce those, protecting the interests of the public, or of the accused, to do in other instances that which they appear to have done in several instances already.

Joseph Sheffield, esquire and ironmonger, sworn.

Joseph Haynes, bricklayer, challenged by the Crown.

Robert Stephenson, anchorsmith, challenged by the Crown.

Richard Bant, gentleman, challenged by the prisoner.

Isaac Giam, baker, challenged by the Crown.

William Churchill, gentleman and wine merchant, sworn.

Thomas Wilkinson, farmer, challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Fish, tobacconist, challenged by the prisoner.

Edmund Collingridge, water-gilder, challenged by the Crown.

William Shore, farmer, challenged by the Crown.

Josiah Bartholomew, watchmaker, challenged by the prisoner.

John Jones, carpenter, challenged by the Crown.

Thomas Bristow, coachmaker, challenged by the prisoner.

Samuel Granger, lighterman, sworn.

THE JURY.

William Percy,	Charles Page,
John George Holmden,	John Young,
John King,	William Butler,
Charles Elton Prescott,	Joseph Sheffield,
Benjamin Rogers,	William Churchill,
George Golding.	Samuel Granger.

Mr. Shelton.—One of the Jurymen is sworn by the name of Golding; I am told his name is Goldring.

Mr. Curwood.—We have no objection to him.

Mr. Gurney.—Nor the Crown.

Mr. Shelton.—Then I may proceed.

Mr. Gurney.—Yes.

The Jury were charged with the prisoner in the usual form.

THE Indictment was opened by Mr. Bolland.

Davidson.—Will your lordship be pleased to grant us a seat?

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Yes, certainly.

Mr. Gurney.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—It is my duty to lay before you, very shortly, a statement of the circumstances which will be adduced in evidence on the part of the Crown, in support of this indictment. You will have observed that the charge which is made by it against the two prisoners now at the bar, William Davidson and Richard Tidd, is not of any private nature; it does not impute to them any acts affecting the interests of private individuals, but it accuses them of the highest crime known to the law, of that which strikes at the existence of the government, and aims at its entire subversion—to substitute, in its place, some provisional government, whose pledges for good government were to be slaughter and conflagration.

It will not be necessary for me to state to you the indictment more particularly than that in the first count it charges a compassing and imagining (that is an intent) to depose the king, and in another a compassing to levy war against the king, in order to compel him to change his measures. The evidence which we shall lay before you will most completely substantiate both of those charges.

The law has wisely made the intention to commit these crimes high treason, so as that intention be manifested by overt (or open) acts; the acts done in furtherance of this intention are charged in the indictment, and will be proved by the witnesses.

The indictment comprehends several persons, Arthur Thistlewood, James Ings, and John Thomas Brunt (whose trials have taken place), the two prisoners at the bar, Davidson and Tidd, upon whose fate you are to pronounce (and six other persons) of the names of Wilson, Harrison, Bradburn, Strange, Gilchrist and Cooper, all of whom, and many others will necessarily be introduced to you in the course of this inquiry.

Of these persons the first, named Arthur Thistlewood, was undoubtedly the leader; he had sustained the rank of a gentleman; and it is a striking feature in this case, that a person in that rank should be found associated as he has been with the other persons named in the indictment, most, if not all, of whom are working mechanics.

When this plan was first conceived, it may not be in our power to demonstrate; but you will find, that so far back as the month of January, it had arrived at considerable maturity; that the plan (which was afterwards acted upon) had then been formed to assassinate his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner; and it was then hoped, when all the persons intrusted by his majesty with the direction of public affairs should have been cut off at one blow, that by following that up by conflagrations in different parts of the metropolis, and by armed men acting in various directions, the reins of government might be seized by these conspirators and the government itself overthrown.

To perfect this plan, and enlist into its execution as many persons as possible, meetings were held in various places: we shall not have occasion to follow those meetings into different parts of the town but we shall confine our evidence principally to meetings which took place first in a back room at a public-house called the White Hart, and were afterwards removed, for greater security to a two-pair of stairs back room in a house in which the prisoner Brunt (who has been tried) actually lodged in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane. It was contrived, that Ings should take the lodging; that he should profess an intention to bring his furniture in; but no furniture was ever brought in: the key of the room was kept by Brunt; and in this room sometimes once a-day and sometimes twice a-day, the meetings of these conspirators were held, for the purpose of maturing the plan that had been conceived, and of devising all the means of its execution.

The death of his late majesty (which took place on the 29th of January) for some time disconcerted their plan of operations. Until after his late majesty's funeral, of course cabinet dinners were suspended; the conspirators became impatient of the delay which occurred, and that impatience gave birth to other projects for carrying the same object into effect. At one time it was proposed to divide their force into several parties, to attack the ministers separately at their respective houses; and it was thought that by this means, though it was not likely all should take effect, they might be able to take off four or five whom they particularly marked for destruction; at another time, another project was entertained, to break out on the night of his late majesty's funeral, at which time the cabinet ministers would necessarily be at Windsor, and the guards would be at Windsor; when, therefore, there would be neither the head to direct, nor the arm to execute the resistance to the measures which they projected; and it was thought, in the absence of all those means of resistance, they might carry their plan into execution. This, however, was on consideration abandoned, and they looked forward with eagerness to the next cabinet dinner that should take place, which by bringing all his majesty's ministers into one house, and into one room, would give them the means, at one blow of effecting their destruction.

These cabinet dinners take place during the sitting of Parliament, at the houses of the members of the cabinet alternately, usually I believe, on a Wednesday; but though no notice had been given of any dinner, they were certainly looking forward to that Wednesday to which you will particularly direct your attention (the 23rd of February) for the accomplishment of their purpose; and, as the time drew near, every exertion was made to complete their preparations; pikes were provided and pike-handles, composed of rough sticks cut from trees seven or eight feet long, ferruled at the end, with holes bored for the admission of pike-heads; pike-heads were procured, some old bayonets, others old files filed to a point to operate as a bayonet or pike-head; pistols, blunderbusses, swords, hand-grenades and fire-balls. The hand-grenades which were constructed were not such as are made by military men, but, for the purposes of destruction, perhaps scarcely less effective; about three ounces and a half of gunpowder put into a tin case or chamber rather smaller than this, which I hold in my hand [holding up to the jury an ink-stand], a tin fuse brazed into it, containing a powder prepared for priming, which communicated with the gunpowder in the tin case or chamber, then stocking or cloth cemented round the tin case; a number of nails or other pieces of iron inserted round that; then more cloth cemented; and the whole bound round very tight by tarred string, so as closely and completely to compress it; and, as you very well know, it requires no military skill to be aware that if fire be communicated to the fuse, and so to the powder in the chamber, that would explode, and those pieces of iron would be scattered round like so many bullets. The greatest destruction would be thereby effected. It was proposed that these hand-grenades should be one means of the destruction of his majesty's ministers, by being thrown into the room where they were assembled; but many more were constructed than were requisite or could be used for that purpose, these were intended to effect the other and ulterior objects of their guilty plan.

Besides these, there were fire-balls, composed of pitch, tar, oakum, brimstone, and resin, which had been all made up into balls to be set on fire; these thrown into the windows of buildings would infallibly set those buildings on fire; a considerable number of these were provided. Besides these there was a large number of cartridges for muskets and pistols, and not a few cartridges for cannon. Many of these instruments were prepared at Fox-court, many in other places, and the principal dépôt for them was in the house of the prisoner Tidd; and you will find, that though Arthur Thistlewood was looked up to by these conspirators as their leader, the two prisoners, Tidd and Davidson, were not inconsiderable or inactive coadjutors, that they entered into the conspiracy heartily and zealously, that they forwarded it to the utmost of their power, and that they were amongst the most eager for its complete and perfect execution.

On the Sunday preceding the Wednesday which I have mentioned, these conspirators held a larger meeting than usual to concert their measures: they met again on the Monday; they met again on the Tuesday, on which morning they received intelligence that a newspaper announced a cabinet dinner for the next day at the earl of Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square. The news was at first doubted; but the newspaper being sent for, it was found correct. This excited the greatest degree of exultation, expressed by some in the most savage and ferocious terms, by another in terms of shocking impiety; but it was received by all as good news that now all their enemies were to be brought together within one room, all within the means of destruction; and they lost no time in proceeding to consider and to develop all the means by which they should effect their guilty purpose. Thistlewood detailed those means to the meeting in a manner which showed that they had been all well considered; the detail was received with acquiescence and approbation, and a determination that the plan should be carried into execution. The course of proceeding which Thistlewood proposed was this: That they should proceed in a body to the house of the earl of Harrowby; that Thistlewood should knock at the door, and offer to the porter a letter; that the body should instantly rush into the house; that two, armed with swords pistols and hand-grenades, should guard the staircase which led to the upper part of the house; that two others, similarly armed, should guard the staircase leading to the lower part of the house; and that two others, with the same weapons, should be left to guard the area; and that then fourteen should enter the noble earl's dining-room, armed with swords, pistols and hand-grenades, and should massacre every one they found there. They were then to go to other places, where other parties were to act—for other parties were to be assembled in different parts of London; one to set fire to the barracks in King-street, by throwing one of those fire-balls into the hay-loft, which had a window looking into a mews; others to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane, to seize two pieces of artillery that were there; others to proceed to the Artillery-ground, to seize four pieces of artillery which were there; to march from thence to the Mansion-house, to plant the cannon so as to batter it, in case those within should refuse to surrender; to take possession of the Mansion-house, to establish therein a provisional government; then to take the Bank, and to give it up to pillage.

This most atrocious plan, as I before said, was approved of, and they all resolved to act upon it; and every degree of necessary activity seemed to be infused into every mind, to be ready for the perpetration of the crime. They parted, to enable Thistlewood and some others to visit some meetings in another part of the town (one known by the name of the Mary-labone Union) and it was settled they should meet there the next day. The next day they did meet there; all things seemed ready.

Thistlewood was pleased to find them so forward in their preparations; the pistols were flinted, pikes were got ready, sent off to their associates in other parts of the town, and the men who were there armed and accoutred themselves, and in different parties proceeded from Fox-court. It had been thought that that room was not a fit place of rendezvous from which to issue forth to the accomplishment of their purpose in Grosvenor-square, and another place had been selected and engaged by them, which seems to have been admirably adapted for their purpose: it was so on account of its proximity to Grosvenor-square; it was so also on account of the obscurity of its situation, which was not likely to attract public observation: it was a stable and cart-house with a loft and two rooms over them, in a very obscure street called Cato-street, one end of which comes into John-street, in the Edgware-road, but enters only by a gateway, which looks like the gateway of the yard of a public-house; the other end is almost equally obscure. Just as you enter this street from John-street, and turn to the right, you will come to the stable in question. This had been vacant for some time, and it was taken for this purpose.

Some of the conspirators began to assemble early in the afternoon; weapons were carried there in the course of the afternoon, and then, for the purpose of excluding observation, a cloth was nailed against the window, in order that those who lived opposite might not see what should pass therein. They were within a little more than ten minutes walk of Grosvenor-square; they would have to go down the Edgware-road and Park-lane, and would arrive there almost immediately; and it was thought (and certainly not without reason) that they had chosen a convenient place of rendezvous, and that they were not likely to be discovered.

In this loft and in this stable there were assembled, in the course of the evening, all the persons named in this indictment, and as many more as amounted to about five-and-twenty, all armed for the purpose. To guard against surprise, they placed sentries in the stable; one of those sentries was the prisoner Davidson; he was armed with a sword and a carbine. At first some little apprehension was betrayed that their force was insufficient, and some alarm was excited on account of the non-attendance of the prisoner Tidd, who was looked up to as a person of importance in the execution of the plan. Their alarm was however removed by the appearance of Tidd. The time approached for the accomplishment of their purpose, and Thistlewood had just called out the fourteen who were to enter the dining-room at the earl of Harrowby's, when they were surprised by the officers of Bow-street, followed by a party of the guards, who had been ordered to attend them. When the officers entered the stable, they found Davidson and Ings, the two sentries. The officers who were foremost, leaving them to be secured by their followers, ascended by a ladder into the loft, and they found there above twenty persons, with that magazine of arms which will be exhibited to you. They announced that they were officers, and called upon them to surrender; instead of surrendering, the persons there, conscious of the nefarious purpose for which they were assembled, desperate from the knowledge that they had forfeited their lives by what they had already done, made a most determined resistance, and Thistlewood their leader stabbed one of the officers, Smithers, who fell on the floor a lifeless corpse! The lights were extinguished; the cry was "to kill the officers;" in the confusion the officers were pushed down the ladder; they were followed by several of the persons there, some of whom entirely escaped, but those who are included in this indictment (with the exception of Thistlewood and Brunt) were taken. These desperate men were not content with taking the life of Smithers, but Thistlewood fired at another officer and made a cut at him with his sword. The prisoner Davidson was pursued; he resisted; with his sword he cut at one, and he fired his carbine at another. Ings, another of the prisoners who has been tried, fired at another officer, and expressed a savage regret that he had not killed him. The prisoner Tidd resisted to the utmost of his power; he fired a pistol at lieutenant Fitzclarence, and was taken only by the superior force of those with whom he was in conflict.

VOL. XXXIII.

I have before stated that Thistlewood escaped; he was apprehended the next morning, not at his own residence, but at another part of the town, where he had taken refuge. Brunt also escaped; he was taken the next morning. The other prisoners were apprehended either in the loft in the stable, or in escaping from the stable. In that loft were found guns, bayonets, pikes, hand-grenades, fire-balls and cartridges. This was the magazine intended for that party which was to execute the first and most important part of their guilty project—the assassination of his majesty's ministers.

Gentlemen, this is the conspiracy which is charged upon the prisoners,—this is the high treason which is imputed to them by this indictment. It will be proved to you by evidence which you cannot doubt.

To give you those details which can be given by no other persons, it will be necessary to call before you accomplices in their crime. Traitorous conspirators do not sound a trumpet in the market-place to invite honest men to their councils; they admit none to their councils but those who partake in their guilty plans. For what passed, therefore, in their private councils, we must resort to the evidence of accomplices. A great and signal benefit to the community arises from that circumstance, in the prevention of very many crimes; it sows the seeds of distrust among men who meditate those crimes which cannot be committed by a single hand, but require the co-operation of numbers; each man feels and fears that he who shares his councils may at some future day be a witness to bring him to justice. This consideration deters many from the commission of offences; but if accomplices could not be received as witnesses in a court of justice, offenders would be emboldened by the certainty that the arm of justice would be too short to reach and too weak to punish them. We do not however on the part of the Crown present to you accomplices as witnesses who are to be received without jealousy and caution. They who acknowledge that they participated in the crime which is charged upon the prisoners, are not to be received on the same footing with honest and loyal men of untainted character. You will look at their evidence; you will watch their demeanour; you will observe whether, in the relation of their story, they present means of contradiction, because, if men are fabricating a story, they will take care to give no means of contradiction—they will lay the scene as between themselves and the persons accused alone, and thus deprive the accused of the means of defence which might arise from the contradiction of their evidence. But, above all, you will look to the confirmation which they shall receive from other sources.—Confirmation as to what took place in their consultation-rooms it is absolutely impossible they should receive, for none but accomplices can know what passes there; but if you find that in every instance in which they can, it will be impossible for you to doubt that they are speaking truth in those parts in which they do not receive confirmation, only because in the nature of things they cannot receive it.

The confirmation of the accomplices that will be given to you by the witnesses which we shall call, will be the most complete and the most perfect that, in a long experience in the profession, I remember ever to have heard.

The principal accomplice, Adams, will be confirmed as to the meetings in Fox-court, by the apprentice of Brunt, who lived with his master, who saw those meetings, who saw the persons who attended them, who saw them go out on Wednesday the 23rd, who saw his master return in a dirty condition which showed he had been engaged in some conflict, who heard him divulge to his wife that it was "all up," that the officers had come in upon them, and that he had escaped only with his life.

The accomplice will receive confirmation in another point, which I omitted in the course of my relation to state to you; for on the last day on which they were assembled, it was considered that some proclamations would be necessary to be issued to the multitude during their operations in the night; it was suggested, that cartridge paper would be convenient paper for the purpose. Brunt sent his apprentice to purchase six sheets of cartridge paper; on them Thistlewood wrote his proclamations in these words, "Your tyrants are destroyed.

The friends of liberty are desired to come forward, as the provisional government is now sitting." It will be proved to you by the apprentice,—not that the proclamation was written, not that it was read, for he was not in the room,—but that he was sent for the paper, that he purchased the paper, that he gave it to his master Brunt, and that Brunt carried it into the room in which Thistlewood and the other persons were assembled.

Another confirmation occurs from this circumstance; some alarm had been excited, from an incident that was communicated to them, that their meetings were suspected by government, and that information had reached the office of lord Sidmouth, who you know is secretary of state for the home department; and it was resolved, therefore, that sentries should be placed in Grosvenor-square, to watch the house of lord Harrowby, to see whether police officers or soldiers were introduced into it; concluding, that if that were not the case, they might proceed safely, because they might suppose that no information whatever had been given. Sentries were accordingly placed; the prisoner Davidson was sentry on the Tuesday-evening, from six o'clock till nine; and we will prove to you by the watchman, that he was there sauntering about. Brunt and Adams went from nine till twelve; during a part of the time they went to take refreshment in a public-house; and we will call a person who saw them there, and who played at dominos for some time with Brunt in that public-house. These are important confirmations of the account which will be given you by the accomplice.

Another and very important confirmation arises from disclosures made to a person of the name of Hiden; he was solicited to take a part in this guilty plan; it was divulged to him very distinctly by one of the prisoners; he appeared to listen to it, for he naturally supposed that the person who was so confided in, and who should at once reject it, would not be very safe; indeed, he was given so to understand, but he showed that it was not his intention to partake in it, by immediately writing a letter to lord Castlereagh, to communicate it to him, by endeavouring to get access to lord Castlereagh—not getting access to him, by going to the house of lord Harrowby—by following him to the park, and giving to him the letter, and afterwards by an appointment with lord Harrowby, meeting him the next morning (Wednesday the 23rd) in Hyde-park, and making further communications to him. This, gentlemen, is complete confirmation, for the plan in its detail was given to him, and as the time approached still nearer (namely, on the afternoon of Wednesday) he saw some of the conspirators upon the spot, and among them the prisoner Davidson; and the time was appointed for him to join those who were then assembled in the loft.

Further confirmation arises from the search of the back room in Fox-court, the next morning, when Brunt was apprehended, when there were found a pike-staff, gunpowder, gunpowder in flannel bags as cartridges for cannon, hand-grenades, and fire balls, which Brunt was packing up for the purpose of sending to the house of another of his associates, where he thought they might be deposited with more safety than in his own.

Further confirmation arises from the search on that same morning in the house of the prisoner Tidd, where were found more hand-grenades, more fire-balls, a number of pike-staves, a quantity of gunpowder, many of those cartridges for cannon, and an immense number of musket-cartridges made up in parcels of fives. This lodging of Tidd's I stated to you had been used as the dépôt, where their ammunition was placed.—The finding this quantity there, is considerable confirmation of the evidence of the accomplice.

But if all these confirmations were blotted out, if no one of them existed, it appears to me that Cato-street itself is confirmation above all confirmations; that alone proves that the accomplices are speaking truth. There are found assembled in a hay-loft, a man in the rank of a gentleman, with five-and-twenty mechanics, with this vast store of arms for different purposes; when they are found they make that desperate resistance which is never made but by persons who know that when they are taken their lives are forfeited to the law; the finding them assembled there, the magazine of arms with which they were provided, and their conduct when surprised, all combine to demonstrate their purpose; and if any thing more were necessary, the prisoner Davidson, when he was taken, exclaimed "damn him who will not die in liberty's cause." Thus do assassins and traitors profane the name of liberty. It has been their cant in all times. These men have conspired to destroy the government under which we live, and to substitute a government of their own. To deprive us of the rights and the laws which we inherit from our ancestors, and to give us in exchange their own rule and dominion, commencing in and to be cemented by the most atrocious crimes.

In answer to this case, what defence is to be made? It will be said, perhaps, "true it is there was a plot to assassinate his majesty's ministers, but the assassination of his majesty's ministers is not of itself high treason." Undoubtedly it is not; the assassination of all the Privy council, aye and all the members of both Houses of Parliament, singly and individually, and with no other object (if such a thing were possible), is not of itself high treason; but for what but a treasonable purpose could such a black and guilty design enter into the heart even of the most depraved and abandoned of mankind? These miserable men had never come in contact with his majesty's ministers, so as to harbour private malice or private revenge against them; they had no hatred or malice against lord Harrowby, it was against the president of the council; none against the earl of Liverpool, it was against the first lord of the Treasury; none against the hero of fifty victories, but the master general of the Ordnance. The private characters of the ministers are above all reproach; their personal virtues have secured them the esteem not less of those who politically differ from them, than of those who are their professed friends and supporters. To say that ministers have not given satisfaction to all, is to say that they are but men, and that we are but men. Whatever political differences exist, no man can doubt but that they must wish to identify themselves with the greatness and the glory of their country. They have conducted the affairs of the state in arduous and critical times. If, after the exhaustion of a long and expensive war, the people are now suffering some of its consequences, let it be recollected that the country stands on a proud and commanding eminence, and that it has acquired and maintained a character not unworthy of its ancient renown.

Political differences among Englishmen have never led to a crime so black and atrocious as assassination; and for none other than the treasonable purpose imputed could these men, have ever entertained such a design. That assassination was to be the commencement of those operations which they vainly hoped would end in the substitution of themselves in the places of those whom they were to assassinate, and in the establishment of that provisional government which could be established only by the deposition of the king.

It may next be said that the project was weak, that their means were totally inadequate to their end, that their numbers were unequal to the accomplishment of their purpose. There never yet stood at the bar of this or any other tribunal men accused of a treasonable conspiracy of whom that observation might not be made, and of most of them with infinitely more truth than in the present case. History is full of weak plans, of ill-contrived plots and abortive conspiracies; but are we on that account to reject all history? Nay, our own times have furnished us with instances of conspiracies more weak, with means more inadequate, conceived by men of higher intellect and far better means of information. Colonel Despard was an officer of great military skill and experience;—his plan, compared with the plan of these conspirators, was weak and puerile.

In the cool consideration of detected and defeated projects we are apt to reject that as impracticable and visionary which political enthusiasts have contemplated as easy of execution. These guilty men—founding their hopes on the existence of popular discontent (which discontent had been excited and fomented for some months before by speeches and writings of the most flagitious character) which they supposed to have spread further and wider than it had, heating each other's minds by seditious and treasonable discourse, till they persuaded themselves that all men thought and felt as they did, that they wished for a change, and were ready to enlist under their standard,—imagined that if they could but strike some great and frightful blow, if they could but destroy those who were intrusted with the supreme administration of affairs, and introduce confusion, and inspire terror into the metropolis by means of conflagrations, that they could then carry on their further operations by the armed men whom they had provided, and that they might count on such an increase of force from malcontents as might enable them to subvert that government which was the object of their hatred. Although the design was impracticable, I admit, with respect to ultimate success, yet as to temporary suspension of the functions of government, and temporary confusion and anarchy, I am afraid that, however the design is to be branded as wicked and atrocious, it does not bear the character of weakness and of folly.

This is the case which we shall lay before you; you will hear and you will attend to the evidence according to which you are sworn to decide, and you will follow that evidence implicitly, whether it lead to a verdict of conviction or of acquittal.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is it wished that the other prisoners should be put to the bar.

Mr. Attorney General.—If your lordship pleases.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Perhaps I ought to address myself to the counsel for the prisoners as well as the counsel for the Crown. It is merely to enable the witnesses to speak to their identity; but if it is understood that when they speak of A. they are speaking of the prisoner A. and that when they speak of B. they are speaking of the prisoner B. it may not be necessary.

Mr. Adolphus.—I have no wish at all, my lord, upon the subject.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It is better, perhaps, that they should come, to prevent any mistake of their persons; it is for the prisoners' benefit that they should be there certainly when they are spoken of.

James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper were placed at the bar behind the prisoners on trial.

EVIDENCE FOR THE CROWN.

Robert Adams sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.

What are you by trade?—A shoemaker.

Where did you live before you were in confinement?—No. 4, Hole-in-the-wall passage, Brook's-market.

You are now come up in custody?—Yes.

Were you ever in the army?—Yes.

In what regiment?—The royal regiment of Horse-guards.

The Blues?—Yes.

When did you leave the army?—About eighteen years ago.

Do you know the prisoner, John Thomas Brunt?—Yes.

Where did you first become acquainted with him?—At Cambray, in France.

How long is that ago?—In 1816.

Was the English army at that time at Cambray?—Yes, the head-quarters were.

What were you doing at that time at Cambray?—Following my trade.

With the army?—Yes.

Do you remember seeing Brunt early in the present year at his lodgings?—Yes.

Where were his lodgings?—In Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane.

What was Brunt by trade?—A hoot-closer.

Did he make any proposal about introducing you to Thistlewood?—Yes.

Did you, in consequence of that, accompany him to Thistlewood's lodgings?—I did.

When was that as nearly as you can recollect?—The 12th of January, a Wednesday.

Did you go alone with him, or was there any other person in company?—Brunt and Ings.

Tell us what passed at Thistlewood's lodgings when you went with Brunt and Ings?—On Brunt introducing me to Thistlewood, Brunt said to Thistlewood "this was the man I was speaking to you about." Thistlewood said, "you were in the Life-guards?" I told him "No, I belonged formerly to the Oxford-blues;" he says, "I presume you are a good soldier?" and after that, that he supposed that I was a good swordsman; I told him I once was, and that I could use the sword now if it were required to defend myself, but it was a long time since I had used a sword or arms of any description; he turned the discourse upon the different shopkeepers of London particularly, saying they were a set of aristocrats altogether, and that they were all working under one system of government, and he should glory to see the day that the shops were shut up, and well plundered; he turned his discourse upon Mr. Hunt, saying Mr. Hunt was a coward, and no friend to the people; that he had no doubt, could he get into Whitehall, and overlook the books, he should find his name there as a spy to the government; he next turned his discourse upon Mr. Cobbett, that Mr. Cobbett, with all his writings, he did not consider as any friend to the people, and he had no doubt upon his mind that Cobbett was a spy equally the same.

Did any thing further pass at that meeting that you recollect?—Mr. Brunt alluded to two men that he had to call upon in Carnaby-market; and asked Mr. Thistlewood if he would walk with him; Thistlewood refused this, saying he had somewhere to call; before we left the room, Brunt told Thistlewood respecting of a blunderbuss that was to be raffled for, and asked him if he would be there; Thistlewood, to the best of my recollection, told him that he would.

Did you then leave Thistlewood?—On this, I believe we left; I do not recollect any thing else at that time.

On going from Brunt's to Thistlewood's, or at any other time had Brunt stated any thing to you as to any plan they had in agitation?—A plan was stated to me previously to our getting to Thistlewood's.

What did he state to you?—He told me there was a plan that was drawn up by two or three, and he had no doubt, if I would consent to join them, it would meet my approbation.

Did he tell you what this plan was?—This plan was to assassinate the ministers, the first time they met together to dine.

That was before you arrived at Thistlewood's?—Yes, it was; he likewise told me at this time, "besides," says he, "we have got information where the thieves keep their money, to the amount of upwards of three million all in hard specie; after we have done this we intend to go to that place and plunder it."

Did he say where the place was?—Not at that time.

Some time after this, were you in confinement for debt?—I was.

In the Whitecross-street prison?—Yes.

When did you come out of prison?—The day after the death of our late king.

That was the 30th of January, the Sunday?—Yes.

After you had come out of prison, did you go to any meeting in Fox-court?—On the Monday evening I called.

You have told us that Brunt lived in Fox-court?—He did.

Was that room in the same house in which Brunt lived?—On the same floor.

Brunt lived in the two-pair of stairs front room?—Yes.

This meeting was in the back room?—Yes.

Did you learn from Brunt who hired that room?—I heard him say he had hired it of the landlady for Ings.

Was there any furniture in that room?—Only a stove fixed.

Did meetings continue to be held in that room up to the 23rd of February?—They were held twice a day, except that there was none on Sunday evenings.

What persons usually attended those meetings?—Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Davidson, Harrison, Wilson, Bradburn, Tidd occasionally.

Any more that you remember?—Edwards.

Do you remember the names of any more, at this moment?—Not at this moment.

You tell us you came out of prison on the 30th of January; that, on Monday evening, the day afterwards, you attended one of those meetings?—Yes.

Can you tell us any thing particular that passed at those meetings?—Not on the Monday night.

Do you recollect any time when Harrison was there?—A Wednesday night.

When you went to the room, whom did you find there?—I saw Thistlewood, Harrison, and in the course of the evening Ings was there, and Wilson, and Edwards.

Tell us what passed when you went in?—When I went in, Thistlewood and Harrison seemed in deep discourse, respecting some conversation they had heard; information they had gained of the life-guards and foot-guards being to leave London to attend the funeral of the late king. Harrison was told by a life-guardsman, that every man in the life-guards that could be mounted and could be spared, was to attend the funeral of the late king, as well as the foot-guards, and likewise the police officers; after he had left the life-guardsman, he said it came to his mind that it would be an excellent opportunity to kick up a row in London that night. Mr. Thistlewood agreed to the plan; and proposed that it should be done by collecting what men they had among themselves together, and to take the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, as well as the cannon in the Artillery-ground, and likewise for the fire-balls to be made use of to set fire to the different buildings; thinking it would be an excellent opportunity, as the soldiers and what police officers could be spared would be out of London, that there would not be sufficient strength left in London to protect it.

What further passed?—Thistlewood said, it would be necessary to send a party up to Hyde Park corner, in order to prevent any orderly leaving London for Windsor to communicate what was passing in London.

Any thing further?—He likewise proposed, that the telegraph over the water should be taken, in order to prevent it communicating any intelligence to Woolwich.

Did this plan meet with the assent of those persons who were at that time assembled?—It met with the assent of those persons then in the room.

After that, did Brunt and any other person come into the room?—Brunt and Ings at this time.

When Brunt and Ings came into the room, was this plan which had been in agitation communicated to them?—It was communicated to them by Thistlewood.

On its being communicated to them by Thistlewood, what passed?—Brunt and Ings both declared there was nothing short of the assassination of the ministers which they had in view, that could satisfy them.

In consequence of this, was that project which had been so mentioned given up?—It was.

Do you recollect a meeting which took place on Saturday the 19th of February?—Yes.

Who was at that meeting?—There were Thistlewood, Harrison, Brunt, Ings and Hall.

What passed at that meeting?—On my going into the room, they seemed to be in a study between themselves ; they got up, and Thistlewood said, "well, it is agreed on, that if nothing happens between this and next Wednesday night, on Wednesday night to go to work."

Did any thing further pass at that meeting ?—Yes ; Thistlewood gave instructions to Brunt.

Did he assign any reason why they must go to work the next Wednesday night ?—The reason he assigned was, that they were all so poor they could wait no longer ; he gave instructions to Brunt, and those in the room, that there should be a meeting sit the next morning at nine o'clock, to draw up a plan to settle how they should act.

Did they separate after that ?—Yes, at least they went away.

Did a meeting take place on the next morning ?—Yes.

Was that meeting larger than usual ?—It was.

Were the prisoners at the bar among the party who met that morning ?—Yes.

Both of them ?—Yes.

Tell us what passed on Sunday morning, the 20th of February ; what time did you get there ?—Just before eleven o'clock ; Thistlewood said, on looking round, "there are twelve of us, it is time to proceed to business ;" he proposed Tidd to take the chair. Tidd takes the chair with a pike in his hand ; and he began by stating, that "we," he said, "have come to a determination, that if nothing transpires between this and next Wednesday night, we intend to go to work, for we have been waiting so long expecting the ministers to dine together ; finding they do not, we intend if nothing happens, that they do dine together between this and that, to take them separately." On this, he began to propose his plan, saying, he intended to take the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, the six cannon in the Artillery-ground, and for Mr. Palin to take upon himself to set fire to the different buildings.

Was Palin to do that alone, or how ?—He was to have assistance from men that he had collected himself. Mr. Thistlewood said, this was an outline of the plan at present ; and as Mr. Brunt had got a plan to propose respecting the assassination, he should drop it for the present, and leave it to Mr. Brunt to speak.

Upon this what took place ?—Upon this Brunt came forwards to explain his plan ; Thistlewood stopped him, saying "let my plan first be put from the chair ; if any one in the room has any thing to say upon it let him speak."

Was it put from the chair ?—Yes ; and agreed to by all present.

The prisoner, Tidd, being in the chair ?—Yes.

After this was put from the chair and agreed to, what took place ? did Brunt come forward ?—Brunt came forward, and spoke to this effect : Brunt said, as we cannot get the ministers all together, as it was proposed to take them separate, I propose to you there shall be as many as we think we can take ; as many men as we can get shall be separated into so many parts, and from each allotment there shall be a man drawn, and that man that is drawn, is the man that is to do the deed.

The men should be divided into a certain number of parts, and from each part a man drawn for the purpose of committing each murder ?—Yes, just so ; that man that the lot fell upon, if he attempted it and did not do the thing, if there was any signs of cowardice, he should be run through upon the spot directly ; upon this I got up myself ; I asked him if he thought it was impossible for a man to attempt to do a thing of that kind and fail ; says I, "if a man fails, is he to be run through on the spot immediately ;" he said "no, unless there is signs that he is a coward." This motion was put from the chair as before, and agreed to ; directly after this, in came Palin, Potter and Strange.

Palin, whose name you have before-mentioned, and Potter and Strange, came into the room ?—Yes.

Was that the Palin who was to head the party for firing ?—Yes.

On their coming into the room, were the circumstances that had passed communicated to them ?—Yes, they were ; and they agreed to them after Thistlewood and Brunt had communicated the same to those as he had to all in the room before ; Palin got up to speak to the chairman, saying he wished to say something, that he had paid due attention, and that he amongst the rest had agreed to what had been proposed ; but he wished to know how those things, as they had so many objects to be carried at the same time, were to be done ; "you talk of the West-end job taking from forty to fifty men."

Had that number been mentioned for that called the West-end job ?—Yes, it had been by Thistlewood.

What was the meaning of the West-end job ?—That meant the assassination of the ministers ; it was so called.

And from forty to fifty men were thought necessary for that purpose ?—Yes. "You talk of taking the two pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane, and six pieces of cannon from the Artillery-ground, and my setting fire to the buildings ; I wish to know how this is to be done ; you ought to know whether you have men to depend upon sufficient : I cannot give you any satisfaction on that point till I can see what men I can speak to ; I wish to have instructions from here whether I can communicate to them what has passed here this morning."

What was answered to that ?—It was said from the chair, Thistlewood and Brunt, that there was no doubt that Palin certainly knew the men he had spoken to respecting it ; if Palin was satisfied within himself that he had got such men as he could depend upon, he was at liberty to act, and to tell them what had passed.

Upon that was he satisfied?—Upon that he sat down satisfied.

After this had taken place, did the meeting break up?—The chair was left upon this.

Did any thing further take place?—They were pretty well all standing; at this time Thistlewood suddenly turns himself round, "Oh, Brunt, well thought of, now as Palin is here, you may as well take him to this spot close by here, and let him see whether he thinks it is practicable."

What place was that?—That place was Furnival's-inn-buildings.

Furnival's-inn-buildings was at that time not finished?—The back part of it was not.

Was that near the back of Fox-court?—Yes.

In consequence of that, did Brunt and Palin go out?—They did.

Did they return before you quitted the place?—They did.

What passed, on their return?—On their return, Mr. Palin gave it in that it was a very good job, and a very easy one, and would make a very good fire.

Did any thing further pass on that occasion?—Yes; Thistlewood said, that it would be highly necessary (if it was possible) to get the men together, and to communicate their intentions to have them, if possible, to give them a treat; but he said he did not know how it was to be done, for they were all so poor; on this, Brunt turned himself to the fire, walked across the room and back again, and said he had a pound note he had reserved for the purpose, though he had done little or no work lately, but he would be damned if he did not spend it upon his men; Thistlewood said, "where shall we take them to? I suppose Hobbs would have no objection to letting us have the room up stairs."

Hobbs kept the White Hart?—Yes.

Had there been any meetings at the White Hart previous to those meetings held in the back room at Brunt's lodgings?—Yes.

Were those meetings held in a room at the White Hart, or in a back room?—In a back room in the yard. Those meetings were discontinued while you were in prison for debt?—Yes.

Now proceed.—Brunt said, he did not much like it after what had dropped from my mouth "but never mind," says Brunt, "we can go there, as time gets so short; I do not see what occasion we have to fear the traps," or some expression of that kind.

Had you, in point of fact, made some communication to them of what had passed between you and Hobbs?—Yes; he said he would call on Hobbs, and hear what he had to say; on second recollection, he said he would give his boy a holiday that day, send his wife out, and what men he had to collect together, to have them in his own room.

After this conversation had passed, I believe you separated?—Yes.

Tell us whether you had seen any arms in that back room at different periods?—I had.

Had you seen among other things, any pike-staves?—Yes.

In what state were they?—In the rough.

Had any thing been done to the ends of them?—No more than just as they were cut from the tree they grew on.

Was any thing done after they were brought in there?—Bradburn sawed the ends of them off with a saw, and ferruled them.

Was that done in that back room?—Yes.

Were there any sockets or holes made in them?—Yes.

After those ferrules had been put on in the manner you described, by Bradburn, what passed?—There was an alteration, it was considered, after the ends of the pike stick had been pared down to the ferrule that was knocked down, that the pike staff was so weak it would not support the pike; in consequence of that, every ferrule was cut off again, and bigger ones were got and put on.

Was that done also in the room?—Yes.

Besides those pike-staves, were there any hand-grenades brought there?—There were some that were brought in there ready made, and some made there.

Did you see Davidson do any thing there?—Yes, Davidson and Harrison; there was a kind of a thing that was wound round a tin case first, and some pitch that was melted in an iron-pot; after this was put in, there were some nails bound round.

Did you see Harrison make any of them?—Yes.

Did you see Davidson also do any thing towards making them?—I did.

Was there any other place where they were afterwards carried to?—They were carried to Tidd's.

To Tidd's lodgings?—Yes, in Hole-in-the-wall passage.

What was that called?—The dépôt.

Who was it that suggested they should be removed from the room?—Thistlewood.

What reason did he give?—He assigned the reason, that there should be nothing kept in that room, in case there should be any persons come to that room who might give information.

In consequence of that, were the things from time to time removed to Tidd's?—They were.

Do you remember a meeting which took place on the Tuesday morning, the 22nd of February?—Yes.

The meeting of which you have been speaking was the Sunday?—Yes.

Where was that meeting on the Tuesday held?—In the same room as Brunt's.

About what time?—About ten o'clock.

Who were the persons present?—There was Thistlewood, Brunt; there was Hall; there was Ings at this time; and, just after this, Edwards comes in, and brings the account of the information he had seen in the paper, of a dinner that was to be held on the Wednesday night.

A cabinet dinner?—Yes.

At what place?—Lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square.

In consequence of this, was a newspaper sent for?—Yes; Hall fetched it.

Did it appear by the newspaper that the information was true?—Yes.

What passed on this information being communicated?—On this being communicated, Brunt expressed himself, "now, damn my eyes," says he, "I believe there is a God; I have often prayed that those thieves may be called together, that we may have an opportunity to destroy them, and now" says he, "God has heard my prayer."

Was any thing else said, that you remember?—Ings was equally alive to it; upon this Thistlewood proposed that there should be a committee sit directly, in order to alter the plan of assassination which had been agreed on on the Sunday.

Referring to the plan of individual assassination?—Yes; my sitting in the chair, Thistlewood proposed me to take the chair; I takes the chair, and called to order. Thistlewood was going to speak; I interrupted him; I said, "Gentlemen, I hope from what fell from my mouth yesterday morning, you have given it a due consideration."

That was the communication that had been made to you by Hobbs, the landlord of the White Hart?—Yes.

Suggesting something, I believe, respecting the police officers having inquired at Hobbs's;—Yes.

You communicated that to the meeting?—I did.

Tell us what took place?—Upon this Brunt put himself into a bit of a passion, and so did all of them, and particularly Harrison, so much that he walked about and threatened the first man that attempted to fling cold water upon the concern, he would run that man through directly with a sword; upon this I opened my coat in this way, and said, Harrison, if you have any conception that I am not a friend to you and every man in this room, do it now; Palin and Potter and Bradburn were in the room; Palin got up, surprised from what he had seen, and walked across the room; and Palin was the man that holla'd out, insisting on my being heard.

Was Hall in the room at that time?—He was.

In consequence of this conversation that took place, did Brunt make any proposal?—On Mr. Palin insisting on some explanation being given of that I had alluded to, Brunt got up and said he would get up and tell the whole; Brunt got up and communicated it.

Did Brunt make any proposition?—He made a proposition, that lord Harrowby's house should be watched.

When was that watch to commence?—At six o'clock that evening.

Who were the two men that were at the first on the watch?—Davidson was one, but the other I cannot remember, and Brunt and Tidd were to relieve them.

When were they to relieve them?—At nine o'clock.

It was to be a three hours watch?—Yes.

Were Davidson and Tidd both present in the room at that time?—Yes.

Was it said why that watch was to be appointed?—That watch was to be appointed to see if there were any police officer entered the house, or any soldiers; if there was any thing of that kind entered the house of lord Harrowby, it was to be communicated to the committee; if there was nothing of that kind seen, Brunt insisted upon it that the business should be done the following night.

After this did you separate?—No, we did not; after this proposition of Brunt's was settled, Thistlewood directly proposed Tidd to take the chair, in consequence of my interrupting their business.

Did Tidd take the chair then?—Yes, he did; then Thistlewood came forward with the proposition of a fresh plan, respecting the assassination of the ministers; he proposed going himself to lord Harrowby's door with a note in his hand, for the servant to give to his master, telling him he must have an answer; at the time he got in, the others were to rush in after him, and to secure the servants, presenting a pistol to their breast, threatening them with instant death in case they made any resistance; at the same time other persons were to go to take command of the stairs leading to the bottom part of the house; another party to take the command of the stairs to the upper part of the house, and two men to the area; these men were to take, to each station, a hand-grenade a piece, as well as pistols and blunderbuss; if any servants attempted to retreat from the upper or lower part of the house, or the area, a hand-grenade was to be thrown among them, with a view to destroy them; at the same time it was proposed that they should enter the room. Ings was the man that offered himself to take the command, to lead into the room. Ings proposed to go in this kind of way; as soon as he entered the room he was to accost their lordships by saying, "Now, my lords, I have as good men here as the Manchester yeomanry; enter citizens and do your duty;" and two swordsmen were to follow in after him.

Who were the two swordsmen?—I was one myself, and Harrison another.

Harrison had been in the Life-guards?—He had; on this being done, the swordsmen entering the room, followed by the pike-men, Ings declared he would follow and cut every head off as he came to them.

What was Ings by trade?—I always was led to believe that he was a butcher; and as well as that, he proposed to cut one of lord Castlereagh's hands off. Ings had two bags with him.

What was he to do with the bags?—He proposed to bring away the heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth in the bags; he would have one of lord Castlereagh's hands, saying, that he would cure that, as it would be thought a great deal of in a future day. Ings had on a former day said, he would exhibit those heads on poles, and carry them through the streets; on the house being left, after they had done what they had to do, it was proposed, and Harrison undertook it, to go to the King-street barracks, and set fire to the shed where the straw and hay were deposited, and to destroy the whole building.

Was any further use to be made of the heads, when they were brought away?—Yes, this thing was often talked of; this discourse finished on the Wednesday afternoon; those heads, after they were brought away, which had been proposed by Ings, saying he would exhibit them about on a pole, Thistlewood said, "no, the best way of carrying them will be to put them on a pike each, and carry them behind the cannon to terrify the people, to make them believe that there was somebody of more consequence than they were aware of at the head of them."

Was any further use to be made of either of them after that, of lord Castlereagh's head for instance?—It was proposed after this, by Bradburn, after it had been exhibited about the streets for two or three days, says he, "I will make a box and inclose it, and send it to Ireland, or take it over myself to be exhibited there."

Did any thing further pass at that meeting, as to the plan?—Yes, it was proposed that after they had done at lord Harrowby's, Harrison was to go to the horse barracks, supported by Wilson, to set them on fire, by a ball prepared for that purpose, and others were to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane; if they met with any interruption from the people, it was proposed to run the pikes through them, and to fire upon them occasionally; and after they met the party in Gray's-inn-lane, to assist them in taking those two pieces of cannon at the Light-horse stables, and to proceed from there to the Artillery-ground to take the six cannon there.

Who was to head the party that was to take the six cannon at the Artillery-ground?—Cook; after Cook had got the six pieces of cannon he was to lead them, and bring them into the street, and if there was any interruption to fire; if he found the people came over to him, to enable him to advance, he was to advance to the Mansion-house, divide the cannon into two parts, place three on each side of the Mansion-house, and demand an entrance; and if it was refused, fire upon it on both sides.

What was to be done with the Mansion-house?—The Mansion-house was proposed, by Thistlewood, for the seat of the provisional government.

Cook was not to be of the party at lord Harrowby's?—No, he was to command the party that was to go into the city; then it was proposed that they should take the Bank of England, and plunder it; but the books were not to be meddled with, as Thistlewood thought, by preserving the books, they would communicate to them something more than they were aware of.

You afterwards broke up, for the purpose of making preparations?—Yes, that is the outline of it.

On the Wednesday, what time did you go there?—I went up about two o'clock, as near as I can guess.

Was any thing said as to a sign or countersign?—Harrison was the man that proposed this; saying the men that had to go round to communicate it to what men they could collect——

It was proposed, then, that the persons there should go round for the purpose of communicating what they had in view to their associates?—Yes.

What was proposed as to that?—Harrison proposed that button should be the countersign.

How was that to be?—The man appointed to stand in Oxford-road was to pronounce the letters b, u, t, and the man in waiting to say t, a, s; on doing this he was to be considered a man friendly to their concern.

Where was that station to be?—The end of Oxford-road, by Tyburn-turnpike.

After they had made those arrangements did you separate for the purposes of preparation?—Yes.

Did Davidson and the other men go upon the watch on the Tuesday, as had been appointed?—Yes, I found Davidson on the watch; but the other man I did not know.

At what time did they go upon the watch?—They went upon the watch at six o'clock.

You state it had been originally proposed, that Tidd and Brunt should go upon the watch at nine o'clock for the purpose of relieving Davidson and his associate?—Yes.

Did they go upon that watch?—They settled for that; but Brunt came back in about five minutes, saying, that Tidd had called at his house, and found the man that he had appointed; and that he was a man of too much consequence to be left, and that therefore he could not go on the watch.

In consequence of that, what proposal was made?—For me to go instead of Tidd.

Did you, in consequence of that, go upon the watch with Brunt instead of Tidd?—Yes, I did.

When you got upon the watch did you see Davidson there?—Yes.

Did you and Brunt continue on the watch till twelve?—Not in the square all the while.

Did you, part of the time, go into any public-house in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

Where was that public-house situate?—At the back of the square; a public-house at the corner of the mews.

Did Brunt do any thing there?—He played at dominos there.

Did you, during that time, go out into the square to see whether all was quiet, and return again?—Yes; and I went out at eleven o'clock, and stopped till the turn of twelve, and then went home.

You found all quiet?—Yes.

Do you recollect on Tuesday afternoon, or evening, going to Fox-court, and smelling any strange smell?—Yes; on going up stairs, I smelt a strange smell; on going in, I found Edwards, Ings, and Hall. Ings and Hall were employed in making illumination-balls to fire the buildings, and Edwards in making the touch-paper for the grenades. Hall was laying the paper on the floor, to receive the balls, to prevent their sticking to the hand.

Did you stay there any time, or go away?—I went away almost directly.

The next day, I believe, you did not go very early to the room did you?—No.

Some business of your own kept you away?—Yes.

What time did you go?—About two o'clock.

Whom did you find when you went there?

—I found Brunt in his own room, the front room.

While you were in that front room, did Strange come in?—Strange was the first man that came in after myself.

Did Strange come in by himself, or accompanied by other persons?—By himself; there were one or two strangers came in afterwards.

What were they employed about?—There were some pistols laid upon the drawers in Brunt's room.

How many?—I saw half a dozen.

What were they doing with those pistols?—They were endeavouring to fix the flints in them.

Was any thing said by Brunt?—On these last men coming in, Brunt proposed they should go into the other room.

Did they in consequence of that go with the pistols into the other room?—Yes.

You went into the other room too?—Yes.

Whom did you find at that time in the other room?—There were no other persons in the room at that time, except those who followed from Brunt's room.

Who came in afterwards?—Thistlewood came in soon afterwards.

Was Ings there?—Not at that time.

Did you see him there in the course of the afternoon?—Yes.

What was Ings doing?—Ings, within a very little time after he came into the room, began to equip himself.

Did any thing take place before Ings came in?—The different strangers that were then in the room were busy in fixing the different flints to their pistols, and likewise the slings to the cutlasses that I saw lying in the room.

Did any body make any proposition to them?—Not as yet; on Thistlewood coming into the room, he looks round.

When Thistlewood came in, were they preparing themselves?—Yes, they were; and he said, "this looks something like as if you were going to work;" he claps his hand on my shoulder, and asked me how I did; I said "I am rather unwell, and very low in spirits;" in consequence of this, he proposed to Brunt to send for something to drink to put me in spirits; and he proposed directly after this, that there should be some paper fetched, as he wanted to draw up some bills, and money was produced from Thistlewood to Brunt.

Was any thing said about the sort of paper?—Thistlewood wanted such paper as the newspapers were printed upon; he did not know the name of it, and I proposed to him to have some cartridge paper; in consequence of this, cartridge paper was sent for, and Brunt said his apprentice or his boy should fetch it.

Brunt has a son as well as an apprentice?—Yes.

Did Brunt go out for that purpose?—Yes, and the cartridge paper was brought.

Was there any table in the room?—A table and chair were brought in from Brunt's room at the time.

What was done with them?—Thistlewood sat down, and wrote three bills?

What were the contents of those bills?—Thistlewood wrote "Your tyrants are destroyed. The friends of liberty are called upon to come forward. The provisional government is now sitting. James Ings, secretary. February 23rd, 1820."

As he was writing the third bill, did you make any observation upon him?—On my looking at Thistlewood, I perceived him to be very much agitated, and he could not write any more, and he wished somebody else to take the pen, and proposed Hall to take the pen; Hall refused it; there was another man, a strange man, in the room, who refused at first to take the pen, but afterwards took it.

Did he proceed to write any other bill?—Yes, he did.

We must not ask you the contents of that bill; what was to be done with those bills?—Those bills were to be stuck up at the side of different buildings that were to be set fire to, in order to communicate to the public what had been done.

After those bills were written, what further took place at the meeting? how was Ings equipped?—Ings equipped himself by putting a black belt round his loins, another hanging upon his shoulder to support the cutlass with, with a couple of bags in the form of a soldier's haversack.

Were these under his great coat?—One over each shoulder.

Under his great coat?—Under the coat he wore at top, he put on his great coat afterwards; the belt round his loins was to contain a brace of pistols, a belt for his cutlass; and on viewing himself, he perceived that he had forgotten to bring his steel.

Had he any knife?—Yes, a large butcher's knife, with wax-end round the handle.

Was he asked any question why the wax-end was wound round the handle?—Yes, he was asked the reason, and he said it was to prevent its slipping in his hand when he was doing the job.

Was that like a butcher's knife?—No, a butcher's knife is sharp at the point; he said he had procured it for that purpose; about this time Bradburn came up, saying he wished Thistlewood to send some person to the men he had collected together, at a spot where they might be more handy.

Who was appointed for that purpose?—Tidd was appointed; Tidd was not very willing to go, as he said, because they were Irishmen; he thought it would be better for one of their own country to go; for one of their own country would do better with them.

Did he at last go?—Yes, he did.

Do you happen to recollect how the prisoner Davidson was accoutred?—I cannot charge my memory that I saw any thing of that kind.

Tidd.—My lord, I did not understand the evidence the last time he brought my name into question.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You do very rightly, if any thing passes which you do not hear distinctly, to inform us of it, and it shall be repeated: the last he has stated respecting you was, that on Bradburn coming up, and saying he wished Thistlewood to send some person to the men he had collected near the spot, you were desired to go; that at first you rather objected to that, stating that the men who were to be met were Irish, and that one of their own countrymen would manage better with them than you who were English, and that you at last consented.

Tidd.—You have made a mistake there.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You will have an opportunity, by your counsel or yourself, to put any questions that you think proper; but it is not only more regular, but it is more advantageous to you to wait till he has concluded his examination before you put any questions; you shall have the full opportunity in its proper time.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Do you remember Palin's coming in?—Yes.

On his coming in, did any thing pass?—Yes; Palin, seizing the opportunity of Thistlewood and Brunt being out of the room, begins to address himself to what were in the room; saying, "Gentlemen, what you are met here for, I hope you all know what it is; if such, I hope you will give it a consideration; first ask yourselves respecting the deed of the assassination, whether you conceive, within yourselves, it will be a matter of consequence to your country; if you conceive it will be of consequence to your country, then in the next place you ought to come to a determination to stick true to each other; unless you come to this determination, you can do no good; any man that is seen, after you begin this, to show the least signs of cowardice, that man ought to be run through upon the spot;" a tall man that was in the room, whose name I do not know, spoke, saying he could pretty well see the meaning of his speech; "but," says he, "you speak as if all that were in the room knew what we were met here for; that is what I and some of us wish to know; I am not a man that am afraid of myself, nor should any man that turns out on such a thing as this be afraid of his life; I will be the first man, if I see any man a coward, to run him through." Palin was going to speak again; at this moment, in came Brunt into the room.

Did Brunt come alone, or Brunt and Thistlewood?—Brunt alone. Brunt seeing, as it appeared to me, an alteration in the countenances of the men in the room, wished to know the cause; he was told that there were those in the room, who did not know what they were met there upon, and wished to know. Brunt said directly, "This is not the room where you are to be informed, go along with me to the room in the Edgware-road, there I will tell you." Brunt said then, "any man that goes along with me, I will treat him with a drop of something that is good, in order to put them in spirits for what they are going about." The tall man made answer, "I hope whoever is going on this piece of business will not go and drink, for a drunken man in such a business as this is not fit to be trusted; for a man so doing would throw himself into the hands of his enemies." On this Brunt began to put the men on the move to go to the Edgware-road, saying (and that was the first time I heard that), that Palin would want that room to bring his men to.

Davidson.—Mr. Attorney-general, you asked the witness how Davidson was accoutred; does the witness mean to say that I was at Fox-court that evening.

Mr. Solicitor-General.—Was Davidson at Fox-court that evening?—I have not said he was: I did not see him there that afternoon, at the time I am speaking of.

You have given an account of meetings that took place from the beginning of January to the 23rd of February; was Davidson frequently at those meetings in that place?—Yes.

But he was not at the particular meeting to which you now speak?—No, he was not.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I have been looking to my note of what passed on a former day, as well as the present, and he did not name you as one of the persons present at that time.

Davidson.—Thank you, my lord.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Was he at the meeting on Sunday, when this meeting was arranged?—Yes, he was.

And he had been at several of the previous?—Yes; the first of my knowing Davidson was on the 10th of January,

: That was before you went to prison?—Yes.

After this had taken place, and Brunt put the men on the move, did you go up Oxford-street?—I did.

Did you meet Thistlewood in the Edgware-road?—Yes.

Was Brunt with you at that time?—Brunt and another man.

Did you all go together to the stable in Cato-street?—Yes.

When you went into the stable did you see any person in the stable on the ground floor?—I saw Davidson sitting, and Wilson standing, apparently, as it appeared to me in walking along, doing something to the pikes.

Did you go up into the loft?—I did.

How many men did you find assembled altogether, including those that were below?—There were about six or seven of them, or there might be more.

What was there up stairs in the room?—On the bench in the room, there were pistols and cutlasses.

What kind of a bench was it?—I did not take particular notice of the bench.

Was it like a carpenter's bench?—Yes.

What passed up there; did more men come in?—There were more came in the course of the evening. From the accounts that Thistlewood gave, counting the men that were in the room, there were eighteen men in the room up stairs, and two below, which made twenty.

Did they appear to you to be as numerous as that?—Yes, they did.

Were you yourself armed in any way?—I had a blunderbuss, which I took off and laid upon the bench, and a broomstick, that had been prepared for the reception of a bayonet, for Brunt; I delivered them both.

Was Tidd there at that time?—He was not.

Was Brunt there?—Brunt was up in the loft when I went up.

And Thistlewood went up with you?—Yes, he went up before me.

Did any thing pass about Tidd not being there?—In going up from the stable, Thistlewood and Brunt were in discourse together.

Thistlewood seemed rather agitated, for fear, as it appeared to me afterwards, Tidd would not come. Brunt perceiving there was an alteration in the countenance of what men were in the room, and Ings as well, Ings began to stamp and swear: he hoped they would not stop now; if they did, he should either hang himself or cut his throat. On this, Thistlewood goes to the end of the table; just after this Tidd came.

Had any thing passed about Tidd's not coming?—Brunt turned himself round to the bench, and said, he would venture his life that Tidd would come; that he was confident of it, and shortly after this Tidd came into the room.

Tell us what passed?—I saw Tidd talking to Thistlewood; Thistlewood seemed at this time a little agitated, and so did Tidd himself;

Thistlewood seeing me looking at him turned himself away; Tidd came towards me, and I said to Tidd, "Tidd do not you think this is a pretty set out; do you think it is possible for the men here to do that which is talked of;" Tidd said, "no, it never can be done."

Tidd.—My lord, I have no opportunity of speaking.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It would be much better for yourself you should postpone it; you may be sure your learned counsel will take a note of it.

Tidd.—It immediately concerns what Mr. Adams said last.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It is irregular for you to break in, but I would not on that account if you tell me you prefer doing it now; forbid your doing it; but you may be quite sure it is more for your advantage to hear all he says before you put any question, than to break in upon his narrative; if you should omit it in consequence of having your mind occupied, I undertake to remind you before the proper season for your putting questions is gone by.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did Thistlewood say any thing upon this?—Thistlewood said, "I hope for God's sake you will not think of dropping the concern now, if you do, it will turn out a second Despard's job;" saying, that there were quite men enough in the room, and "you seem to be frightened for fear of not having strength enough." Thistlewood said, "supposing lord Harrowby to have sixteen servants in his house, they will not be prepared as you are; but not only that, but they will be terrified, and from going into the house to coming out of it again, will not exceed ten minutes." He just went over it saying, that fourteen men, he thought, would be enough to go into the room; these fourteen men were proposed, after its first being put to all in the room, whether all in the room present were agreeable to go.

It was put to the persons in the room, whether they were agreeable to go?—Yes.

What was done upon that?—On their consenting to go, there were fourteen men picked out.

For what were those fourteen men picked out?—They were picked out for the sole purpose of going into the room to do the murder.

What were the others to do?—The other six were to secure the servants.

The six were to be employed in the manner you represented before, to guard the stairs and the area?—Yes.

Was any thing done in the way of separating them from the rest?—The men stood at this time where they were, and Brunt produced a bottle, and just at the conclusion of this, I heard a noise down stairs.

I want to know whether the fourteen men moved to any separate part of the room or not?—No, not to the opposite side of the bench; after the officers came into the room, they sidled into the little room.

Were the fourteen men singled out for the purpose of doing this?—Yes.

What did they do?—They agreed to go into the room.

Who were those men?—There were, Thistlewood was one; Ings was another; Brunt was another; Hall, Wilson, and Davidson was proposed.

Where was he?—He was down below.

Do you remember any more?—I do not know; I have mentioned all the names I know, and Bradburn and some others that I do not know. Were they separated to a different part of the room from the rest?—Those who were to go in.

After that separation had taken place, or while that was going on, was there any alarm given below?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Before this, had any other person made any address to the people?—Mr. Brunt made an address to the people; he turned round to the bench again, and said "You seem to think there is not sufficient strength to go;" he declared that if there were not more than eight or nine men, he himself was determined to go; he directly said if there were not more than five or six men he would go. "We have things here which some of you know nothing about, that will blow the house up, and if I go with five or six and find myself in danger, I will clap fire to it, and blow the house down over our heads."

Mr. Solicitor General.—You state, that while the picking out the men was going forward, you heard a noise below; what kind of noise was that?—The sound of a pistol; directly after this, at the bottom of the ladder, the word was given "Holles, show a light!" on this, Thistlewood turns to the bench, takes the candle, and from that goes to the head of the ladder in the room, looks down, saw they were coming, turned round, and set the candle on the bench; on this they began to sidle off (which was the first time I saw this little room) into the little room; the officers came into the room.

They came up the ladder?—Yes: and took the command of the room, with their pistols presented.

You need not describe what took place at that time, as we shall have that from the officers themselves; I believe the lights were blown out after Smithers was killed?—Yes; as soon as the pistol went off.

And you made your escape?—Yes.

When Thistlewood said that fourteen men would be sufficient to go into the room, was Tidd in the room?—He was; but I am pretty sure that Tidd was not one that was to go into the room.

Was he in the room at the time when they gave the assent to what Thistlewood proposed, that they should go on with the measure?—Yes, he was.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Was he there when Brunt made the speech you have just stated?—He was.

Was that after you had made the observation to Tidd, "A pretty set out; do you think these men can accomplish the work?"—After I had made the remark.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Both Brunt's and Thistlewood's speeches were after that?—Yes, And Tidd remained in the room?—Yes.

When were you first apprehended?—On Friday the 25th.

When you made your escape, did you go back to your own apartment?—Yes, and remained there till I was apprehended.

You were afterwards, I believe, examined at Whitehall, with the other prisoners?—I was not examined that day.

But you were afterwards?—Yes.

Robert Adams, cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

As all the jury have not had the misfortune to meet you three times, just tell me what you told us—that among your other virtues, you abandoned your religion; that is so, is it not?—It was so.

You became a disbeliever in Christianity?—I did.

And that at the age of forty-five years?—Yes.

You do call yourself a christian now?—Yes.

When did you come back to the belief of Christianity?—I may say that I came back to the belief of Christianity about the 24th, but I was convinced before that.

Though you were convinced of it before, you did not come back to the belief till the 24th?—I did not exactly.

That was the day after you were in marvellous great danger of being hanged?—It was so.

So that the fear of the halter brought you back to your old belief?—It might have some effect.

I observe you have very much altered your manner; you do not seem quite so vehement; has any body been talking to you since you were examined here?—No; I do not want any body to talk to me.

You have changed it because you think it somewhat more decent?—No; I am rather unwell.

Had you mixed much in political society before you met Mr. Thistlewood?—Never in my life; I have had my political opinions, but never to join a party.

Was it among your political opinions, that it was lawful to sweep off fifteen men in cold blood?—It never was lawful in my sight.

I dare say you thought it a very atrocious act?—I thought it a very cruel one at the first proposal.

You recollect you told me it was first proposed to you on the 2nd of January?—Yes.

And notwithstanding you thought it so cruel an act, you consented to be introduced to Mr. Thistlewood ten days after, on the 12th?—I did.

And from the 12th of January to the 23rd of February, when you were disappointed all of you, you still continued to frequent meetings where that matter was debated, settled and determined on?—Yes, I did.

Notwithstanding all your private opinions, and thinking it was a cruel act? look to the jury?—I did; I am not going to enter into debate at all upon it; I shall answer you, yes or no.

And you took no inconsiderable part in those meetings according to your own account;—I have stated every part that I recollect; if you are in possession of any part I have not communicated I am ready to do it.

I am in possession of more than the jury know of you, or than I wish to know?—I will state every thing to the jury.

You were at one time appointed chairman of this committee of assassination?—Yes.

Did you call yourselves so? What did you call yourselves? most committees have a name?—If I may be allowed to make a remark upon that—

Mr. Solicitor General.—Make no remarks, but answer the question. There was no particular name appointed.

Mr. Curwood.—Were they all members of the committee?—They were regular except Cook, on the Sunday morning; that was the first time that the committee met.

A committee is part of a larger body; where was your large body?—The larger body that was got together was in the room in Cato-street; that was the largest number that was ever collected together to my knowledge.

Were they the whole of those you expected to revolutionize the government with?—There was a talk of a vast many more attending.

Do you know of any others?—I do not; not by name.

Could you have brought any men into the field?—No.

Your single sword was all you could contribute?—I never got that, nor the worth of a shot towards it.

That was all you agreed to contribute?—That was all I agreed to contribute.

Keep to your own account; “all the committee themselves did not know what was going forward?”—Those that were upon the committee knew what was going to be done; there were some that attended after the committee; it was not regularly termed a committee each time.

All the meetings did not know what they were going to do?—No, some did not.

You knew what was going to be done?—Yes.

But some man in a brown coat got up and said, “You suppose we all know what we are going about, but I wish to know?”—Yes.

When he said that the design being to assassinate the cabinet ministers, Mr. Brunt said, “You must come to another room, and there you shall know?”—Yes.

And upon that, men joined you?—They followed us.

It was not the same party that were to go from Cato-street to lord Harrowby's, that were to seize the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane?—The same party that were to do the west-end job, were to go to Gray's-inn-lane.

Did not you tell us, that Mr. Cook was at the head of the party to seize the cannon?—That was at the Artillery-ground.

But not the west-end job party?—No.

Did you know where Mr. Cook's party were to come from?—No.

You never heard where his division hid themselves?—No; I have seen Mr. Cook himself.

Was Mr. Palin to fire the town with his own hand?—He and others.

Where were his men to come from?—I do not know.

You have told us about a proclamation; I suppose that proclamation received universal consent when it was read?—The three bills.

The three bills, saying, “Your tyrants are destroyed?”—Yes; I did not hear any body object to it.

It was part of the plan that those bills were to be stuck up in the streets the same night?—It was proposed by Thistlewood; it was not put from the chair; it was said by Thistlewood they were to be stuck up against the houses.

What became of them?—I cannot say; I saw them in the room, but never out of it.

Who were to stick them up?—I do not know.

I will not go through the whole of this story; but ask you, do you know a man of the name of Thomas Chambers?—I do not.

Then if you do not know him, you never of course called on a man of that name, and solicited him to join you in killing his majesty's ministers; telling him, at the same time, you would have blood and wine for supper?—I do not know that ever I was acquainted with such a man.

Will you deny this fact?—I will positively; if I were guilty of the fact I would acknowledge it; but I am not and will not acknowledge it.

On the night of the 23rd, the night you were all detected, did you and Edwards call on that man, Chambers, and desire to leave some arms with him?—I never saw Edwards after the Wednesday morning.

Then you mean to say you did not?—Yes, I will swear I did not.

That we may have no mistake about the man, the Chambers I mean lives in Heathcock-court, in the Strand?—I do not know that I could find out Heathcock-court.

You have never been in that court?—Not that I know of; I may have been in it, but I do not know it.

You have omitted some things in your evidence to-day?—I have omitted a great deal.

You stated before, that there were to be messages sent to the out-ports, to prevent any gentlemen leaving the kingdom without an order from the provisional government?—Yes.

That Brighton was to be taken possession of by a force?—Yes.

What had Brighton done?—Nothing more than the other places.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You will find that connected with the circumstance of their permitting no persons to go out.

Mr. Solicitor General.—I have omitted many circumstances, in consequence of my desire to shorten the case.

Mr. Curwood.—His lordship has reminded me, very properly, of a circumstance; they were all to be plundered if they permitted any person to go out of the kingdom?—Yes.

Where was the force to come from to do this?—I cannot say, but they expected the people to come over.

As you were a leader, what were the arrangements for all this?—I had not the ambition about me to be a leader; I did not expect they would bring things to such a pitch.

What were your motives?—I have told you before; I had a reason for it, and shall not make allusion to that again.

You stand here to give us the truth, and the whole truth; what was your object?—My object was to search further into the principles of Brunt, as I stated the last time.

What had you to do with Brunt's principles?—I had a foolish and curious idea, which I call a very weak one.

A foolish and curious idea?—And very weak indeed to run myself into so much danger for that.

You wish the jury to understand, that you joined men for the purpose of assassination, firing the city, and overturning the government, because you had a foolish and curious idea, to know what were Brunt's principles; do you mean to state that to the jury?—I state to the jury, that that was my motive; that I took Brunt by the hand, and I had not been long acquainted with Brunt before I had reason to believe what I thought of Brunt was confirmed.

So because you thought something of Brunt, and you wanted to know whether it was well founded or not, you mixed with a plot to assassinate fifteen illustrious men, to fire the city, and to overturn the empire?—There was no number of men mentioned at that time.

His majesty's ministers, who amounted to fifteen?—Yes.

You state to the jury, that was your only reason for joining in this plot?—I do.

Do you know a man of the name of Whatman?—No.

You have told us, that there was a conversation in the loft at Cato-street, in which some one said to Tidd or you, I believe, "This is a pretty business, do you think there are enough of us here to do such a job;" and he said, "No;" did not Tidd tell you he had been deceived in the business which had brought him to that loft, but finding what it was he would have nothing to do with it?—He did not say he had been deceived, but his answer to me was, "No, it never can be done."

Was that all that he said?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Prisoner Tidd, you have heard the last question put by your learned counsel, and the answer given to it; if you wish to pursue that question further, you may do so, and if you wish me to refresh your recollection by repeating to you the question to which your former interposition referred, I will do it.

Tidd.—Thank you, my lord; with respect to the last question put to him, that was the question I intended to put to him; but what I stated to him was this, when I came up to him he said, "this is a pretty piece of business," I observed to him——

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Before you go further, I would suggest to you, whether it may not be more prudent in you to confer with your counsel, and to put yourself in the guardianship of his discretion and judgment, rather than to put the questions yourself. You will exercise your own discretion. Do not imagine for a moment, that the Court wishes to prevent your putting any question which you may think for your advantage; the court interposes because sometimes persons put questions which they suppose may benefit them by their answer, and they do them an injury; when they have the benefit of such assistance as you have, perhaps it will be better to suggest the question to your counsel. Having stated that I am ready to take down any question you may propose.

Tidd.—I am very much obliged to you my lord.

Davidson.—I will send my question to my counsel.

Mr. Curwood.—With respect to Davidson, you have stated that he was not at the meeting on the 23rd?—Yes.

Was he armed when he was in Cato-street?—I do not recollect seeing him armed.

Do you remember seeing him there at all?—I do.

If he had been armed in any extraordinary way must you have noticed it?—I saw him both in the stable and up in the loft.

Had he at that time a belt round him, with a sword and pistols and musket?—I did not observe that he had any arms; I saw that he was very busy amongst them.

But you did not observe that he was armed?—I did not.

If he had been armed, must it not have attracted your attention?—Of course, if he had had them about him perceivable, I should have sees them, but for me to say he had no arms about him, I cannot; he might have them in his pocket.

Had he a sword by his side?—I did not observe that.

Had he pistols in his belt?—I did not see them.

Or a musket in his hand?—I think I must have seen it; but when the officers entered, the arms were principally lying on the bench; if they had not, I think the consequences must have been more fatal than they were.

*Robert Adams re-examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.*

Do you remember any person ever bringing any bullets to the room?—Yes.

How many?—He stated the number to be about five hundred; this was at the room in Fox-court, on the Tuesday morning, and he had a hand-saw in his right hand.

You have been asked about the Christian religion; what was it that led you to disbelieve in the Christian religion?—The thing that led me to disbelieve the Christian religion, was the works of Paine on the Christian religion, that were put into my hands by Mr. Tidd himself.

You have been asked as to other persons; was Palin in Cato-street?—No.

Was Potter in Cato-street?—No.

Was Cook in Cato-street?—No, not to my knowledge; I did not see him there.

Did you find any of the persons to whom Palin alluded as his men?—No, I did not.

There were some persons who were to set fire to the town, of whom you knew nothing?—No; he had a party from his own mouth, that he was to call on, of whom I knew nothing.

Did you know any thing of Cook's party?—I did not.

You knew nothing either of Palin's or Cook's party; the one being to take possession of the cannon, and the other to set fire to the town?—No.

I think you say Hall was in the room at the time those proclamations were written?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Hall is not to be tried?

Mr. Solicitor General.—No, my lord.

*Eleanor Walker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.*

I believe you are the niece and servant of Mrs. Rogers, of No. 4, Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane?—Yes.

Did Brunt, who has been tried here, lodge in your house?—Yes.

Had he lodged there for many months before last January?—It would have been a twelve month this last Easter.

What rooms did he occupy?—The two front rooms on the second-floor.

In the month of January last, did he introduce any person to you to take another room?—Yes.

What room was that?—The two-pair of stairs back room.

Who was the person whom he so introduced?—Ings.

The person who has been tried?—Yes.

Did he state to you what Ings was?—No, he did not.

Was it at all mentioned what business Ings was?—No; he said perhaps he might bring his goods in in a week.

The room was unfurnished?—Yes.

The rent was three shillings a week?—Yes.

Did Ings ever bring any goods in?—Not to my knowledge.

*Mary Rogers sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.*

We have learnt from your niece, that in the month of January last, a two-pair of stairs back room was let to a person?—Yes.

Whom did that person turn out to be?—Ings, I understand.

How many weeks did that person occupy the room?—Four or five.

How many did he pay for?—Four, to the best of my knowledge; he left one unpaid.

In the course of those four weeks, did you make inquiry of Brunt as to who and what Ings was?—I did.

What did he state to you was Ings's business?—He stated that he was a butcher, and that he knew nothing more of him than seeing him in a public-house, and hearing him inquire for a lodging.

Did Ings ever bring any furniture in?—Never.

In the course of the time that he occupied it, do you recollect any evening seeing any persons go up stairs?—Yes, very well.

How many in number?—Three men.

Was there any thing remarkable in the person of either of the three?—The middle one was a black man.

[A paper was handed to the court by the prisoner Davidson.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you wish this question to be put?

Davidson.—They are pretending to know me, but I do not press the question.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do not deceive yourself: the question you have now handed up to be put by your counsel, is one which in its present form he would not have put, and probably would not have put at all: you would also do well to be attentive to the evidence: she has not said that she has known you; she is not asked whether you are the person, and therefore the jury and I shall not take it that she at least has proved that you were; but if your question is put, it is not at all improbable that better recollection might fix that you were.

Davidson.—I understood at first that she did speak to knowing me.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—No, she neither has done so upon this nor upon a former occasion.

Davidson.—I am obliged to your lordship.

Joseph Hale sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Were you apprentice to the prisoner Brunt, who has been tried?—Yes.

Did you live with him at his lodgings in Fox-court?—Yes.

He occupied two rooms?—Yes.

One he occupied as a workshop, and the other as a room to live in?—Yes.

Did you sleep in the workshop?—Yes.

Do you remember a back room on the same floor being looked at by a person in January last?—Yes.

By whom?—By Ings and Brunt.

After they had looked at it together, did you hear either of them speak to the other upon the subject?—I did.

Who spoke?—Brunt spoke.

What did Brunt say to Ings?—He said "It will do; go down and give them a shilling."

Did Ings go down?—Yes.

Had you known Ings before that?—Yes.

How long?—About a fortnight before was the first time I had ever seen him.

In whose company had you seen him?—He was with Thistlewood in Brunt's workshop.

How many times had you seen him at Brunt's in the course of that fortnight?—I do not remember seeing him but twice before he took the room.

The same evening in which Brunt and Ings had looked at the room, did Ings come there?—Yes.

How did he get into the room?—He came and asked Mrs. Brunt for the key.

She had the key?—Yes.

Did she give it him?—Yes.

Did he go into the room?—Yes, he did.

Did any other persons come into that room, on that night?—Hall, the tailor, came with Ings.

Though you might not see, did you hear any other persons come into that room on that night?—Yes, I believe there were.

Your master was taken up, I believe, on Thursday the 24th of February?—Yes.

From the time that the room was taken by Ings, till your master was taken up, were any meetings of persons held in that room?—Yes.

At what time of the day do you recollect meetings to have been held?—Mostly they were held about seven o'clock in the evening.

Give me the names of persons that you have seen come to those meetings?—Thistlewood, Ings, Davidson—

By Davidson, do you mean the prisoner?—Yes; Brunt, Bradburn, Adams, Strange, Potter, Hall, Edwards.

Look at the bar, and see whether you see any other person there?—No, I do not remember seeing any other.

Do you know any person of the name of Tidd?—Yes.

VOL. XXXIII.

Do you know his person, or only his name?

—I know his person.

Do you see him at the bar?—Yes.

Did you ever see Tidd there?—Yes.

I did not hear you to repeat that name, but I understand you did?

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I have taken him to mention the name of Tidd.

A Juryman.—We did not hear him name him before.

Another Juryman.—I did.

Mr. Gurney.—I will put the question; did you see Tidd come to that room?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Thistlewood, Ings, Tidd, Hall, Davidson, Edwards, Potter, Adams, Strange, Bradburn; do you recollect any others?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—Did you know Tidd well?—I have seen him coming to Brunt's many times.

Was he of the same trade as your master?—Yes.

Did he come to your master about work?—I do not know that he did, but I have seen him at our lodgings.

Have you ever been at his lodgings?—Yes.

Where were they?—In Hole-in-the-wall-passage, Brook's-market.

On any occasion when you passed the door of that room, was it open?—Yes.

Did you see any thing in it?—Yes.

What?—I saw some long poles, like branches of trees, rough as they came from the tree.

About how many in number?—About twenty.

In the course of the time this room was used in this way, did you hear any work going on in it?—Yes.

What kind of work?—I have heard hammering and sawing.

On the Sunday before your master was taken up, was there any meeting in that room?—Yes.

At what time of the day?—In the morning.

Was it a larger or a smaller meeting than usual?—I believe it was a larger one.

Were the persons whom you have named all there?—Yes.

Are you sure, particularly, that Tidd was there?—Yes.

Are you sure Davidson was there?—Yes.

Did they all go away together, or separately?—Separately, one or two at a time.

Was your master in the room with them?—Yes.

After the meeting broke up, did any person come out of the room with your master, into your master's room?—Yes.

Who was that?—Strange.

On the Monday and on the Tuesday, were their meetings held in that room?—Yes.

On the Wednesday, was there any number of persons there?—Yes.

Do you remember any persons being there at about two o'clock?—Yes.

Who were they?—Strange, and a person whom I do not know.

Did Strange and that person come into your workshop?—Yes.

What did they do there?—They were flint-ing pistols.

How many pistols?—Five or six.

Did they finish the flinting of them, or did any thing interrupt them?—There were persons overlooking them.

Who observed that?—I do not know the man.

That stranger observed that?—Yes.

What did Brunt say upon that?—Brunt told them to go into the back-room.

Did they do so?—Yes.

In the course of that afternoon, were there several persons in the back-room?—Yes.

Did any person come out of the back-room, and ask you for any thing?—Yes.

Who did?—Thistlewood.

What did he ask you for?—A piece of writing paper.

Did you give it him?—Yes, I did.

Where did he go with it?—Into the back-room.

After that, did any other person come out of the back-room to you?—Yes.

Who?—Brunt.

What did he desire you to do?—He told me to go and get some cartridge paper.

How much?—Six sheets.

Did you go and buy it?—Yes.

Did you give it to him?—Yes.

Where did he take it to?—Into the back-room.

This was on the Wednesday?—Yes.

At about what time did your master go out?—At about six o'clock.

After this, had your mistress occasion for any thing for the purpose of making tea?—Yes, she wanted a table.

The table was ordinarily in your living room?—Yes.

To what place did she send you to get it?—To the back-room.

Did you knock at the door?—Yes.

Who opened it?—Potter opened it.

Did he give it you?—Yes, he did.

After that, did any other person call?—Yes.

Who called?—Tidd.

Did he come into Mrs. Brunt's room?—Yes.

Did she show him any thing?—Yes.

What?—She showed him a pike-head and a sword, which hung in one of the cupboards.

What did she ask him?—She asked him what she could do with them.

What did he say?—He said, if she would give them to him, he would take them away.

Did he take them?—Yes.

To what place?—To the back-room.

After that, did you hear any persons go down stairs from that room?—Yes.

After those persons were gone, did any body come into your mistress's room and speak to her?—Yes.

What message did he give her?—He said, if any persons called, she was to send them to the White Hart.

That is a public-house close by?—Yes.

Shortly after, did any persons call?—Yes.

How many?—Three.

Did your mistress direct them to the White Hart?—Yes.

Did they know the way?—No.

What was done to show them the way?—I went and shewed them the way.

Upon your return, did you find any other persons?—When I came to the door, I was there two or three minutes, and Potter came up.

Did you direct him to the White Hart also?—Yes.

Were there any persons with him?—Yes.

Did you go to the White Hart to show him the way?—No.

Why did you not?—He appeared to me to know the way.

At about what time did your master come home?—At about nine o'clock.

Were the tail of his great coat, and his boots in the same condition as when he went out?—No.

In what condition were they?—They were very muddy.

Did you hear what he said to his wife when he came in?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said it was all up, or words to that effect.

Did he appear composed or otherwise?—He appeared confused.

What more did he say?—He said he had saved his life, and that was all.

Did he say what had happened to put his life in danger?—Yes; he said where he had been a lot of officers had come in.

Just after he had said that, did any other person come in?—Yes.

Was that person known to you, or a stranger to you?—I do not know who it is.

How did Brunt receive him?—He shook hands with him, and asked him if he knew who had informed.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Try to give us the very words.—He shook hands with him, and said, "Do you know who has informed him."

Mr. Gurney.—Can you remember the first words he used when he came in?—Those were the words to the best of my recollection.

What did the stranger say?—He said, no, he did not.

From the manner of their speaking to each other, did it appear to you that they had been together?—Yes.

What more did the stranger say?—He said he had had a dreadful blow on the side, and was knocked down.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—That you understood to be speaking to the same transaction of which your master had been speaking?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—After that, did your master say any thing?—Yes; he said, "there is something to be done yet."

After saying that, what did he and the stranger do?—They both went away together.

After they were gone, did Mrs. Brunt and you go into the back room?—Yes.

What did you see there?—I saw in some of the cupboards a lot of rolls of brown paper, with tar in them, and four large balls, made of string tarred, as big as my two fists.

What do you now understand them to be?—I have heard since that they are hand-grenades.

Any thing else?—Yes, some flannel bags; two of them were full of something.

The others were empty?—Yes; and some cartridge paper.

Was there any iron pot?—Yes.

To whom did that pot belong?—Brunt.

Did your mistress take the things out, or leave them in the cupboard?—Left them in the cupboard.

At what time did your master come home?—At about eleven o'clock.

Before he went to bed did he give you any instructions for the next morning?—Yes, he told me to get up as soon as I could, and clean his boots.

Did you get up soon in the morning, and clean his boots?—Yes, I did.

After that, did he make any inquiry of you?—Yes.

What was that?—He asked me if I knew the Borough, I told him yes.

Did he ask you whether you knew any place in the Borough?—He asked me if I knew Snow's fields; I told him, no.

Did he then tell you where to go to?—Yes, to go to Kirby-street Snow's fields.

To whose house?—To the house of a man of the name of Potter.

Did he tell you what you were to take?—He said I was to take the things that were in the back room.

Did he and you go together into the back room?—Yes.

What did you take with you?—We took two rush baskets.

What did he direct you to put into those baskets?—The things that were in the cupboard.

Those things you had seen the night before?—Yes.

Did you do so?—Yes.

After that, was any thing done with respect to either of the baskets?—Yes, one of them was tied up in a blue apron belonging to Mrs. Brunt.

What use had been made of that blue apron for some time before?—It had been used as a curtain to the window of the back room.

Was the other basket tied up in any thing?—No.

Did your master go into his own room?—Yes.

What happened at that time?—While we were there looking for something to tie the other basket in, two officers came in.

Did they take your master into custody?—Yes.

They took possession of the two baskets containing those things, and the iron pot?—Yes.

Joseph Hale cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

Do you know a man of the name of Dwyer?—No.

You say you do know Edwards?—Yes.

And Adams?—Yes.

They were frequently there?—Yes.

Were you near enough to hear their voices when they spoke?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—Will you forgive me asking one question? You have mentioned Thistlewood as one of the persons who used to come?—Yes.

By what name did the others use to address him?—Sometimes T. and sometimes Arthur.

Did you hear the other persons call each other by their names?—Yes.

Mr. Curwood.—I dare say you have heard the man called by his Christian name many times, have not you?—Yes.

And sometimes by the first letter of his name?—Yes; and sometimes by his name, Thistlewood.

You say Adams and Edwards were frequently there?—Yes.

More frequently than the other people do you think?—Edwards was there oftener than Adams, but Adams used sometimes to come up.

Thomas Smart sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Are you a watchman?—Yes.

Were you at watch on the night of the 22nd of February last, in Grosvenor-square?—I was.

Did you see any men there who particularly attracted your notice?—I saw four.

What time of night was it?—It was about half-past eight, or a quarter before nine, at the furthest; after I had called half-past eight.

What were they doing?—They were looking through the palisades; they stood at the corner when I went up to them.

Where was that?—It was at Mr. Maberly's house they were at that time; they were looking about, and I went up to see what they wanted.

Did you say any thing to them?—They asked me what o'clock it was, and I told them it was near nine.

Did you observe any thing about the appearance of any of them?—I thought they were very suspicious characters; one of them had a stick.

Was one of them a dark man?—Yes; a man of colour.

Do you know whether Bissix was a watchman there?—Yes, I called Bissix to make observation, telling him I saw some suspicious characters.

Who were they?—Strange, and a person whom I do not know.

Did Strange and that person come into your workshop?—Yes.

What did they do there?—They were flinting pistols.

How many pistols?—Five or six.

Did they finish the flinting of them, or did any thing interrupt them?—There were persons overlooking them.

Who observed that?—I do not know the man.

That stranger observed that?—Yes.

What did Brunt say upon that?—Brunt told them to go into the back-room.

Did they do so?—Yes.

In the course of that afternoon, were there several persons in the back-room?—Yes.

Did any person come out of the back-room, and ask you for any thing?—Yes.

Who did?—Thistlewood.

What did he ask you for?—A piece of writing paper.

Did you give it him?—Yes, I did.

Where did he go with it?—Into the back-room.

After that, did any other person come out of the back-room to you?—Yes.

Who?—Brunt.

What did he desire you to do?—He told me to go and get some cartridge paper.

How much?—Six sheets.

Did you go and buy it?—Yes.

Did you give it to him?—Yes.

Where did he take it to?—Into the back-room.

This was on the Wednesday?—Yes.

At about what time did your master go out?—At about six o'clock.

After this, had your mistress occasion for any thing for the purpose of making tea?—Yes, she wanted a table.

The table was ordinarily in your living room?—Yes.

To what place did she send you to get it?—To the back-room.

Did you knock at the door?—Yes.

Who opened it?—Potter opened it.

Did he give it you?—Yes, he did.

After that, did any other person call?—Yes.

Who called?—Tidd.

Did he come into Mrs. Brunt's room?—Yes.

Did she show him any thing?—Yes.

What?—She showed him a pike-head and a sword, which hung in one of the cupboards.

What did she ask him?—She asked him what she could do with them.

What did he say?—He said, if she would give them to him, he would take them away.

Did he take them?—Yes.

To what place?—To the back-room.

After that, did you hear any persons go down stairs from that room?—Yes.

After those persons were gone, did any body come into your mistress's room and speak to her?—Yes.

What message did he give her?—He said, if any persons called, she was to send them to the White Hart.

That is a public-house close by?—Yes.

Shortly after, did any persons call?—Yes.

How many?—Three.

Did your mistress direct them to the White Hart?—Yes.

Did they know the way?—No.

What was done to show them the way?—I went and shewed them the way.

Upon your return, did you find any other persons?—When I came to the door, I was there two or three minutes, and Potter came up.

Did you direct him to the White Hart also?—Yes.

Were there any persons with him?—Yes.

Did you go to the White Hart to shew him the way?—No.

Why did you not?—He appeared to me to know the way.

At about what time did your master come home?—At about nine o'clock.

Were the tail of his great coat, and his boots in the same condition as when he went out?—No.

In what condition were they?—They were very muddy.

Did you hear what he said to his wife when he came in?—Yes.

What did he say?—He said it was all up, or words to that effect.

Did he appear composed or otherwise?—He appeared confused.

What more did he say?—He said he had saved his life, and that was all.

Did he say what had happened to put his life in danger?—Yes; he said where he had been a lot of officers had come in.

Just after he had said that, did any other person come in?—Yes.

Was that person known to you, or a stranger to you?—I do not know who it is.

How did Brunt receive him?—He shook hands with him, and asked him if he knew who had informed.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Try to give us the very words.—He shook hands with him, and said, "Do you know who has informed him."

Mr. Gurney.—Can you remember the first words he used when he came in?—Those were the words to the best of my recollection.

What did the stranger say?—He said, no, he did not.

From the manner of their speaking to each other, did it appear to you that they had been together?—Yes.

What more did the stranger say?—He said he had had a dreadful blow on the side, and was knocked down.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—That you understood to be speaking to the same transaction of which your master had been speaking?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—After that, did your master say any thing?—Yes; he said, "there is something to be done yet."

After saying that, what did he and the stranger do?—They both went away together.

After they were gone, did Mrs. Brunt and you go into the back room?—Yes.

What did you see there?—I saw in some of the cupboards a lot of rolls of brown paper, with tar in them, and four large balls, made of string tarred, as big as my two fists.

What do you now understand them to be?—I have heard since that they are hand-grenades.

Any thing else?—Yes, some flannel bags; two of them were full of something.

The others were empty?—Yes; and some cartridge paper.

Was there any iron pot?—Yes.

To whom did that pot belong?—Brunt.

Did your mistress take the things out, or leave them in the cupboard?—Left them in the cupboard.

At what time did your master come home?—At about eleven o'clock.

Before he went to bed did he give you any instructions for the next morning?—Yes, he told me to get up as soon as I could, and clean his boots.

Did you get up soon in the morning, and clean his boots?—Yes, I did.

After that, did he make any inquiry of you?—Yes.

What was that?—He asked me if I knew the Borough, I told him yes.

Did he ask you whether you knew any place in the Borough?—He asked me if I knew Snow's fields; I told him, no.

Did he then tell you where to go to?—Yes, to go to Kirby-street Snow's fields.

To whose house?—To the house of a man of the name of Potter.

Did he tell you what you were to take?—He said I was to take the things that were in the back room.

Did he and you go together into the back room?—Yes.

What did you take with you?—We took two rush baskets.

What did he direct you to put into those baskets?—The things that were in the cupboard.

Those things you had seen the night before?—Yes.

Did you do so?—Yes.

After that, was any thing done with respect to either of the baskets?—Yes, one of them was tied up in a blue apron belonging to Mrs. Brunt.

What use had been made of that blue apron for some time before?—It had been used as a curtain to the window of the back room.

Was the other basket tied up in any thing?—No.

Did your master go into his own room?—Yes.

What happened at that time?—While we were there looking for something to tie the other basket in, two officers came in.

Did they take your master into custody?—Yes.

They took possession of the two baskets containing those things, and the iron pot?—Yes.

Joseph Hale cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

Do you know a man of the name of Dwyer?—No.

You say you do know Edwards?—Yes.

And Adams?—Yes.

They were frequently there?—Yes.

Were you near enough to hear their voices when they spoke?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—Will you forgive me asking one question? You have mentioned Thistlewood as one of the persons who used to come?—Yes.

By what name did the others use to address him?—Sometimes T. and sometimes Arthur.

Did you hear the other persons call each other by their names?—Yes.

Mr. Curwood.—I dare say you have heard the man called by his Christian name many times, have not you?—Yes.

And sometimes by the first letter of his name?—Yes; and sometimes by his name, Thistlewood.

You say Adams and Edwards were frequently there?—Yes.

More frequently than the other people do you think?—Edwards was there oftener than Adams, but Adams used sometimes to come up.

Thomas Smart sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Are you a watchman?—Yes.

Were you at watch on the night of the 22nd of February last, in Grosvenor-square?—I was.

Did you see any men there who particularly attracted your notice?—I saw four.

What time of night was it?—It was about half-past eight, or a quarter before nine, at the furthest; after I had called half-past eight.

What were they doing?—They were looking through the palisades; they stood at the corner when I went up to them.

Where was that?—It was at Mr. Maberly's house they were at that time; they were looking about, and I went up to see what they wanted.

Did you say any thing to them?—They asked me what o'clock it was, and I told them it was near nine.

Did you observe any thing about the appearance of any of them?—I thought they were very suspicious characters; one of them had a stick.

Was one of them a dark man?—Yes; a man of colour.

Do you know whether Bissix was a watchman there?—Yes, I called Bissix to make observation, telling him I saw some suspicious characters.

Charles Bissix sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Are you a watchman?—Yes.

Were you in Grosvenor square on your duty on the night of the 22nd of February?—I was.

Was Smart there at the same time?—Yes, he was.

Did you see any men in the square who attracted your notice?—Yes.

How many?—Two.

What were they doing?—They passed us and asked what time it was; we told them it was near nine o'clock, and they passed along and took particular notice of some of the houses in the square, particularly Mr. Maberly's and lord Harrowby's; and one of them, the man of colour, had a stick in his hand, rather larger than is carried by persons in general.

They appeared to be looking particularly at the houses?—Yes, they were watching the houses.

Henry Gillan sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You live at No. 15, Mount-street, Berkeley-square?—Yes.

Do you ever frequent the Rising Sun public-house?—I go there sometimes.

Did you happen to be there on the 22nd of February last?—Yes.

How is the house situate?—The corner of Adams-mews and Charles-street.

What time of the day or evening were you there?—Between nine and ten o'clock.

While you were there, did either of the prisoners at the bar come in?—No, neither of those; Adams and Brunt were the men that came in.

Had they any refreshment?—Yes; some bread and cheese, and some porter.

Did you play at any game with either of them?—I played two games at dominos with them.

With which of them?—With Brunt.

At what time did you leave the house?—At near ten o'clock.

Did you leave Adams and Brunt there?—Yes.

John Hector Morison sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

Are you journeyman to Mr. Henry Thomas Underwood, of No. 74, Drury-lane?—Yes.

He is a cutler?—Yes.

Do you know a man of the name of Ings?—Not before he brought a sword.

You now know that man who has been tried here?—Yes.

Did Ings bring you any thing in the way of trade to do?—He brought me a sword to grind, on Christmas Eve.

Did he give you any directions respecting it?—To be ground sharp, from the heel to the point, and likewise the back to be ground.

Was that done for him?—Yes.

Who fetched away the sword?—He did himself.

Did he afterwards employ you to do any thing?—Yes; a fortnight afterwards he brought me another to be ground as the first was.

Was that done also, and delivered to him?—Yes.

Edward Simpson sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You are corporal major of the second regiment of life-guards?—Yes.

Do you know the prisoner Harrison?—Yes, perfectly well.

Was he ever in your regiment, and how long?—He was; I cannot state the exact time; but he was in, to my knowledge, for five years and upwards.

Did his regimental duty make him acquainted with the King-street barracks?—Yes.

Were there any windows in those barracks looking into Grosvenor-mews?—No, Gloucester-mews; five windows looking out of the loft.

I believe they are stopped up?—Yes, they are.

How long have they been stopped up?—They were stopped up some two or three days after the affair in Cato-street.

What did the lofts contain?—Hay and straw chiefly.

Was it possible for a person, by throwing any thing in at either of those windows, to produce a fire?—At one window particularly, opposite where the straw was lodged.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—What quantity of straw do you think was in that situation at that time?—Two or three loads, I suppose, at the least.

In a situation which might have been reached by a fire-ball going in at the window?—Yes, most undoubtedly; perhaps it was not situated above four feet from the window.

James Aldous sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

You are a pawnbroker, I believe?—I am.

Do you know the prisoner Davidson?—I do.

How long have you known him?—Two or three years.

Did he, at any time, pawn with you a blunderbuss, and of what description?—A brass-barrelled blunderbuss.

Did he take it out of pawn; and if so, when?—On the 23rd of February, that morning.

Have you seen that instrument since?—Yes, I have.

In the custody of the officers of Bow-street?—Of Mr. Ruthven.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is that the same that was pointed out to you here?—It was shown to me, but not in this court.

But you have seen it in the possession of Ruthven?—I have.

John Monument sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.

You are at present in custody at the Tower?
—Yes.

You are brought here in custody?—Yes.

What are you by trade?—A shoemaker.

Where do you live?—At No. 8, Garden-court, Baldwin's-gardens.

Is that near Brook's-market?—Yes.

Do you know a person of the name of Ford?
—Yes.

Do you remember seeing Thistlewood at any time at Ford's?—Yes.

As nearly as you can recollect, how long ago is that?—Nearly three months before I was taken up.

Nearly three months before the 23rd of February?—Yes.

In consequence of seeing Thistlewood at Ford's did Thistlewood afterwards call upon you?—Yes.

How long was it after you had seen him at Ford's, that he called upon you?—I believe about a fortnight, or three weeks.

At the time when he called upon you, did he call alone, or was any person in company with him?—Brunt was with him.

Was any person in the room with you, when he called?—Yes, my brother and my mother.

After he had been in the room some short time, did he say any thing to you?—Yes; he said he wished to speak to me.

Did you, in consequence of that intimation, go out of the room with him?—Yes.

Leaving your brother and Brunt in the room?—Yes.

What is your brother's name?—Thomas Monument.

What did Thistlewood say to you, when he got out of the room?—He said, great events were at hand, the people were everywhere anxious for a change, that he had been promised support by a great many who had deceived him, but that now he had got men who would stand by him; he asked me whether I had any arms; I said, "No;" he said, "every man should have arms;" he said, all that belonged to them had arms, or "all of us have arms," to that effect; he said "some have got a sabre, some have got a pistol, and some have got a pike, every one have got something;" he said, I might buy a pistol for about four or five shillings; I told him I had got no money to buy pistols; he said well, he would see what he could do.

After you had had that conversation, do you remember any thing more that passed at that time?—He said, the man he brought with him was a person in the same line, and that he lived in a court in Gray's-inn-lane.

That he was in the same line of what?—In the same line of business.

Brunt was a boot-closer, I believe?—Yes, he was.

Did you, after this conversation, return into the room, where your brother and Brunt were?
—Yes.

Did Thistlewood and Brunt shortly after go away?—Yes, I lighted them down stairs; and in the passage, Brunt told me his name, and that he lived at No. 4, in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane.

Do you recollect, on Tuesday the 22nd of February, Brunt calling upon you?—Yes.

Was your brother then present?—Yes.

Did Brunt call alone, or was he in company with any person?—In company with Tidd.

Tidd the prisoner?—Yes.

What did you say to him, on his coming into the room?—I said to Brunt, "I thought I had lost you;" he said, the king's death had made an alteration in their plans.

What did you say to that?—I asked him what plans; he said there was to be a meeting the following evening, up at Tyburn-turnpike, where I should hear all about it.

Upon his saying that, what further passed?—He then looked to Tidd, and asked him, whether he should give me the name.

What did Tidd say?—Tidd said, Yes, he supposed there was no danger; upon which Brunt said, when I got there, if I saw any people about, I was to say b, u, t, and if they were friends they would answer t, o, n; he said he should be at our house the following morning, to tell me all about it, and at what time it was to take place.

Was that all that took place at that meeting, as far as you remember?—Yes.

Upon that, did Tidd and Brunt go away together, leaving your brother in the room?—Yes.

The next day did he call?—Yes.

Was he alone or in company with any person?—Alone.

At what time did he call?—About half-past four in the afternoon.

What did he say?—He called me down stairs.

Was your brother with you?—Yes; he said he wanted me to go in half an hour; I told him I could not, for that I had some work to finish, which must be done before I could go; he asked me what time it would be done; I said, about six o'clock; he said, he could not wait so long as that, but that I must go with the man that he brought with him the day before.

Did he tell you the name of that man?—Yes; that his name was Tidd, and that he lived at Hole-in-the-wall-passage, Brook's-market.

Did you promise to go?—I do not know that I said positively that I should go.

But you gave him reason to suppose you should?—Yes.

Did you go that evening to Tidd's lodging in Brook's-market?—Yes, at about half-past six.

Did you find Tidd at home?—Yes.

What did he say on your entering the room?—He said he was waiting for some more men that were to go with him; and that if there were no one else came before seven o'clock, he would not wait any longer.

Did any person arrive before seven o'clock?—No.

What did he do?—I asked him where it was we were going to; he said, at a mews in Edgware-road; he went to a box at a corner of the room, and took out a pistol, which he put into a belt which was round his body.

What else did he take?—About six or eight pike-heads wrapped up in brown paper.

Did you look at those pike-heads particularly?—No, I did not examine them.

You did not see whether they were bayonets or files?—They appeared to be three square like bayonets; then he took a staff of about four feet long, with a hole at the end, as if to put a pike in.

After he had thus provided himself, did you go out together?—Yes.

You went down into Holborn, and from thence into Oxford-street?—Yes.

While you were going along, what passed between you?—I asked him what we were going about; and he said, I should know when we got there; I then asked him, whether we were going to the House of Commons; he said, no; there were too many soldiers near there; I asked him again where we were going to, he said to Grosvenor-square; I asked him, whether any one in particular lived there; and he said there was to be a cabinet dinner there that evening.

Upon his saying that, did you understand what was intended?—Yes; I did not ask him any more.

Did you go on with him towards Edgware-road?—Yes.

Did you come to an archway that leads into a narrow street?—Yes.

When you got under that archway, did you find any persons there?—Yes, two men.

Did any conversation pass?—Tidd was before me; he spoke to them, I believe a few words, and then we entered into a stable.

Did you find any persons there?—Yes, three or four men.

At the further extremity of that stable there was a ladder?—Yes.

Did you go up that ladder?—Yes, I went up after Tidd.

Did you find any persons in the loft above?—Yes; about three or four-and-twenty persons.

Did you see any thing like a carpenter's bench?—Yes.

With what was that covered?—Swords and pistols.

Was Thistlewood among the persons whom you found there?—Yes.

Can you tell us what passed in the room after you got there?—There was a man in a brown great coat sitting on the other side of the carpenter's bench, who spoke of the impropriety of going to lord Harrowby's with so small a number as five-and-twenty men.

Had the number been mentioned before?—Yes; some person was going to count them, and Thistlewood said there was no occasion, there were five-and-twenty.

Look at the prisoner Davidson; did you see him there that evening?—Yes.

Did he come into the loft after you, or did you find him there?—I do not think he was in when I first went in, but he came in afterwards.

Had you ever seen him before?—At one or two meetings in Smithfield.

So that you knew his person?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—What do you mean by meetings in Smithfield?—Public meetings.

Are you sure of his person?—Yes.

Had he taken any prominent part in those meetings, so as to give you an opportunity of observing his person?—No, I never heard him speak.

But you have no doubt of his person?—No.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Did you the following day, or soon afterwards, see him at Whitehall?—I saw him not the following day, for we were put in separate rooms; but the day we were taken to the Tower, and the day before that, we were all put into a room together.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You say that this person remarked on the impropriety of going to lord Harrowby's with so small a number; did he mention lord Harrowby's name?—Yes, I think he did.

Mr. Solicitor General.—Repeat what passed?—On his saying this, Thistlewood said he only wanted fourteen men to go into the room; and, supposing lord Harrowby had sixteen men servants, that number would be quite sufficient: upon which the man in the brown coat said, "when we come out of the room, of course there will be a crowd round the door—how are we to get away?" Thistlewood said, "you know the largest party are already gone;" upon which Davidson told the man in the brown great coat not to throw cold water upon their proceedings.

Was the Davidson you speak of the prisoner at the bar?—Yes; for if he was afraid of his life, he might go, they would do without him; and Brunt said, that sooner than they should go from the business they were going to do, he would go into the room by himself, and blow it all up, if he perished with them; and he said, "you know we have got that that can do it."

After this conversation had taken place, were any parties separated from the rest to go into the room?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did the man in the great coat make any answer to that?—Yes; he said as they all seemed for it, though he did not like going with so small a number, he would not be against it; and he proposed that they should all put themselves under the orders of Thistlewood; upon which Thistlewood said, that every one engaged in that business would have the same honour as himself.

Mr. Solicitor General.—After that conversation had taken place, were the persons who were to go into the room separated from the others?—Yes; Thistlewood then proposed that the fourteen men to go into the room should volunteer from the persons then assembled, and that those who so volunteered should place themselves at one side of the room.

Upon that proposition being made, did any of them separate themselves for that purpose?—Yes, about twelve or thirteen.

Can you tell us the names of any of them; you do not know the names of many of the party?—No.

State any within your knowledge?—Tidd, Brunt, Davidson and Wilson; that is all that I recollect.

While this was going on, did any alarm take place below?—I did not hear any; Thistlewood went down stairs and came up again, and said, he had just received intelligence that the duke of Wellington and lord Sidmouth, had just arrived at lord Harrowby's.

Shortly after that, did any alarm take place below?—I did not hear any alarm till I perceived the men at the top of the stairs; they said they were officers, and bade them surrender.

I will not ask as to what passed, because we will have that from other persons; you were taken into custody yourself?—Yes.

Smithers was killed?—I did not know it was him till afterwards; there was a man killed.

You were examined at Whitehall?—Yes.

On one of those occasions, were you handcuffed to Thistlewood?—Yes, both the last times I went.

State what Thistlewood said to you?—He said, if I was asked who led me into that business and took me to the meetings, that I was to say it was a man of the name of Edwards.

What did you answer to that?—I said, "How can I tell that falsehood, when you know I never saw the man;" he said that was of no consequence; if I was asked what sort of a man he was, I was to say that he was not much [taller than myself, of a sallow complexion, and dressed in a brown great coat.

John Monument cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

You had joined in this plan to assassinate his majesty's ministers?—Unwillingly.

You did join it?—Through fear.

How through fear?—I was afraid if I did not join it, it would be the worse for me; for when Brunt came on the 22nd of February, he said, that any one that was any ways concerned with them, and did not go, would be destroyed.

Therefore you having been concerned with them—No more than what I have stated.

Had you been concerned with them before?—No.

Have you told us all that you know to-day?—Yes; all I can recollect.

You do not know any thing of any other schemes or plans?—No.

You know nothing about a proclamation?—No.

You know nothing of a plan to raise rebellion, and levy war?—No.

All you know is about a plan to assassinate his majesty's ministers?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is not that examination into the legal consequences?

Mr. Solicitor General.—I understand you to say, you have told us all you know?—Yes.

Mr. Curwood.—I will ask one question more if you please: did not Tidd, when you were in the loft, tell you he had been deceived, and persuade you to go away with him and leave the party?—No, he did not; I wish for his own sake as well as mine, that he had.

Thomas Monument sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are brother to the last witness?—Yes.

Are you a shoemaker?—Yes, I am.

Do you live with your brother?—Yes.

Do you remember Thistlewood calling upon your brother at his lodgings?—Yes.

Did Thistlewood call alone?—No, he was accompanied by Brunt.

Do you remember Thistlewood going out to have some conversation with your brother?—Yes, he asked my brother if he could speak with him.

Upon Thistlewood asking your brother if he could speak with him, did they go out of the room together?—Yes.

Did they remain absent for a short time?—Yes, three or four minutes.

Did Thistlewood and Brunt go away together?—Yes.

Do you remember, on Tuesday the 22nd of February, Brunt calling upon your brother?—Yes.

Alone, or in company with any person?—In company with Tidd the prisoner.

What passed when they came in?—My brother said, "I thought I had lost you."

What did Brunt say in answer to that?—Something was said concerning the king's death; it was said, that had made an alteration in their plans.

What did your brother answer to that?—My brother asked him what plans; he said they had different objects in view.

What then took place?—Brunt asked Tidd if they should give us an outline of the plan, but I do not know whether Tidd made any answer; I did not hear any answer. Brunt said we were to meet the following evening at six o'clock, at Tyburn-turnpike, and he then gave us the pass-word.

What was it?—That we were to use the letters b, u, t, and if any of their party were there they would answer t, o, n, and then we should know them.

Did any thing more pass?—No.

Did Brunt say any thing about calling the next day?—No, he did not, but he came the next afternoon, between four and five o'clock; my brother could not go with him, for he had work to finish; then Brunt said, you must call on Tidd in Hole-in-the-wall passage, and he will take you.

Did your brother go, and if so at what hour?—I believe it was near seven o'clock; I did not see him afterwards.

You did not go yourself?—No, I did not.

Thomas Hiden sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Have you carried on the business of a cow-keeper and dairyman in Manchester-mews?—I have.

You have now the misfortune, I believe, to be in prison for debt?—I have.

How long have you been so?—I have been in a week ago last Saturday morning.

Do you know the prisoner, Wilson?—Yes, I do, perfectly well.

A few days before the 22nd of February, did he make any proposition to you?—He did.

What proposition did he make to you?—He met me, and asked me if I would make one of a party.

For what?—To destroy all his majesty's ministers.

Where?—At a cabinet dinner; that they were waiting for a cabinet dinner.

Did he say whether they had provided any thing for the purpose?—He said they had got every thing ready, and were waiting for a cabinet dinner.

Did he describe what sort of things they had ready?—He told me they had got such sort of things as I never saw; that they were covered with tarpaulin, and bound round with cords, filled full of nails and other things, and that they had got some made of tin, which were very strong indeed.

Did he say what those things would do?—He said, the strength of them is such, that if they were set fire to, and put under the walls of the houses in the street where we were walking, they would lift them up.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did he state how they were to be used?—That they were to be lighted with a fuse, and put into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner; and all that escaped the explosion, were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon.

Did he mention any thing to be done with any persons' houses?—He told me after that, that they were going to light up lights to set fire to some houses.

Whose houses did he mention?—He said, they were to burn down lord Harrowby's, lord Castlereagh's, the duke of Wellington's, and lord Sidmouth's and the bishop of London's, and one other that I do not recollect, and by that means it would keep the town in a state of confusion for a few days, and it would become general.

What answer did you give him to this proposition?—I asked him how many there were to be; he said, I had no occasion to be alarmed, there was a gentleman's servant who had given them money, and if they would act upon the subject, he would give them a considerable sum more.

Did you tell him you would be one?—I did; I told him I would be one; I had a reason in so doing.

After you had told him that, did you write any letter to lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Did you go to lord Castlereagh's house?—I did.

Did you get access to his lordship?—I did not; I went two or three times.

After that, to whom did you get access?—I saw lord Harrowby.

Did you follow him?—I did, to the park; and there I spoke to him.

Did you give him the letter you wrote to lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Is that the letter [showing a letter to the witness] which you gave to lord Harrowby?—It is the very letter.

Did you the next day see his lordship again in Hyde-park?—Yes, I did, by appointment.

On the next day, Wednesday, did you see Wilson again?—I again saw him on the 23rd.

That was the day of the Cato-street business?—Yes.

At what time of the day?—I believe between four and five o'clock in the afternoon.

What did he then say to you?—He met me as I was walking up Manchester-street with one of my little girls; he said, "Hiden, you are the very man I want to see;" I said, "what is there going to be;" he said, "there is to be a cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor square." I asked him where I was to meet them; he said, I was to come up to the Horse and Groom, in John-street, the corner of Cato-street, and there I was to go into the public-house, or to stop at the corner till I was shoved into a stable close by. I was to meet them at a quarter before six, or six o'clock. I asked him, if that was all that was going to be; he told me that there were to be four parties, one in Cato-street, another in Gray's-inn-lane, one in the City, or in Gee's-court, I am not certain which.

Where was the fourth to be?—There was to be one in the Borough.

Did he say any thing more about Gee's-court?—He said, I had no occasion to be alarmed, for all Gee's-court was in it.

By whom is Gee's-court inhabited?—I believe it to be generally inhabited mostly by Irishmen.

Did he say any thing more about Irishmen?—He told me that the Irishmen were all in it, but they would not act till the Englishmen began first, as the English had so many times deceived them.

Did he say any thing about yourself?—He told me that there were two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, that were easily got at by breaking in a small door.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did he say what particular business was to be done by your party?—He told me, that our particular party was to go to lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square; and that they there were to do the grand thing, to destroy all his majesty's ministers.

Mr. Gurney.—You say, that he told you there were some cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, that could be got by knocking in a small door?—Yes; and that there were four more pieces of cannon in an Artillery-ground somewhere, but I do not know where; and that they could easily be got, by killing a sentinel.

Did he say where they were to go, after they had done that which they intended in Grosvenor-square?—He said, after the grand thing was done, all parties were to meet somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house.

Did he say any thing more to you?—He told me I was to be sure to come, or the grand thing would be over before I came.

Did you go to John-street that evening?—I did.

At what time?—Between six and seven o'clock; but I believe it to be near seven when I got there.

When you got there, whom did you see?—When I came into John-street, by the corner of the post by Cato-street, I saw Mr. Wilson and Mr. Davidson.

By Davidson, do you mean the man at the bar?—Yes, I do; the coloured man.

Had you known Davidson before?—Yes, a long while before.

What did either of them say when you came?—Mr. Davidson said, "you are come;" I said, I was come, but I am behind my time; he asked me then if I was going in; he said, Mr. Thistlewood was there; I told him I could not go in, as I had some cream to get, and must go and get it, if possible.

You left them, and did not go again?—I left them, and did not go again.

Did you ask him what time they should go away?—Yes; and he told me they should go about eight o'clock, and if they were gone, I was to follow them down to Grosvenor-square; the fourth house from the corner, on the lower side.

Do you remember Davidson saying any thing to you?—Yes; the last words he said to me were, "come you dog; come, it will be the best thing you were ever in in your life."

Mr. Gurney.—We do not offer the letter in evidence, my lord not conceiving it to be competent to us to offer it; if my learned friends call for it, it is at their service.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You understand by law, gentlemen, the prosecutor cannot read that letter, because it is a communication with which none of the prisoners charged, had any thing to do; I mention that, because you might wonder that it is not read.

A Jurymen (Mr. Young).—It struck me quite forcibly, my lord.

VOL. XXXIII.

Thomas Hiden cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

His last words were, "come, you dog, come, it will be the best thing you were ever in in your life?"—Yes, they were.

And you expected a great deal of plunder, I dare say?—No, I did not expect any thing of the kind, for I never intended to go.

How long had you known Wilson?—I had known him a good while.

Had you often seen him?—I had seen him at Mr. Clark's the tailor.

You mean to represent yourself as an honest man?—I do, in that respect.

Did not you think it a very odd address to you, an honest man, that a man should come up to you, without any introduction, "we are in a plot to assassinate his majesty's ministers, will you join us?"—No, I did not think it at all surprising, for I had seen Mr. Davidson, the black, before that, at my friend Clark's, and he said to me, as he went out, "Hiden, you do not come forward like the rest of us, to support the meetings." I said, no, I could not; and I had been denied to him by my family, because I did not wish to see him.

There is a great deal in that; but I do not understand it?

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I must take it down as he has stated it; it will perhaps be found to bear upon this; state it slowly?—

Witness.—While I was at Mr. Clark's, the prisoner at the bar, Davidson, came in, and he said as he went out, "Hiden, you do not come forward as the rest of us do, to support the meetings;" I told him I did not, my business would not let me; he told me, that the people that had come forward, and promised to support the cause, them that did not come forward would be the first that they should murder; by so doing, when Wilson met me, having seen him there at the same place, I told him I would come, for my own safety, to the meeting, because Davidson told me that the men that did not come forward, would be the men that they should first murder.

Mr. Curwood.—You kept away from them as much as you could?—Yes; I never went among them, but at a shoemakers' club twice.

Then, of course, you did not know what their objects were?—No, I did not, except what Wilson told me.

Except what Wilson told you on this day?—On the days I have mentioned.

Wilson told you they had a plot to murder his majesty's ministers?—That they were going to murder his majesty's ministers.

That was all he told you?—He told me they had got hand-grenades, and things of that kind.

But he did not tell you of any other plots they had in hand?—He did not tell me, unless it was the cannon, and what I have stated.

It was part of the plan to murder his majesty's

4 U

Did Brunt say any thing about calling the next day?—No, he did not, but he came the next afternoon, between four and five o'clock; my brother could not go with him, for he had work to finish; then Brunt said, you must call on Tidd in Hole-in-the-wall passage, and he will take you.

Did your brother go, and if so at what hour?—I believe it was near seven o'clock; I did not see him afterwards.

You did not go yourself?—No, I did not.

Thomas Hiden sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Have you carried on the business of a cow-keeper and dairyman in Manchester-mews?—I have.

You have now the misfortune, I believe, to be in prison for debt?—I have.

How long have you been so?—I have been in a week ago last Saturday morning.

Do you know the prisoner, Wilson?—Yes, I do, perfectly well.

A few days before the 22nd of February, did he make any proposition to you?—He did.

What proposition did he make to you?—He met me, and asked me if I would make one of a party.

For what?—To destroy all his majesty's ministers.

Where?—At a cabinet dinner; that they were waiting for a cabinet dinner.

Did he say whether they had provided any thing for the purpose?—He said they had got every thing ready, and were waiting for a cabinet dinner.

Did he describe what sort of things they had ready?—He told me they had got such sort of things as I never saw; that they were covered with tarpaulin, and bound round with cords, filled full of nails and other things, and that they had got some made of tin, which were very strong indeed.

Did he say what those things would do?—He said, the strength of them is such, that if they were set fire to, and put under the walls of the houses in the street where we were walking, they would lift them up.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did he state how they were to be used?—That they were to be lighted with a fuse, and put into the room where the gentlemen were at dinner; and all that escaped the explosion, were to die by the edge of the sword, or some other weapon.

Did he mention any thing to be done with any persons' houses?—He told me after that, that they were going to light up lights to set fire to some houses.

Whose houses did he mention?—He said, they were to burn down lord Harrowby's, lord Castlereagh's, the duke of Wellington's, and lord Sidmouth's and the bishop of London's, and one other that I do not recollect, and by that means it would keep the town in a state of confusion for a few days, and it would become general.

What answer did you give him to this proposition?—I asked him how many there were to be; he said, I had no occasion to be alarmed, there was a gentleman's servant who had given them money, and if they would act upon the subject, he would give them a considerable sum more.

Did you tell him you would be one?—I did; I told him I would be one; I had a reason in so doing.

After you had told him that, did you write any letter to lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Did you go to lord Castlereagh's house?—I did.

Did you get access to his lordship?—I did not; I went two or three times.

After that, to whom did you get access?—I saw lord Harrowby.

Did you follow him?—I did, to the park; and there I spoke to him.

Did you give him the letter you wrote to lord Castlereagh?—I did.

Is that the letter [showing a letter to the witness] which you gave to lord Harrowby?—It is the very letter.

Did you the next day see his lordship again in Hyde-park?—Yes, I did, by appointment.

On the next day, Wednesday, did you see Wilson again?—I again saw him on the 23rd.

That was the day of the Cato-street business?—Yes.

At what time of the day?—I believe between four and five o'clock in the afternoon.

What did he then say to you?—He met me as I was walking up Manchester-street with one of my little girls; he said, "Hiden, you are the very man I want to see;" I said, "what is there going to be;" he said, "there is to be a cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor square." I asked him where I was to meet them; he said, I was to come up to the Horse and Groom, in John-street, the corner of Cato-street, and there I was to go into the public-house, or to stop at the corner till I was shoved into a stable close by. I was to meet them at a quarter before six, or six o'clock. I asked him, if that was all that was going to be; he told me that there were to be four parties, one in Cato-street, another in Gray's-inn-lane, one in the City, or in Gee's-court, I am not certain which.

Where was the fourth to be?—There was to be one in the Borough.

Did he say any thing more about Gee's-court?—He said, I had no occasion to be alarmed, for all Gee's-court was in it.

By whom is Gee's-court inhabited?—I believe it to be generally inhabited mostly by Irishmen.

Did he say any thing more about Irishmen?—He told me that the Irishmen were all in it, but they would not act till the Englishmen began first, as the English had so many times deceived them.

Did he say any thing about yourself?—He told me that there were two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, that were easily got at by breaking in a small door.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did he say what particular business was to be done by your party?—He told me, that our particular party was to go to lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square; and that they there were to do the grand thing, to destroy all his majesty's ministers.

Mr. Gurney.—You say, that he told you there were some cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, that could be got by knocking in a small door?—Yes; and that there were four more pieces of cannon in an Artillery-ground somewhere, but I do not know where; and that they could easily be got, by killing a sentinel.

Did he say where they were to go, after they had done that which they intended in Grosvenor-square?—He said, after the grand thing was done, all parties were to meet somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house.

Did he say any thing more to you?—He told me I was to be sure to come, or the grand thing would be over before I came.

Did you go to John-street that evening?—I did.

At what time?—Between six and seven o'clock; but I believe it to be near seven when I got there.

When you got there, whom did you see?—When I came into John-street, by the corner of the post by Cato-street, I saw Mr. Wilson and Mr. Davidson.

By Davidson, do you mean the man at the bar?—Yes, I do; the coloured man.

Had you known Davidson before?—Yes, a long while before.

What did either of them say when you came?—Mr. Davidson said, "you are come;" I said, I was come, but I am behind my time; he asked me then if I was going in; he said, Mr. Thistlewood was there; I told him I could not go in, as I had some cream to get, and must go and get it, if possible.

You left them, and did not go again?—I left them, and did not go again.

Did you ask him what time they should go away?—Yes; and he told me they should go about eight o'clock, and if they were gone, I was to follow them down to Grosvenor-square, the fourth house from the corner, on the lower side.

Do you remember Davidson saying any thing to you?—Yes; the last words he said to me were, "come you dog, come, it will be the best thing you were ever in in your life."

Mr. Gurney.—We do not offer the letter in evidence, my lord not conceiving it to be competent to us to offer it; if my learned friends call for it, it is at their service.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You understand by law, gentlemen, the prosecutor cannot read that letter, because it is a communication with which none of the prisoners charged, had any thing to do; I mention that, because you might wonder that it is not read.

A Jurymen (Mr. Young).—It struck me quite forcibly, my lord.

VOL. XXXIII.

Thomas Hiden cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.

His last words were, "come, you dog, come, it will be the best thing you were ever in in your life?"—Yes, they were.

And you expected a great deal of plunder, I dare say?—No, I did not expect any thing of the kind, for I never intended to go.

How long had you known Wilson?—I had known him a good while.

Had you often seen him?—I had seen him at Mr. Clark's the tailor.

You mean to represent yourself as an honest man?—I do, in that respect.

Did not you think it a very odd address to you, an honest man, that a man should come up to you, without any introduction, "we are in a plot to assassinate his majesty's ministers, will you join us?"—No, I did not think it at all surprising, for I had seen Mr. Davidson, the black, before that, at my friend Clark's, and he said to me, as he went out, "Hiden, you do not come forward like the rest of us, to support the meetings." I said, no, I could not; and I had been denied to him by my family, because I did not wish to see him.

There is a great deal in that; but I do not understand it?

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I must take it down as he has stated it; it will perhaps be found to bear upon this; state it slowly?—

Witness.—While I was at Mr. Clark's, the prisoner at the bar, Davidson, came in, and he said as he went out, "Hiden, you do not come forward as the rest of us do, to support the meetings;" I told him I did not, my business would not let me; he told me, that the people that had come forward, and promised to support the cause, them that did not come forward would be the first that they should murder; by so doing, when Wilson met me, having seen him there at the same place, I told him I would come, for my own safety, to the meeting, because Davidson told me that the men that did not come forward, would be the men that they should first murder.

Mr. Curwood.—You kept away from them as much as you could?—Yes; I never went among them, but at a shoemakers' club twice.

Then, of course, you did not know what their objects were?—No, I did not, except what Wilson told me.

Except what Wilson told you on this day?—On the days I have mentioned.

Wilson told you they had a plot to murder his majesty's ministers?—That they were going to murder his majesty's ministers.

That was all he told you?—He told me they had got hand-grenades, and things of that kind.

But he did not tell you of any other plots they had in hand?—He did not tell me, unless it was the cannon, and what I have stated.

It was part of the plan to murder his majesty's ministers, and set the town on fire?—He stated that which I have told you.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—By those means it would keep the town in a state of confusion for a few days, and then it would become general.

Mr. Curwood.—You were too many for me the last time; you know a man of the name of Bennett?—Yes.

I asked you whether you had not invited him to attend any private radical meeting?—I never did ask him to attend a private radical meeting, and I will be on my oath to it.

Did you or did you not tell him that when he was there he might speak or not speak, just as he liked?—I do believe I did say so.

Had you never asked him to attend?

Mr. Gurney.—A radical meeting you asked him the first time?—I never said the word radical meetings of any form whatever.

Mr. Curwood.—Did you tell him he might be called upon to take up arms, and if he was called upon, he must take up arms?—I never said so to the best of my recollection.

Will you or not swear you did not?—I never will swear what I do not know, for no man living; I never recollect saying so to him in my life; I never made use of the words radical meeting to him.

Did you or not tell him that if he were called upon to take up arms, he must do it?—I never recollect saying such a word to him.

You must recollect whether you did or not?—I do not know that I did use that word to him.

Do you think you could have said that and forgotten it?—I do not know that ever I said such a thing to him; if I did know that I had said so, I never would have denied it.

Then all you mean to say is, that you might have said it, but forgotten it?—No, I do not think it possible that I did; for I did not know of it being in contemplation at the time.

Then you have not recollection enough to say you did not?—I have not.

*Thomas Hiden re-examined by
Mr. Gurney.*

You have been at a meeting called a shoemaker's club?—Yes.

How many times?—I went twice.

With whom did you go?—Mr. Clark, a tailor.

Did he live near you, or in the same house with you?—He has done, but did not at that time.

Whom did you see at those meetings?—Davidson the prisoner, and one more of the prisoners who is now at the bar.

Who is that?—Harrison.

Where was that club, called a shoemaker's club, held?—I believe the sign of the public-house was the Scotch Arms, in some court near the Strand, but I do not know any other direction than that; it was on a Sunday evening when I was there, but I never was there but twice.

Did you at any time propose to Bennett to go with you and Clark?—Yes, I did; my friend Clark called upon me, and induced me to go, and I said, I dare say Bennett will go with my friend Clark and another person; and the other person said, "No, give the other a Newgate calendar, it will suit him much better than going."

But Bennett went with you and Clark?—Yes; that was as long ago, I may safely say, as four or five or six months.

*John Baker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.*

I believe you are butler to the earl of Harrowby?—I am.

Do you recollect, in the month of February last, by his directions, issuing cards of invitation to the Cabinet ministers to dine at his house?—I do.

On what day in February was it you issued those cards?—On the 18th or 19th; I rather think the 19th.

For what day?—The Wednesday following; the 23rd.

The cards of invitation were issued either on the Friday or Saturday preceding?—They were.

Do you know whether before that time, in consequence of the king's death, the cabinet dinners were suspended?—That was the first after the king's death.

Was the dinner prepared for the 23rd?—It was.

I believe the preparations went on till the dinner hour?—Yes, till after the dinner hour.

At what time, on the evening of the 23rd, was the dinner countermanded by lord Harrowby?—About eight, or it might be ten minutes after eight.

Up to that time had you and the other servants of my lord Harrowby expected the ministers to dine at lord Harrowby's house?—Yes, we expected them momentarily.

At what hour did you expect them?—Seven o'clock was the regular dinner hour, and I expected them from that time.

I believe one of the houses adjacent to lord Harrowby's is the Archbishop of York's?—Yes, it is.

Do you remember, between six and seven o'clock on that evening, observing carriages setting down or taking up?—Yes, there were carriages, I believe, taking up between six and seven o'clock.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen, the counsel would naturally call lord Harrowby next, but his lordship is probably engaged in some public business, which prevents his being here at the moment. His lordship will be ready, when he arrives, to prove the communication with Hiden; and that the preparations for the dinner went on as you have just heard.

Richard Munday sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Where do you live?—At No. 3, Cato-street.

Do you remember on the afternoon of the 23rd of February last, seeing any person in Cato-street?—Yes; when I came from work in the afternoon, I saw Davidson walking to and fro in the gateway.

Did you see him again?—Yes, I saw him running away after the transaction took place; but I had seen him between that lighting a candle, with another candle in his hand.

Did you see him go into the stable?—Yes, I saw him push the stable door open, and go into it; and I saw Harrison at the door at the time.

Did you observe, whether the coat of either of those men flew open?—Yes, Davidson's coat flew open, as he stooped with his hat over the candle; and I observed a cross-belt round him, and a belt down here; and I saw two pistols and a sword, I suppose, sticking out here; I thought it to be a sword that stuck out in that way.

In the course of the afternoon had you seen any sacking, or any thing put against the door?—I heard a nailing up at watering time, and I looked up and saw them nailing some sacking over the railing of the door, a kind of bread-bagging or something of that sort.

Would that prevent any person looking into the room?—I thought it was to keep the place warm, to bring some cows back being cold weather; but it would keep any persons from looking in.

Had the stable been empty for some time?—Yes, the cows were taken away before Christmas; I had not seen the door open from that time till this.

Had you seen persons go in and out?—When I passed by, I saw two go in and three come out.

Later in the evening did you observe persons?—No; after half-past six o'clock I was never out of my door.

George Caylock sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Littledale.

Do you live in Cato-street?—Yes.

Did you see any person in the street on the 23rd of February?—Yes, Mr. Harrison.

Had you known him before?—Yes.

Did you see him go into the stable?—Yes.

Did he tell you any thing about it?—He told me he had taken two chambers there, and was going to clean them up.

Did you see any other persons go in and out of that stable that evening?—Yes.

How many?—From twenty to five-and-twenty.

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven sworn.—Examined by Mr. Bolland.

You are one of the constables of Bow-street?—Yes.

Did you, in consequence of information, go on the 23rd of February to Cato-street?—I did.

At what time did you first get there?—I did go up in the afternoon, and at six o'clock I went there again.

Did you go into the Horse and Groom?—Yes.

Did you see either of the prisoners at the bar, or the persons charged with this indictment, there?—Yes, I saw Cooper and Gilchrist there.

Had Cooper any thing with him?—Yes, he had a mop-stick or broom-stick.

Did he leave it or take it away?—He left it there.

Did either of them come back for the stick?—Gilchrist did.

Did he get the stick?—He did not, I have it.

What sort of a stick was it?—Like a hair-broom-stick, a mop-stick; and there was a place round it, as if to receive a socket.

Did you go into the stable?—I did.

At what hour?—About half-past eight, as nearly as I can tell.

Who was with you when you went? were Ellis and Smithers and others with you?—They were.

What did you observe?—I observed a man with a gun on his shoulder, and a sword by his side, with cross-belts.

Do you know who that man was?—I do not.

What did you then do?—I went up the ladder.

What did the ladder lead you to?—To a loft.

What did you observe?—A bench, with arms upon it; and I heard a clattering of arms.

How many men?—I suppose about four or five and twenty.

What did you say?—I said, "We are officers, seize their arms."

What did they do?—Thistlewood, whom I immediately saw, seized a sword, and retired to the inner room.

What did he do with that sword?—He stood fencing with it, endeavouring to keep any body away that approached him.

Did any body approach him?—Yes, Smithers.

What did Thistlewood do on his approaching?—He stabbed him.

Did Smithers fall?—Yes, he died immediately.

What happened after this?—A pistol was fired, and the lights were put out instantaneously.

By whom was that pistol fired?—I have heard since, but do not know of my own knowledge.

What was done then?—I heard a voice, from the corner where Thistlewood was, call, "Kill the b——rs; throw them down stairs." I joined in the cry, and got down with them.

Where did you go?—I got into John-street, and met the soldiers, and returned with captain Fitzclarence.

In what state was the loft when you returned?—I did not get into the loft for some time after that.

Upon your coming back to the stable door, did you observe any body?—I observed Tidd.

What was he doing?—He was endeavouring to get away from the stable-door, as it appeared to me.

Did you lay hold of him?—I did. I said to some body, "Lay hold of him;" and, as I spoke, he lifted up his arm, and then I saw a pistol: I laid hold of his right arm, I turned him round, and fell upon the dunghill, and he upon me; the soldiers came up soon afterwards. The pistol, I should mention, went off.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Did it go off whilst it remained in his hand?—That I am not aware of.

Mr. Bolland.—Was he secured?—He was, and I conducted him into the public-house.

On taking him in, was he searched?—He was.

What was found on him?—A leathern belt round his waist, and two ball-cartridges in his pocket.

Did you remain in the public-house?—Before I had finished searching him, a man, named Bradburn, was brought in.

Did you search Bradburn?—I did.

What did you find?—I found a string twisted five or six times round his waist, and six ball-cartridges and three balls loose in his pocket.

Were there any others brought in?—Wilson, and the black, Davidson.

You did not search either of them?—No.

Did Davidson say any thing on his being brought in?—Yes; he damned and swore against any man that would not die in liberty's cause; that he gloried in it; and he sung part of the song, "Scots, wha' hae wi' Wallace bled."

Did Wilson say any thing?—Yes, he said it was all up; he did not care a damn; they might knock him on the head now.

You returned to the loft, I believe?—Yes.

Who were there?—There were some soldiers, and some of the prisoners, and one who is an evidence.

Monument?—Yes.

Did you find any arms there?—Yes.

Who were the other three, besides Monument?—Strange, Cooper, and Gilchrist.

What description of arms did you find?—I found two swords myself, and I saw some pistols found, and a gun or two; I found ten grenades in a bag, and one large one was found in my presence, by Nixon, and given to me, and two fire-balls.

Have you the custody of all these?—They are here, Taunton has the key.

Tidd.—My lord, I wish to ask him a question; if you recollect, I was the first man you took into custody?—You were.

Tidd.—On searching me, he expressed himself, "damn me, here is nothing here but a tobacco-box?"

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Was that so? that you expressed yourself on searching him, "there is nothing here but a tobacco-box?—No.

The Earl of Harrowby sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are one of his majesty's privy council?—I am.

And one of his ministers?—I am.

We understand, my lord, from your butler, that cards of invitation were issued by your lordship's direction, for a cabinet dinner, on the 23rd of February last?—They were issued at the close of the preceding week.

I must trouble your lordship to repeat the names of the members of the cabinet, and their respective offices?—The lord chancellor; lord Westmoreland, the lord privy seal; the earl of Liverpool, first lord of the Treasury; Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Castlereagh, secretary of state for the foreign department; earl Bathurst, secretary of state for the colonial department; lord Sidmouth, secretary of state for the home department; my lord Melville, first lord of the admiralty; the duke of Wellington, master general of the ordnance Mr. Canning, president of the India board; Mr. Robinson, president of the board of trade; Mr. Bragge Bathurst, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the Mint; and the earl of Mulgrave.

And yourself?—Yes.

Your lordship is president of the council?—I am.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Fifteen in number?—Yes.

Mr. Attorney General.—In consequence of his late majesty's death, I believe the cabinet dinners had not been held as usual, for some time?—They had not.

I omitted to ask your lordship whether all those noblemen and gentlemen who have been mentioned are privy councillors?—They are privy councillors, and compose what is called the cabinet council.

Does your lordship remember, on the day preceding the Wednesday on which the cabinet dinner was to be had, riding in the park?—Yes.

Does your lordship remember seeing that person [Hulen] near Grosvenor-gate?—I was accosted by him near Grosvenor-gate.

Did he give you any letter?—He did.

Is that the letter? [showing a letter to his lordship.]—That is the letter.

A letter addressed to my lord Castlereagh?—It is.

Did he desire your lordship to have this communicated to my lord Castlereagh?—He told me it contained intelligence of great importance to his lordship and myself, and desired I would have it communicated to lord Castlereagh.

Did you upon that inquire his name?—He expressed a wish to have some further conversation with me; I asked him whether he had put his name and address in the letter, he said he had not. I told him, if I was to communicate with him it would be necessary I should know his name and address, and upon that he gave me a card containing his name and address.

Did you make any appointment to meet him again?—When I knew what were the contents of that letter, I made an appointment to meet him again in the park, at eleven o'clock the next morning.

Did your lordship ascertain the contents of that letter while you were with him?—I did not; the letter was produced by lord Castle-reagh at the council.

Did your lordship meet him again the following morning?—I did the next morning, in the young plantations near the Ring; I appointed that spot, because he appeared to be extremely apprehensive of being seen in my company when I met him the day before near Grosvenor-gate.

Having seen this person in the manner you stated, did the dinner take place at your lordship's?—The dinner did not take place.

The preparations went on?—They went on until the communication of a note which I wrote from lord Liverpool's house, between seven and eight o'clock; that must have reached my house about eight.

That was the first communication that your lordship gave to your servants, that it was not to take place?—It was the first.

*James Ellis sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Attorney General.*

I believe you are one of the conductors of the patrols at Bow-street?—I am.

Did you go to Cato-street on the evening of the 28rd of February last?—Yes, I did.

Did you go with Ruthven?—I did.

Did you go into the stable in Cato-street?—Yes, I did.

About what time did you arrive at the stable?—As near as I can state, about half-past eight o'clock.

On your entering the stable, did you observe any man in the stable?—I did; I saw Davidson; I believe it was Davidson.

Where did you see that man whom you believe to be Davidson?—Between the foot of the ladder and the door of the stable, about half way between.

The ladder is opposite to the door of the stable, at the further end?—Yes.

What did he appear to be doing?—He had got a carbine, or something of that kind, in his right hand, and a sword at his left side, and he appeared as if he was walking sentry.

Did you observe whether he had any belts on?—He had white belts.

Did you observe any other person in the stable?—There was another person in the further stall of the stable.

That was the stall nearest the ladder?—Yes.

Do you know who that person was?—I cannot tell; I should not know him again; I only saw that he was a shorter man, in a dark coat.

When you say, you believe the man you saw on first entering to be Davidson, did you observe him?—Yes; I took him by the collar, turned him round, and looked in his face, and saw it was a man of colour.

How soon afterwards did you see him in custody?—I took him into custody within five minutes afterwards.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—When you took him into custody, did he appear to be dressed in exactly the same way as you had observed him before?—Yes, exactly the same.

Mr. Attorney General.—Had he the belt?—Yes, he had the white cross-belts.

At the time you apprehended him, had he a carbine and a sword?—Yes, he had.

Did you go up the ladder to the loft above?—I followed Ruthven up the ladder.

What did you observe when you got into the loft?—When I got into the loft, I observed a number of people falling back to the back part of the room.

How many persons did there appear to be in the room?—I judged there might be about four or five-and-twenty altogether; I cannot speak positively.

Did you see any of them retire into a small room adjoining the loft?—There were three apparently attempting to enter the small room, and as I went up, Arthur Thistlewood brandished his sword at me, and was advancing rather towards me; I desired him to desist, or I would fire, at the same time holding up a pistol with one hand, and my staff with the other.

What did he do upon that?—Upon that he retreated back just within the door of the little room.

What happened then?—Smithers, who immediately followed me, on gaining the top of the ladder attempted to enter the little room; at that moment Thistlewood made a stab and stabbed him on or near his right breast; upon that his hands went up in that way, and he fell back, and exclaimed "Oh my God!" on that I immediately fired at Thistlewood, but without effect; Smithers staggered against me, and fell past me, a general rush and confusion took place; I was pushed on to the ladder, and pushed down the ladder.

Into the stable?—Yes; upon that I attempted to get into the door way into Cato-street; I remained in the door-way a few seconds, when two or three shots were fired in the stable, one or two of which passed me in the door-way; another was fired by a tall man, in a dark-coloured coat, by some person up in the corner of the stable; the man firing stood under the ladder; I then attempted to go outside the door, when some shots were fired from the window of the little room.

The window of the little room looked into Cato-street?—Yes.

In what direction were those shots fired from the window?—Towards the door.

That window is not directly over the door?—No, it is over the cart-house, three or four yards out of the line; I then heard a cry of “stop him;” and saw Davidson run in the direction from the stable towards Queen-street; I pursued him, and came up with him I think about seventy yards off, and took him into custody.

What happened on your getting up to him?—I caught him by the collar, and he attempted to cut at me, but I was too close to him, and Gill, another officer, came up and assisted me in disarming him; he made no resistance after I had once got hold of him.

Had he a carbine when you took him?—He had, and the cross-belts.

I believe you afterwards assisted in securing some of the other prisoners?—As soon as I had left him in the custody of others, I returned to the stable, and assisted in securing three or four more in the stable.

*James Ellis cross-examined by
Mr. Curwood.*

When you took Davidson, did you take him into the public-house?—I took him into a shop first, not a public-house at that time.

It was a chandler's shop, I believe?—Yes; he was afterwards in the public-house.

*Robert Chapman sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.*

You are also one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Were you appointed to go to Cato-street on the 23rd of February?—Yes.

Do you remember being at the Horse and Groom in that street?—Yes.

Who was with you?—William Lee, the constable.

Do you remember seeing any persons come into that house?—Yes; Davidson and Cooper.

Who was the third?—I cannot identify him; I believe it to be Gilchrist.

Tell us what they did, when they first observed you?—They stood observing us for some time through the rails.

They were outside?—No, under the door by the lamp.

In consequence of their observing you, did you go on?—We went away; but previous to that Cooper went past; Gilchrist, I believe it was, passed me so quickly that I could not identify him at that time; Davidson had a drab great coat on, that covered him entirely over, a very large one, a servant's coat.

You passed on to Molineux-street?—Yes.

Where did you go then?—We turned round one of the streets to Queen-street.

Did you observe them again?—Backwards and forwards, I saw persons go in; Cooper as he passed in said he should go in and have some beer, and as they passed they looked us in the face.

As if observing who you were?—Yes.

Did you afterwards go round into Queen-street?—Yes.

Did you, when you got to the Queen-street end of Cato-street, hear the report of a pistol?—I did.

In consequence of that did you run up Cato-street?—I did.

What did you observe?—The persons were then running very fast out of the stable, and there was a firing; two armed men ran down the street, and as I had just overtaken them, I heard a piece go off; I turned round and heard somebody say, “Stop him!” I turned round, and I observed a man with his hand up, I thought to strike any person; I went up to him, and he struck at me, and I then saw it was a sword. Ellis recovered, and laid hold of him by the collar, and Ellis and I took him against the wall; he had also a carbine.

Who was that?—Davidson. He was dressed quite differently then; we took him into the chandler's shop.

Was there any thing else in his pocket?—A couple of pistol flints in his pocket.

Davidson.—My lord, I would beg to ask this witness a question.

Mr. Adolphus.—Send it over to me, and I will ask it if I think it proper.

[The prisoner wrote down his question, and it was handed to his counsel.]

*Robert Chapman cross-examined by
Mr. Adolphus.*

Did you go into any public-house, at all with the prisoner?—No.

Did you remain with him? was he in your custody from the time when he was taken?—Yes; till I went with him into the stable.

And he never was taken into any public-house at all?—No, not then.

Where was the carbine?—Benjamin Gill took it, and loaded it in the shop; he went and bought some powder. Gill came up and struck him on the sword hand, and took it from him.

You saw that done?—Yes.

Was not the carbine in the road, at some distance from him, when you took him?—No, I think not.

*Robert Chapman re-examined by
Mr. Solicitor General.*

You conducted him to the chandler's shop, and afterwards to the stable?—Yes, with a file of soldiers.

And afterwards you gave him up?—Yes.

Whether he was taken into the public-house or not, you cannot tell?—No; but I do not think he was.

You do not know, one way or the other?—No, I do not.

William Lee sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Gurney.

Are you a Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

On the evening of Wednesday the 23rd of February, did you go in company with Chapman?—Yes.

At about what time?—Somewhere about half-past six.

Near the sign of the Horse and Groom did you observe any persons?—I observed Davidson.

The prisoner Davidson?—Yes; and Gilchrist, Cooper, and Harrison, as well.

After you had stood there some little time, did you walk away?—Yes.

Did any person follow you?—Thistlewood followed us, and spoke to us.

In what way?—At least I spoke to him first; he came and stared us in the face, and I said it was very rude to stare us in the face; Chapman said, "I suppose the gentleman thinks he knows us." Thistlewood returned for answer, "Oh, it is a mistake;" and turned on his heel towards Cato-street.

You and Chapman had been sent first I believe, as officers less known?—Yes.

After walking away some little time, did you return and look at the stable?—I went round and came into Cato-street, and then I saw Davidson leave the stable, and come to the corner; at that time Gilchrist and Cooper were under the gateway. I will not be sure of Harrison being there at that moment, but he was there soon afterwards; they were talking to a man dressed like a baker.

At half-past eight, did you enter the stable with the party which accompanied Ruthven and Ellis?—Yes.

Did Ruthven and Ellis and one or two more go up the ladder?—They did.

You heard a firing and confusion there?—Yes.

And they were hustled down again?—Yes; and the lights appeared to be put out.

Was there any firing down the ladder?—There were several shots fired down the ladder.

Did you quit the stable?—Ruthven desired me to stop under the gateway, the people were crowding in shortly after the military came.

Before the military came, were there any shots fired from the window of the loft, or the room up stairs?—There were.

When the military came, they entered the stable?—Yes.

Benjamin George Gill sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Bolland.

Are you one of the dismounted horse patrol at Bow-street?—Yes.

Did you form one of Westcoatt's party to go to Cato-street?—Yes.

At what time did you arrive?—I cannot state exactly.

Did you go into the stable?—Yes.

Were Ruthven and Ellis there?—Yes, they were before me.

What did you see?—There was a light there; I saw a man standing at the bottom of the ladder.

Was that man armed?—He had something, but I cannot say what it was.

What sort of a man was he?—A short, thick, stout man, of a dark complexion.

Did Ruthven and Ellis and Smithers, go up?—They went up, and I followed Nixon; he was on the ladder, he was near the top, and I was as close to him as I could possibly get.

Did any thing happen to you, before you could get into the loft?—I heard a report of a pistol, or something in the loft; Ellis came tumbling through the place, as if he had been knocked down; he knocked down Nixon, and Nixon fell upon me in the corner.

Was there a rush from the loft?—There was.

When you got up, where did you go?—I do not say I did get up, but I got near the door, and by a sudden rush, I was pushed into Cato-street.

When you got into Cato-street, did you see either of the prisoners at the bar there?—Yes, Davidson.

Where was he when you observed him first?—I observed him come out of the door with a carbine.

How was he coming out?—Running out; he discharged the carbine right at me.

Did he pass you?—He did; after he had passed me, I saw he was a man of colour.

Did he pass away from you or stop?—He ran.

Did he do any thing more than fire the carbine, before he ran away?—No; I was about three or four yards from him.

Had he any thing else than the carbine?—Yes, he had a large sword; I ran after him, and cried out, "stop him, stop him!" and had very nearly reached him, when he made a back cut at me with a sword, and then he advanced forwards again.

Was he stopped by any person?—He was stopped by Ellis.

What passed on Ellis stopping him?—I cannot say; I got up as soon as I possibly could, and pulled out my truncheon, and struck him on the under wrist, and he cried out "oh; I am lame, I am lame!" I said, "damn your eyes, I will cut your hand off;" I made a grasp at the blade of the sword with my left hand, I found it very sharp, and let go of it; it cut my fingers.

Did you strike him again?—I cannot say.

Did he retain the sword? I think it was twirled round his wrist, by a string on the top of the sword; I think it must have been fastened to his hand, or he would have dropped it before, when I struck him; but on this the sword fell, and I picked it up.

Did you take the carbine from him?—I took the carbine out of the open hand.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—In what position was he when you picked up the sword; Ellis had got hold of him and another man.

You never lost sight of him after you saw him with the sword?—No.

Mr. Bolland.—Where was he taken to?—Over to a little shop in Queen-street.

Did you take the carbine with you?—I did.

What became of the sword?—I left it with Ellis.

Are the sword and the carbine both forthcoming now?—Yes.

Shall you know them?—Yes, I shall.

John Muddeck sworn.—Examined by Mr. Littledale.

Are you a soldier in the Coldstream regiment of guards?—Yes.

Were you one of the party that went to Cato-street?—Yes.

Do you remember when you got into the yard, seeing any one standing near the stable-door?—Yes; I did not know his name at the present, but I know the person.

Did you see him the next day at Whitehall?—Yes; I found his name was Tidd.

Look round and see whether he is there?—That is the gentleman [pointing him out].

Did he do any thing?—Yes; he presented a pistol to Mr. Fitzclarence.

Did he fire it off?—Yes; and I saw serjeant Legg take him afterwards.

Did you after this go into the lower room?—I went towards the stable-door, and I saw a prisoner cut with a sword at captain Fitzclarence, and he immediately turned the sword again to cut.

Which prisoner?—I do not know; he went in again and I did not see who he was, and afterwards Mr. Fitzclarence made an attack at them, and went in at the door, and I followed him in.

After you got in, did any of them do any thing?—Yes; after I got into the centre of the room, the prisoner, Wilson, presented a pistol to my breast, and it flashed in the pan, but did not discharge; I afterwards made a stab at him with my bayonet.

I believe you afterwards secured him?—Yes.

You saw him afterwards, and knew him to be Wilson?—I took him to the public-house and looked at him by the light.

Is that the same person you see at the bar?—Yes, it is.

William Legg sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are a serjeant in the Coldstream guards?—Yes.

Were you one of the party that went under the command of lieutenant Fitzclarence, on the night of the 23rd of February?—Yes.

Upon your coming into Cato-street, you knew the stable there?—Yes.

When you came to the stable, did you observe any man standing near the stable?—Yes.

How was he standing?—He was standing with his back against the wall, between the gateway and the stable door.

Between the gateway leading out of John-street and the stable door?—Yes.

Had he any thing in his hand?—Yes, he had a pistol in his hand, and he levelled it at lieutenant Fitzclarence.

Was lieutenant Fitzclarence at the head of your picquet?—About a yard and a half at the head of me.

Upon your observing this man level his pistol at lieutenant Fitzclarence, what did you do?—I knocked the pistol aside by my pike, and seized the muzzle end of the pistol with my right hand; a scuffle ensued between the man and me which should have the pistol, and the pistol went off in the scuffle.

Did you pull the trigger?—No, I had hold of the muzzle of it.

The man who had the pistol had hold of the other end?—Yes.

What was the effect of the pistol going off?—It tore my jacket into ribbons; I have the jacket here, if you wish it; whatever the pistol was loaded with, tore the sleeve of the jacket off the right arm.

Did you secure that man?—As soon as the pistol went off, he let it go easily; he never struggled any more for it.

Did you secure him?—I did; I secured him, and delivered him over to the police officers.

Who was that person whom you secured?—Tidd.

You saw him afterwards?—I saw him afterwards and have seen him since.

I believe you then went into the stable and up into the loft?—I went into the stable.

You assisted in securing some of the persons who were taken in the loft?—They had surrendered when I got there to part of the picquet.

You assisted in securing some of the arms that were taken in the loft?—I did.

Lieutenant Frederick Fitzclarence sworn.—Examined by Mr. Attorney General.

I believe you are a lieutenant of the Coldstream-guards?—I am.

Do you remember being applied to on the evening of the 23rd of February to send a picquet to John-street, or Cato-street?—I was.

I believe you commanded that picquet?—I did.

What attracted your notice after you got to John-street?—The report of fire-arms.

In consequence of that report, did you go with your picquet to Cato-street?—I brought the picquet forwards towards Cato-street.

On your getting to the archway, leading into Cato-street, what passed?—I met a police officer, crying out, "soldiers, soldiers! the stable door!" I made towards it, and the moment I got to the door I met two men, one of whom presented a pistol, and the other cut at me by a sword; we exchanged several cuts; he, seeing the body of the picquet coming up, ran into the stable, and I followed him into the stable. I came up to one man, who said, "do not kill me, and I will tell you all." I gave him in charge, and then returned and took another man out of one of the stalls; the soldiers took him away. I then led the men up into the loft, where I found three, four, or five men, with a large quantity of arms upon the bench, and on the floor.

What sort of arms?—Blunderbusses, pistols, and pikes.

You assisted in securing the persons in the loft, and the arms?—I did.

Serjeant Legg was of your party, I believe?—He was.

Did you observe serjeant Legg contending with a man?—I did not attend to him; my attention was called to the man with whom I had a scuffle.

Lieutenant Frederick Fitzclarence cross-examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Did you take Davidson into your custody?—Yes.

Where was he taken?—To Bow-street.

During that time was he taken to any other place?—He was brought into the stable in Cato-street.

Proceeding from the stable, was he taken into any public-house or other house to your memory?—No.

Mr. Attorney General.—You do not remember his being taken into a public-house?—No, I do not; I will not be sure whether he was taken into the Horse and Groom; there were two or three prisoners there; there were Tidd and Wilson, I am not sure whether he was or not, I rather think not.

William Westcott sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are one of the Bow-street patrol?—I am.

You went to Cato-street on Wednesday the 23rd of February?—Yes.

On going up did you see Ings, one of the prisoners at the foot of the ladder?—Yes.

He was in that stall at the foot of the ladder?—Yes, he was.

John Wright sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are one of the Bow-street patrol?—I am.

Did you go up to the foot of the ladder in the stable in Cato-street?—I did.

Did you see a stout man standing near the foot of the ladder?—A stoutish man.

Did you take any thing from that man?—A knife.

What sort of a knife?—A butcher's knife and a sword.

Was there any thing twisted round the handle of that knife?—Wax-end.

That knife is in the possession of the officer?—It is.

VOL. XXXIII.

I believe you were knocked down?—Yes; immediately after I took the knife, I was knocked down, and received a stab in my right side.

And that man escaped from you?—Yes, he did.

Ings was immediately afterwards brought back in custody?—Yes.

Joseph Champion sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

You were at the stable in Cato-street on the night of the 23rd?—Yes.

Do you remember seeing the man who was tried here the other day, Ings, at the foot of the ladder?—Yes.

Did he sing out any thing on the officers appearing?—Yes; "look out above there!"

He afterwards, I believe, made his escape?—Yes.

Was he brought in custody?—Yes; Brooks came up bringing him in custody, in the Edgware-road.

Did you search him?—We took him to Mary-le-bone watch-house, and searched him there.

What did you find on him?—Two haversacks slung across his shoulders, under his great coat, one under each arm; a tin case nearly full of powder; three pistol balls; a knife-case, and a belt round his waist.

What kind of knife-case was it?—Made of cloth.

For a large or a small knife?—For a large knife; there is a knife wrapped round with wax-end, which fits it; and which is in it now.

William Charles Brooks sworn.—Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

You are one of the Bow-street patrol?—Yes.

Do you remember seeing a man run in John-street, on the night of the 23rd of February?—Yes.

Did you pursue him?—I met him.

When you met him, what did he do?—He presented a pistol at me, and fired it.

Was the pistol loaded?—Yes.

How do you know?—The ball went through my clothes, bruized my shoulder, and grazed my neck.

On this pistol being fired at you, you staggered into the street?—Yes.

And the man ran on?—Yes.

Was he afterwards taken by Moay the watchman?—Moay laid hold of him.

Was he afterwards searched in your presence?—I searched him in the watch-house, and took two haversacks from him, slung one on each shoulder, and a belt round his body, and a tin case nearly full of powder.

And a knife-case?—No; Champion took that.

In your presence?—Yes, and the ball.

When he was taken, what did you say to him?—I asked him how he came to fire at me, a man he had never seen before; he damned me, and said he wished he had killed me, as he meant to do.

Samuel Hercules Taunton sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are an officer at Bow-street?—I am.

On the morning of Thursday the 24th of February, did you go to Brunt's lodgings to apprehend him?—Yes, I did.

In what room did you take him?—In the front two pair of stairs room.

Did you search the back room two pair of stairs?—I did.

Did you find there any things in two rush baskets?—I did.

Besides the rush baskets, there were an iron pot, and a pike-staff?—There were.

We will not trouble your lordship with an enumeration of the things now, as they will be produced hereafter. Did you ask him a question about that back room?—I did; he denied their being his apartments.

Did you then call up the landlady, and ask her whose it was?—Yes.

What did she say?—She said the lodgings were let in his presence to a man, she did not know his name; I then inquired of Brunt who this man was; he said he had only seen him once at a public-house, and he did not know who he was.

Did he mention how he came to recommend him?—Only that he met him at a public-house.

Was that all?—Yes.

Any thing about his wanting a lodging?—No, not to me.

Did you then go to Tidd's lodgings in Hole-in-the-wall passage?—I did.

Did you find any articles of ammunition there?—I did.

We will not take the detail of that now. At what time did you go to Brunt's?—About eight o'clock; and to Tidd's at nearly nine.

Did you ask Brunt about these baskets?—He denied knowing any thing about them.

Daniel Bishop sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are a Bow-street officer?—Yes.

On the morning of the 24th of February, did you apprehend Arthur Thistlewood?—I did.

At about what hour?—Between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning.

Where did you find him?—At the house of a Mrs. Harris, No. 8, White-street, Moorfields.

Up, or in bed?—He was then in bed.

How were his clothes?—He had his breeches and stockings on.

And his coat and waistcoat by the bed side?—They were.

Did you find any thing in his coat or waistcoat?—In his coat and waistcoat I found three leaden balls, a ball cartridge, and a blank cartridge, and two flints, and a small silk sash.

You took him to Bow-street, and then to the Secretary of State's?—I did.

Daniel Bishop cross-examined by Mr. Curwood.

Do you know a man of the name of Salmon?—There is an officer belonging to Bow-street of that name.

Did any man of the name of Salmon go with you to apprehend Thistlewood?—Salmon, one of our officers, was present, and likewise Lavender and Ruthven, and several patrolers at the back and front of the house for fear of mischief.

Mr. Solicitor General.—You surrounded the house before you entered it?—Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General.—I am afraid, my lord, the case cannot be closed to-night. I would beg to submit, at what time your lordship would think it proper to leave off.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen of the jury, the solicitor-general intimates, that they have now, on the part of the prosecution, got through probably all their case, except the production of the arms and ammunition found at the various places. If we could hope, that by sitting for some few hours longer, and increasing your fatigue only to that extent, we could finish the trial this evening, I would take your opinion, whether we should proceed to its close; but it is quite clear we should only get on to a late hour of the night, and probably not accomplish it at last. If, therefore, we must adjourn, I have no doubt you will concur with the Court in thinking, this is the most convenient time; therefore, to-morrow morning the counsel for the prosecution will close their case, by the production of the arms, and then the case for the prisoners will be gone into.

Foreman of the Jury.—We all coincide with your lordship.

Davidson.—My lord, having been taken by surprise, and not having my witnesses, would your lordship permit me to be visited by my wife to-night, that I may send for them?

Mr. Gurney.—Your attorney.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—The Court has nothing to do with these arrangements, but those to whom your application will be made through your solicitor, will, I am sure, take care that you shall not suffer by any want of access of necessary persons to you for that purpose. Then, gentlemen, we will have the honour of meeting you precisely at nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

SESSIONS HOUSE, OLD BAILEY,

THURSDAY, APRIL 27th, 1830.

William Davidson and Richard Tidd were set to the bar; and James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper, were placed behind.

Mr. Gurney.—We shall not require the attendance of the other prisoners.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is it wished, by the counsel for the prisoners, that they should be present.

Mr. Curwood.—No, my lord.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—The other prisoners may retire.

[They were removed from the bar.]

George Thomas Joseph Ruthven called again —
Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Are there now upon the table the arms and ammunition found in Cato-street?—There are; there are three sticks which have got on by mistake.

[They were removed from the table.]

Withdrawing them, the articles on the table were all found in Cato-street?—They were.

Were there more hand-grenades than there are here?—Yes, six more.

The others, I believe, have been opened in the course of the investigation?—They have.

At the time these pikes were found, were they ferruled, as I observe some of them are now?—They were.

Have the ferrules of the others dropped off in consequence of the greenness of the wood?—I presume it is in consequence of that.

I observe that some of the pike-heads are files sharpened, and others are bayonets?—Yes.

All these holes are bored for the reception of these pike-heads to screw on?—Yes, they will receive them.

Mr. Gurney.—We will hand you, gentlemen, one parcel of the sharpened files, and one parcel of the bayonets, and a pike-staff.

[They were handed to the jury, and one of the bayonets screwed in.]

The hand-grenades, I observe, are all fitted with fuses?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—The several persons who found each are in attendance, but my learned friends have not desired the personal identification of each.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—With a view to have that distinctly understood, you may ask him, whether they were either found by him, or delivered into his possession by persons who were there before they quitted the spot; then if the gentlemen wish you to call any person who found any particular article they may have that done.

Mr. Curwood.—We do not desire it, my lord.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Then, I take it for granted, without calling A. who found this particular blunderbuss, and B. who found this sword, and so on, that it is to be taken they were all found in the stable at Cato-street, and put into the possession of the witness Ruthven; the gentlemen on the part of the prisoner do not require it to be carried further.

Mr. Gurney.—Whom was the carbine taken from? Davidson?—I cannot state that myself.

Where are the haversacks?—That is one on the table.

They were taken off the person of Ings?—Yes.

[They were handed to the jury.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You will have the goodness, gentlemen, to attend to the dimensions of those haversacks.

Mr. Gurney.—Is this the belt, this the knife-case, and that the knife, taken from Ings?—As I understand.

Mr. Gurney.—You observe, gentlemen, the belt and the knife-case are made of the same materials, and you will observe the fitting of the knife and the knife-case, you will observe the wax ends round the handle.

[They were handed to the jury.]

This list is your making out?—Yes.

In the loft, thirty-eight ball-cartridges, fire-lock and bayonet, one powder flask, three pistols and one sword, with six bayonet spikes and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet spikes and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet spike and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades, two fire-balls, one large grenade and bayonet, a rope ladder, one sword stick, forty ball-cartridges, one bayonet and three loose balls, these were all found in the loft: in the stable, in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball-cartridges, three balls, and some string put round him to act as a belt; the pistol which it is alleged Tidd fired, the pistol which it is alleged Wilson attempted to fire, a blunderbuss, sword belt and scabbard, two pistols, one sword, twelve sticks with ferrules: in the pocket of Tidd, two ball-cartridges, and round him a leathern belt: two ball-cartridges facing the stable, and ten ditto in Newnham-street: one musquet cut down and one sword from Davidson; one havemack, cross belts, one pricker, bayonet, scabbard, cartouche box and a belt round his body: two haversacks one belt and tin powder case, four pistol balls one pistol key and a knife-case, from Ings: one haversack containing seventeen ball-cartridges, three balls, one pistol flint, one pricker, one worm for drawing cartridges, one knife and a turn-screw, one stick cut to receive a bayonet, left in the public-house; that was left by Cooper or Gilchrist?—By Cooper.

Is that also made to receive a ferrule at the top?—Yes; it is.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—That was left by Cooper, and afterwards asked for by Gilchrist?—Yes.

John Hector Morison called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You mentioned, yesterday, that the prisoner Ings had brought you a sword to sharpen, on Christmas eve?—Yes.

Look at that, and tell me whether that is the sword he brought to you to grind? [shewing a sword to the witness.].—Yes.

What were the directions?—To grind it sharp from the heel to the point, and to make the point as sharp as a needle.

Is it particularly sharp?—Yes.

[It was handed to the jury.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is that the one you call a scimitar?—They are both of the scimitar shape.

Mr. Gurney.—Has the edge been sharpened since it left you?—The edge has been made much keener, by sharpening it with a steel or a stone, I cannot say exactly which.

Benjamin George Gill called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You mentioned a carbine and a sword taken from Davidson, can you select those from the arms which are now on the table?—Yes.

Mr. Attorney General.—Your lordship will recollect, he said there was a sling.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Yes; you will recollect gentlemen, this witness stated, that he believed there was a sling attached to the hand of the prisoner, whom he struck to oblige him to resign it; you will observe, the one produced has such a sling.

Was the carbine loaded when you got possession of it or not?—It must be loaded because he had discharged it at me before.

Did you observe any moisture upon it?—

After I took it to Bow-street, it was quite damp; I put my finger down the barrel and shewed it to several gentlemen who were there.

George Thomas Joseph Rathven called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

Were the greater part of these fire-arms loaded when you took them?—They were; we had them drawn for the purpose of being produced here.

What were they loaded with?—With ball, with the exception of one gun which had large shot.

James Aldous called again.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You have mentioned a brass-barrelled blunderbuss taken out of pawn by Davidson on the 23rd of February; look at that blunderbuss, and state whether you are able to identify it as the same?—Yes; I believe it to be the same.

Davidson.—My lord, may I ask Mr. Aldous one question?

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Yes, certainly.

Davidson.—Do not you recollect, when I pledged it, my saying it was not mine, and that you said you would lend me seven shillings upon it, as you knew me, otherwise you would not have taken it in at all; that it was not worth that?—I do not exactly recollect that; the prisoner might make that observation, but I do not recollect it.

Samuel Hercules Taunton called again.—

Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You mentioned to us yesterday, that you had gone to the lodgings of Brunt, and that in the back room two pair of stairs, you found two rush baskets, with a number of things?—Yes, they are here.

Give us the contents of those rush baskets?—Here are nine papers with rope-yarn and tar.

Are these what you call the fire-balls?—They are [One was handed to the jury.].—There are also some steel filings.

The other basket is what was wrapped up in a blue apron?—It is.

What did you find in that basket?—Four grenades, three papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients, that is fire-balls, two bags of powder, one pound each.

These bags are made of flannel, and you have weighed them, and found they contain one pound each?—Yes.

[They were opened, and found to contain gunpowder.]

Have you any of the same kind of flannel bags empty?—Five.

Is gunpowder ever sold packed up in that form?—I do not know; I never bought any in such a state.

Did you ever see any exposed to sale in such a state?—No, never: a paper of gunpowder a leather bag: containing sixty-three bullets.

That cartouche box?—Yes.

These were the contents of the baskets?—Yes.

You mentioned an iron pot?—This is it [producing it].

Does it appear that tar, or some such substance, has been heated in it?—There has been; there are the remains of it now.

And a pike handle?—Yes; there is a pike-handle.

Are the hand-grenades which have been produced from Cato-street, and those you found there, of the same description?—Yes, exactly.

You mentioned that you proceeded from the lodgings of Brunt to the lodgings of Tidd?—I did.

Give us the things which you found at Tidd's lodgings; have you a haversack here?—Yes.

What does that contain?—Four hundred and thirty-four bullets, one-hundred and seventy-one ball-cartridges, sixty-nine ball-cartridges without powder; and a brown paper parcel with three pounds of gunpowder.

Did you find a coarse canvass cloth?—Yes.

What did you find in it?—Ten grenades, eleven bags of powder, one pound each.

Do you mean flannel bags, of the same description with the others?—Yes; and ten empty bags; a small bag, with a tin powder-flask; sixty-eight bullets, four flints, and twenty-seven pike-handles.

Are those the pike-handles you have by you?—Yes.

Are they of the same description with those found in Cato-street?—Yes.

Were they all ferruled?—They were when I found them, but being green, some of them have dropped off.

Were they all bored to receive pike-heads?—Yes.

Did you also find a trunk?—Yes.

What are the contents of that trunk?—Nine hundred and sixty-five ball-cartridges.

Made up in parcels of how many each?—Five each.

A Juryman (Mr. Young).—Would that box be strong enough to remove those from place to place?—It was tied up strongly when I found it under the bed.

Mr. Gurney.—In that case would it be strong enough to be removed?—Oh yes, certainly; it is now ready to break with being carried about so often, and brought down here.

Serjeant Edward Hanson sworn.—Examined by Mr. Gurney.

You are a serjeant in the royal artillery?—I am.

And acquainted therefore with such things as you see before you?—Yes.

In the first place look at these flannel bags of gunpowder, containing one pound each; what purpose were they intended for?—I suppose they were meant for cartridges for a six-pound gun.

Made up in a proper and convenient shape for that purpose?—Only too small, they should have been rounder.

Would they answer that purpose?—Yes.

They are made up differently from what you, as a military man of experience, would make them?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You would make them in a mould fitted to the gun?—Yes.

A person who had no opportunity of modeling from a gun would make them so?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—What appear to you to be the ingredients of these fire-balls?—They are nearly all alike; this is exactly like the other, except that one is without brimstone; this has oakum, tar, rosin and brimstone.

One of them you found without the brimstone?—Yes; that is all the difference I have seen in them.

Would they be effectual means of setting a building on fire, if they were thrown into a window on the floor?—Certainly.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you apprehend that the one without brimstone was so from accident or design?—I do not know; I should rather think it was meant for the bottom of one of these grenades.

The composition of which the brimstone would not enter?—No.

Mr. Gurney.—If one of these were thrown into the windows of a hay-loft, with two or three loads of hay and straw, would they burn it down?—Most assuredly.

Or thrown into any building and lighting on wood, they would set it on fire?—Yes.

How long would they burn?—That is a good large one, that would burn four minutes.

Amplly sufficient to set it on fire?—Yes, there would be a body of red fire left after it had done blazing.

Look at one of those hand-grenades, and open it; with respect to those you have opened, what do you find to be in the interior?—A small box of tin.

Containing what?—About three ounces and a half of gunpowder.

Is there a fuse brazed into this box?—Yes.

Mr. Gurney.—As the counsel for the prisoner do not object to our leading on these points; do you find first the rope-yarn the exterior?—Yes.

Then a sheet of paper?—Yes; there was a piece of stocking on one.

Then more rope-yarn?—Yes.

Then a number of pieces of iron tied together round it?—Yes.

You then come to a tin box, with a fuse brazed in it?—Yes.

And filled with gunpowder?—Yes.

You have found that three ounces and a half of gunpowder had been the contents of the box?—Yes; I weighed one, and they all appeared to be the same.

Is that more than sufficient for a nine-inch shell?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Have you found as many as twenty-five pieces of iron?—Yes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I ask this, from his examination on the last occasion; the counsel do not object to it?

Mr. Curwood—No, my lord.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—If that were thrown into a room with persons in it, would it be discharged in about half a minute, and probably be attended with death and destruction to the persons in that room?—Most assuredly it would; [the witness proceeded to open one in the presence of the jury], there is some brown stuff here.

Mr. Gurney.—Is that cemented on?—Yes, it is; here are under that four great nails fastened on; then there is another piece of this brown stuff.

Now you have come to the tin carcass?—
Yes.

Force out that fuse which is brazed in, and empty the gunpowder; that fuse has a priming in it?—Yes; it has a composition in it.

That is full of gunpowder the same as the other?—Yes it is; the very same.

Is the powder good?—Very good.

These hand-grenades are not made, I believe, in the manner in which a military man would make them?—They are not.

Are they so constructed as to be very effectual and destructive?—They are so.

The regular hand-grenade is a shell?—It is.

That could be obtained only by resorting to foundries?—No.

There are only four pieces of iron there, but you found in another twenty-five?—Yes.

They vary according to the size of the pieces?—Yes.

Mr. Attorney-General.—My lord, that is the case on the part of the Crown.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Curwood.—Gentlemen of the jury, it has now for the fourth time become my melancholy task to address you and other juries on these occasions. I say my melancholy task, because it is known to all the world, that notwithstanding all that my learned friend and myself could urge on behalf of the prisoners, three former verdicts of guilty have been pronounced. Irksome as the task was to me in the first instance, I need not tell you that its weight is much increased in consequence of those verdicts. I should very ill have executed my duty on the former occasions, if I could have any thing new to offer to you on the present, because I must have given the case very little attention indeed, even for the short time that I had to consider it, if, at least, during the progress of the three former trials, almost every thing that could present itself to my mind had not already presented itself. But, nevertheless, I should be deserting my duty to these unfortunate men at the bar, if I were not, upon the present occasion, to address to you some at least of those observations which, according to my view of the case, ought to be attended with some consideration.

I told you, or at least some of you who were on the former jury heard me say, that the first time I rose to address you (and I said it sincerely) I gave more weight to the evidence then brought forward on the part of the Crown, than, upon a re-consideration, I thought it deserved. And the more I come to look at the evidence which has been given—I mean the important and material parts of it, that is, those parts which are to sustain the issue you have to try—I still consider it is of so suspicious a nature, that every time it is presented to you anew it deserves, at your hands, a new and further consideration. What I mean is, that the charge of treason is mainly, and I believe I may almost venture to say wholly, supported by the evidence of an accomplice, and such an accomplice, that a more complete man of infamy I do not think can be taken out of the sink of human crime, of any age or of any country. He stands tainted in no common degree, he is devoid of almost every moral and social duty; he has violated the confidence of private life equally with his public duties:—his duty to God, his duty to his king, his duty to the public, he has equally disregarded; there is no duty, public or private, which he seems not to have violated; he admits, that he has been an apostate from his religion, and of course a denier of that God to whom he appeals for the truth of the testimony he is to give; he admits, to-day, that he has been an infidel and a traitor, a meditated murderer and an assassin. Now, can you have a worse man before you? The deeper a man is steeped in infamy, the less he deserves credit at your hands; or, if he tells a story, it ought to be a story probable in itself, and confirmed by witnesses of truth and veracity.

The misfortune of this case is, that there is mixed up with the charge you have to try, so much of undeniable guilt, that I am afraid it is almost beyond the human power to separate that part of the case which is proved, from that which is only charged, and, as I humbly contend before you, not distinctly proved. It is not in the nature of the human mind that, where falsehood is mixed up with truth, a jury should be able easily to throw aside the falsehood, and discriminate between that and the truth with which it is blended. It requires patient inquiry and nice discrimination, and therefore I pray you distinctly to see what is the charge upon which you are to pronounce; and to consider not, how much guilt is proved against these men, but whether there is distinct evidence to prove that precise charge upon which you are to found your verdict. If you come to examine and separate the evidence minutely, I think you will find that all that fixes the guilt of high treason upon these men, depends solely upon the testimony of that infamous witness Adams; because it depends entirely upon what took place at those consultations, at which, he says, he was present. Neither Hiden nor Monument (who are two witnesses implicated to a certain extent in the same transaction) was present at those consultations, and therefore neither can give you an account of what passed there. And if you are inclined to give them full credit, they both distinctly admitted that, although they knew (and one participated in) the horrid plan of assassinating his majesty's ministers, yet they knew of no ulterior plan of levying war against his majesty, or conspiracy to levy war against his majesty, which is the main charge which you have to try.

Always bear in mind that such is the charge, or rather those are the charges you are to decide upon. Whether there was any conspiracy to levy war (for that is the language of the indictment) against his majesty, whether war was actually levied, or whether there was any conspiracy to depose or put the king to death. Now let me recall to your recollection, what was admitted by my learned friend, the counsel for the Crown, in opening this case to you (and he did not admit it without good consideration, for he is too good a lawyer to admit it if not well founded) that, whatever may be your opinion of the nefarious and wicked design to assassinate all his majesty's ministers, yet, in point of fact, such assassination, or a conspiracy to do it, does not in itself amount to high treason. Take this admission and apply the evidence to it; see whether you can find in the evidence, as it is confirmed, any thing beyond that plan. Do not suppose me to speak with levity of that matter, but see whether you have consistent and confirmed evidence, beyond that fact, of any design of what may be called levying war. The design of a conspiracy may be gathered from the consultations and overt acts of the conspirators; here are certain overt acts, I admit, proved, which go in confirmation of some part of the testimony of Adams; the finding of arms, and the meeting in Cato-street, for instance. But that only goes to confirm the one part of the alleged conspiracy. It goes, I admit, to confirm him most mainly in this, that they entertained a design of assassinating the ministers; and if the prisoners were here now, answering for that charge, I could not and should not have a single word to say to you; I could not urge that the witness, infamous as he is, is not fully confirmed up to that extent; but beyond that I contend there is not a single particle of evidence to support the charge of treason. Consider first the probabilities in such a plot to overturn the government; you must admit (since the ingenuity of my learned friends cannot deny it) that as a scheme for that purpose it is so wholly absurd and ridiculous, that it never could enter into the head of a man who had one particle of reason left. No man who is walking about without a keeper at his heels, and in a straight waistcoat, ever could set about a plan of oversetting the government of such a mighty empire as this with means such as they appear to have had.

My learned friend has said very truly, that when men enter into great schemes, their imagination deceives them, and they are so anxious for their ultimate object, that they overlook all difficulties which lie between them and the wished-for end. That is true to a certain extent; men do not properly appreciate difficulties which are in the way of their ardent wishes; but there is a limit to that error; men do not contemplate impossibilities although they underrate difficulties. If you should be told, it was a part of their scheme to arrest the sun in its course, or to roll back the tide of the Thames,—if a witness were to come and assert boldly that such was part of their scheme, you would not and could not believe it; then I will put it to you, are even those impossibilities which I have stated, more absurd than the plan these men are said to have contemplated, for the purpose of oversetting this great and mighty government with the means they proposed? Now, if this is given you upon the evidence of an infamous witness, and is not corroborated by any witness of character, can you, will you, or ought you, to believe it, when the lives of eleven men, ay, when the lives even of eleven infamous men, depend upon it? For however infamous you may consider the persons charged in this indictment to be, thank God there are specific laws for every offence; and whenever a jury may find them guilty, of those charges of which they may be guilty they must pay the penalty annexed by the laws to such offences. But it is your duty, not to convict them in one form of indictment, merely because you think they have been guilty of another offence of which they might have been convicted in another form of indictment.

Before I proceed to the comments I was about to make on the evidence, let me make this observation to you, that an accomplice, when he comes before you as a witness, should at least appear with all the marks of sincere contrition; you should be well satisfied, that however iniquitous his former conduct has been, at least at the moment he presents himself to you, to detail the circumstances he is about to disclose in evidence, he appears with a mind thoroughly convinced of the iniquity of that former conduct, and that he is then determined to speak truth even to the last letter. If you should see by his manner and conduct, that even in that box he was inclined to shuffle, to prevaricate or speak that which was false, would you give him credit for a single moment? Now let me bring this to your recollection; when I cross-examined him as to his motives, in joining and confederating with these people, what did he say? it was fear kept him to the last with this band of conspirators! that this was an idle excuse I am sure I need not say one word to convince you; what fear could restrain him from going to the proper authorities and disclosing what he knew? what more did he say to account for his having entered into this plot? Remember it was first told him on the 2nd of January; he paused over it ten days, and on the 12th of January he was introduced to Thistlewood; he heard all that Thistlewood had to tell him; he attended every committee from that time to the 22nd of February daily, and twice a day; it is true, as my learned friend reminds me, that he was fifteen days in prison, where he might safely have made a disclosure; but down to the very night when they were all taken prisoners, he continued with them, and to all appearance, one as fully bent upon effecting the scheme as any amongst them; and it was not until that he got back to the Christian religion, that is to say, when the halter stared him in the face, that his conscience informed him he was in the wrong; and you remember when I asked him if he did not en-ascertain the design of the others, what was his motive for thus apparently acting with them? he tells you, with an unblushing front, that he had some suspicion, of the character of his companion Brunt, and in order to ascertain the truth of that suspicion, he joined in this most horrid plot! there is a man joining in as murderous a scheme as ever was devised or imagined, and all for the purpose of ascertaining a doubt as to the character of his companion! Do you believe him when he tells you this? if you do not believe him, then down to the very moment in which he stands in that box, you see him still persisting in crime. If he is still persisting in crime and uttering falsehood, how is it possible to believe any part of his statement? how can you rely upon any thing that he says?

With respect to the crime itself, it is of the greatest importance to the safety of the lives and liberties of us all, that the bounds of law should be faithfully preserved; crime when defined, no doubt, ought to meet due punishment, not abstractedly, but in that mode the law has pointed out. If you confuse the bounds of offences you take away the best safe-guard of the subject. But, above all, this maxim applies to the law of treason. As it is accurately defined, so ought those definitions to be most religiously observed; and unless you are convinced that the parties here charged are guilty of the actual and specific facts charged upon them, you ought not to find them guilty. I do not hesitate to say this before gentlemen who have pronounced former verdicts of guilty, and, I must admit, upon the same evidence; because from the manner in which you conducted yourselves upon former occasions, I saw that you gave great attention to the cases before you, and I know those verdicts were the result of your clearest conviction; and knowing that fact, it is with confidence I feel, that if upon another review of the evidence you should see occasion to change your former conclusions, you will have manly boldness enough to do it; and, therefore, I do not hesitate to urge again before you for further consideration, arguments, although from the past events I must feel they have been unsuccessful upon the former occasions.

I was stating, that in all cases it would be necessary to preserve the bounds of crime, more particularly, in cases of high treason. Laying aside, for a moment, the consideration of the suspicious nature of this testimony, I will suppose you to give full credit to the evidence. Then, I say, a very material consideration arises, whether, under this supposition of giving full credit to Adams, the prisoners were conspiring to levy war, or to make a great and enormous riot for the purposes of plunder, or any other illegal object; for although the guilt of that intent would be very great, yet, if it amounts only to a riot, you ought not to find them guilty of high treason. I took an opportunity on a former occasion, and must again refer you to a very eminent law writer as to this point; he states that there ought to be an accurate distinction between riot and levying of war, which latter would amount to high treason; and he states a number of acts of parliament, and says, that all those acts would be useless if every great riot is to be construed a levying of war; but then he goes on to state other cases where what in common understanding would be considered a riot had been held to be treason, and he says, "These things being decided, we must now acquiesce in them, and consider them as law." Now when a great and considerate writer uses a particular phrase, it is not used without intention; and, therefore, I contend that when that learned judge uses this singular phrase "we must acquiesce in it," that he means, if I had this for the first time under my consideration, I should say it does not amount to levying of war; but, inasmuch as former judges have so decided, I must give a reluctant consent. The inference I draw from this passage is this, I would call on the learned attorney-general (and if the case exists there is no man more competent to give it you), to shew you a case precisely similar to the present, that is, where a case of this sort has been held to be a levying of war. If he does not shew you an instance precisely similar, then hear what the learned judge says; "it is much safer to apply to parliament for their understanding of the matter." Do not you extend the law of treason by construction or implication, because, says he, "no man knows where it may end." Most truly he said so; for if you enlarge constructive treasons, if you make that a constructive levying of war, which, according to common sense is not a levying of war, no man can tell where it may end. Every resistance to the civil power, perhaps every resistance to a play-house guard in a play-house riot, may be considered, in the event, a levying of war, in opposing the military and civil power of the king, and therefore high treason.

Look at the evidence which Adams gives. He states that he was at most, and, I believe, pretty nearly all their consultations. At the first consultation which he states to be of any importance, which passed a few days before the funeral of his late majesty, he says, he saw Thistlewood, Harrison, and one or two more, sitting in deep consultation, as if they were agitating some important subject. Thistlewood then related to him, that Harrison had told him it was extremely probable a great part of the military would be out of town at the funeral of the king; and it struck him that would be a most favourable opportunity, to do what? to raise an insurrection and levy war? No! he uses a forcible though a vulgar expression, to kick up a row! to raise a riot for the purpose of plunder; and you will recollect, at a subsequent meeting, they said they could wait no longer than the following Wednesday, why? because they were all so poor. Twelve or fourteen men of the humblest situation in life, were about to overturn the empire, and they were all so poor, they could wait no longer than the following Wednesday! Now apply your common sense to the transactions stated; is it not more consistent that these poor men were only waiting to begin a system of riot and plunder, rather than a system of rebellion and war against the government of the country?

I stated to you before, that as a system of levying war, the scheme was so absurd it was wholly incredible; that it did not become credible because it was sworn to; and more particularly that it did not become credible because it was sworn to by a witness of such infamous character.

On former occasions, my learned friend and I went through with more particularity the evidence in detail; but I will now merely give you the outlines of it. The first was their scheme of assassination, which I do not mean to deny has so much confirmatory evidence as to raise a fair inference in your minds, that they contemplated that fact; but you have also the admission of the learned counsel for the Crown, that that fact does not amount to high treason; that the crime of high treason consists in the levying or conspiring to levy war, and not in killing or conspiring to kill the ministers. Let us now, therefore, look to their preparations and means for levying war. They talked of having forty men, and with these they were to possess themselves of the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane; how many men it might require for that I do not precisely know, but without horse and without apparatus I should think the parish watch would have prevented their performing that service. They were further to detach another part of these forty to take the six pieces of cannon in the Artillery-ground; how many men it would require for that object a rough guess would enable us to judge of. They were to send another detachment to prevent a single orderly going to Windsor; a single man could not perform that task, but they must send a sufficient detachment to take possession, not only of the usual road, but they must have a sufficient force to prevent the men passing out over any of the bridges, or by any other road; they must therefore take possession of every outlet from London; they were to take the telegraph, to prevent a communication with Woolwich; they were to dig trenches, to prevent the approach of cavalry; and all this with a force of forty men! Now, I ask, whether the absurdity or madness of this supposed plan does not make it wholly incredible; even after giving full credit to the assertion of my learned friend, the Solicitor-general, that men in their eagerness to obtain an ultimate object overlook intermediate difficulties? Are these difficulties they have overlooked, or are they not the ravings of insane minds? Who has told you these designs existed? The witness Adams—you are to believe him; why? because, say the learned gentlemen on the other side, he is confirmed. He is confirmed as to certain things, I admit; but because he is confirmed in certain things, are you to believe every absurdity that so infamous a witness chooses to state? I told you before, and I beg leave to call your recollection to it again, that he is not confirmed as to those points which involve the crime of treason. He is confirmed as to the procuring of the arms, and so far he may be confirmed as to the point relating to the assassination; but he is not confirmed as to those plans which he says passed at their deliberations, and which alone make the treason. Monument was not there; he cannot and does not confirm him; and as far as he knows and states, he does not certainly confirm the plan for levying of war. Hiden was not there; he does not attempt to confirm him; and I think in cross-examination, he told you expressly in words, that he had no knowledge of any conspiracy or plan for levying of war; therefore, all he confirms, is the plan of assassination, not the plan of levying war; and do not, I pray you, forget for a single moment, that the plan of levying war is the only thing which constitutes treason in this count of the indictment.

There was one piece of evidence indeed, which, from reading the notice given to the prisoners, I was taught to expect would have been produced, which would have been mainly confirmatory of their supposed intention to excite war in the state. The prisoners had notice to produce a proclamation, which was said to have existed, and which would have clearly manifested their intention, namely, a proclamation, "that their tyrants were destroyed; that the friends of liberty were called upon to come forward as the provisional government was then sitting." Signed, "James Ings, secretary." Now, if that proclamation were in evidence before you; if it had been produced; if it could have been produced; or even if its existence could have been proved by testimony such as you could believe, I must here admit at once, however visionary, however absurd all their schemes were, yet if you had unquestionable evidence that such were their schemes, that such had been their deliberations and consultations, however absurd they were, I must have admitted the case was made out against these men. But is that fact confirmed at all? neither Monument nor Hiden, the confirmatory witnesses, say a word about it; they know nothing about it. Does any other witness confirm it? I will tell you what the supposed confirmation of this proclamation is, the witness Adams has told you that such a proclamation was written, and that six sheets of cartridge paper were sent for, upon two or three of which sheets of cartridge paper these proclamations were written. Hale proves he was sent to fetch cartridge paper; is the sending for a sheet of paper any proof what was afterwards written upon that paper? the wicked ingenuity of this fellow, feeling that he had here to make out a case of high treason, has availed himself of a fact in the cause, which could be proved, to introduce a fact into the cause which I am bound to say did not exist, because there is not a shadow of proof of its existence; he does not even tell you, that those proclamations were destroyed. The witness who confirms the fact of sending for the paper, afterwards states what I consider another important fact, namely, that among the things in the cupboard was found part of the cartridge paper: now, if any thing had been written upon that cartridge paper, if even a fragment of it had been left, if you could only have found the words, "provisional government" upon that paper, I would have said that was a fair inference for you to say, that having found a part, you might fairly believe the rest which was spoken to, though not found there. But there is not a single fragment of writing, nor a single witness who affects to have seen it; but you see a part of the paper is found afterwards in the cupboard without a blot upon it. The men had no suspicion when they set out on this plan, that they should be taken; but when they are taken, not one word of this proclamation is found upon them, and the whole proof of this most important piece of evidence which is to give a colour to all the rest, remains on the unsupported testimony of a witness such as Adams, who has described such facts of himself that I can hardly find terms to say what the man is; but I must say, and do and must ever feel, that he is one of the basest of mankind; and even in the witness box shows that he is not worthy of credit. Now, can you believe this piece of evidence upon the testimony of such a man?

If, then, it be material and necessary to confirm this man, are there other sources from which he might have been confirmed? because if there be any one man in existence, who could have given confirmation to this man, but who is not called, you will mainly suspect, that if that man was called, so far from confirming him, he must have destroyed the whole of his testimony. There is a man in existence, we know, who could have confirmed him; there is a man in existence, who has been called to confirm him, but that man is not called again; I mean a man of the name of Dwyer. There was an attempt made, when that man was called, to impeach his testimony, and I suppose you did not think his testimony upon that occasion was impeached, because I am bound to assume, you gave credit to him. My learned friend, the attorney-general, seems to think I am irregular in what I am stating, that I ought not to allude to the former trial.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—It is not strictly correct, but one is reluctant to interrupt a gentleman in your situation; but even if your conclusion is right, that the jury did not believe his evidence, it would be the more proper for the Crown to pause as to calling him again.

Mr. Curwood.—My argument is, that the jury did believe him then.

But there is a man of the name of Edwards, who is not included in the indictment, though throughout the evidence in the cause he appears to be a most active conspirator; he is at every meeting; you find him manufacturing the hand-grenades; he is the man who is charging the fuses; why is he not called? why is he not here? My learned friends must pardon me for saying, that I think every witness, who by any possibility could give confirmation to such a man as Adams, ought at least to appear in that box to be examined, and to stand the test of cross-examination; and you must suspect there is something amiss behind, when that witness is not called before you.

It may be said, that though Edwards was there, and is not called, there were other conspirators present, who are not in the indictment, and whom the prisoners might have called, and who are competent witnesses. If this had been a case of mere guilt or innocence there might have been a great deal more in that argument; but, inasmuch as those witnesses cannot be called to say that they are innocent men, for if they come here they must admit that they have been guilty of great and atrocious crimes, though they might conscientiously and truly swear, that they had not been guilty of this specific crime, they would come into this court with halters about their necks, and would not be suffered to leave that witness box, but most probably would be sent from thence to Newgate. Is it likely, then, that they should be brought here by the prisoners? Let not that argument, therefore, press too heavily against the prisoners. If there was any truth in this story, there would have been matter, as I apprehend, of confirmation from other quarters; because, on the night when these parties met in Cato-street, to carry into execution that plan, which I perhaps must admit they had in contemplation; if there was any truth in the testimony of Adams, as to their ulterior plan, at that very moment other parties ought to have been proceeding towards the Artillery-ground and Gray's-inn-lane. Now, however, the plan in Cato-street failed; it did not fail time enough to prevent the operation of the other parties. If there were any truth in the idea of this plot, there would have been some attempts in the other parts of the town. Now it appears, that every thing was quiet there, and that therefore, as far as it operates at all, operates in contradiction to the case of the Crown.

There is, I admit, connected with this plan of assassination a great deal of conversation about public dissatisfaction. Can that, or can it not be explained according to now existing events? That this lower order of politicians had taken a scheme of arming themselves, perhaps it is impossible to deny; but what I deny is, the inference that my learned friend, the counsel for the Crown, drew from it, that because they took to arming themselves, therefore they must of necessity have contemplated raising rebellion against the constituted authorities of the country. In other times, and under other circumstances, perhaps, it might have been a strong argument that it was so intended; but look only to recent events, and see whether in those recent events you do not find a key to the whole transaction. I have alluded before, and must of necessity allude again to a late public transaction (for where the course pursued by the counsel for the Crown is the same, my track to follow them must be the same also), though it might be tedious to the same persons to hear the same things repeated again and again, yet it becomes a duty, and some of you have not heard what others have. Then let me call your attention to the event at Manchester; where an immense population, as it now appears, unarmed, were attacked by an armed force. In speaking of this event, I am most anxious to say nothing that should intimate an opinion from myself either on the one side or the other; here I wish to discard, and I hope you will do the same, any political feeling I may have respecting men who are entitled to be defended and judged of according to the strict letter of the law, without any regard to their actual or supposed political conduct. But most certain it is, that by one set of men that attack was considered a necessary act of duty; another set of men, who were favourers of government in the main too, thought it an act of oppression on the people; while another party did not hesitate to call it the massacre at Manchester; and as they considered it an attempt, on the part of government, to prevent the exercise of the legal right of Englishmen to assemble and discuss their grievances, and to put a stop to that which we consider as one of the best constitutional safe-guards (I say nothing, gentlemen, who are right, or who are wrong), but this I know, it was felt or said by many, that, inasmuch as people could not assemble unarmed with safety, many of the demagogues took advantage of that feeling, and held out to the people that it was necessary they should arm themselves to attend those meetings which they considered as legal assemblies; and that explains what Thistlewood said to Monument, "All my people are arming themselves;" he does not go on to tell him we are all arming ourselves for the purpose of raising rebellion against the government; but taking the current feeling of the day among certain people of the country, it is this; "notwithstanding the attempts to prevent our public meetings, we will continue to meet, to discuss our grievances; and as we may be attacked by an armed force, we will arm to repel force by force." I do not say that it was not a desperate resistance of the law, but be it so. If any of you think it was, still that will not warrant you in coming to the conclusion, that the men who so acted are guilty of high treason in levying war against the government. This transaction will furnish you with a clue to a great deal of the conduct of these persons; it will furnish you with the reason why these men were arming themselves, without resorting to the supposition adopted on the other side, that because they armed themselves they were of necessity contemplating war and rebellion.

What fortifies me in this conjecture, and what produces the little pleasure that could affect one's mind in the contemplation of the transaction, as it is detailed to us, is this; I do not find that the witness Adams, on any one occasion, has stated expressions hostile towards the person of the king; this, at least, is a feature of the case very distinguishable from the cases which happened in the year 1794. I dare say many of you recollect the proceedings of the reforming societies of that day, when not only our sacred sovereign, but the very kingly office itself were spoken of in terms which made one shudder. And I am most happy to lay my finger on any thing which can relieve the general gloom of this case. In no part of this transaction, as it is stated to us, is there evidence that a malignant expression was used against the king's person; and if I might here deviate to state a private feeling of my own, I feel it with particular satisfaction, for I am one of those who think we ought never to name our king and our sovereign, either publicly or privately, without respect and veneration. I do not deal in the language of adulation, gentlemen; I am one of those who think the name of the king ought never to be mentioned without respect; and I do not say so from motives of flattery, but from what I consider sound constitutional principles. Because that does not restrain me or any man from boldly and fearlessly canvassing the acts of any administration, and expressing freely my opinion of their results; for the acts of an administration are to be condemned if bad, not as being the personal acts of the king, but as the acts of men who, by bad advice, mislead their sovereign; and I have therefore a right to oppose the acts of any administration boldly and freely, so it be done with decent language and temperate conduct, and I do not, in so doing, fail in the least in that reverence and respect due from every subject to the royal person and authority.

In the variety of evidence which has been given to you on this occasion, perhaps you will pardon me if I pause for a moment to see what further observation may present itself on different parts of it. One observation strikes me at this moment, that a witness, such as Adams, at least, should be consistent in his testimony. But I cannot fail of observing,—and it appears upon his cross-examination, therefore I may observe upon it here, that on every trial he has varied something, and added something new; now a man who came in the first instance to tell you a story so much in detail, ought not to have added other material facts. But I cannot fail to observe that as the case of every separate prisoner has come forward, he has found out some new fact pressing proportionably harder upon that particular prisoner. This at least is a suspicious feature in his evidence, and will not render it more worthy of credit at your hands.

With respect to the confirmation he has received at the hands of witnesses whom you cannot suspect, that confirmation does not go to the point of treason: recollect, the treason is the motive of their assemblies, and is to be inferred from what passed in their deliberations; that rests wholly upon himself; no other witness speaks to that matter. The first head of confirmation which is given is, that they took a room (two or three witnesses are called who concur in that respect) at the back of Brunt's, and had frequent assemblies there; that is a fact not denied; but it is not their meeting in that room, it is what were their deliberations when they were so met, which you are to consider. To illustrate this: suppose in any one of the clubs (the shoemaker's club for instance, which has been talked of) Mr. Monument had come forward, and stated, that in this shoemaker's club there were treasonable conversations carried on, and that some person had come and proved that all those parties met in this room; he is confirmed as to their being there; but are you therefore to believe a most wicked witness, when he invents all sorts of stories as to the conversations in that room?

Then there is another piece of confirmation, that certain persons were watching about lord Harrowby's door; that is, I admit, a confirmation of part of his story, but to what extent? it is a confirmation of the story, that they had in design this desperate assassination plot, but it is not a confirmation that they meant to levy war against his majesty; that does not stand confirmed; so that all the confirmation coming from unsuspected sources goes to the extent of an assassination plot, but not a conspiracy to levy war against the constituted authorities of the country.

It has struck me in re-considering this very important case, that I may have overlooked (what if I have overlooked must be ever matter of deep regret to me) a very important consideration of the evidence, which, if I am right in my present view of it, ought not only to serve the present prisoners, but ought to have served those who have gone before them; the English law in its great regard to the subject's safety, with respect to the crime of treason, has said, no man shall be held guilty of treason, without being convicted by the testimony of two witnesses; and here, for a moment, I would beg his lordship's attention: there must be two witnesses to a substantive treason. I do not mean to contend there must be two witnesses to each overt act, but there may be one witness to one overt act, and another witness to another overt act, of the same species of treason. Then let us look at the substantive treasons stated in this indictment, and at the overt acts there charged in support of them, and see if there be two witnesses to a substantive treason, or if any two of the overt acts be proved by any witness, except Adams.

The indictment (and you will consider it with great attention) states eleven overt acts; they are differently stated in three of the counts of the indictment; but I believe they are in substance all the same. When I have gone through the overt acts in the first count of the indictment, you will consider whether you find two witnesses speaking distinctly to the same thing. The first count, as you know, turns upon whether they intended to levy war or not; and the first overt act stated is, that they met, and assembled, and conspired and consulted, to devise, arrange and mature plans and means to subvert and destroy the government and constitution of the realm. Now, the fact of their meeting is proved by several witnesses. That I admit; but it is not simply the fact of their meeting, upon which this is to depend, it is with what intent they met. Who proves that they met with an intent to overturn the constitution? Adams. Who else proves it? who says any thing more of the deliberations than Adams? no one: therefore it rests solely on the testimony of Adams—that is the first overt act. The second overt act is pretty nearly the same in substance; that they did meet and conspire to stir up, raise, make and levy insurrection, rebellion and war.—Mind, it is not the fact of their meeting which is the overt act, but it is the intention with which they met which is to be proved. Who proves the intention with which they met but one witness? Look through the series of witnesses called, and see whether you find another witness who proves the intention with which they met. The third overt act is, that they met with a design to assassinate divers of the privy council of our lord the king; that I admit is proved by more than one witness—distinctly proved; but you are next to ask yourselves, whether the overt act, when it is proved, furnishes an inference as a necessary consequence, that the overt act proves the levying of war and rebellion. I have an admission of the learned counsel, that to assassinate the whole privy council does not of itself amount to high treason.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I understood Mr. Gurney to admit, that a conspiracy to murder a privy councillor is not high treason; but I never heard him admit, that an overt act (proved over and over again) to murder his majesty's ministers, is not to go to the jury for them to infer, whether that was with an ultimate design of deposing the king and levying war against the king. I do not wish to interfere with your argument, but I think you have misunderstood the admission.

Mr. Curwood.—Mr. Gurney admitted, as the law is, that to conspire to murder, or even actually to murder, the whole privy council, is not of itself a substantive treason.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—No man will understand, and especially when it is in the hands of the counsel for the prisoners, that there is the least impatience on the part of the Court; but when you stated broadly, that you had an admission, I thought it right to call your attention to it, for the purpose of seeing whether there was such an admission. I hope you will not consider my interruption as inconvenient or improper.

Mr. Curwood.—On no occasion would I consider the interruption of his lordship as unkind; I have on too many occasions to thank him for great urbanity. I did not state, that it was not evidence from which you might infer another object, but I contend, that that being proved, you were not precluded from exercising your own judgment; that you were not bound up from considering, whether they had or not another object in view. The learned counsel for the Crown admitted, that of itself it was not high treason; and my argument is, that it not being high treason of itself you were not of necessity to suppose it was to be followed by high treason; you may, in your judgment, think it is good evidence—that there is something else to follow; or you may say, on the other hand, that there is no evidence that any thing was to follow. I put it merely as an argument to your understandings, and not as conclusive evidence.

The next overt act is varying only the terms of it; that they did procure divers arms and weapons to assassinate divers of the privy council; to which the same argument applies. I admit the fact; but I say, that having admitted the fact, it does not of necessity follow, that they had any other object in view. Then, the seventh is, that they conspired to seize cannon with an intention to arm themselves, and other false traitors, to levy and make war. You must take the whole of it together, not merely the conspiring to seize cannon, but for that particular purpose of levying war against the king. Why, perhaps they had no such purpose to levy war against the king; still it reverts back to the testimony of Adams the only witness who speaks to the purpose of their minds.

The next overt act is, that of conspiring to set fire to certain buildings; that I admit has been proved, but I deny the consequence. I say, they might conspire to set fire to buildings, but whether for the purpose of plunder, or for the purposes of levying war, is a matter for you to decide upon; and that does not yet appear in evidence, except on the testimony of Adams. Then comes the overt act, that they published divers proclamations; but there is not a tittle of evidence except that they published one, and that from the mouth of Adams. Then the next is, that they published a specific proclamation.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Is it publishing, or preparing?

Mr. Curwood.—I beg your lordship's pardon, it is preparing. Then comes this specific proclamation. Now, I have argued before, that that proclamation is not at all in existence; it is a mere invention of Adams; but even supposing that he speaks truth upon this occasion, what else is there to confirm him? it rests solely upon the testimony of Adams. Then comes the rest—an insurrection actually to levy war, that is, in fact, if I may so call it, a sweeping overt act; and the argument I have had the honour to address to you before, equally applies to this. That is the whole question, whether there was, or not, any design to levy war against his majesty.

Now, I believe I have submitted at least the leading points of the evidence to your consideration. I have not attempted to dilate much upon it, because in the exercise of the duty that I have to perform to these unfortunate men, I have thought it best to convey my meaning in as few words as I possibly could. I have not attempted any thing like declamation; I have confined myself to such arguments as have presented themselves to my mind, praying you to take into your consideration many others that must present themselves to your own; but, as I said before, I trust by my brevity I have not confused what I meant to say. If I have had the good fortune to state intelligibly those arguments I have presented, I can only conclude by imploring you to lay out of your minds all which has passed on former occasions, weigh deliberately and seriously before you condemn men to death upon the testimony of such an infamous witness as this man appears to be. At least be satisfied that he is confirmed by unsuspected testimony; and what I was going to pray, I know you will grant—Those amongst you who have pronounced verdicts on former juries, if you should, on a calm and dispassionate review of the testimony of this man, see reason to alter your former opinions, have the manly fortitude to do it; and do not, because without impeachment to yourselves in another view of the evidence you have come to another conclusion, think that conclusion binding upon you now. This is all I ask, and this I know you will readily grant.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PRISONERS.

Mary Barker sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Adolphus.

You are the daughter of Tidd, who now stands at the bar?—I am.

Do you know a man of the name of Edwards?—Yes.

Do you know a man of the name of Adams?—Yes.

Did Edwards ever leave any thing at your father's lodgings, or house?—Yes, he did.

How long before this dreadful affair in Cato-street?—About a fortnight, I think.

What did he leave there?—He left things; that I since have heard were grenades, and likewise powder.

Do you remember the grenades by their shape?—They were in a kind of cannister.

Was one of them considerably larger than the others?—Yes.

Who left that very large one?—Adams.
For what purpose did they profess to leave them? were they to remain there, or not?—Edwards asked, if he might leave them for a little while.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you propose this as a contradiction of Adams, or as a substantive fact? I do not remember that you examined Adams to this.

Mr. Adolphus.—No; I do not offer it as a contradiction.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I thought it might have escaped my recollection.

Mr. Adolphus.—No; there is very small chance of its escaping your lordship's recollection: were they to remain there?—No; they were to be called for again.

Were any of them taken away?—Edwards took them once away, and said he would take them to finish them, and he brought them back again.

How long was that before the Cato-street affair?—It might be about a week.

Were they ever taken away again?—They were taken away on the 23rd.

By whom were they then taken away?—By Edwards.

Were they ever brought back again?—There were some brought back on the morning of the 24th.

How long was that before the officers came?—About a quarter of an hour.

Do you know who brought them back?—No.

Did you see the person?—Yes.

Was he a stranger to you entirely?—Yes.

In about a quarter of an hour afterwards he brought them again?—Yes.

Was there a box, among other things, left in your house?—Yes.

In what state was that?—Corded.

Was that ever, to your knowledge, uncorded at any time?—No.

Was it taken away on the 23rd, or did it remain where it had been?—It remained exactly where it had been till the morning of the 24th, when the officers took it away.

What it contained you did not know till the officers came?—I do not know till this day.

Thomas Chambers sworn.—Examined by
Mr. Curwood.

Is your name Thomas Chambers?—Yes.

Where do you live?—At No. 3, Heathcock-court in the Strand.

Do you know the witness Adams, who has been examined here?—Yes.

Do you remember the day when the people were taken up in Cato-street?—Yes.

Did he, in company with any body, call upon you at any time before that?—Twice.

How long before?—About a month before, in company with Edwards.

What conversation had you with him?—They asked me (Edwards first), whether I would go along with them; I asked them where.

Was Adams by?—Yes. He said, Why I was not such a fool as not to know there was something on foot; I said, no, I did not know there was something on foot. "Well, we are going to kill his majesty's ministers," says Adams, "and we will have blood and wine for supper."

Are you sure of the expressions?—Yes.

What else did he say?—Edwards replied, "By God, Adams, you are right; it shall be so."

Do you remember the evening when Adams was taken up?—No, I do not know about that.

The evening that the people in Cato-street were taken up, I mean?—Yes; I remember that nothing occurred to me that night.

Did Adams call upon you that evening?—No; he called upon me the Monday before that took place, and Edwards with him, with a bag with him.

What did that bag contain?—He asked me to let him leave it with me; I asked what it contained, and he said, only a few pistols and such like; and a man named William Tunbridge was in my room at the time.

Did you let him leave it?—I told them, I would not let them leave it, or any such things, and I never saw them afterwards.

You are sure they made use of those expressions about blood and wine for supper?—I am certain of it.

Thomas Chambers cross-examined by
Mr. Gurney.

What book were you sworn upon?—I do not know what book it is; there it is.

Nor care?—I never took an oath but once before I came here the other day; this is the third time; it is the prayer-book, I should suppose.

Do you believe in Christianity?—I do; I am a churchman.

And you always said so?—Yes, I never said to the contrary; I always believed in the Bible, and was brought up to the church.

And Paine's works perhaps you have read?—No, I never saw them.

Do you know the two prisoners?—Yes, both of them.

How long have you known them?—I have known Davidson since, I believe, about the time of Mr. Hunt's procession.

How long have you known Tidd?—I have not known him except in the trade.

You and he are brother shoemakers?—Yes.

How long have you known him?—I cannot say.

Oh yes, you can; half a year?—I cannot say.

Will you swear you have not known him a twelve-month?—Yes, I will.

Will you swear you have not known him nine months?—I cannot say pointedly.

Will you swear you have not known him six?—I cannot say.

Did you not know him at the time of Mr. Hunt's procession?—Know him?

That is all I ask you?—I did not, particularly.

Did not you know him?—I cannot say, not to swear to him, not particularly.

Do you mean to say, you did not know him as early as Mr. Hunt's procession into London?—I cannot say.

How soon after?—It might be at some of the meetings.

Meetings where?—In Smithfield.

Did you attend them all?—I did; every meeting that was held openly in the air.

You scorn secret meetings?—Yes; and there is not a man in England who can say I attended one, whose word is worth a farthing.

Did you carry banners?—Yes.

Whom did you go with?—With scores of people.

I know that; any of the prisoners who are indicted?—I cannot say but I might have walked with them in the procession.

I dare say you can give me their names without any difficulty?—There are some of the prisoners whom I do not know.

But there are some of them you do know; you told me before, you knew Ings?—Yes.

And Brunt?—And Brunt.

And Wilson?—By person.

And Harrison?—And Harrison very well.

And Bradburn?—I do not know Bradburn so well.

But you know him?—Yes.

Strange?—No; I do not think I know Strange at all.

Did you go to any of the Smithfield meetings in company with any of the persons that have been mentioned?—I cannot say: they might be there.

Did not you and Wilson go together?—No, not to my knowledge; he might be there.

What weapon did you carry to the Smithfield meeting?—None but the flag which I carried openly.

What in your pocket?—None.

Had you no pistol in your pocket?—I carried none, nor I knowed of nobody that carried none.

You told me you carried a flag at each of the meetings; how long have you known Thistlewood?—Ever since Mr. Hunt's procession.

Where have you seen him since?—He has been in my house repeatedly since, for I took home the flags afterwards; for he has been there to fetch them and distribute them to those who were to take them in the open air in the meetings.

Have you seen him at any other place since?—Yes; one Sunday evening, at the Black Dog, in Gray's-inn-lane.

Do you know the White Lion, in Wychstreet?—Very well.

Do you frequent it?—I have not done it of late; I used to do.

What is your number and section?—I have got no such thing.

You do not know of any such things?—I know of nothing of the kind.

What was the name of your society?—It was no specific name; they called themselves reformers, that was all.

Were Harrison, and Wilson, and Davidson, and Palin, and Thistlewood, all with you at the Smithfield meeting?—I cannot say that.

Was Thistlewood there?—I saw Thistlewood there when Mr. Hunt was in the waggon, and I was in the waggon; I was always in the waggon.

Was Davidson there?—I cannot say; there were thousands of people.

Will you swear you did not see Davidson there; he is remarkable in his person?—I can swear he was not there; that I did not see him, at least, when Mr. Hunt took the chair.

You were always in the waggon?—I do not think I ever saw him in the waggon.

I did not ask whether you saw him in the waggon?—There might be other people of colour there besides him.

Will you swear he was not there?—I do not think I saw him there.

At this time, when Adams and Edwards called upon you, about a week before the Cato-street affair, and told you there was a plan to assassinate his majesty's ministers, and Adams said, you must be a fool not to know what was going on—No, Edwards said that.

"Edwards asked me, and Adams being by, asked me too, if I would go along with them, that I was not such a fool"—I said, "go along where," and he said, "why I was not such a fool as not to know there was something on foot;" I said "No I did not know there was something on foot." "Well, we are going to kill his majesty's ministers," says Adams.

Adams said, "We will have blood and wine for supper?"—Yes; and then Edwards replied, "By God, Adams, you are right."

And you thought they were such ferocious monsters, they were going to commit assassination?—Yes; but I did not consider they would get fools enough to do it; I considered myself a fool, but not so big a fool as that.

But lest they should, did not you go and give information?—It never struck me; but the reason was, I never thought they would get any body to do such a foolish thing.

Keeping such company as you did, I should have thought you might have expected it?—I never heard a man say a word against his majesty's ministers, except those men Edwards and Adams, in my room, and a drunken man in an ale-house.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—What was the ridiculous thing that you thought so very preposterous, that thinking yourself pretty much of a fool, (I do not say that) you thought they could not get a fool big enough to do?—To go with Edwards and Adams; foolish enough to go and kill them.

You thought that so monstrous and absurd, no man would be found monster enough to do that?—Not to do that.

Mr. Gurney.—You never thought of the wickedness of it, only the folly?—I thought they would not be able to get any one to do it. You never heard any man say any thing against the ministers, except a drunken man?—Except in a newspaper.

And yet you attended the Smithfield meetings?—That was in the open air.

Will you now swear again, having attended all those meetings, that you did not otherwise than from these men and a drunken man in an ale-house, hear persons speak violently against his majesty's ministers?—Never, as to killing them.

I do not suppose they mention such things in Smithfield?—I never heard them say things harder than I have read in the public papers.

You told me, I think, before, that you first met with Ings at a shop near you, where public papers were sold?—Yes.

The Black Dwarf and Medusa and Republican shop?—You say so, not I.

You said so?—That that was where they were sold, but not I, I said, yes.

The little shop where they are stuck round close to your court?—Yes, and I will tell you all the books I read, and those are Cobbett's.

You cannot read worse?—I cannot think I can read better, for they have kept me out of all kinds of hobbles.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You only read the works you have mentioned, and you apprehend you have been sworn upon the prayer-book?—Yes; I never read any thing but Cobbett, I had got plenty of them before.

And you apprehend you have been sworn to day upon the prayer-book?—Yes; so I apprehend.

John Bennett sworn.—Examined by Mr. Curwood.

Where do you live?—At No. 4, Little Park-lane, New-street, Mary-le-bone.

What are you by trade?—A bricklayer.

Do you know a man of the name of Hiden?—Yes.

Did he at any time call upon you, and ask you to accompany him at any private radical meetings?—Yes, he has.

Did he use those expressions, a private radical meeting?—Yes, he has, in my own house.

Has he endeavoured to persuade you to accompany him once, or more than once?—More than once or twice, or ten times.

Many times?—Yes.

What did he tell you was to be done there?—He did not tell me any thing was to be done; he only requested me to go with him, that I might sit and see and hear, and say nothing without I chose.

Did you ever accompany him?—No, I never did; I never moved to any meeting, either public or private, in my life.

Of course we do not bind you down to other meetings, but private or public radical meetings?—No, I never did to no meetings.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am now going to call evidence to Davidson's character, my lord.

Isaac Cook sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Where do you live?—24, Charlotte-street, Blackfriars'-road.

How long have you known the prisoner Davidson?—About six years.

In what situation has he been in that time?—About six years ago, he worked as a journeyman for me in the cabinet line.

Has he continued in that employ since or not?—I believe he has, but not for me.

Have you continued acquainted with him?—Occasionally he has called at my house, when he has wanted any wood.

In the way of business?—Yes.

What character are you able to give to him?—At the time he worked for me, he was a very honest hard-working industrious man, and he conducted himself as a journeyman ought to do.

Have you known sufficiently of him to speak of his character since?—No.

That character goes only to six years ago?—Yes.

Do you know of what line of life he had been in before he came to you?—I think I have heard him say—

Mr. Adolphus.—I cannot ask to that.

Robert M^r William sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

What are you by profession?—An architect. Living where?—In Lion's-inn.

How long have you known the prisoner Davidson?—I knew him in the years 1800 and 1801, so far as from reading mathematics with him at Aberdeen.

Have you had any acquaintance with him since?—I have met him three or four times in the streets of London since; the last of which I think was in June 1816.

Mr. Adolphus.—I am afraid he has only to thank you for your good intentions: I cannot ask you as to his character eighteen years ago?—I should think not; I was rather surprised at his sending to me; it is so long ago since I have known much of him.

Stephen Hales sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

What are you?—I keep a grocer's shop at No. 17, Bell-court, Gray's-inn-lane.

You appear on behalf of Tidd?—Yes.

How long have you been acquainted with him?—Fifteen months; during which time I never saw any thing in his conduct of what is now brought before the Court.

You never saw any thing treasonable, or which looked like conspiracy?—No.

He never invited you to any meetings?—No.

Did he appear an industrious and prudent man?—Yes, he was always at his work; or when he had nothing to do, took a walk with his family, or reading.

He seemed a quiet well-disposed man?—Yes.

William French sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

What are you?—A carpenter and undertaker, No. 18, Union-court, Holborn.

How long have you known Tidd?—Nearly three years; he was a lodger and tenant of mine.

What character has he borne in that time?—The best of characters; I never saw any thing wrong; I called every week for my rent; he appeared a very industrious and honest man; I never wished for a better tenant, and particularly punctual to his word.

Samuel Lands sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

Where do you live?—No. 11, Charles-street, Hatton-garden.

What are you by business?—A boot maker.

How long have you known Tidd?—Turned of three years.

What character has he borne?—A very good one to the best of my knowledge.

As an honest and industrious man?—He always appeared so; Mr. Tidd has worked for me the whole of that time.

Therefore you have a good opportunity of knowing his character?—Yes.

He has deserved your good opinion?—Yes, he has.

Robert Wood sworn.—Examined by Mr. Adolphus.

What are you?—A tinman and brazier.

Where do you live?—At No. 5, Elliot's-row, near Lord's cricket-ground.

How long have you known Tidd?—I have no knowledge of Tidd; I know Davidson, and have known him upwards of three years.

What has been his character during that time?—He was a cabinet-maker; he has appeared a very sober industrious man.

Mr. Adolphus.—There are other witnesses to character but I will not call them, my lord.

Mr. Adolphus.—Gentlemen of the jury, the course of the arduous duty which I have undertaken on behalf of the unfortunate prisoners who are named in this indictment, or at least six of them, brings me now for the fourth time to address a jury on a case which has been laid before them, with the same circumstances (and except a few variations, such as particular incidents have required), almost verbally with the same proof; and, gentlemen, it is not only the distaste which arises from frequent repetition, but certainly in some degree it is that enervation of the mind which must result from frequent ill success, which makes me declare that I rise to address you under circumstances, peculiarly painful. That I have heretofore very much at length, and with great minuteness investigated these circumstances, that I have done so unsuccessfully, presents no topics to my mind either of consolation or of dismay, because I know that I have performed my duty according to the best of my ability, and I know, too, that if the particular facts of to-day should present to your minds reasons which have not occurred to the minds of any juries before, or to any of you who may have been on juries before, you would notwithstanding what others have done, or what you yourselves might have concurred in, give your verdict this day as if the matter were entirely new, and come to such a conclusion as the evidence shall require, without regard to what has been done before. But the enervation and prostration of mind I have described arises from this, that it is nearly impossible to tread the same ground again with the same confidence and vigour as at first; and it is impossible not to believe that that which has before failed in convincing must fail again, and not to feel that which is inseparably connected with ill success, a degree of dispiritedness which enfeebles the mind even where it feels deeply, unaffectedly, and sincerely.

VOL. XXXIII.

My learned friend has stated, that he feels sensible that all has been said which could be said on the subject before us. I confess, retaining the opinions I entertained at first, I feel a perpetual jealousy of my own efforts, a perpetual distrust of the powers of my own mind, which makes me believe I must have omitted something, because I failed to convince. I fear, however, that I shall not be more vigorous than I have been in the introduction of my opinions, but must labour under all the inconveniences arising from lassitude and distrust of myself.

This case is laid before you for the fourth time, without any variation of facts, though with some novelty in respect to the manner of introducing it, and that is not to be wondered at, because a number of gentlemen highly polished and instructed, will each take a somewhat different view of any subject. My learned friend and myself had no opportunity of shifting our ground;—when I say shifting our ground, I do not mean to use that as a phrase of any levity with respect to my learned friends; but they have some advantage in presenting the aspect of this case, which is denied to my learned friend, Mr. Curwood, and myself, for we have had to labour up the same track without relief from each other. We have never varied the mode of statement of our argument; if we had, it would have been charged upon us in reply as evidence of the fallacy of our former arguments, and that we had taken to others still more fatal. I can only therefore repeat to you part of that which I have stated before, with such little novelty as the occasion may suggest. I can only resort to the same topics I have already used within your hearing, or at least within your knowledge; for you cannot be ignorant of that which all the town has learned.

It has been already stated to you, by my learned friend, that the conspiracy which constitutes the treason on the present indictment is proved mainly if not entirely, by the witness Adams, who is, as a witness, too infamous to demand implicit credit from a jury. The law with respect to accomplices and their confirmation has been discussed so often at the bar, has been so often, so clearly, and so forcibly laid down by the judges, that it is next to impossible to hope that any observation at this time can acquire much of your attention; but I take the liberty of remarking that it stands clearly as a rule of law, not to be departed from in practice, that an accomplice must be so confirmed that his tale must become credible—not merely credible in some parts, but that he shall gain credit while he is detailing the whole—by the credit you are induced to give to his veracity in those parts where he is confirmed by other witnesses; but the confirmation depends mainly on the manner in which he appears before the jury. With respect to some witnesses, a slight confirmation will produce credit; with respect to others, very strong confirmation will be required before they are believed. I am not saying in point of law (for it would be absurd and no man who had ever read a book of law would be able to say) that an accomplice is expected to be confirmed in every point of his narrative; for it must inevitably occur to every man's observation, that if he were expected to be so confirmed in every point, he might have been dispensed with, for the case could do as well without his evidence. Assuredly no man, from the attorney-general to myself, would ever, in such a case, bring an accomplice at all, and we would exempt the accomplice from cross-examination by bringing at once the man who would make his evidence unnecessary; but without going to that extent, I do humbly insist, that it is necessary that an accomplice, who comes to prove a crime, should be confirmed in something that is material to that very crime, and that it is not sufficient to bring confirmation merely to certain matters of fact drawing toward the same focus.

I will put a familiar illustration; we will suppose, that in any part of the country there existed any set of men, who had been the bane of the community, who had plundered and robbed roosts and orchards, till they had become marked by every one; supposing on any occasion one of the party were detected, and he turned witness against the rest; supposing the plans and circumstances were so laid that he was seen at this public-house with that person, at another situation with other persons; and supposing this accomplice had pointed out the place where certain implements, useful for some part of their project, could be found, and that they were found accordingly; but supposing he added to that, that the intention was not to commit those depredations which were pointed at by other witnesses, but that he fixed upon them a charge of burglary, an intent to murder the master of the house: that witness being proved to be so bad a character, it would go very seriously to the jury to consider whether the certainty of being confirmed in slight, general, or unimportant particulars, had not encouraged him to the invention of a charge more atrocious, and to suggest crimes of a deeper dye than those which had really been contemplated. Suppose too, that there were a reward for one conviction, and not for another, when it was quite clear that there had been a plan to plunder orchards or hen roosts, to take away poultry or fruit, or to do other things which would be a subject of simple larceny, would it on the evidence of such a witness be believed, that the plan went to the unheard-of extent of robbing the house and murdering the family, more particularly if there was proof that that house was so well closed, and that family so well guarded, that those persons had no force or means to effect it, and must have run on assured and obvious destruction if they made the attempt? Gentlemen, I say, if that evidence, unsupported where it was capable of being supported, and unconfirmed except by particulars which were applicable to one case as well as another, were presented to you, would you not hesitate to pronounce the prisoners guilty of the higher offence? By this sort of parallel I wish the present case to be tried. Here is an obvious, known, avowed intention; it is that of wreaking vengeance, which some of those men were rash enough to believe had been merited by his majesty's ministers, on the heads of those ministers; vengeance repugnant to every sense of propriety from which a British mind recoils, but which does not amount (as I state from the admission of my learned friend) to high treason, unless it is taken as the overt act of a further intention; that is to say, to speak less technically, if the beginning and end of the plot of these men were to murder his majesty's ministers, to fire the town, to plunder the unfortunate objects of their vengeance, to do any other thing which were within that scope, they are not to be tried for it under the present indictment. These crimes are in themselves sufficient to subject the persons committing them to the highest and severest punishment; and if in the prosecution of their real intention they have committed other crimes, they can be reached by the law, without supposing that those acts form part of the plot charged in the present case; but unless they intended some or all those things which Adams has ascribed to them, namely, to depose the king, and to prevent his family from reigning, to seize the public munitions of the country, to establish a provisional government, which was to sit somewhere or other—unless they intended to seize the king's fortresses or palaces, and to levy war against the king, they are not guilty of high treason. That they did intend any or all of these things, you have from the mouth of Adams alone; and it will be for you to consider when we come to talk of him hereafter how far such a man, unsupported in these respects, is to be believed because he is supported in that which is avowed, because he is confirmed in circumstances which apply more to the meeting in Cato-street the objects of which were precisely defined, but without the aid of any witness to confirm him in those other more material circumstances to which I have adverted.

It is said by my learned friend who addressed you upon this case, after going through the list of confirmations which he intended to produce, that if all other confirmations were absent, Cato-street itself is a confirmation. It is a confirmation if the assassination of his majesty's ministers is the end intended;—it is a refutation, if it is supposed that the seizure of the town, the subjugation of the million who inhabit it, and the capture of his majesty's subjects who should present themselves in its defence, were the objects; I say it is a refutation of that, even if it should be granted that plans of an ulterior nature were at one time entertained, of which, give me leave to say, I see no distinct evidence. Cato-street, so far from confirming, distinctly repels that inference; for the large number of ball-cartridges found in a box never was carried to Cato-street, but remained corded up, as it had been for weeks before, in the lodgings of Tidd, and there it was found on the following morning by the officers; so that these twelve hundred rounds of ball-cartridges, which were to produce those mighty effects, were all locked up in the arsenal, except a dozen or two which were found in Cato-street; so far, then, from this being any evidence of an ulterior intention, it shews that the whole quantity, even if these men knew what that quantity was which was in that corded box, was in perfect quietness; and no man ever seems to have thought of taking them to Cato-street, or of meddling with them at all on that fatal and miserable night.

Then Cato-street, so much relied upon, confirms that which is not denied, but rebuts that which is to be raised as a superstructure upon it. It is said of Adams, that he has no interest to come here and to falsify the truth, by over-stating that which he pretends to know, or that which he may fairly be conceived to know; that consideration depends mainly upon the character of the man, and upon the circumstances under which he comes forward, and to these I beg particularly to direct your attention; he is the only witness to prove the ulterior intentions of these parties; their plot, whatever it was, had been detected, and had failed; the persons of many of them were in prison so early as Wednesday night, and the rest, I believe, of those now in custody, as early as Thursday morning; examinations of them, and respecting them, had undoubtedly taken place in the meantime, and all they had disclosed was related, so that we may take it, from what appears in the cause, that these transactions immediately aimed at by the meeting in Catostreet, namely, the attack of lord Harrowby's house (to which it is said Cato-street was particularly convenient, Cato-street being near to Grosvenor-square) were well known on Friday; then Mr. Adams is taken into custody, and on Saturday, after other examinations have failed, comes his deposition, extending the matter, which went only to murder and to conspiracy, to the full charge of high treason; which being in its nature a conspiracy, includes in one indictment all the parties, and makes the sayings of one in the absence of another evidence against him who is absent, and the distinct acts of each overt act applicable to the whole; therefore it is, that Mr. Adams on Saturday comes forward, and becomes a witness of great importance; whether he had contemplated that before or not, we cannot obtain a disclosure from him; we may form conjectures, in me they may be called mistaken suggestions, but if they enter into your minds, they may be effectual in giving a right character to the evidence, and a proper determination to the case.

Then let us see what Adams is, and what he comes to disclose; he has been described by my learned friend. And of all the men who have been characterized in court, Mr. Adams is the last person to complain. Is he a traitor to his king? my learned friend tells you so, and why? because Adams tells you so. Is he a traitor to the friends whom it appears by other evidence he had attempted to seduce, and who had intrusted him? his appearance before you shews it. Is he a renegade to the blessed faith, in which he had been instructed in his infancy, and on which he ought to have formed his conduct in life? he himself tells you so. But it has been said, and may be said again, he repents, and becomes converted and reformed; and nothing is so reasonable as that conversion which the moment of distress brings upon us, which the view of death forces upon us, and which the near approach of eternity compels us to embrace. It is observed by perhaps the best epic poet the world has produced, that the detection of hypocrisy does not belong to man, nor even to angels—that it is a privilege reserved by God to himself; most true is that observation; and therefore I shall be most careful in calling any man a hypocrite; but in the analysis of the human mind, I can only have recourse to human acts to determine what is real, and what a fallacious pretence; and this, with as much confidence as becomes me, I would press upon you; to my understanding, without attempting definitely to pronounce upon it, all the evidences of fraud, of guilt, and of hypocrisy, are upon this man, and not one of the marks of true repentance. Does a man, in truth, repent of a crime? he endeavours to make amends for it in the best way in his power; does he repent of deserting his God, and committing the sin against the Holy Ghost? he then, by contrition and humility, by self-examination and self-abasement, endeavours to make atonement for it, but not by the accusation of others, whom his example may have misled—not by making a sacrifice of the lives of others to save his own—not by tendering himself to kiss that gospel to which he has never been united—by receiving the sacrament again, by renewing his homage to his repudiated Redeemer, and soliciting peace with his offended Maker; but he would rather, if his profession of penitence were sincere, submit himself to the law he has incensed, than take the measure of betraying others; a measure suspicious in any hands, but which cannot possibly be pure in his.

I would not say this, were he a party without any apparent bias to the conviction of the individuals against whom he has appeared to give evidence, were he a party whose testimony had been consistent and uniform on all occasions; and, above all, were he a party whose evidence was in itself probable; but wanting all these circumstances, and standing self-condemned, then I do humbly insist, on behalf of these unfortunate men whose lives are assailed by his most corrupt and incredible testimony, that credit cannot be given to him unless he were better supported.

A man has been produced for the defendants, upon an answer of whom I have no doubt an observation will be made to you. On being asked, "On what book have you been sworn?" he says, "I believe on the common prayer-book." That such a mistake may have been made in the mind of a man who never was before examined in a court of justice cannot be unnatural, when it is one of the propositions laid down in our books on the law of evidence, that a swearing on the common prayer-book is just as binding on a deponent as if he had been sworn on the gospels, and just as open to punishment; there may have been therefore in his mind an idea of that kind. He is asked, "Have you read Paine's works, and suffered your mind to be corrupted by them?" "No, I never did read any of those books, and I never have renounced my faith." He is asked (I suppose it is a question of importance in this cause or it would not have been asked), When you knew of these infamous plots going on, when Adams, whom you have been called to contradict, and Edwards, who has never been called, told you this, did you go and give information before a justice of the peace? No, he did not. If there be any thing against this man from these circumstances (and I suppose there was by the way in which it has been pressed in cross-examination, and by the way in which some such matter has been most improperly mentioned elsewhere), it goes as much to the disadvantage of one as of the other. But the man is asked as to his private conduct, as it relates to parts of his private opinions; he tells you he has a drawer full of Cobbett's works; I wish his drawer were better filled. He tells you, he has known several of the prisoners, and that he has seen them at public meetings, but never at private. Does Adams tell you the same, or has he been the chief mover in all their private meetings? and does he now come forward, at last, to be their chief accuser when he can make any thing by it, when he could have done so on the first occasion? Chambers carried flags where all the world could see them; Adams conspired in private, where none could see him; but he has this advantage, that all his victims being included in one sweeping indictment, he can come forward to give evidence against them, without a by-stander to confront, or an observer to contradict him. Chambers is asked, "Did you in any meetings you attended hear any thing against his majesty's ministers?" "No," he says, "I did not;" evidently meaning by that not, "I did not hear their public measures and their conduct arraigned and criticised very severely; but I never heard, except from the mouth of Edwards and Adams, any thing like a proposition to assassinate them; when I did hear it from Adams and Edwards, it appeared to me, no men on earth could be found fools enough to believe such a thing;" and indeed, gentlemen, though there were twenty men found fools enough, it would require a credulity which no man can possess, to believe that there was the further design of surprising the town, intrenching the roads, seizing artillery, besieging the Mansion-house, over-awing the military, and causing a great number of people to assemble together to assist in executing all this by the single efforts of a few miserable men, without wealth, without connections, without talents, without all or any of the means of influence.

It is said, this proposition is mainly supported by the evidence of Monument, who states that at a certain period arms were to be prepared, and that Thistlewood had said that all his friends were to be armed. But when was this said? before the meeting at Finsbury; before those meetings in which these parties mostly shewed themselves, it was said that they must go armed; why? because by going armed they would overturn the government? No, that never appeared to have been the intention of any of them; and you are left to infer that from such isolated propositions as Adams has given you. It is said they went armed, and no doubt they did at the time of the meetings, in consequence of the transaction at the meeting at Manchester, which they, and others who sympathized with them, denominated the massacre at Manchester; they thought that by going armed they might prevent their being put down by those who would wish to interfere with their meetings; it arose out of the feeling of the moment, and no otherwise.

If there was at that time a thought that any considerable number of the populace would join them for the purposes of external mischief, the meetings at Finsbury and other places which took place towards the close of the last year, and the events which took place there, must have convinced them how impossible it was for them to succeed, unless they were too dull to understand, and too incapable even of mischief to be the subjects of a verdict; for it is known to all mankind, that in those meetings they were derided and pelted, their speeches treated with scorn, and their persons with insult; that it was apparent they could gain neither hearing nor favour. Then is it to be said, an insurrection is to be produced by the heads of the ministers being shewn on poles, the sight of burning houses, and the proceedings of a night such as never has been seen in London since the days of Richard the 2nd, when Wat Tyler paraded the streets with heads on poles? far from causing any thing like an insurrection, a violent resistance and the trampling to pieces of those atrocious men must have been the consequences; and those few who had not the courage or spirit to assist in trampling them down would have retired to their own houses, weeping and dejected, deploring the fate of those who had been murdered, and the state of their country, in the metropolis of which such a crime could have been transacted.

What confirmation have you that there was such an absurd plot, does the evidence of what was found in Cato-street confirm such a plot? Let the absurdity of the plot be evidence against that; and if it be said that a dozen of pikes could be of no use in the assassination of ministers, let it stand as parallel with that in the argument, that a dozen pike-staves and ten hand-grenades would have been of infinitely less importance in a general attack upon the town, and in the general subjugation of his majesty's loyal subjects, than they would have been in their superfluity in an attack on the minister's house, and on the persons of fifteen unarmed men. In wading between two dangerous masses of absurdity and contradiction to all the rules of probability and common sense, I should humbly submit to you, that that which leads to mercy and acquittal is the better course to take; and unless, on laying your hands upon your hearts you can say, we are convinced by other circumstances independently of the evidence of the infamous Adams, that there was a plot to the extent he has described; you will say, being able to make nothing of it, we have adopted the safer course, and have come to the conclusion that the murder of his majesty's ministers was in the thought of these men, and perhaps plunder beyond it; but there is nothing that leads us to believe, that there was any further intention to the extent this indictment charges, and which we must believe before we can find these men guilty of high treason.

It is said that the proclamation, or the supposed proclamation is also confirmatory of the original intention: that which you have heard respecting the proclamation, has come from the witness Adams, but it is supposed he is confirmed by the apprentice Hale; my learned friend has made many observations upon the improbability and absurdity of that proclamation; I wish it could have been possible for my learned friend to have produced such a paper, or that an attempt had been made to produce it, because you would then have seen from the scholarship of Ings, the butcher, about which I cannot give you evidence amounting to any thing like the writing of such a proclamation, how likely it was he was to be the secretary to any thing.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—There is nothing importing that Ings had written it; the evidence is, that he was not even called upon to do the official act of putting his official name to it, but that it was done by the author of the proclamation.

Mr. Adolphus.—It was so, gentlemen; not that he wrote the proclamation, which he might have done in a very good fair hand, and yet that would have argued nothing as to his scholarship, but that he was put forward as the secretary of a provisional government; but it is supposed this proclamation was written three times over, and that the copies were to be posted near burning buildings, in order to excite insurrection throughout the town by telling the people that their tyrants were destroyed, and that a provisional government was assembled; no man knowing who or where they were assembled. Mr. Ings is named as secretary of this provisional government, and this is confirmed by whom? by the apprentice, who says, that on a particular day he was sent out to purchase six sheets of cartridge paper. Let me suppose there is a meeting of men for a dangerous purpose, and that there are men who, upon the very eve of the explosion of the matter, are disposed to make that of it which does not belong to it, or that any one of them wants half a dozen sheets of cartridge paper, and that one of them sends out to buy it; who can prove what use it was put to except the witness Adams himself and he gives an account of it which is altogether incredible; cartridge paper is the very worst material for such a purpose; one part of a sheet of cartridge paper has been found during the search, in the very apartment in which this proclamation is supposed to have been written, a plain proof that the sheets were not put to that purpose, because if there was any intention to write the six proclamations, they would have been all used; that evidence therefore, either rebuts the proposition that there was such a proclamation, or proves nothing respecting it.

But let us recollect this; all the proclamations in the world, to be of any use, would not have been in the pocket or possession of one man, because that one man could not have been at many places at the same time, affixing those proclamations, so that they might be read by different detachments; all the persons supposed to concur in this proclamation, except Thistlewood himself, were taken on the spot at Cato-street, and yet not one of those proclamations was found in the possession of any one of them. Thistlewood was taken the next morning. It may be said he had destroyed that proclamation, but does his conduct exhibit any of that foresight which you would have anticipated? No, he is found with arms about him, and with cartridges in his pockets. Then is he to be supposed, nevertheless, to have had the precaution to tear the piece of paper which remained in his possession? When you examine into conduct, you cannot examine it with the supposition of such incredible inconsistency; you must suppose that a man who tore the proclamation would have thrown away the bullets, and that where the one remained the other would have been found, if it ever existed; but, I think, you will come to the conclusion, that this was one of the additions of the unbeliever Adams, who comes forward to save his own life, by fixing guilt upon others. The account which he gives of these proclamations, in order to give them in evidence in their absence is, "the last time I saw the proclamations" that applies to the three, which are given in evidence, the other I will not allude to "one was in the possession of Thistlewood, one in the possession of Ings, I know not what became of the third;" Ings then was the last possessor of one proclamation; he was taken without the power of making away with it, at the very spot in Cato-street, and yet no such proclamation, though they were immediately searched, was found, and, as I believe, no such proclamation so absurd and foolish ever had existence.

Mr. Baron Garraw.—It is not of much importance, but probably the gentleman who suggested that to you, had his mind filled with the former trial; I have not on this occasion, any evidence in whose possession they were; probably your own mind was going with my recollection, till it was suggested, certainly very properly, by the person who conceived it to be evidence in this cause.

Mr. Adolphus.—Gentlemen, I am obliged to his lordship for the correction; but you observe, as these trials advance we save time by not taking down the evidence each time, as considering the same facts as proved.

Mr. Baron Garraw.—Let it be considered as in the cause, it has been stated in one of the cases.

Mr. Adolphus.—Gentlemen, I have finished my observation; I said to my learned friend when he was examining to this matter, you have proved enough to put the verbal evidence of its contents before the jury, and you may proceed to that; that is literally how it happened. If I have said it appeared in this cause, that Ings was in the possession of any one of them, I have over-stated; but if Thistlewood was in possession of only one, the other parties, and probably those taken at Cato-street, would have been in possession of the others, and then if they were so in possession they would have been found upon their persons; but there is not produced a trace, not only of those three, but of any one of the six; the three existing in the memory of Adams; that three others were written stands on his recollection; but there is not a scrap of those, or any circumstance shewing their existence, produced in proof.

I think I have stated already, that it appears from Monument's evidence, that the plan of arming took place before the meeting in Finsbury; that evidence will come to your minds, as evidence founded on some degree of hope, though not founded on any promise; and when I say that, God forbid I should taint any man with a supposition which does not belong to him; but we all know how much a little expectation will warp our minds; when I say his majesty's ministers did not make a promise to Hiden, I treat them not as ministers, but merely as English gentlemen, to which in every situation of their lives they must be entitled, even from their most violent opponents; I concede to them only that which has always been conceded to them, in saying, that they are noblemen and gentlemen of the greatest personal virtues and individual merits; to say that individuals in such situations would not give a man a promise before he had given his evidence, is to say no more than that they were not the most infamous of mankind, which God knows I would not suppose of them; it is the furthest from my heart; but to say that the witness expects something, is not to stigmatize him; but I say, he takes my reason with him, when he says that he has a right to expect that the service he renders to the individuals composing his majesty's government, to fourteen persons whom he has put upon their guard so as to save their lives, should entitle him to their individual gratitude, and that I hope he will receive; that I take into my consideration, not as making him come here as a decided witness of falsehood, and most of all, certainly not with the concurrence or even the connivance or any thing which may amount to knowledge of those about whom I have been speaking, namely, his majesty's ministers; but that it will have an influence upon the evidence he is to give, and make him more positive on points on which he may be doubtful, and to which he probably would not strain his mind, were it not for the hope he had previously conceived.

Although it has been denied by Hiden, we have attempted to prove that he has not been so much a novice in those matters as he represented, that he was not destitute of knowledge of radical meetings, nor quite guiltless of attempts to induce persons to go there. Bennett, who states he has never been in the habit of attending those meetings, tells you that Hiden did come, not only once, but ten times, to ask him to attend those radical meetings; but I will not disguise or conceal that the whole of the invitation went to this, "you may see and hear what is going on, but you need not join in saying any thing." I say that shews that Hiden invited him to go, though he had denied it in his evidence; but it does not go to the extent of his having endeavoured to seduce another man into disloyalty; it goes to the extent of his having tempted him to a knowledge of that which he ought never himself to have known, that is the extent to which Hiden is contradicted, that is the state under which you are to consider his testimony, certainly in other respects uncontradicted, except from the improbability of his story, and except as to those circumstances, meritorious enough, to which I have referred. After all we fall back on that which has been so much treated of, the probability or improbability of this plot, in all its extent and bearings. On that subject I despair of saying any thing new, and when I mention one word upon the subject, I know by anticipation from the experience of three times what answer is given, and what answer I may expect in reply, when I say that I am not convinced by the answers I have yet heard, and probably shall not be by any I may hereafter hear. In private life, I do not profess to be more obstinate or incapable of conviction than another man; but in a cause, I do not feel that the improbability of conspiracy is at all apologized for or removed by evidence such as we have just heard, nor do I feel that it receives credit from the arguments which have been applied to it from any quarter. I do not say, nor did I mean to say, that because the accomplishment of the thing is impracticable, therefore the formation of the plan is not true; but when a witness stands forward to tell a most incredible story, it becomes every jury seriously to consider whether it is not the fiction of a man who has screwed his mind up to the purpose of making good a very extensive charge against others, in order to save his own life. I say that is the single purpose for which Mr. Adams must have invented some parts of this story, and for which he varies it from time to time, because if these men are to be charged with a dangerous conspiracy to assassinate his majesty's ministers, that is proved from other sources; if they are charged as principals in the murder of Smithers the Bow-street officer, that is proved from sources, when compared to this evidence, of purity in itself; is there any doubt of the attack upon the military who surrounded them? That is proved by that brave young officer, lieutenant Fitzclarence; but when we come to the matter of this indictment, it is necessary to bring him forward again and again, because without him those circumstances could never have been brought before you; he could have been confirmed at least by a man of the name of Edwards, but he is not confirmed by him; he could have been confirmed by others whom we have been asked to call for confirmation, but let Chambers be an example, who is not tainted with treason, and let us see whether, exercising a common discretion, we ought, if we were counsel in a case of forty shillings, to subject to cross-examination the persons who have been present, or are stated to have been present at those meetings; had they ever been present, their cross-examination would have been such that I should not have chosen to have placed them before you; if they could state that they were never present, they might have been presented before you in a more favourable light than the witness Adams, but they could not have contradicted him in any particular material to this inquiry.

After the observations which have been pressed upon you by my learned friend, Mr. Curwood, I am really tired of going over these topics; that a plot of such extent and of such fearful importance should have been nursed in the minds, and carried almost to its completion by such men as these, is among the most incredible circumstances that have ever existed, even in these wonder-making times. I am told that similar cases have occurred in former days. I have been asked by the learned counsel for the Crown, is it credible that Mr. Thistlewood, a gentleman by education, and a gentleman in some of the movements of his life, could have consorted with persons in the low situation of the other prisoners, for purposes of plunder, or of the kind described in this indictment? From the grave solemnity with which the question was put I feared that I was misled by imagination, when I fancied that I was referring to the experience of the past. I thought my memory had failed, and therefore I took to my books, and there I found, as I had thought, that, in the year 1794, and for three or four years preceding, men of education and rank in life infinitely superior to Mr. Thistlewood had attached themselves to, and associated with men quite as low in situation as the lowest of those who have been brought before you on this occasion; and yet that juries were recommended to believe, and did find on their oaths, that other motives than those charged against these prisoners, had induced that concurrence of them together, and the accused were acquitted, upon those arguments and those grounds, of such treasons as were then laid against them. There is nothing so improbable or impossible, that the changes and chances of human affairs do not bring to our knowledge and to our experience; let me suppose (for I am not at liberty to enter into the private history of any man) that a man of good fortune at his outset in life had ruined himself by abandoned courses; that an estate on which a virtuous man might live contented, had been destroyed by gaming or other improper pursuits, that that man so reduced, finding himself under the necessity of associating with some persons, goes to those most ready to receive him, namely, the lower class, who will find themselves honoured by his association, and that out of his resentment there should arise a plan for satiating his vengeance, and for recruiting their means of subsistence; is it to be believed that a gentleman so reduced would revolt from such a plan as that, or would join in it? Or is it more easily to be supposed, that a man who had common sense, who had seen foreign countries, who knew of what British society was compounded, should think by one band of twenty-five men, which it was hoped would be increased to forty, to take the metropolis, to change the government, to depose the king, and to establish a rule quite opposite to the feelings of the nation? This is so improbable, that all arguments sink before it into annihilation, I do not want, nor has it ever been my aim or my effort to add one circumstance of disgrace to the witness against me, certainly not to the client whose cause I have supported; but let me not be restrained by that feeling from giving the rational construction to that which is at present irrational. It is asked by my learned friend, is the resentment of these conspirators against Dudley earl of Harrowby, as such, or against the president of the council? It is asked, is their malice against lord viscount Sidmouth, or against the secretary of state for the Home Department? Is it against lord viscount Castlereagh, or against the secretary of state for the Foreign Department? Is it against John lord Eldon, or against the lord high chancellor of Great Britain? To all these questions, I return the answer which my learned friend who put them must naturally expect. It is against not the office, but the official man that the malice is directed; it is a misconceived rancour against those who have concurred in thanking the yeomanry who did that execution at Manchester, which they denominated a massacre, which made them think that they shewed their sympathy to the sufferers in that transaction, by bringing to signal, summary, and vindictive judgment, those whom they were wrought upon to consider as abettors in the supposed massacre. This appears to me a rational and tenable view of the subject, and toward this all the parts of the case naturally tend. A retreat into another country, would, no doubt, have been sought for immediately; and that towards that property might be secured, and that there might be a great preparation of means for the procuring that, I can easily conceive; but that this wretched band of feebly-armed ruffians should attempt to overturn the government, to hold the metropolis against any force, to take the Bank, and all the rest of the nonsense which has appeared in the testimony of Adams, I cannot believe; my mind is incapable of embracing it as the proposition of truth, and my reason rejects it as a foul and baseless fabrication.

I have now done with these subjects; I have done, I believe, the last duty of this kind that I shall be called upon to perform; I have done it, God knows, honestly and laboriously in proportion to the time that was allowed to me, with every wish in the world to do a real service to those who have confided their case to me; I have not attempted nor has it ever been my wish to assail the persons of his majesty's ministers or advisers, or the honourable persons engaged in the conduct of this cause, with any thing approaching to a reflection; if any such thing has escaped me, I should be ready to apologize for it, for no such intention was ever entertained by me, however ill-chosen my expressions may have been. I am sorry for the importance which has been given to this case; this is not like those cases to which I have referred, when affiliated societies, supported by men of rank in literature, in the state, and in the country, were formed, not only all over the metropolis but all over the kingdom, and made themselves petitioners for foreign aid, by sending to implore the assistance of the regicides of France, who united with those who had said to God, depart from us, we will none of thy ways. It is not pretended that these poor creatures have ever sent out a letter or a missionary; it is not in my knowledge that one of them, unless indeed it was Thistlewood, could speak a foreign language; there is not a belief that any thing short of utter disgrace and contempt could attach to them at home; if, nevertheless, you believe they did form this project, and that the ultimate end or aim of it was to depose the king, or to compel him by force to change his measures, you will pronounce them guilty of high treason; and it is not for me to deprecate that which you consider to be justice; you are acting upon your oaths, and must find that verdict if the evidence makes out the case; I am sure you will do it with regret, seeing that a weapon so material to be exerted against those who would overthrow all our national establishments is brought to bear on persons so feeble and insignificant; but the greatness of the accusation will not pervert your understandings, however it may affect your hearts; but you will, in making up your minds to find that verdict, weigh and measure and sift every circumstance which has been laid before you, in order to inform your judgment and give it all the leaning you can (consistently with your consciences) in favour of the prisoners. I shall ever lament that part of the history of my own times, which records that such a conspiracy as this has been made the subject of so much investigation; but it will not I trust be without its advantages; the convictions which have taken place, and the conviction or acquittal at the present moment, will not be without their use, most especially if they destroy all the relics of that combination of which the seeds were sown from the year 1790 to 1794, and to which I am sorry to say we had something like an allusion in the cross-examination of the witness Chambers. He is asked to what section and number he belongs, though the man denies that he knew of such a thing; I see that the Crown have some information of the kind; I am sorry that that arrangement of former times is still in use, and I hope that any persons who may be ready to engage in the subversion of the government, will see from the examples before us, that if it were possible they should succeed, they would, like all inferior conspirators, be soon thrown aside as those who had done their part; but if they failed, exposed themselves, or were betrayed, that they would be left without support and without protection, without companions, and without commiseration, to suffer the miserable fate their conduct had brought upon them; it is fit they should know, and this trial will prove it, that men more depraved than themselves are only luring them to their destruction; that the more timid are only waiting to inform against them; and that he who will conspire against his king, will not hesitate to betray his brother conspirator whenever fear points out that as the road of safety; this important lesson, read through these miserable persons, will not be in that respect read in vain, and when they see how crippled and beggared it is possible for men under these circumstances to stand, they must hereafter remain at a fearful distance, if they have common sense, from all enterprises which involve such immediate danger, and drive them out of the possibility of receiving any thing like countenance or support. Above all, let them learn from the specimen of the witness Adams, that he who substitutes the writings of Paine, or of superior authors, in the place of the bible, will in the end shew himself as faithless toward man as he has shown himself faithless toward his Maker; that he who rejects the book of life, will be moved by nothing but the sordid hope of worldly advantage; and that where it becomes his interest he will betray even his brother; that he who renounces his fidelity in that book, shews himself so prodigal of his soul's health, that there is no believing in his political faith, or any other which can be substituted for it; and if there be among those who hear me, and who are wavering in their faith, or doubtful in their belief, by what such persons have been, let them take caution from the evident treachery of the man who renounced his religion for notions inimical to all good; from that excellent manual our church catechism let them learn to honour and obey the king, and all that are put in authority under him, and never forget the injunction to learn and labour truly to get their own living, and to do their duty in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call them. It is not the sacrifice of such a number of obscure individuals as may be found guilty, or as other juries may pronounce guilty; it is not the sacrifice of such men that can strengthen government, or do that which is alone the aim of our laws; the punishment is intended to operate not vindictively upon the offender, but beneficially upon survivors; and there is great danger when feeling is excited, of its being pushed too far in order to punish those who have been unquestionably guilty; but I trust you will not pronounce the prisoners guilty of high treason, unless you are convinced they have been guilty of it, because they have sought, through the road of crime, to effect that which they falsely considered as the dictate of patriotism.

I have nearly concluded my address to you; you will be the fourth jury who have pronounced upon this indictment against wretched men, having no means of defence except those which charity and a proper sense of professional duty have procured for them; what shall be the further views of government, it is not for me to divine, but I hope, if there be a road to mercy in any degree, that will not be left out of their consideration; I am sure enough will have been done for example; the further multiplication of widows and orphans will not be necessary, and as judgment has been conspicuous in the prosecution of those who are now before you and those already convicted, so will mercy, extended to others, contribute to the firmness of that government which can shew it. While I am pleading for mercy, let me not forget to entreat of you so much as can possibly enter your bosoms consistently with your oaths. I do not ask twelve firm-minded British men to adopt those sentiments of puerile pity, which might make you falsify your oaths and forget your God; but I entreat you most seriously, if you are not so satisfied as to rely upon the witness, Adams, to give the prisoners the benefit of the doubts to which his testimony is so abundantly subject. I know you will act honestly; I am sure you will act firmly; to all the juries who have preceded you the country is infinitely indebted, and the prisoners too, for the minute attention they have paid to every part of the subject. I have observed the same in you; I do not ask you to forget your oaths, but I implore you not to forget any circumstance which may strengthen the claims of mercy.

VOL. XXXIII.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—William Davidson, the law of England, in its extraordinary tenderness for persons charged with the crime of high treason, allows to the person accused an opportunity of making full defence by counsel, and you received the great benefit the law has extended to you in that respect; but if, in addition to that which has been urged to the jury through your learned counsel, you wish to make any observations yourself, it is allowed to you to do so, and this is the proper and the only opportunity.

Davidson.—I am extremely obliged to your lordship for the opportunity you have given me; I would call your attention to two particular instances.—

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I wish you would do it so that I may hear every word; if you wish it, pause for a moment.

Davidson.—From my life up, it was always my study to earn my bread by honest industry. I had no friends in England, but I always laboured for my family; I have an extensive family, which is my only grief. As to the crime I am charged with, I lay my hand on my heart, and say that I am not guilty of it. With regard to the blunderbuss—I met with Mr. Williams, who is now gone to the Cape of Good Hope, and he had this blunderbuss very rusty; he asked me where I was going to, I said after a job; I have been working for myself for five years, which is the reason I have had no master to come before you. I used to sell my goods at auction rooms, and when I saw the name of Welford put down in the list of witnesses, I meant to appeal to him as being the cashier for Mr. Denew, who sold my goods; he said, he had bought this blunderbuss to take to the Cape of Good Hope, but that he had taken it to a gunsmith, and found he would charge him more than it was worth for repairing it, and if I could get part of his money back, he would be obliged to me; I took the blunderbuss home, and kept it; it is not worth much; I cleaned it, and scraped the stock, and proposed to raffle it; I met with Mr. Edwards, whom I never knew till I dined at the Crown and Anchor, at Mr. Hunt's procession; that is the first time I ever went to a public dinner in my life; Mr. Edwards promised to be one of the members, and promised to get me a considerable number of persons more; there were to be twenty members, at one shilling each, and it was to take place the next Monday. I saw Mr. Thistlewood there the following Monday for the second time; I saw Mr. Adams and several others, but I did not know them again, except Mr. Adams and Mr. Thistlewood; they wished to commence raffling for the blunderbuss; I got up and said it should not be done without the money was tendered, for it was not my property, and it was my duty to be accountable for it; I received bad language; I found the company inconsistent with that I expected; I took the blunderbuss and went away; Mr. Williams called the next morning to know the result; he was disappointed, as he wished to lay out five or six shillings in the west end of the town; I said he might pledge it if he wished; he said he did not know any person in that end of the town; I said I knew Mr. Aldous, I had known him for years; he said, well, you pledge it; I said I would; I then told Mr. Aldous it was not my property; he said he would not have lent me more than five shillings but for knowing me. The vessel in which Mr. Williams is gone, is called the Belle Alliance. Mr. Williams told me, that he could not sell the ticket to his fellow passengers, they were so very poor, but would I accept it.

On the 22nd of February, Mr. Edwards said, he had been to see Mr. Williams, and that he had told him, that by giving me a trifle, he might get the ticket from me. I said, "he gave me the ticket; but if you wish it, you may have it;" he said, "Well, I am going to sell it, and shall get ten shillings more, but I should not have called for it, but for having a customer ready;" the same evening he called at my house again at eight o'clock; he said "Mr. Davidson, if you have no objection to going for this blunderbuss, you had better go as you pledged it, lest the man should object to my having it." I did not think he intended to forfeit my life; he told me where to meet him the next morning in Oxford-street, and I took the blunderbuss under a gateway in Oxford-street to him; he said, "will not you walk in, and have a glass with a countryman of your's?" I said, "what do you mean by a countryman?" I was not much acquainted with him; he says, "a man of colour." I had an objection to going in, for though I am a man of colour, I have never associated with any of them. I was very well brought up. I found them all very ignorant; who this man of colour was I do not know. Mr. Edwards promised to meet me the next day, but that night I was apprehended.

Now, my lord, we will pass to the account of the sword. Going about my own concern, I met with a person I knew at Liverpool, of the name of James Goldsworthy; he expressed his surprise at meeting with me in London, and after inquiring about my family, I told him I was very badly off, and that it was very bad to be a master, unless he has full work, for that other masters do not like to employ him; he told me he had set up a business a few miles out of town; it was a pleasant walk, and he would employ me if I liked; I told him, with the greatest pleasure; I asked him what wages I should have; he said, what did I expect; I said, thirty-two shillings a week; he said, he would give me thirty shillings; he said, call at the Horse and Groom. I did not at that time know that Mr. Goldsworthy and Mr. Edwards were acquainted. I now know they lodged in one house. As the officer says, I stopped at the corner, but as to the habiliments I was in, I never had cross belts on; is it possible, that if they had been so conspicuous, Adams would not have seen them in the stable? however I went into the public-house, and did not see Mr. Goldsworthy; I went a bit of a walk, and when I came back in half an hour, I saw several persons passing backwards and forwards; I saw several men looking at me, but I did not see the person I was looking for; I went again and stood at the corner; at a little after eight o'clock I was going down the Edgware-road; but previous to that, the landlord asked me, whether I was looking for any particular person; "yes," says I, "a gentleman I appointed to meet me, but he has not kept his word;" I was going down the Edgware-road, and I saw Mr. Goldsworthy near Queen-street; he said, "I suppose you are tired of waiting?" "Yes," says I, "if it was not for an anxiety to get work, I would not have stopped so long;" he says, "go and get a pint of beer, I have to shake hands with a friend;" and he gave me a sword and a bundle; I said, "what do you want the sword for, are you going to cut my head off?"—"No, but we have many thieves in our part, and it is for my own protection." As I am to stand before God, I never meant any bad. I was passing the stable, I saw persons rush in, and very foolishly went in, and I was attacked; I ran away; I never cut at any one; I never had any belt on; I would never plead for my life only, for I have ventured my life fifteen times for my country and my king, and how can it be supposed I would join wicked men, who would attempt to overthrow so well-founded a constitution as the British constitution, and from the little acquaintance I have had with any men, save those directly in my business, it is not likely that I should be in any plot. I do not mean to say that I was not apprehended in Cato-street; but I still contend, my lord, that the carbine was not in my possession directly nor indirectly; it was picked up at a distance, and brought to me, and I was asked whether it was not mine; I denied it, but another person said, "oh, it is surely his, why do you ask him?" I was carried into a chandler's shop; I never was in a public-house; and captain Fitzclarence cleared up that point, though one of the officers swore that I even addressed the people; and said, that the man who would not die in liberty's cause, ought to be damned. I was left in the custody of the officer who took me; and I asked captain Fitzclarence, whether he did not take me directly to Bow-street; what time had I then to address any persons, or to go into any public-house when I was a prisoner; even the landlord of the public-house I would appeal to, to know whether I was a prisoner in his house. I do not mean to say that an existing plot might not have been, but I pretend to say I knew of no existing plot; I was accidentally brought into Cato-street as I have laid my story; but I knew nothing of a plot for plunder or massacre.

If my colour should be against me which perhaps, gentlemen of the jury, you may suppose it to be, and think that because I am a man of colour I am without an understanding or a feeling, and would act the brute; I am not one of that sort; I would wish to wipe off those impressions from those learned gentlemen who have so prosecuted me. When not employed in my business, I have employed myself as a teacher of a Sunday-school, and in that capacity have remained; and I would draw your attention to a simple mistake—there was a person, a man of colour, nearly my stature, insulted one of our female teachers in the Walworth-road; I then lived at Walworth; and though this young lady was a teacher in the same school I was, she so far mistook the person as to make a complaint of me; I found some of them looked cool upon me, and I sent in a letter of resignation, consequently the whole committee waited upon me, and called me from my wife into the front parlour, and expostulated with me upon the impropriety of my conduct, and persisted in it; it struck me with such horror, that I had nothing to answer, but I determined to investigate it, and I sent my wife to the young woman to ask a little information; I traced out the person that had insulted her, brought him to the committee, and he acknowledged his fault, and she came ashamed to look me in the face, and hid her face, and offered me her hand. If any thing I could say would do away these impressions

I would proceed, but I would as lief be put to death, if I thought your lordship or the learned gentlemen for the Crown, believed I was that monster that for a moment I could harbour a thought to murder any human being directly or indirectly; if you believe that, I hope your lordship will not shew me the least mercy, for my conscience acquits me; I can stand before my God, and I will stand at his tribunal to assert, my lord, that I am not guilty of doing such a thing, nor deserving it. If your lordship will permit me to have a drink of water.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Oh, certainly, take your refreshment, sit down and compose yourself, and address the jury again, if you desire it, when you are composed, there is no impatience on the part of the Court, take your own time. I would observe to you, upon that which you have said, that you may rest most perfectly assured that with respect to the colour of your countenance, no prejudice either has or will exist in any part of this Court against you; a man of colour is entitled to British justice as much as the fairest British subject that ever came into a court of justice, and will always be sure to obtain it, and this case will be decided upon the facts given in evidence; God forbid that the complexion of the accused should enter, for a single moment, into the consideration of the jury.

Davidson.—My lord, it is but very few words I have got further to say, for as to politics I never troubled my head with it. I have a family of very little children, and a wife that never earned a penny for me since I have had her; it is only the distress of my family I feel; were it not for that, I should quote a passage in Isaiah, "He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth;" but when I think of the case of my family, for the love I bear my children, I should use the utmost of my power to prevail upon a British jury, if it were possible, to clear up those black charges which are laid against me. First of all, here is Mr. Adams, he can positively swear that he has not seen me in any warlike appearance whatever. I was down stairs when Mr. Thistlewood numbered his men; he said eighteen and two below; when he was asked whether I was by, he said no, I was down stairs, but my name was put down immediately the officer came up. The next witness, Mr. Monument, comes forward and says, that I addressed the congregation, and told them that any man that was afraid of his life might walk off, and that in a few minutes afterwards the officers came up; now your lordship and the jury must see there is some exaggeration of these things. I do admit I was in Cato-street, by passing through the street, but as to admitting any thing else, it would be against my conscience, it would be wrong in me to say that; I knew nothing of their plans; I now know that Mr. Goldsworthy was an accomplice of Mr. Edwards, they might be the plotters; but I did not expect that he would be that base character, that having been a journeyman in a shop in which I was an apprentice he would have entrapped me. I have served my country, I have done all which an honest man can do; I have supported my family by honest industry, and I can appeal to fifty gentlemen I have dealt with since I have been master, that they never have known me to go to public meetings, except one meeting in Smithfield, as a common spectator. I knew nothing at all of these men till I found myself a prisoner along with them. I had seen Mr. Thistlewood, but I never saw him the night I was apprehended, till I was apprehended; if I had seen Mr. Thistlewood, and Mr. Edwards, it might have led me to suspect, but none spoke to me nor I to them; if I was one in their concern, being such a conspicuous character as I know I am from my colour, can it be supposed that I would stand in a gateway to be seen and identified above all others? It is not for me to say any thing further on my own behalf, my learned counsel, on the points of law have done me justice; and as for those learned gentlemen, the counsel for the Crown, I have nothing to lay to their charge; I admire the way in which they have done their duty, according to their judgment upon the evidences; if those gentlemen knew me better, or it was possible I could have shewn them my former conduct, they would not have pointed me out the character they have done. I never, my lord, have done any man an injury, but I have supported an honest character, for by an honest character I intended to live, and nothing but that; my family was all my society that I kept, neither politics nor laws ever troubled me; as for any thing further that I have got to say, it would be useless.

I would only call the minds of the jury to a few passages I have selected out for that purpose, if it would not be insulting to the Court; I would select this passage in the indictment, in which it is said that I had not the fear of God before my eyes, but was moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil; now, my lord, I always had the fear of God before my eyes, and it was my constant prayer, and I always used those passages which I have read in some of Mr. Pope's writings:

"If I am right thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, oh! teach my heart
To find that better way!

"Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the faults I see;
That mercy I to others shew,
That mercy shew to me."

These were always my constant impressions, my lord, and those passages in the indictment may better be applied to those gentlemen who stand there to swear my life away, to the destruction of myself and my family; but here, in the Bible, it is said, "One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin in any sin that he sinneth, but at the mouth of two or three witnesses shall the matter be established." It goes on to the word which is above your lordship's head, "If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong, then both the men between whom the controversy is shall stand before the Lord, before the priests and the judges which shall be in those days, and the judges shall make diligent inquisition; and behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother, then shall ye do unto him as he had thought to have done unto his brother; so shalt thou put the evil away from among you, that innocent blood be not shed in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance." These things I would wish to impress on the jury's mind; I am a stranger to England by birth, but I was educated and brought up in England; my father was an Englishman and my grandfather a Scotchman; I certainly have a little prerogative for claiming to be an Englishman, being here from fourteen years of age; but I have not a friend in England, and it is hard that my life should be taken away, not knowing any thing of the plot made out against his majesty's ministers; the earl of Harrowby I knew for years, when I worked at Rugely, in Staffordshire, for Mr. Bullock. I have worked at his lordship's house, and for the regard I have for his lordship, from knowing him personally, I should have shuddered at the thought of taking his life; and if any man would have mentioned such a plan to me, it would have turned upon whether I should have turned a public informer, or have privately informed his lordship; but my conscience does not accuse me of any thing improper, for if I am to die, I can die with a clear conscience, that I know nothing of any assassination plot, nothing of any plunder or burning of the city, for those things I detest; I would get my living by honest industry, but I never was a man known to associate or keep any bad company.

I would have called your attention to several other witnesses, but they did not attend at the time they were called upon. All I have got to say is this; I hope the gentlemen of the jury will weigh the matter well in their minds, seeing it stands only between life and death; and should they harbour an opinion, that I am guilty of treason, though not guilty of murder, though that has been a crime charged—if they think I am a culprit that would stand here to acquit myself against the force of conscience, I am very willing to abide by their judgment.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Richard Tidd, if it is your wish to add any thing to what has been urged to the jury by your learned counsel, this is the proper time for you to address them.

Tidd.—Thank you, my lord. The first thing I have got to say is, that I had the misfortune to become acquainted with Brunt about a month before Christmas, by his frequently going to see Adams, who lived next door to me; our windows nearly join each other, and by that means we became acquainted; he frequently came up to my house, and during the Christmas holidays, he and I kept the holidays together; after the holidays, he introduced me to a man of the name of Edwards, whom I did not know before, though he challenged knowing me before. I went out with them at different times on the Sunday; it is well known that I every other day in the week worked fourteen, sixteen or eighteen hours in the day, and that I never went out but on a Sunday. Mr. Edwards and Brunt together told me there were certain meetings, which I knew of before, but I never attended any meetings. After this, acts of parliament passed which signified that these meetings were illegal, and that persons who went to them were liable to be prosecuted; but Mr. Edwards told me, he had got some connexions in a higher scale of life, that were determined that meetings of a similar description should be held privately; that he himself had got full authority to signify that to all those who were willing to meet to procure redress in parliament; I was satisfied; I thought there could be no particular harm in such meetings as those, and I went to the room taken by Ings, in Brunt's house. I did not see or hear any thing particular that day, but I was solicited to go another day, on a Sunday, the day spoken of here; and in the course of some appointment between Adams and some other persons in the room, I was nominated as a stranger to take the chair. There were certain propositions made on that Sunday, on which I declared positively, if that was their intention I would never attend such kind of meetings; I was fully determined not to keep company with them afterwards; but prior to this, Mr. Edwards comes up to me, and he says, "We have got certain materials, and Mr. Thistlewood's compliments, and he would be obliged to you, if you would let them remain here a day or two, till we can remove them." I told them I would not permit things of that kind to come into my place; with that answer he went away; on the evening of that day he brought that trunk, which you have there, and afterwards, when I saw him again, says I, "why did you bring that, when I positively said it should not come into my place?" he says, "it is not material, we only want it to stop a day or two;" then on the Sunday, as I before observed, I went to this meeting, where, as I have said, these propositions were stated; I never went again, but on the Tuesday, Edwards and Brunt came up to me, and asked me, whether I still kept in that determination; I said, "yes, I did;" he said, "well, all those proceedings are entirely frustrated,—there is a union in Mary-le-bone, but for self-preservation every man is requested to go there with some implement of defence;" I told him I had no implement of defence whatever; "then," says he, "I have plenty,—for through those gentlemen who support me in calling such meetings together, we can always get arms." He pulled out a pistol from his pocket, and said, "I am not without arms, for I have a stick sword," shewing it me; he left that, saying, "I will see you again;" in the course of that afternoon, he came up again, and says, "do you know where the meeting is to be held?" I said, "No;" he said, "here is a direction," and he gave me a direction, which I have in my pocket now; but I suppose the direction is not material. [The prisoner handed in a small paper.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you wish the contents of that paper should be stated by the officer?

Tidd.—No, my lord, it is only the direction that Edwards gave to me where the meeting was to be held.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you wish it should be read?

Tidd.—Yes, my lord.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—"Horse and Groom, John-street, Edgware-road."

Tidd.—During Wednesday, my lord, while I was out, I went to shops for work, and Brunt came up; and while they were there, I came home, and Edwards brought up a brown paper saying, you must bring this paper up to the meeting, for all those things that we have will be wanted, in case of a revolution taking place in this country, which is very likely in the course of a very little while, for the people are very dissatisfied, and very numerously dissatisfied in the country; you must bring this to the club in the evening; and Brunt observed, that he had several different acquaintances that were coming to the same club in the evening, and as I should be at work late, he would give them notice that they should come along with me; my lord, about seven in the evening, I left off work, and no other came than that young man Monument; I went up, according to their directions, to the Horse and Groom, and I do declare before you, that I never specified nor ever knew any thing about any cabinet dinner, or any thing of the kind; it was never mentioned to me; I hope, my lord, you will excuse my vulgar ignorant way of expressing myself.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—You have no apology to make upon that scale; whatever you say, and in whatever language and manner, will be attended to.

Tidd.—I went with Monument up to the place, expecting to go to the Horse and Groom; I met a man, whom I did not know, and he introduced me into this stable; I had not been there for ten minutes, before I was taken by the officers; that is the matter, my lord, I assure you, as nearly as I can recollect it.

REPLY.

Mr. Attorney General.—Gentlemen of the jury, painful and irksome as is the task I have now to perform, and tiresome, at least to many of you, as must be the repetition of a narrative already told, of arguments already stated, and of observations already made, yet I am sure you will feel with me, however irksome that task may be both to myself and to you, that in a matter of so much importance, not only to the prisoners at the bar, but to the public at large, no time devoted to the fair investigation of the case is mis-employed; and in the few remarks I shall feel it my duty to address to you, my only endeavour will be to bring back your recollection to the real state of the evidence as it now stands, and to direct you to those points upon which, as it appears to me, the verdict you are to pronounce must ultimately depend.

It would be an idle waste, indeed, of your time, if I were to delay you by any laboured observations with respect to the law of this case. Little discussion has taken place upon that subject by the learned counsel who have addressed you on the part of the prisoners; and I may state to you, without hazard, that if the acts charged upon this indictment, as establishing the treason imputed to the prisoners at the bar, are substantiated to your satisfaction, the crimes alleged in the different counts of this indictment, at least in some of them, has been completely proved. The charge, divested of all technicalities, is simply this,—that the prisoners at the bar, in conjunction with others, had formed a plan to overthrow the constitution of this country; that, in furtherance of that plan, they had held those consultations, and had provided those means, and had contemplated that assassination, about which you have heard so much; and the only question for you will be, whether these acts have been made out, or not; because, if they have, they at once prove that these men have been guilty of compassing to depose his majesty from his imperial dignity, and of conspiring to levy war against him to compel him to alter his measures and councils.

My learned friend who sits by me, in introducing this case to you, told you (and I must beg leave to repeat the observation), that in a charge of this nature it is impossible to prove to the full extent the nature of secret deliberations and conspiracies, but by the testimony of one who has engaged in them. He stated to you, that in the examination of the testimony of such a person, you should exercise considerable jealousy and caution, and that unless you find him confirmed by other testimony, against which no imputation can be raised, you will not be advised by the Court to find a verdict of guilty. Almost the whole of the able addresses which have been made to you by the learned counsel for the prisoners has therefore been directed to the examination of the testimony of the first witness Adams. They have submitted to you (but I beg leave wholly to differ from them) that the case, as far as it relates to the charge of high treason, rests solely upon his evidence; that it does not so rest, I am sure I shall be able to satisfy you, if at present you entertain any doubt upon the subject, when I come to examine the other parts of the case; but, for the present moment, I will confine your attention to the testimony which he has given, and to the confirmation which it has received. In the discharge of the painful and anxious duty which my learned friends had to perform in the defence of the prisoners at the bar, they have of course kept all circumstances of corroboration out of sight, feeling that when once brought under your review, they must satisfy the most sceptical mind of the truth of the testimony of Adams.

Before I come to the confirmations, let me consider for a moment some of the objections which have been urged against his testimony. That he is an accomplice, that he has participated in the guilt of the prisoners at the bar, I fully admit; but it is said he is unworthy of all credit, because, on his cross-examination, he has confessed to you, that for a time he had been led astray by those pernicious publications which have been too successfully circulated, and that he had withdrawn his belief from the Christian religion. Gentlemen, to what cause does he ascribe that unfortunate lapse of faith? Sorry am I to state, that, by the evidence, it appears that he owes it to the conduct of one of the unfortunate men now standing before you; for Adams tells you, that it was Tidd who furnished him with those publications which, for a time, sapped and undermined it. Do not let that circumstance operate more than it ought against the prisoner; but you cannot forget that the fact has been proved to you; and if Adams has erred from the path of the true faith, I am afraid that you will be obliged to attribute his offence to the unfortunate man at the bar.

It is said by my learned friend, that it is quite incredible that one who has so swerved from the belief which he professed should, in the moment of calamity and distress, have discovered his error, and have returned again to the Christian faith.

I see nothing improbable in it; on the contrary, it is our daily experience that it is in the hour of affliction that the mind is most strongly impressed with the sacred truths of religion; and I for one, can readily believe that after his escape from the appalling scene in Cato-street, during the days of seclusion, when confining himself to his house he endeavoured to elude the vigilance of the police, this man reflected seriously on his past conduct, and on his providential escape, and began again to feel the force of those doctrines which folly had, for a moment, obliterated, and returned to that faith in which he had from his infancy been educated; but whether that be so or not, he tells you that at present his mind is impressed with the belief of the Christian religion, and that he acknowledges the solemn sanction of that holy book on which he has been sworn to give his testimony.

Let me ask you what contradiction has been given to his evidence; one has been attempted by putting Chambers into the box, but I do not find that his evidence is brought under your consideration by my learned friends, for they felt, that after his cross-examination, it would be a vain attempt to impose on the credulity of twelve honest and intelligent jurors, by endeavouring to persuade you to think that that man told one syllable of the truth.

I pass over Chambers's acquaintance with many of the prisoners, his attendance at the Smithfield meetings, and other circumstances of that nature; you recollect that (but I must call your attention to a part of his examination) he was asked on what book he was sworn; he told you that, instead of that sacred volume on which alone a person in a court of justice in this country is to be sworn, he believes it was the Prayer-book. My learned friend who last addressed you, feeling the effect this disclosure was likely to produce on your minds, has vainly attempted to get rid of it by saying, that in some work which he has read, but which I was never fortunate enough to meet with, it is laid down that an oath taken on the Prayer-book is as valid in a court of justice, as one taken upon the New-testament.

Undoubtedly if a Prayer-book contains the four Gospels, such an oath is binding and valid; but it did not appear that such was the conception of the witness; he thought that he was sworn upon the Prayer-book alone; but pass that by—what is the account Chambers gave of the conversation he stated to have passed between himself and the witness Adams, and a person of the name of Edwards? He says, that a few days before the affair in Cato-street, they came to him, on a very slight acquaintance, and at once asked him to engage in a plan to assassinate all his majesty's ministers, using language which I will not repeat to you, expressive of the exultation and triumph they should feel after that act had been completed; and yet that man, Chambers, with all this information imparted to him, buries it in his own bosom—lays it before no magistrate—makes it known to no individual, and it is not till this day that any communication upon the subject has ever escaped his lips. Can you believe such testimony? He unblushingly tells you that he felt no horror at the project. If he had felt as he ought upon such a scheme being communicated to him, I ask you whether it is credible that he should have kept such a secret in his own breast, and not have imparted it to a magistrate, or to some of those noblemen and gentlemen who were to be the objects of the assassination which Adams and his companion meditated. He does no such thing, and therefore, without delaying you longer on his testimony, I confidently expect, as the conversation is altogether denied by Adams, that you will have no hesitation in dismissing from your minds the whole of the evidence of Chambers.

I do not find in the course of the addresses of my learned friends, that they made any other observation on the manner in which Adams has given his testimony, or pointed out any other supposed contradiction in the case. That being so, let me shortly call your attention to the story which he narrates, and to the manner in which he is confirmed in every part of it. It has been said by my learned friends on the other side, and they have argued upon it at considerable length, that though they admit Adams to be confirmed in some facts, nay even to the extent of the plan of assassinating all his majesty's ministers, they contend, that beyond that point there is no confirmation whatever, and that all he has told you of any ulterior views is fiction and invention. Now let me ask you in the outset, what possible motive, what interest has Adams to add to the guilt of intended murders the crime of high treason? It is said he is an accomplice—an accomplice in what? Would it not have been sufficient for him, when he was apprehended, and when he declared the whole which he knew, to have said, it is true I am an accomplice, it is true I was in Cato-street, and that I was embarked in a conspiracy with Thistlewood and Ings; but criminal as we are, though our plan was to assassinate his majesty's ministers, it was there to end. According to my learned friend Mr. Adolphus, the only motive he could have would be to destroy his own credit altogether. Let this remark, if you think it deserving of consideration, weigh upon your minds in determining upon the credit of Adams. The admissions of my learned friends, admissions not improvidently made but extorted by the facts in the case, place the plan for the assassination of his majesty's ministers beyond the reach of doubt. But the counsel for the prisoners say, that there the confirmation ends; give me leave to inquire, if that argument is well founded (and I put it seriously to my learned friend) what proof is there even of the plot of the assassination, except the preparations and the meeting in Cato-street? They have no other evidence than that of Adams on which to found the admission they have made, and shall not his testimony be admitted to prove the ulterior purpose these conspirators had in view; if it is credible in one part, it is to be believed in all its parts; if it establishes the plot of assassination, it equally supports the conspiracy to overthrow the government.

Adams states to you that a room had been hired by these men, in the house in which Brunt resided, for the purpose of holding their consultations, of devising their plans, and of preparing the means of executing them. Is that fact true, or is it false? It is proved to be true by Eleanor Walker, Mary Rogers, and another witness, whose credit has not been attacked, I mean Hale the apprentice of Brunt. You will recollect the pretence under which it was taken; it was, that it was to be a lodging room for Ings, and he said that he would bring his furniture into it; no furniture was ever brought in, and the only uses made of it were meeting there, and preparing the mischievous and destructive instruments you have seen. I may here observe, that it has been argued by my learned friends, that the direct purpose for which it was hired, is proved only by Adams; the three witnesses I have introduced to you, shew that his testimony is true in that respect; the facts in the case corroborate him; no one ever lodged there; the only persons who resorted to it were the prisoners and others implicated in this conspiracy, and the only things found there were such as were prepared for, and are well calculated to carry it into execution.

There are other facts in which he is confirmed by Hale, I mean as to the meetings in that room, and the persons attending those meetings; he tells you, that on the Saturday they had determined that a blow should be struck on the following Wednesday, and that therefore on the Sunday morning a meeting was to be held at Brunt's room, to elect a committee to devise and organize the plan; that meeting, Adams says, was larger than usual, and he is confirmed in that by Hale; Hale has informed you it was the largest meeting he remembers, and was attended by upwards of twenty persons: the confirmation does not stop here; what did they do in that room? you remember Adams tells you, that a number of staves were brought there, green sticks for the purpose of being prepared to receive pike-heads; that Bradburn had been employed to put on the ferrules, and that he did not perform the work properly at first, having weakened the ends of the poles so much, that it was necessary to saw them off, and put on larger ferrules; Hale heard at times noises, as if there was sawing and hammering in the room, and he saw pike-staves there. He is confirmed in another singular fact; Adams must have been more than a prophet if it did not really take place. You recollect that at a meeting on Tuesday the 22nd February great agitation was excited, in consequence of Adams having communicated to them something that had occurred between Adams and Hobbs of the White Hart, from which Adams concluded that their schemes were not altogether unknown to the police; Brunt, to satisfy their doubts, and to ease their minds, proposed that on that evening a watch should be set in Grosvenor-square to observe lord Harrowby's house, to see whether any soldiers were introduced into it, concluding, that if no such thing took place, they might be sure their plans were undiscovered, and they might proceed with security; the watch was set, and the first men to perform the duty were Davidson and another, who were to be relieved by Brunt and Tidd. Davidson, with his companion, were to take their stations at six, and continue till nine. The watchmen of the parish have been called to you, and they proved that on that evening they saw a man answering the description of the prisoner Davidson, and another person with him, lurking about the square between six and nine o'clock. You remember that in consequence of Tidd having to communicate with some person who was thought to be essential to the success of their plans, he was on that evening prevented accompanying Brunt, and Adams was fixed upon to supply his place, and that he accompanied Brunt at nine o'clock to Grosvenor-square. He states that he went there with Brunt; that, after watching for a short time, wanting refreshment, they went to a public-house at the back of lord Harrowby's house, and that there Brunt played at dominos with a stranger. You have the very person, Gillan, who played with Brunt, produced to you. Then Adams is confirmed in all he has told you as to that part of the transaction. It is impossible he should be confirmed in any other manner. Brunt is a prisoner, who has been already tried; he could not be called. The only person who could be brought to corroborate the testimony of Adams was the young man who met him and Brunt at the public-house. The watchmen confirm him as to persons being seen in Grosvenor-square; his evidence is therefore supported, in this part of the case, beyond the possibility of contradiction.

His narrative is shown to be true in another particular. He informs you, that as they prepared their arms they thought it unsafe to keep them all in the room in Brunt's house, and that the house of the prisoner Tidd, was considered to be a fit dépôt for them. If confirmation of this part of Adams's evidence were wanting, it has been supplied to you by the unfortunate young woman, the daughter of Tidd, who has been called; for she has proved to you that hand-grenades and other instruments were, from time to time, deposited in her father's house; that the box produced to you, containing the ball-cartridges, had been there for a fortnight before the affair in Cato-street; that some of those things were taken away upon the very morning of the 23rd of February, and that some were brought back on the following morning. It was a natural thing that some of those instruments which were lodged at Tidd's should be removed on the morning of Wednesday to Cato-street. It is an occurrence to which Adams did not speak, but Mary Barker has proved it.

The next confirmation (and a very remarkable one) is given of what Adams states to have taken place in the afternoon of the 23rd of February, on his arrival at Brunt's house; while he was there, Strange and another person, whose name he does not know, came in, they were engaged in flinting their pistols, and finding themselves likely to be observed where they stood, they retired to the room taken by Ings. It was impossible for Adams at the time he told you that, to know that he should be confirmed; it was not a circumstance that he was likely to invent, inventing it might have subjected him to contradiction. Hale tells you, that on that very afternoon he saw Strange and another person flint their pistols in Brunt's room, and afterwards withdraw into the back room. That is not all, Adams informs you that afterwards upon the arrival of Thistlewood and the other persons on that afternoon, and before they proceeded to Cato-street, Thistlewood was desirous of writing certain proclamations, which were to be exhibited in different parts of the town, in order to rouse the disaffected to join the standard of revolt; he states to you, that there not being any paper in the room fit for the purpose, he suggested that they should be put upon cartridge paper, and Brunt was requested to procure some. Hale was on that afternoon sent out by Brunt to purchase six sheets of cartridge paper; he brought them to Brunt, who carried them into the room where Adams says the proclamations were prepared. Recollect also what Adams tells you occurred upon that occasion; three proclamations were written by Thistlewood, when he became agitated and could write no more. Hall was requested to assist him, but refused. Thistlewood then desired another to do so, who at first declined, but at last did write one, the contents of which I will not state to you, because they are not properly in evidence. See then, how far Adams is confirmed, and see still further how he might be contradicted, if his account were not true. My learned friends admit, that the cartridge paper was purchased and taken into that room, but they contend that the contents of the proclamation rest on the credit of Adams alone. Now he is not only confirmed as to the fact of the cartridge paper being sent for, but also as to a part having been used. Hale states that there was some cartridge paper left in the room, but not the whole he had brought; I do not recollect that he specified the quantity. Now let us consider how he might have been contradicted. Hall was there. Hall is a person whom it was in the power of the prisoners at the bar to produce before you. It is said Hall is an accomplice, and that by bringing him forward as a witness, he would have been exposed to destruction. If he be an accomplice, and this fact took place, undoubtedly he would have been placed in jeopardy, but then my learned friends must assume that what Adams has sworn is true. Then undoubtedly if Hall were produced, he must confirm him; but their supposition is either that Hall was not there, or that the proclamations were not prepared; if Hall were not there, he might have been examined to prove so; if he were there, he might have been called to shew that what Adams has sworn is false, and that the proclamations he speaks of were never written. If Hall had been made a witness, and any questions had been put to him by the counsel for the Crown, to implicate him in the conspiracy, my learned friends know extremely well that he might have refused to answer, that he might have said I am not come here to criminate myself, but to prove certain facts; I have a right by the law of England to protect myself, and not give evidence which may involve me in crime. Hall is not called, because being there, he must have stated, as my learned friends know, that the proclamations were so prepared and written by Thistlewood. His absence, therefore, corroborates the testimony which has been given to you.

Another argument has been used by the counsel for the prisoners; they say, Hall should have been called by the Crown; but see how ill that observation squares with the rest; they state that ten accomplices would not make the proof stronger; that one accomplice unconfirmed cannot be believed, and that therefore the case would not be advanced by calling ten such witnesses, unless their evidence was corroborated by unimpeachable testimony. Without adverting to Palin and the other persons, who also, according to my learned friend's hypothesis, are innocent, it is enough for me to have shewn, that there is one witness whom it was in their power to have produced, and that they have not called him; and I repeat, the absence of Hall confirms (if further confirmation were necessary) the story told by Adams.

What is the next matter in which he is supported? He tells you, that when he got to Cato-street, Tidd had not arrived: you will remember some alarm was expressed in consequence of his non-appearance. It appears that Tidd, after Brunt was gone, and after the rest of the party had set out from the lodgings for Cato-street, called at Brunt's house, and saw his wife, and she told him there was a pike-head and a sword in the cupboard, and asked him what was to be done with them. Tidd knew well how to dispose of them; he received them from her, took them into the back room, and left the house. You have no evidence of what was done with them afterwards; but Adams has informed you, that Tidd arrived at Cato-street some time after the others. Hale gives you the reason why Tidd was so late; he was at the lodgings as before stated after his companions were gone; and Monument also (who is called an accomplice by my learned friend) accounts for it. I will not at present detain you with the events in Cato-street, because in a future stage of the observations I shall be under the necessity of calling your attention to them; but as I have mentioned them, permit me here to observe, that in my humble opinion it was correctly said by my learned friend who opened the case, that if there were no confirmation of Adams's testimony, but that which the meeting and preparations in Cato-street afford, the charge upon this indictment is irrefragably proved, and that you can have no doubt of the plan of these men, and the design they had conceived.

There is another witness who I admit to my learned friend was an accomplice in the crime of these men, but undoubtedly not to the extent to which Adams is proved to be involved, I mean Monument. He came late into the scheme, and seems to have been kept in ignorance of the full extent of it until his arrival in Cato-street. You observed the manner in which that young man gave his evidence; and I think if any thing depends upon demeanour, you cannot fail to agree with me, that his deportment entitles him to credit; he is borne out in every part of his story in which it was possible for him to receive confirmation; he told you the manner in which he was called upon at two several times by Thistlewood and Brunt, and afterwards by Brunt and Tidd, and in this he is confirmed by his brother, on whom there is no imputation of being concerned in the plot. The evidence of Monument affecting the prisoner Tidd is most important. He was visited by Brunt and Tidd, on the morning of the 22nd of February; they endeavoured to prevail upon him to become a party in their plans, and as at that time they had not procured the room in Cato-street, it was proposed that Monument should come to Tyburn-turnpike, where he was to meet the other parties engaged in the conspiracy. Brunt asked Tidd whether it would be safe to give the counter-sign to Monument; Tidd thought it would, and the word was imparted to him; but having before the next day procured this loft in Cato-street, Brunt came to Monument, and required his attendance at an earlier hour than he was able to give it, and in consequence of that, desired him to call on Tidd, and go with him to their place of rendezvous. The witness called at Tidd's; Tidd armed himself with a pistol, and then accompanied him to Cato-street. He tells you what passed after their arrival, and completely confirms Adams in that part of his account; he mentions the alarm which some of the party felt at their numbers being inadequate to their object; that that alarm was quieted by the address of Thistlewood, who told them they were too far embarked to recede, that their force was sufficient, that they had twenty-five men to oppose only fourteen or sixteen unarmed servants of lord Harrowby.

There is a third witness, moreover, who is neither an accomplice, nor one against whose character the least attack has been attempted. I allude to Hiden; and if all the evidence given by Adams were blotted out from the notes of his lordship, I submit, that Hiden's testimony, uncontradicted and unimpeached as it is, coupled with the facts which afterwards occurred in Cato-street, proves the treason charged upon this indictment. First consider the previous character of this man; next look to his conduct on this occasion; and lastly, weigh the evidence he has given, and how it has been borne out by the subsequent transactions in the case. Against his previous character there is not the slightest imputation; it has been attempted indeed to be proved, that he had not only attended radical meetings, but had invited Bennett to attend also. He admits, that he was present at two meetings of a society called the Shoemaker's club, but held for political purposes; and, unless he had attended those meetings,

Wilson most probably would not have thought he was a person to be trusted. He confesses too, that he did ask Bennett to accompany him; and all that Bennett has stated that can by any possibility affect Hiden is, that he asked him to go to a radical meeting, and Hiden does not recollect that the expression radical was used by him; you have, therefore, every right to believe, from his former and still more so from his subsequent conduct, that he is an honest man, on whose testimony you can place the utmost reliance. What interest had he to make any disclosure to lord Harrowby on the 22nd of February? My learned friend says, he cannot but think there is some expectation of remuneration operating upon the mind of Hiden, some hope of reward to be bestowed on him by those whose lives he has saved, for the testimony he has given upon the trial. Did any such motive influence him at the time when he made the communication to lord Harrowby? What possible interest could he have in telling that which was untrue? He must have been a prophet indeed if Wilson never imparted to him the plot in agitation. How was he to know any thing of a conspiracy to destroy the ministers of the king. Of hand-grenades, or fire-balls, or parties stationed in different parts of the town to seize the cannon? Of the intention to fire houses, to take the Mansion-house, and establish a provisional government there? He could only know these things from some conspirator deep in the plot, and he tells you that conspirator was Wilson. When it is argued before you, that there is no ulterior object of the plot proved but by the testimony of Adams, do my learned friends think, that Hiden's evidence has been erased from your recollection? If it be not, what ground is there to impeach it? Do not the facts which occurred bear him out? In Hiden, therefore, you have a witness neither impeached nor impeachable, and upon whose testimony I submit to you, you may safely rely. Then, with his testimony before you, let me call your attention to the occurrences that took place in Cato-street, and to the preparations made there, which are supposed by my learned friends, to have been merely intended for the assassination of his majesty's ministers. In this part of the case, I will take the opportunity of examining the reasoning of one of my learned friends upon a supposed conspiracy of an inferior nature, a conspiracy to rob hen-roosts, and commit burglary, and of an accomplice appearing as a witness and fixing upon his associates the whole crime. Compare such a case with the present. My proposition is, that the plan was, not only to murder his majesty's ministers, but to overthrow the government; the supposition on the other side is, that the sole object of the plot was the assassination.

To return to my learned friend's case; suppose, says he, the accomplice to state, and to be confirmed in many facts which shewed that the intention of the accused was undoubtedly to rob the hen-roosts, but that there was no corroborating testimony to support him in his assertion that burglary was also meditated; could you, he asks, as a jury, find the prisoners guilty of a conspiracy to commit a burglary? certainly not. I freely admit it to my learned friend; but let me in return put this question to him, and let us see how he will deal with it; if in addition to preparations which were necessary to accomplish the first purpose of robbing hen-roosts, there were found crow bars, picklock keys, matches, phosphorus, and other implements, applicable only to house-breaking, what would my learned friend say to this confirmation of the accomplices account? Would he then deny that there was evidence to show that the prisoners were guilty of the greater offence?

What were the preparations made by these conspirators? were they such as were adapted to the sole purpose of assassinating his majesty's ministers, or were they of a nature calculated to effect more extensive destruction? were fire-balls, were pikes necessary? but, above all, were the twelve hundred rounds of ball found at Tidd's and the cartridges for loading cannon, intended to be used against my lord Harrowby's house, or his majesty's ministers assembled there? For what then was all this ammunition provided by these men? You find that their preparations were not only equal to the perpetration of the deed, which my learned friends suppose to be the whole plot, but fully adequate to the completion of those plans which Adams tells you they had in contemplation.

What was the object of assassinating his majesty's ministers? Had these prisoners and their associates conceived any particular feelings of revenge against the persons of those noblemen and gentlemen who compose the cabinet? Was private enmity the motive which compelled them to the commission of the bloody act? Or was not rather the blow aimed against these unoffending victims because they filled the ostensible characters of ministers of the Crown, and directed the government of the country? It is beyond human credulity to believe that this plot was intended to stop at the assassination of the illustrious guests of lord Harrowby; no reason can be assigned which could have operated upon the minds of these men to induce them to destroy at one moment fifteen individuals personally unknown probably to many of their murderers, unless you believe they had in view other and to them momentous objects, to the attainment of which the destruction of the advisers of the king was, in their wild and heated imaginations, considered a first and necessary step. You remember they were found armed. Yes, say my learned friends, they were armed, but the proceedings at Manchester had compelled them to protect themselves. But were these pikes procured in consequence of the Manchester transactions? Were the cartridges provided for their protection when they held their meetings? It is only by the desperate circumstances of the case that my learned friends are obliged to have recourse to such an hypothesis; once believe the testimony given by Adams, and confirmed by Hiden, and the whole difficulty must vanish from your minds.

Why did they meet in an obscure room in Cato-street? why was that place chosen? It was doubtless selected because it was a convenient spot to proceed from to lord Harrowby's house. Were no other parties assembled on that night? My learned friends say there is no evidence of any attack at Gray's-inn-lane or the Artillery-ground. It is true there is not; and for this plain reason, the parties intended for the execution of those duties, were of course directed to wait till the blow was first struck in Grosvenor-square: but, though no movement was made, you have it in evidence, from Hale, that persons did assemble who were not destined to go to Cato-street; I allude to Potter and his companions, to a man of the name of Palin who was to head some incendiaries in the Borough, and to another band that has been mentioned, and which clearly was not meant for the seizure of the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, as that task was assigned to Thistlewood and his followers, after they had perpetrated the bloody deed at lord Harrowby's. When the meeting had left Brunt's, it was thought that the room would be wanted for Palin's men; but it was afterwards determined to send them to the White Hart, and directions were given to Hale to do so. Hale tells you, that three persons came to his master's house, who were strangers, and that he desired them in consequence of the order he had received, to go to the White Hart, and they not knowing the way, he accompanied them. Potter afterwards called with others, to whom Hale gave similar instructions. Here you have the most direct evidence that many others were engaged in the plot of that night; recollect, too, the observation of Thistlewood, when fear was expressed of success; he said that they need not be apprehensive, for that there were numbers ready to join them, who waited only for some decisive blow to be struck. Need I refer you to the language of Thistlewood to Monument: "Great events are at hand; people are every where anxious for a change; I have been promised support by numbers who have deceived me; but now I have got men who will stand by me." The only answer given to this by my learned friends is, that the plot is incredible; that it was impossible it could be carried into execution, and that you are on that account to dismiss it from your notice. You are not to consider whether or not it could have been effected by the means these conspirators possessed. The only question for you to decide is, did they harbour in their minds the design imputed to them. If they did harbour that design, and acted in furtherance of it, then are they guilty, however wild and visionary it may have been and however inadequate their means to its execution.

Look at their conduct in Cato-street, when they were apprehended; if they had assembled for an innocent purpose, why was the desperate resistance made to the officers? and here I cannot help making an observation upon the defence made to you by one of the prisoners at the bar; it is painful to me to do so, but justice absolutely requires it. Davidson has attempted to make you believe that he was not in the stable at Cato-street; that he was accidentally in the street in its neighbourhood upon that evening; and that he was by mere chance in possession of the carbine and sword which were found upon him. But how does the fact stand? The officers tell you, that on their entering the stable, they saw a man of colour, whom they believed to have been Davidson; that he was accoutred, that he had on cross-belts, and a sword by his side, and that he was walking up and down as a sentry. It was proved by Hiden that he saw him there; and Adams swears that Davidson was there, although he did not observe his dress, Davidson being engaged with some others in preparing the pikes. Munday, on the evening of that day, noticed him going into the stable, and on his stooping down, perceived under his coat pistols and a long sword; he saw him light a candle at an adjoining house, and carry it into the stable; but the proof does not stop there, he is actually pursued from the stable; he is observed to discharge the carbine, he makes a cut at his pursuer, and is at last taken with those belts upon him, and with the sword and carbine in his hand. It would be supposing you did not attend to the evidence, if I were to enlarge upon this topic. I have felt these remarks necessary, because he has in the defence endeavoured to make you believe that he was no party to this plot, and that he was only there by accident. My learned friend, finding that Davidson had been clearly proved to have been present at other times, at the meetings and consultations, and to have been active throughout the conspiracy, did not think it necessary to make any observations to you on that part of the case to which the prisoner has thus particularly addressed himself.

Tidd too was found in arms, and made a desperate resistance; he levelled his pistol at lieutenant Fitzclarence on his arrival at the head of his soldiers; a gentleman who had offered him no personal violence; and but for the interposition of that gallant man Legg, who stepped in to the protection of his officer, it is not at all unlikely that lieutenant Fitzclarence might have lost his life, as the unfortunate Smithers did in an earlier part of the transaction.

I have not troubled you with the particular facts affecting each of the prisoners, for I am sure, watching the proof as you have, you must have seen that they were both active throughout the whole of the conspiracy. Tidd was present at their meetings; was chairman on more than one occasion; he approved of their schemes; and though in Cato-street he doubted whether they were sufficiently numerous to attack lord Harrowby's house, against the plan itself he felt no abhorrence, his only fear was, that their means were not equal to carrying it into execution; when his fears were quieted by the address of Thistlewood, all his objections were removed. The only real question is, that which is raised by my learned friend on the other side, as to the intention attributed to the prisoners by this indictment. I submit that it is proved not only by the testimony of Adams, but by Monument and Hiden, and still more by the facts themselves which occurred on the fatal evening of the 23rd of February, by the preparations in Cato-street, and by the ammunition found the next morning at Tidd's and at Brunt's.

If you entertain no doubt of this, your duty points out only one line of conduct, and you are bound, however painful it may be, to pronounce a verdict of guilty against these unfortunate men. It has been said, by one of my learned friends, that he laments that this plot has been made the subject of so much investigation; he thinks, or affects to think, that it was hardly worthy the attention of a court constituted as this is. That it has occupied so much of the attention of yourselves and others, is owing to the lenity of the law, which has enabled the prisoners to sever in their challenges, each of them having the privilege of objecting to a certain number of jurors. It therefore became indispensable, that their trials should proceed separately; and to that circumstance alone is it owing, that this subject has for so long a time occupied the attention of the Court. But the time consumed in this investigation ought not, and I am sure will not, operate upon your minds, or affect the verdict you are to pronounce. Though this be the fourth trial, yet, if the facts proved are, as they have been stated to be by the learned counsel for the accused, identically the same as those proved on the former occasions, the only question in this and each succeeding trial will be, whether the prisoners who stand at the bar for their deliverance are implicated in the guilt of this conspiracy. However we may regret the repetition of these investigations, it is absolutely necessary for the sake of public justice that they should take place.

With respect to the consequences that must follow these trials, and to which allusion has been made, they ought not to have, and I am satisfied will not have any influence whatever on your verdict. You are now to decide upon the fate of the two individuals before you; you will dismiss from your minds all recollection that any persons have been tried, and all knowledge that any others remain for trial. The only question you have to ask yourselves is, whether the evidence given satisfies you that the prisoners are guilty. If it does, I am sure you will feel no difficulty or hesitation in discharging the duty you owe to yourselves and the public, in pronouncing that verdict which alone can satisfy the justice of the case.

SUMMING-UP.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen of the Jury;—The two prisoners at your bar are arraigned before you for that highest and most complicated crime which the community in any country can possibly have to animadvert upon, the crime of High Treason, involving in its probable consequences the crimes of murder, the destruction of property, and every other consequence which can follow from the perpetration of other single crimes committed by other offenders. You have been kept from your various abodes and occupations for a considerable time past, in order to engage in the investigation of the trials which have arisen upon the present indictment, a task devolving upon you as members of the community, painful in its execution, and attended probably with circumstances of a domestic nature not agreeable to you, but which you will not have any hesitation in performing according to the best of your honest judgment, whatever those consequences may be, in the persuasion, I am satisfied, that whatever may be the result of the present or any other trial entered into upon this occasion, it was indispensably necessary that these cases should be brought before the tribunals of the country, in order that the guilt or innocence of the persons accused might be ascertained, and if guilty, up to what extent the guilt had arisen.

The charge against the prisoners is that of high treason, stated in four several counts of this indictment. One of those counts charges the actual levying of war against his majesty, another, a conspiracy for the purpose of depriving his majesty of life, and if you are satisfied that the evidence which has been laid before you is in its material and substantial parts correct, if it brings home a satisfactory conviction to your minds, so that when you retire to deliberate on your verdict, you should say, I cannot as an honest man hesitate or doubt upon it, then it is my duty to tell you, that in point of law the crime of high treason is clearly and unquestionably established. I should have been prepared on the first trial to have told you so, in the language and on the authority of the greatest names that have adorned the legal jurisdiction of our country. Having been prevented by circumstances of a domestic nature from attending at the very commencement of these proceedings, I was deprived of the advantage of hearing the same thing better expressed by the first and highest authorities in Westminster-hall.

I now call your attention to two other counts to which, if you believe the evidence to be true, you will probably be of opinion that it more particularly applies. I mean the first, which charges that "the prisoners with other persons did compass, imagine, invent, devise and intend to depose the king;" and the third, which charges "that they compassed, imagined, invented, devised, and intended to levy war against the king, in order by force and constraint to compel him to change his measures." The indictment, as the law of high treason requires, states that the purposes charged in these several counts of the indictment are established by certain overt acts, eleven in number—conspiring to devise plans to subvert the constitution; conspiring to levy war, and subvert the constitution; conspiring to murder divers of the privy council; providing arms to murder divers of the privy council; providing arms and ammunition to levy war, and subvert the constitution; conspiring to burn houses and barracks, and to provide combustibles for that purpose; preparing addresses to the king's subjects, containing incitements to the king's subjects to assist in levying war and subverting the constitution, and containing particularly the address stated in one of those overt acts addressed to the people, stating that their tyrants were destroyed, and that the friends of liberty were invited to come forward, as the provisional government was then sitting—and if these or any of these overt acts shall have been provably made out to your satisfaction—I use now the language of the law—that is, in other words, shall to your plain common sense and understanding, as you exercise it in the ordinary transactions of life, have been brought home to your conviction by evidence on which you cannot doubt, in that case it is your duty to pronounce the prisoners guilty; but if you entertain any serious satisfactory doubts of the truth of the evidence, or if it does not amount to proof of the facts charged in the indictment, you will do that which will be more agreeable to you, you will pronounce them not guilty.

The evidence has occupied a great number of hours; I am prepared to state it to you verbatim, from the beginning to the end, and with your permission, knowing you will feel no time can be too much that is occupied in such a detail, I will proceed to read it to you; it will occupy much of your time, but you have given me a pledge that you will not regard the time, for your attention has been unremitting from the time you entered that box.

In order to make out the facts of high treason, the first witness called before you is a witness of the name of Robert Adams. It may not be necessary, by way of information, for you have heard it from various quarters, but it may be proper to state, that he stands in the situation of an accomplice. Severe animadversions have been made upon him. It has been said, that he is not only a traitor to his king, unfaithful to his friend, faithless to those who have reposed in him their guilty secrets, but an apostate from his God, losing sight of every interest which can be attained here or hereafter. For the purposes of the present inquiry, it would be enough to state

(not that I censure those observations, those who made them did well to impress your mind with his want of credit, but it is not necessary to go higher to the unsupported testimony of any man, than to state) that he admits himself to be a party to the treason which he imputes to others; so it is in the case of murder, and yet the accomplice of the murderer is heard every day, and verdicts are pronounced upon the testimony of the accomplice of the murderer, on his sole confession, if the testimony of an accomplice so deep in the guilt himself, receives such confirmation as to induce the jury to believe that his story is not the invention of fiction, but the narration of truth; and this is to be collected by the fact of his being confirmed or not confirmed in his narration; it may not be unfit to observe to you here, that the confirmation to be derived to an accomplice, is not a repetition by others of the whole story of the accomplice, and a confirmation of every part of it, that would be either impossible or unnecessary and absurd; impossible, as in the case of a murder committed, where probably there are no persons present but the deceased, the murderer, and his associate in guilt; and therefore you are to look to the circumstances, to see whether there are such a number of important facts confirmed as to give you reason to be persuaded that the main body of the story is correct; I state this not on any authority of mine, but on the authority of two of the most humane and learned and excellent judges, that have adorned our bench, within the memory of man now living; I allude to the prosecutions at York, of Swallow and others, where the late lord chief baron Thomson and that most humane and excellent man Mr. Justice Le Blanc presided, the first of whom was called upon to state the law, which he laid down most correctly.—* I do not mean then for the first time, it was always the unquestioned law, and has been acted upon in innumerable instances. Upon the occasion to which I allude it was explained to the satisfaction of every one; you are, each of you, to ask yourselves this question—now that I have heard the accomplice, and have heard other circumstances which are said to confirm the story he has told, does he appear to me to be so confirmed by unimpeachable evidence as to some of the persons affected by his testimony, or with respect to some of the facts stated by him, as to afford me good ground to believe that he also speaks truly with regard to other prisoners or other facts, with regard to which there may be no confirmation? Do I, upon the whole, feel convinced in my conscience, that his evidence is true, and such as I may safely act upon? With this key and with that view, you will attend to the testimony of Adams, with which I will proceed.

He states, that he comes here in custody;

* See the case of Swallow and others, 10 How. Mod. St. Tr. 980.

that before he was in that custody, he lived at No. 4, Hole-in-the-wall-passage, Brook's-market; that he was formerly in the royal regiment of horse-guards, and left the army about eighteen years ago; he says, "I first knew a person of the name of Brunt," who is one of the prisoners included in this indictment, "in the year 1816, at Cambray, in France; I then knew him by the name of Thomas Morton; the head-quarters of the army were at that time at Cambray, and I was with the army carrying on my trade of a shoemaker;" this occasions the acquaintance and intimacy which led, as he states to you, to the communication I am now about to state; he says, "early in the present year, I called at Brunt's lodgings in Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane, he was at that time carrying on his business of a boot-closer; on the 12th of January he introduced me to Mr. Thistlewood, in Stanhope-street; those were the lodgings of Thistlewood; Ings was with us; on our entering, Brunt said to Thistlewood, this is the man I was speaking to you about;" referring to some former conversation Brunt had had with him, about some man he was to bring; "Thistlewood said, 'you belonged, did you not, to the life-guards?' I told him no, I belonged formerly to the Oxford Blues; he said, 'I presume you are a good soldier and can handle your sword well?' I told him I once was a good soldier, but I had not had occasion to use the sword or any weapon for a considerable number of years past, I could use a sword once, and should be able to use my sword again in my own defence. Thistlewood then turned the discourse, and began to speak on the subject of the shop-keepers of London, particularly saying they were a set of aristocrats all together, and that they were all working under one system of government, and he should glory to see the day when all their shops should be shut up and well plundered;" then he says, "Thistlewood turned his discourse upon Mr. Hunt, saying, Mr. Hunt was a coward, that he was no friend to the people, that he had no doubt, could he get into Whitehall and overlook the government books, he should there find the name of Mr. Hunt, as a spy to government;" he next turned his discourse upon Mr. Cobbett, and said, "that he did not consider Mr. Cobbett, with all his writings, as any friend to the people, and that he had no doubt, if he could get a sight of those books, he should find Mr. Cobbett's name inscribed with Mr. Hunt's, as one of the spies to government; then Brunt alluded to two men that he had to call upon in Carnaby-market, and asked Thistlewood if he would take a walk to see the men; he refused to go, saying, he had somewhere to call; before we left the room, Brunt told Thistlewood of a raffle for a blunderbuss with a brass barrel," we have since heard some conversation about an intention to raffle for a brass-barrelled blunderbuss; "Brunt asked Thistlewood if he would be there; to the best of my recollection, he said he would, I am not quite certain whether

Mr. Thistlewood said he would or would not go, but we all left the room together; Brunt told me that there was a plan drawn up, and he had no doubt, if I would consent to join in it, it would meet with my approbation; he said the plan was, to assassinate the ministers, the first time they met together to dine; he said, we have information where they keep their money; the thieves have three million in hard money; after we have done this, we intend to go to that place and plunder it;" he says, this was before they arrived at Thistlewood's lodgings.

Then he says, "sometime after this I was confined for debt in the Whitecross-street prison, and remained there until Sunday the 30th day of January, that was the day after his majesty's death. On the next day, Monday, I saw the prisoner, Brunt, at his lodgings in Fox-court; Brunt lived in the two-pair of stairs front room, and there was a meeting in a back room on the same floor. Brunt told me he had hired that room of the landlady for Ings;" that was the room taken by the recommendation of Brunt for Ings, and where the people we have heard so much about used to meet; he says, "meetings were held there twice a-day from that time up to the 23rd day of February," which you all know was that important date on which this conspiracy, such as it was, was detected in Cato-street, "except that there were none on Sunday evenings;" the Sunday evenings appear to have been occupied in other ways, in readings in public houses, and conversations not of the most useful tendency to keep men out of scrapes of this sort, but for some reason the meetings were not held at this room on the Sunday evenings. He describes the room as several other persons have done, as having no furniture in it but a fixed stove; then he says, "the persons who usually attended those meetings were Thistlewood, Brunt, Ings, Hall, Davidson (the prisoner now at the bar), Harrison, Wilson, Bradburn, Tidd occasionally, but not so constantly as the others, and Edwards. I do not recollect the names of any more at this moment; I was at the meeting on Monday the 31st of January, but nothing particular passed then. I was there on the following Wednesday; when I went to the room I found Thistlewood and Harrison there, and in the course of the evening, Ings, Wilson, and Edwards came; when I went in Thistlewood and Harrison had been in deep discourse respecting some information they had gained, that the life-guards and foot-guards were to leave London for the purpose of attending the funeral of his late majesty. Harrison said, that a life-guardsman had told him, that every man in the life-guards that could be mounted was to attend the funeral, as well as the foot-guards that could be spared, and likewise the police officers. Harrison said, he thought it would be an excellent opportunity to kick up a row in London that night; Thistlewood agreed to the plan, and proposed, that it should be done by collecting together what men they could among themselves, and taking the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, as well as the cannon in the Artillery-ground, and likewise to make use of the fire-balls in setting fire to different buildings." He said, he thought it would be a favourable opportunity, as the life-guards and foot-guards, and the police, and a great many other persons who attended the funeral of his late majesty would be out of town. The noble lords, constituting his majesty's cabinet, could not fail in the solemn duty of being present upon that melancholy occasion. It has been said, in the course of one of the eloquent addresses made to you, that all that was intended here was, "the kicking up a row in London;" one is disposed to ask, what sort of row could be intended to be kicked up in London; they choose the opportunity when all the horse-guards, and all the foot-guards, and all the police were out of London, and when, as they express it, there is nobody in London to protect it; oddly enough, during about a fourth part of the trial in which we have been engaged, it has been admitted, that to be sure there was a conspiracy to assassinate all his majesty's ministers, but it is said that that was all; these persons were all very poor, and wished to kick up a row; but it appears it was to be a row of such a size, that it was thought desirable they should avail themselves of the absence of all troops, and all police officers from London. That is the effect of the testimony of this witness; he communicated this to Mr. Thistlewood, and Mr. Thistlewood approved of it; but Mr. Thistlewood immediately improved upon it, and proposed, that the two pieces of cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the six pieces of cannon in the Artillery-ground should be taken all on the same night (this is the row that was to be kicked up on the night of the king's funeral) and that they should use fire-balls to set fire to the different buildings. Thistlewood then said "it would be necessary to send a party to Hyde-park corner to prevent any orderly man leaving London for Windsor, to communicate at Windsor" What? why, that there had been a row in London; that it was necessary to take care that no persons should come back to prevent the effects of this idle row; he likewise proposed, "that the telegraph over the water should be taken to prevent any intelligence being communicated to Woolwich," which, we all know, is the deposit of a considerable proportion of the artillery; "this plan met with the assent of those persons in the room; after this Brunt and Ings came in, and the plan which had been in agitation was communicated to them by Thistlewood; Brunt and Ings both declared, that there was nothing short of the assassination of ministers would satisfy them; in consequence of this, the project which had been mentioned was given up." Now, gentlemen, every thing I am stating to you, will be subject to your believing or not believing this narrative; but as we pass along,

I cannot help observing on the character of this proof as it is developed. It will be for you, when you have heard this evidence to its end, to ask yourselves, was this a plan which had nothing for its object but the destruction of fifteen men, however elevated by rank or station, or by their virtues? was the thing in project, that which no one has the hardihood to deny, the destruction of some of his majesty's cabinet ministers, and the destruction of some houses, and to end there, or a more melancholy object, to effect a revolution in the country? Not to subdue, as it is said, the millions resident in this metropolis, but to endeavour to effect all those objects which are stated upon this indictment, however wild and impracticable such projects might prove.

Then the witness says, "I recollect a meeting which took place on Saturday the 19th of February; there were present Thistlewood, Harrison, Brunt, Ings, and Hall; on my going in they seemed to be in a study between themselves; they got up and Thistlewood said, well, it is agreed on, that if nothing happens between this and next Wednesday night, we then go to work; he said that they were all so poor, they could not wait any longer; and he gave instructions that there should be a meeting the next morning, to draw up a plan to see how they should act."

Then he says, "a meeting took place the next morning; it was a larger one than usual: the prisoners at the bar were of the party; we met about eleven o'clock. Thistlewood on looking round said, there are twelve of us, it is time to proceed to business. Tidd took the chair with a pike in his hand, and Thistlewood said he had come to a determination, if nothing transpired between that time and Wednesday night to go to work; he said, we have been waiting so long expecting the ministers to dine together, finding they do not, we intend, if they do not dine together between this and then, to take them separately; he then began to propose his plan about taking the cannon in Gray's-inn-lane, and the Artillery-ground, and that Palin was to take upon himself to set fire to different buildings, and he was to have assistance from the men that he had collected himself. Mr. Thistlewood said this was the outline of the plan at present, and as Mr. Brunt had a plan to propose with respect to the assassination of ministers, he should drop it for the present. Brunt then came forward to explain his plan, and Thistlewood said, let my plan first be put from the chair, and if any one has any thing to say upon it, let him speak; it was put from the chair, and agreed to by all present; Tidd being in the chair. Brunt then came forward and said, as we cannot get the ministers together as it was proposed, I propose to take them separately, and that the men employed for that purpose shall be separated into so many parts, and from each allotment a man shall be drawn to do the deed, a man for the purpose of committing each murder, and if he attempted it and did not succeed, and there was any sign of cowardice, he should be run through upon the spot directly." Then the witness says, "upon this I got up and asked him if a man attempted it and failed, was he to be run through upon the spot? Brunt said no, if there were no signs of cowardice; this motion was put from the chair as before, and agreed to. After this, Palin, Potter, and Strange, came in; the circumstances that had passed were communicated to them, and they agreed to them. After Thistlewood had communicated the same to them as they had to all the others in the room, Palin got up and said, that he had paid due attention, and that he among the rest had agreed to what had been proposed, but he wished to know how the plans were to be executed, as they had so many objects to be carried at the same time." The plan of assassination was called the west-end job; he said, "you talk of the west-end job taking forty or fifty men?" which number had been mentioned before by Thistlewood; "you talk of taking the pieces of cannon from Gray's-inn-lane, and six pieces of cannon from the Artillery-ground; and my setting fire to the buildings, I wish to know how this is to be done; you ought to know whether you have men to depend upon sufficient; I cannot give you any satisfaction on that point till I see what men I can speak to; and I wish for instructions whether I may communicate to them what has passed here this morning." Thistlewood and Brunt said, that there was no doubt that Palin might communicate it, if he was satisfied within himself that he had got such men as he could depend upon; upon that he sat down satisfied. Thistlewood then turned round to Brunt and said, "Oh, Brunt, as Palin is here, you may as well take him to this spot close by, and he will be able to judge for himself whether the thing is practicable or not;" that place was Furnival's-inn-buildings, which were at that time in a progress for being completed for chambers; I believe not yet quite completed; in a commanding situation in the metropolis, and they would make a very great fire, and attract much attention; he then says, "that was near the back of Fox-court; Brunt and Palin went out and returned again, and Mr. Palin said it was a very good job, and a very easy one, and would make a very good fire. Thistlewood said it would be highly necessary, if it was possible to get the men together, to communicate their intentions and give them a treat, but he did not know how it was to be done, they were all so poor. Brunt then said he had a one pound note, he had reserved for the purpose, though he had done little or no work lately, but he would be damned if he would not spend it upon his men. Thistlewood said, he did not know where they could take them to, to give them a treat; I suppose, he said, we can have the back-room at the White Hart, at Hobbs's, where the meetings on former occasions had been held. Brunt said he did not much like it." You know what that arose from; that Adams had stated that Hobbs had thrown out some circumstances of the officers having called there, as if they had information that there was some radical meeting there; and Adams had got into some disrepute with the party, for throwing cold water upon their designs. Brunt said "he did not much like it, after what had slipped from my mouth; but never mind we can go there armed, and if any of the traps should come into the room, I do not see what occasion we have to fear them; he said he would call on Hobbs and hear what he had to say; on second recollection, he said he would give his boy a holiday, send his wife out, and have what men he could collect together in his own room; after this we separated." Then he says, "I have seen arms in that back-room at different periods, and among other things, pike-staves in the rough just as they were cut from the tree they grew on; Bradburn sawed the ends of them off, and ferruled them in that back-room; there were holes made in them, it was then considered that they were too weak, that they would not support the pike; in consequence of that the ferrules were cut off again, and bigger ones got and put on; this was done in the same room; there were some hand-grenades brought in there ready made, and some that were made there; I saw Davidson and Harrison there, making a kind of thing that was wound round a tin case first, and some pitch that was melted in an iron pot, and after this was put in there were some nails bound round; they were both engaged in making a number of them; they were afterwards carried to Tidd's lodgings in Hole-in-the-wall-passage, which was called the dépôt. Thistlewood assigned as a reason for removing them, that there should be nothing found in that room in case any person came there who might give information."

"I remember the meeting that was held on Tuesday the 22nd of February, in the same room at Brunt's, about ten o'clock; there were present Thistlewood, Brunt, Hall, and Ings, and soon after Edwards came in, and said he had been looking into the newspaper, and there was a notice that the ministers were to be at a cabinet dinner on the following Wednesday at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square; in consequence of this, Hall fetched a newspaper, and it appeared by that, that the information was true; upon this being communicated, Brunt said, Now, damn my eyes," it is a most horrid expression, I am obliged to read it to you—being the manner in which this person treated a superintending Providence, as a superintending power only for the purposes of mischief and destruction, and not as we have this day reason to believe, a Providence for the protection of worthy men against the plots of the wicked—the horror of the statement almost disqualifies one from stating it; he said, "Now, damn my eyes, I believe there is a God, I have often prayed that these thieves may be called together, that we may have an opportunity of destroying them, and now God has heard my prayer." Rejoicing in the opportunity which had occurred, of offering the throats of these illustrious persons to the daggers of the assassins, or their persons to the effect of these hand-grenades, at the moment of relaxation from the more active cares of public life. Ings was equally alive to it. "Thistlewood then proposed that a committee should sit directly, to alter the plan of assassination, which had been agreed to on the Sunday morning;" the plan on Sunday morning, you remember, had been the dividing the men into so many parties as they knew they could take off ministers by individual assassination, but now the golden opportunity having presented itself of ministers assembling at a cabinet dinner, a further mode was to be had resort to; for which purpose he proposed a meeting should be held, and a meeting was held accordingly; the witness says, "I took the chair, and called to order; Thistlewood was going to speak, but I interrupted him saying, gentlemen, I hope from what I said yesterday morning, you have given it a due consideration; that was what had been said to me by Hobbs, the landlord of the White Hart, respecting the police officer having inquired at his house. Upon this, Brunt put himself into a passion, and so did all of them, particularly Harrison, who walked about the room and threatened the first man that attempted to fling cold water upon the concern, he would run him through directly with a sword; upon this I opened my breast and said, Harrison if you think that I am not a friend, do it now. Palin and Potter and Bradburn were in the room, Palin got up, walked across the room, and insisted on my being heard; Hall was also in the room at that time. Brunt then, in order to obviate any difficulties that might arise, supposing Hobbs's information to be correct, proposed that lord Harrowby's house should be watched, to commence at six o'clock that evening;" thus they proposed to ascertain whether there was any truth in the idea of a suspicion being entertained by government; "Davidson, and another man, whose name I do not recollect, were to be the first, and Brunt and Tidd were to relieve them at nine o'clock; Davidson and Tidd were both present at the time; the reason why they were to watch, was to see whether any police officers or soldiers entered the house, and if so, it was to be communicated to the committee, and if nothing of that kind occurred, Brunt insisted upon it that the business should be done the following night. If they saw any police officers or soldiers enter, it would be natural to suppose that the suspicions of government were raised, and they were to give information to the committee. After this proposition of Brunt's was settled, Thistlewood directly proposed that Tidd should take the chair, in consequence of my interrupting the business; and Tidd took the chair accordingly. Thistlewood then came forwards, and proposed a fresh plan for the assassination of ministers; he proposed that he himself should go to lord Harrowby's house with a note in his hand, and tell the servant to deliver it to his lordship, and to state that he must have an answer; at the time he got in, the others were to rush in directly after him, and to secure the servants, presenting a pistol to their breast and threatening them with instant death if they made any resistance; others were to take the command of the stair-cases, one party to take the command of the stairs leading to the bottom part of the house, and another party to take the command of the stairs leading to the upper part of the house; and two men in the area. In order to prevent any relief being afforded to his majesty's ministers in the dining-room, they were each to be provided with a hand-grenade, as well as pistols and blunderbusses, and if any servant attempted to retreat from the upper or the lower part of the house, or the area, a hand-grenade was to be thrown among them, with a view to their destruction; then the others were to rush into the room at the same time; Ings proposed himself to take the command to lead them into the room in this kind of way; as soon as he entered the room, he was to address their lordships by saying, Now my lords, I have as good men here as the Manchester yeomanry; enter citizens and do your duty. The two swordsmen were to follow in after him;" they were to be the witness Adams, who had formerly been a soldier, and Harrison, who had been in the life-guards; "on the swordsmen entering the room, they were to be followed by the pike-men. Ings, who was a butcher by business, declared he would follow, and cut every head off as he came to them. Ings had two bags with him, and he proposed to bring away the heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth in the bags; he said he would have one of lord Castlereagh's hands, and he would cure that;" which I understood from the witness, to be preparing it in some sort of pickle; "as it would be thought much of at some future time. At a former meeting, Ings had said that he would exhibit those heads on poles, and carry them through the streets; after this should be done, Harrison undertook to go to the King-street barracks, and set fire to the shed where the straw and hay were deposited, and to destroy the whole building." Then he is asked whether any further use is to be made of the heads when they were brought away, and he said yes; that it had often been talked of, and that this discourse finished on the Wednesday afternoon. "After Ings had proposed to exhibit them on a pole, Thistlewood said, no, the best way of carrying them would be to put them each on a pike, and carry them behind the cannon to terrify the people, and to make them believe that there was somebody of more consequence than was then visible, at the head of the conspiracy. It was proposed after this by Bradburn, that after they had been exhibited about the streets of the metropolis for two or three days, he would make a box, and enclose them in it, and send it to Ireland, or take it over himself, to be exhibited there;" he said, "then it was proposed that after they had done at lord Harrowby's, Harrison was to go to the horse barracks, supported by Wilson, to set them on fire by a ball prepared for that purpose; others were to proceed to Gray's-inn-lane, to the City-light-horse barracks" in truth the barracks of the light-horse volunteers; "and if they met with any interruption from the people, it was proposed to run the pikes through them, and to fire upon them occasionally; and after they met the party in Gray's-inn-lane, to assist them in taking the two pieces of cannon at the light-horse stables, and to proceed from thence to the Artillery-ground, to take the six pieces of cannon there; this party was to be headed by Cook, and after Cook had got the six pieces of cannon, he was to load them, and bring them into the street."

Now, when you are by-and-by taking into your consideration whether the conspiracy had for its object only the taking off the ministers, and to end there, or to endeavour to produce a revolution in the country, by first beginning it in this town; you will recollect, that there were found among the articles these conspirators had provided for the occasion, cartridges made up in bags of flannel, applicable to six-pound cannon, and in fact used for no other purpose; not in the state in which they were likely to be in the possession of any dealer, or other private individual who keeps gunpowder, "the cannon were to be loaded, and brought into the street, and if there was any interruption, Cook was to fire; if he found the people come over to him to enable him to advance, he was to take them to the Mansion-house, and when they got to the Mansion-house they were to divide the cannon into two parts, place three on each side of the Mansion-house, and demand an entrance;" they were to summon the inhabitants of the building to surrender, "and if it was refused, if they did not surrender, they were to fire upon it on both sides, and when taken, it was proposed by Thistlewood for the seat of the provisional government." If this is believed, gentlemen, what becomes of the doubt which has been suggested, as to the extent of the plot which was in contemplation? is this constructive treason? is this constructive levying of war against the king? If the testimony is not true, the prisoner is not guilty of the crime charged upon him. "Cook was not to be of the party at lord Harrowby's, he was to command the party that was to go into the city; and then it was proposed that they should take the Bank of England, and plunder it, but the books were not to be meddled with, as Thistlewood thought by preserving them they would communicate to them somewhat more than they were aware of. It was proposed, that the persons there should go round for the purpose of communicating what they had in view to their associates; Harrison proposed that the word butter should be the countersign; a station was to be procured near Oxford-street, by Tyburn-turnpike; the man appointed to stand there was to pronounce the letters b, u, l. the other was to answer t, o, n. and on his doing that, he was to be considered as a man friendly to their object; after making this arrangement, we separated for the purposes of preparation; Davidson and another man went upon the watch at six o'clock; it was proposed, originally, that Tidd and Brunt should go upon the watch at nine o'clock to relieve them, and they started for that purpose but Brunt came back in about five minutes, saying that Tidd had called at a house, and found a man that he had appointed; that he was of too much consequence to be left, and that therefore he could not go upon the watch."

Now, that there was a watch at the house of lord Harrowby, is proved not only by the testimony of this witness, but by the two watchmen, who saw persons looking about, and by the gentleman's servant who played at dominos with Brunt, so that there has been no attempt made to shake that part of the testimony. Then he says, "in consequence of that it was proposed that I should go instead of Tidd, and accordingly I went with Brunt; we saw Davidson there, and relieved him; we did not continue in the square all the time, but in the course of our watch, we went into a public-house at the corner of the mews, at the back of the square; there Brunt played at dominos; I went into the square again at eleven o'clock, and stopped till the turn of twelve; I found all quiet, and I then went home; I recollect going into Fox-court on Tuesday afternoon or evening; on going up stairs, I smelt a strange smell, and on going in I found Edwards, Ings, and Hall there; Ings and Hall were employed in making illumination balls to set fire to the buildings with, and Edwards was employed in making touch-paper for the grenades; Hall was laying the paper on the floor to receive the balls, to prevent their sticking to the hand; I went away almost directly." He then proceeds to the transactions of the Wednesday; he says, "on Wednesday I went to Fox-court, about two o'clock; I found Brunt in his own room; soon after I went Strange came in, and two or three strangers afterwards; I saw some pistols lying on the floor in Brunt's private room; they began to try to put flints into them; on the last men coming in, Brunt proposed to go into the back room, which they did." Now, you will bear in your recollection what I stated as to the confirmation of the accomplice; have you any confirmation of this most important fact? Have you not Hale the apprentice of Brunt, who almost in words and syllables (though he has had no opportunity of hearing the testimony of Adams) speaks to persons being in Brunt's private room, to one of whom he gives the name of Strange, and states that the rest were strangers; that they were flinting the pistols; that they conceived they were not in a place of proper security, and that they went, therefore, into that place which had been made more secure by putting up Mrs. Brunt's apron; in this he is confirmed by the circumstance that they removed to that room in consequence of being engaged in some transaction which was not to be known, and which it was wished should be concealed; there is not the slightest imputation attempted to be thrown upon that young man, the apprentice of Brunt, who gives this (probably you will think) most important confirmation of the testimony of Adams. Adams proceeds, "we went accordingly there with the pistols, there were no other persons in the room at that time, except those we brought from Mr. Brunt's room; Thistlewood came in soon afterwards; Ings came in in the course of the afternoon, and within a very little time after he came in he began to equip himself; before he came, the strangers were busy in fixing flints to their pistols, and slings to the cutlasses that were in the room; when Thistlewood came in, he looked round and said this looks something like as if you were going to work; he clapped his hand on my shoulder, and asked me how I did? I said I am rather unwell, and very low in spirits; in consequence of this, he proposed to Brunt to send for something to drink to put me in spirits, and directly after he proposed that there should be some paper fetched, as he wanted to draw up some bills; Thistlewood gave Brunt some money, and said he wanted such paper as the newspapers were printed on; I proposed to him to have some cartridge-paper, which was agreed to, and Brunt said that his apprentice or his boy should fetch it; he went out for that purpose, and the cartridge paper was brought; a table and chair were brought in from Brunt's room, and Thistlewood sat down and wrote three bills. The words written in large writing letters on those papers, were these, Your tyrants are destroyed; the friends of liberty are called upon to come forward; the provisional government is now sitting.—James Ings, secretary, February 23, 1820."

As I pass along, let us ask ourselves, I ought rather to say you will ask yourselves, can you receive any confirmation of this part of Adam's testimony, of the scene he describes as to persons assembling and making preparations, for which purpose they commence in Brunt's room; that is not considered secure from observation; they are advised to retire into another room, and they do so. Hale gives you the same account. Adams tells you, that it became necessary that something should be written, and Hale tells you that he was applied to for a piece of paper, and that he carried that into the room, and that then he was desired to fetch some cartridge paper, and that that was carried into the room; that something was wanted—a table and chair—they were carried in; he cannot give you any further account of what was done with the paper in this room. The learned counsel for the prisoners says, I wish we could have seen this proclamation, I could then have told you it was only a riot to set a few houses on fire, or destroy the ministers. The language of this, if it is correctly given, is unequivocal; it is, "Your tyrants are destroyed?" Whose tyrants? The tyrants of the country. "The friends of liberty are called on," all who can read the English language, "to come forward;" for what? you will answer that question for yourselves; but if you want any thing further that is answered, "The provisional government is sitting." You do not want Hale or any body else to come and satisfy the requisition of the learned counsel that he saw this proclamation, which I should apprehend would be submitted only to the confidential and supposed safe eye of a co-conspirator. Would they unfurl these till the fires were lighted, and persons began to inquire what was meant by fires being lighted in different parts of the metropolis? Is there any requisition for the means of preparing something of that kind? the testimony of Hale is that to which you must look for the purpose of answering, whether you have received upon that important point confirmation of the testimony of Adams.

Then he says, "Thistlewood was writing the third bill; and on my looking at him, I perceived him to be very much agitated, and he could not write any more; he wished somebody else to take the pen, and proposed that Hall should do it, which he refused. There was a strange man in the room, who refused at first to take the pen, but afterwards took it, and proceeded to write other bills; these bills were to be stuck up at the side of different buildings that were to be set fire to, in order to inform the public of what had been done." What necessity was there to take means to inform the public with what had been done, if the object was only to cut off fifteen ministers, without any ulterior purpose? the public would know that much too soon, by finding some of the first families in this country in mourning, in consequence of the dreadful explosion which was intended to have been made. For what was it to be communicated to the public (except for the ulterior object) that the friends of liberty were desired to come forward now, that the provisional government was sitting? Then Thistlewood described himself incapable, from agitation or indisposition, to go on, but still there was something more to be done, and Hall having refused, another person took it and wrote something by the dictation of Thistlewood, which I understand, on one of the earlier trials, it was ruled, could not be received in evidence, and therefore is not offered upon this; that is therefore entirely a blank. Then he says, "Ings accoutred himself by putting his belt around his loins, another hanging upon his shoulder to support a cutlass with, and a couple of bags, like soldiers haversacks, one over each shoulder; he put on his great coat afterwards; the belt round his loins, which was to contain a brace of pistols; on viewing himself, he perceived that he had forgot to bring his steel with him; he produced upon that occasion a large butcher's knife, round the handle of which he had wound wax-end, which he stated was for the purpose of preventing the handle of it slipping when he was doing the job; he said he had prepared it for that purpose;" that is, the purpose of cutting off the heads of lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth. "Bradburn came up, saying, he wished Thistlewood to send some person to the men he had collected together at a spot where they might be more handy. Tidd was appointed for that purpose; he was not very willing to go; he said, as they were Irishmen, he thought it would be better for one of their own country to go, as he would do better with them; but it not being convenient to send one of their own countrymen, he went. Palin came in, and as Thistlewood and Brunt were not in the room he began to address himself to the people in the room, saying, gentlemen, I hope all present know what they are met here for; I hope you all know what it is, and that you will give it due consideration; in the first place inform yourselves whether the assassination of ministers is likely to be of consequence to your country; if you think it will, then in the next place you ought to come to a determination to stick true to each other, for unless you do so you can do no good; and if any man is seen after the work is begun to show the least signs of cowardice, that man ought to be run through upon the spot." Here, he says, he was interrupted by a tall man in the room, whose name he does not know, saying, "he could pretty well see the meaning of his speech; but, says he, you speak as if all that are in the room knew what we are met here for; that is not the case; that is what I and some of us want to know; I am not afraid of my own life, nor should any man that turns out on such a thing as this be afraid of his life; I will be the first, if I see any man a coward, to run him through. Palin was going to speak again, but at this moment Brunt came in, and observing, as I suppose, an alteration in the countenances of the men in the room, wished to know the cause; the tall man replied, that there were some in the room who did not know what they were met there upon, and they wished to know what they were going to do. Brunt directly said, this is not the room to know that in; go along with me to a room in the Edgeware-road, there I will tell you; and any man that goes along with me I will treat him with something that is good to drink, in order to put him into spirits for what we are going about. The tall man replied, I hope whoever is going on this business will not get drunk, for a drunken man in such a business is not fit to be trusted; he will run himself into the hands of his enemies. Brunt then began to put his men into movement to go to the Edgeware-road, saying, that Palin would want that room to bring his men to. I did not see Davidson at Fox-court at the time I am speaking of, but he was frequently at the meetings there; he was at the meeting on the Sunday when this meeting was arranged. The first of my knowing him was on the 10th of January, before I went to prison. After Brunt had put his men on the move, I went up Oxford-street, and met Thistlewood in the Edgeware-road; Brunt and another man were with me at that time, and we all went together to the stable in Cato-street. When we went into the stable, on the ground-floor, I saw Davidson and Wilson, apparently doing something to the pikes." Then he says, "I went up into the loft: the number I found assembled, including those that were below, were about six or seven, or there might be more. There was a bench, like a carpenter's bench, in the loft, and on it there were pistols and cutlasses; there were more men came in the course of the evening, and Thistlewood counted them; there were eighteen up stairs and two below. I had a blunderbuss, which I took off and laid upon the bench, and a broomstick that had been prepared for the reception of a bayonet for Brunt; I delivered them both. Tidd was not there at that time; Brunt was up in the loft when I went up, and Thistlewood went up before me. When I went up, Thistlewood and Brunt were in discourse together; Thistlewood seemed rather agitated for fear (as it appeared to me afterwards), that Tidd would not come;" you will recollect that Tidd had, according to the testimony of the other witnesses, undertaken to conduct some other persons who were not arrived; that according to the testimony of Hale, other persons were expected to call, and did call, some of whom were conducted by Hale to the White Hart, and others who knew the White Hart had been sent there; and it appears on the evidence of Monument, and according to the evidence of his brother, which is unimpeached, that he was to meet him, and did meet him; and that when he arrived, he told him he had other men to wait for, but would not wait longer than seven o'clock; but the pledge that he would come there, you find redeemed by his appearance soon afterwards, attended by the witness Monument; then he says, "Ings began to stamp and swear, saying he hoped they would not stop now for if they did, he should either hang himself or cut his throat; and just after this, Tidd came; before Tidd came, Brunt turned himself round to the bench, and said he would venture his life that Tidd would come; that he was confident of it; and shortly after Tidd came into the room. I afterwards saw Tidd talking to Thistlewood; they both seemed a little agitated; Thistlewood seeing me look at him turned away; and Tidd came towards me, and I said to him, Tidd, do not you think this is a pretty set out; do you think it is possible for the men here to do that which is talked of; Tidd said, no, it never can be done; Thistlewood said, I hope, for God's sake, you will not think of dropping the concern now; if you do, it will turn out a second Despard's job." Gentlemen, upon the subject of what the ultimate object of the conspiracy, was, take this declaration, if they dropped the concern, then it would be another Despard's job; if you believe it was made it is of great importance at this period; if all the police officers in London, supported not only by that gallant officer lieutenant Fitzclarence and his piquet, but by a regiment of hussars had come, they might have said, why, what do you want with us? but take us into custody if you please; but Thistlewood said, if you retire now, it will be another Despard's job. If the sole object of that conspiracy was to kill the ministers, and to plunder houses, that would not be high treason. What was Despard's job? that was a project and intention to summon London from St. James's to Tower-hill, constituting the crime of high treason; this is, if you believe the testimony, for I have said to you more than once if you do not believe the testimony it all vanishes; but I desire you to ask yourselves, what the character of the conspiracy is; is it a conspiracy only with the intention that they talk of? Is it to destroy the ministers only, (not that that is a light offence) or was it from an idea that the people, as they represented, were desirous of a change, and that if they could strike that blow they should succeed in their ultimate objects? If they could carry the heads of the ministers through the streets at the tail of their cannon, did they propose to themselves any thing short of that the accomplishment of which I know they had no rational ground for expecting? For I hope to God, the constitution established in this happy land stands too much in the conviction of blessings enjoyed, for such men to succeed in the extinguishment of the government, and the bringing about a revolution; but you will have to ask yourselves, whether this was not a desperate attempt to effect that most desperate plan. "Then Thistlewood said, there are quite men enough in the room, but you seem to be frightened for fear of not having strength enough; he said supposing lord Harrowby has sixteen servants in his house, they will not be prepared as you are; but not only that, but they will be terrified, and from going into the house to coming out of it again, will not exceed ten minutes; he said then, that he thought fourteen men would be enough to go into the room; it was put to all in the room whether they were willing to go, and on their consenting, there were fourteen men picked out for the sole purpose of going into the room to do the murder, the other six were to secure the servants, to guard the stairs and the area;" then he is asked, whether any thing was done in the way of separating the fourteen from the rest; and he says, "the men stood where they were, and Brunt produced a bottle; the fourteen agreed to go into the room;" he then mentions several of them, but I am not sure that he mentions them all. "Thistlewood was one, Ings was another, Brunt was another, Harrison, Wilson and Davidson also were proposed; Davidson was not at that time in the room, he was down below; Bradburn also was one, and others whose names I cannot now recollect; those were then separated to a different part of the room from the rest, and while the separation was going on an alarm was given below; before this time, Brunt had addressed those who did not exactly know what their preparations were; he says, Mr. Brunt made an address to the people; he turned round to the bench again, and said, "you seem to think there is not sufficient strength to go there; he declared that if there were not more than eight or nine, he himself was determined to go; he directly said, if there were not more than five or six men, he would go; and if he found himself in danger, he would blow the house down over their heads; then" he says, "I heard a sort of bustle below stairs; directly after this, at the bottom of the ladder, the word was given, halloo! shew a light; and on this Thistlewood turned to the bench, took a candle and held it at the head of the ladder in the room; he looked down, and saw persons coming, and then turned round and set the candle upon the bench again; on this, they began to sidle off into the little room; he says this was the first time I saw the little room; officers came up the ladder, and took the command of the room with their pistols presented; Smithers was killed, and the lights were put out, a pistol went off, and I made my escape; when Thistlewood said that fourteen men would be sufficient, Tidd was present, but I am pretty sure that he was not one that was to go into the room; he was present also when the assent was given to Thistlewood's proposal, that they should go on with the measure, and likewise when Brunt made his speech; that was after I had made the remark, that I did not think we could accomplish the work. I was first apprehended on Friday the 25th; when I made my escape, I went back to my own place, and remained there till I was apprehended. I was afterwards examined at Whitehall."

Then on his cross-examination, he says, "I abandoned my religion and became a disbeliever in Christianity;" he had been educated and passed his life up to the age of forty-five, as a Christian; he says, "I am now a Christian, I came back to the belief of Christianity about the 24th, but I was convinced before;" the 24th was the day after he found himself at home, after this meeting in Cato-street; he says, "though I had been convinced before, I did not come back exactly till the 24th;" then he is asked, and I do not mean to deny that the form in which the question was put was proper, whether the fear of the halter had not some effect upon him; he says, "I do not mean to deny that;" then the counsel asked him, whether since his last examination, he had not had some advice given to him as to the altering his manner; he said no, he was out of health, he had been frequently examined, that he had no purpose of altering his manner, and no such advice had been given to him; then he says, "I never mixed in political society in my life before I saw Thistlewood; I have had my political opinions, but never joined a party; I never thought it lawful to sweep off fifteen men in cold blood; I thought it was a very cruel act at the first proposal; it was first proposed to me on the 2nd of January, and notwithstanding that I consented to be introduced to Mr. Thistlewood, ten days afterwards, and from that time to the 23rd of February, I still continued to attend meetings where that matter was debated settled and determined on, and even was chairman once at one of the committees; the committee had no name; the body that was together in the room at Cato-street was the largest number I ever saw collected together to my knowledge;" he says "there was a talk of a vast many more assembling; I could not have brought any men into the field; all I agreed to do was, to contribute myself; those in the committee knew what was going to be done, but there were some that attended the meetings, who did not know; I knew what was intended to be done; the same party that were to do the west-end job, were to go to Gray's-inn lane; when the west-end job was done, which was not to take up above ten minutes, the same party were to go to Gray's-inn-lane; Cook was to head the party to take the cannon at the Artillery-ground, that was not the west-end-job party, I did not know where Mr. Cook's party was to come from; I have seen Mr. Cook himself; Mr. Palin and others were to fire the town, but I do not know who they were, nor what they consisted of; nobody objected to the proclamations; it was proposed by Thistlewood, but not put from the chair, that the hand-bills should be stuck up against the houses; I do not know what became of them, nor who were to stick them up; I do not know Thomas Chambers, I never called on him;" this was with a view to the contradiction by Chambers, who was afterwards examined. "I do not know that ever I was acquainted with such a man." In answer to a question, whether on the night of the 23rd, he and Edwards called on Chambers, and desired to leave some arms with him; he says, "I never saw Edwards after the Wednesday morning, and I will swear I did not call on Chambers; I do not know that I ever was in his house; we did not solicit him to be permitted to leave arms there; I do not even know Heathcock-court," which was where Chambers lived; "I have omitted a great many things in my evidence to-day; I stated before, that messengers were to be sent to the out-ports, to prevent any gentleman leaving the kingdom without an order from the provisional government, and Brighton was to be taken by force; all the seaports were to be plundered, if they permitted any person to go out of the kingdom; I cannot say where the force was to come from to do this, but they expected the people to join them; I was not a leader, I had not that ambition about me; I did not expect that they would bring things to such a pass;" then he is asked, what were his motives; and he says, "I had a reason for it, my object was, to search farther into the principles of Brunt;" that was a blameable curiosity; he says, "I had a foolish and curious idea, and every man may run himself into danger by that; that was my motive; I had not been long acquainted with Brunt, before I thought there was something wrong in him; that was my reason for joining in this plot; I do not know a person of the name of Whatman;" that turns out to be correct, at least no such person is called. Then he is asked, whether the prisoner Tidd, when some one said to him here is a pretty business, do you think there are enough here to do such a job, did not reply that he had been deceived in the business, and that he would have nothing to do with it; and he says, "Tidd made no such observation, but his answer was, no, it never can be done, and that was all that he said;" he says, "Davidson was not at the meeting on the 23rd; I do not recollect seeing him armed when he was in Cato-street, I saw him there both in the stable and up in the loft; I did not observe that he had any arms; I saw that he was very busy amongst those who were preparing themselves with arms."

On his re-examination, he says, "I remember a person bringing 500 bullets to the room in Fox-court; I became an infidel from reading Paine's Age of Reason, which I received from the prisoner Tidd; Potter and Palin were not in Cato-street; there were men there whom I knew nothing about; I did not know Cook's party; Hall was in the room at the time the proclamations were written." Hall is not a prisoner now under indictment, and the observation meant to be conveyed to you on the part of the Crown is this, that if the account given by the witness Adams is incorrect, and that there was nothing written on this cartridge paper in the form of proclamations, Hall might have been called to prove these facts; and as it has been urged to you by the attorney-general in his reply, it is undoubtedly so; he could have been called to prove that he was not one of the party so assembled, or admitting that he was one of the party so assembled, that no such proclamation was written, and he would, as the Attorney-general has said, have subjected himself to no consequences such as were supposed; he might have objected to any such question as would have a tendency to criminate himself, if proposed, and it would have been the duty of the Court to have cautioned him.

This being the evidence of the accomplice, to be received as you have been told on all former occasions, with all manner of jealousy, with considerable doubt, to be acted upon with care, they now proceed to call witnesses, from whom they submit, that it derives most abundant confirmation.

The next witness is Eleanor Walker, the servant and niece of Mrs. Rogers, of No. 4, Fox-court, Gray's-inn-lane. She says, "Brunt lodged there, and occupied the two front rooms on the second floor; there was a back room on the same floor. In the month of January last, Brunt introduced Ings to take that room, and it was afterwards taken unfurnished, at three shillings a week; Ings said, perhaps he might bring his goods in in a week; but he never did bring any goods in." This is the whole of her evidence.

Mary Rogers, the mistress and aunt of the last witness, says, "In January last, the two-pair of stairs back-room was let to a person, who turned out to be Ings; he occupied the room four or five weeks, leaving one week unpaid; in the course of that time I made inquiry of Brunt, who and what Ings was, and he told me that he was a butcher, and that he knew nothing more of him than seeing him in a public-house, and hearing him inquire for a lodging; he never brought any furniture in." She says, "on one evening, I saw three men go up stairs, one of them was a black man;" she was not asked, nor did she suggest that person was the prisoner Davidson, but merely that a person of his complexion was one of the men who went up.

The next witness is that important one to whom in passing along I have repeatedly called your attention, Joseph Hale, the apprentice of Brunt. He says, "I lived with Brunt in Fox-court; he occupied two rooms, one as a workshop the other to live in; I slept in the workshop; I remember the back-room on the same floor being occupied in January last by Brunt and Ings; after they had looked at it together, Brunt said to Ings, it will do, go down and give them a shilling, and he went down; I had known Ings about a fortnight before; I saw him twice with Thistlewood in Brunt's workshop in the course of that fortnight; when Ings had taken the room, in the evening he came and asked Mrs. Brunt for the key, and she gave it him; he and Hall came together, and I believe other persons came there that night; my master was taken up on the 24th of February; from the time that the room was taken till that time, there were meetings held in that room; they were mostly held about seven o'clock in the evening; at those meetings I have seen Thistlewood, Ings, Davidson the prisoner, Brunt, Bradburn, Adams, Strange, Potter, Hall, Edwards, and Tidd. Tidd often came there. I was once at his lodgings in the Hole-in-the-wall passage, Brook's-market; the door of that room at Brunt's was sometimes open when I passed it; and upon one occasion, I saw some long poles like branches of trees, rough as they came from the tree about twenty in number; during the time the room was used in that way, I have heard hammering and sawing in it. On the Sunday before my master was taken up, there was a meeting in that room in the morning; I believe it was a larger one than usual; the persons whom I have named were there, and I am particularly sure that Tidd was there, and Davidson also;" you will bear that in your recollection, not only as it goes to confirm the testimony of Adams, but as it will assist you in taking into consideration that which you have heard to-day from the prisoners at the bar in their own defence; "they went away one or two at a time; my master was in the room with them; and after the meeting broke up, Strange came out with him, and they went into my master's room. There were meetings on the Monday and Tuesday in that back room, and on the Wednesday there were a number of persons there. About two o'clock, Strange and a person whom I did not know, came into our workshop; they were flinting five or six pistols, and there were persons overlooking them; the stranger observed that. Brunt told them to go into the back room, which they did." Now this witness has had no opportunity of concerting any story with Adams; you will ask yourselves, whether this is not a most important confirmation, not only as it respects the general story of Adams, but as it respects the parties engaged in this conspiracy, and the share they were taking in it in the course of the night, when proceeding forth to the rendezvous in Cato-street, for that great work they had called the west-end job. Then he says, "in the course of the afternoon there were several persons in the back-room; and Thistlewood came out and asked for a piece of writing paper, which I gave him, and he went into the back room with it. After that Brunt came out, and told me to go and get six sheets of cartridge paper. I went and bought them, and gave them to him, and he took them into the back room; my master went out about six o'clock; after this my mistress wanted her table for tea, which was ordinarily in our living room." They had in that room the table out of Brunt's living room which on ordinary occasions they had not, and you will recollect, that he tells you that Thistlewood asked him for writing paper, and that they had at that meeting cartridge paper also. "After some of the men were gone, my mistress sent me to the back-room to get the table." He did not go in and get it, because he knew there were people still there. "I knocked at the door, and Potter opened it, and gave me the table out. After this, Tidd called, and came into Mrs. Brunt's room, and Mrs. Brunt shewed him a pike-head and a sword, which hung in one of the cupboards, and asked him what she could do with them; he said, if she would give them to him, he would take them away, and he took them away from the front living room into the back-room." He says "after that I heard persons go down stairs from that room, and after that a person came and told my mistress, that if any persons called, she was to send them to the White Hart, which is a public-house close by; shortly after that, three persons came, and my mistress directed them to the White Hart; they did not know the way, and I went and shewed them the way; when I came back, and had been at the door about two or three minutes, Potter came up, and I directed him to the White Hart also; there were other persons with him; I did not go with them, as Potter appeared to know the way; they went away." This is the whole of what he states previous to that which we now know to have been the transaction which took place in Cato-street. "About nine o'clock in the evening," he says, "Brunt came home, the tail of his great coat and his boots were very muddy; he said to his wife, it is all up, or words to that effect; he appeared confused. He said, he had saved his life, and that was all; that where he had been, a lot of officers came in. Afterwards, another person, a stranger to me, came in, and Brunt shook hands with him, and asked him, if he knew who had informed? and he replied, No, he did not. From the manner of speaking to each other, it appeared to me that they had been together. The stranger said, he had had a dreadful blow upon his side, and that he was knocked down; and my master said, there is something to be done yet. After this conversation, they both went away together;" it was apparent that what had happened to each of them had passed at the same place, and that the conversation as to who had informed related to the same transaction, in which they had both been parties, so that this man had been knocked down and injured at the place where he stated that the officers had come in, and he had only saved his life. Then he says, "after they were gone, Mrs. Brunt and I went into the back room, and I saw in the cupboard some rolls of brown paper, with tar in them, and four large balls made of string tarred, as big as my two fists," some of those things which have been presented to you by serjeant Hanson. "I have heard since that they are hand-grenades. I also saw some flannel bags, two of them were full of something, the others were empty, and some cartridge paper, and an iron pot belonging to Brunt," for the purpose of heating the materials. "Mrs. Brunt and I left them where we found them. Brunt came home about eleven o'clock at night; before he went to bed, he told me to get up as soon as I could in the morning and clean his boots, and I did so; he afterwards asked me, if I knew the Borough? and I told him, yes; he then asked me if I knew Snow's-fields? and I said, no; he told me, to go to Kirby-street, Snow's-fields, to a man of the name of Potter; he said, I was to take the things that were in the back room; we went into the room together, with two rush baskets; and he told me to put in the things that were in the cupboard, and that I had seen there before, into the two baskets, which I did. After that, one of the baskets was tied up in a blue apron belonging to Mrs. Brunt, which had for some time before been used as a curtain to the window of the back room; the other basket was not tied up in any thing; we went into Brunt's room, and while we were there looking out for something to tie the other basket in, two officers came in and took Brunt into custody, and took possession of the two baskets containing the things and the iron pot." I think that is the whole of his evidence in chief.

On his cross-examination, he is asked, if he knows a man of the name of Dwyer? and he says, no; then he says, "I know Adams and Edwards; they were often at Brunt's; but I was not near enough to hear their voices when they spoke. When the others addressed Thistlewood, they sometimes called him T. and sometimes Arthur; the rest used to call each other by their names. I have often heard a man called by his christian name, and sometimes by the first letter of his surname. Edwards was there oftener than Adams."

This is the whole of the testimony given you by this person: and no attempt is made to break in upon his credit, by shewing that he had been let into the dangerous secret; but being employed in his master's business as an apprentice, he became from that circumstance acquainted with the fact that there had been, for a considerable time before, secret meetings in that room, taken for fairs the butcher; that at that room there were such implements as those found afterwards at Cato-street, and at the lodgings of Tidd; that there were pikes, hand-grenades, and pike-staves, and that there were swords, which might well proceed from some person engaged in the preparing them in a further state of manufacture to make them fit for use; the sawing off their ends, and preparing them to receive the pike heads, which have now been produced before you, and which appear applicable to those staves; besides that, he shews you that on that very afternoon on which they were proceeding to that ultimate object, whatever it was, these persons were proceeding exactly in the manner in which Adams has stated. Adams, you know, was examined not in his hearing; has been in custody ever since the Friday; and who, therefore, has had no intercourse whatever with this witness. He has confirmed, almost in words, some of the most important parts of the transaction stated by Adams to have taken place at Brunt's, on more occasions than one; it will be for you to ask yourselves, whether, if the case rested here, and the question to be propounded to you was, whether you believed the story told by Adams, it had or had not received such confirmation from unsuspected quarters, from the mistress of the house and her servant, and from the apprentice of Brunt, as to induce you to believe that it was true, and that it was not invented—invented for the purpose of implicating in guilt eleven men, and subjecting them to the forfeiture of their lives: it is for you to consider, whether it be, as it is presented to your minds and consciences, a fiction and an invention, or the narration of truth, though communicated to you by the mouth of an accomplice. It is fit to observe on that, in passing, that unless by some spirit of intuition, it seems impossible that Hale should have been found in such a coincidence as to the persons present—the things exhibited—the transactions on the various days on which those persons met—the instructions with respect to other persons expected to call, persons calling afterwards, and the instructions given to them accordingly—the conducting some and directing others to the place at which they were likely to find those for whom they were inquiring: it is impossible, as it appears to me (but it is for you to exercise your judgment upon it), that this story of Hale's should have so wonderful and extraordinary a coincidence with the facts narrated by Adams, not communicated to Hale down to the moment of his examination before you on trial, unless each of those persons were telling that which each for himself observed.

They then proceed to call to you other witnesses, in order to give confirmation to the testimony of the accomplice, Adams; the first is a person of the name of Thomas Smart, a watchman in St. George's, Hanover-square; he tells you, that on Tuesday the 22nd of February, in taking his walks in Grosvenor-square, about half-past eight, he observed four men; he says, "they were looking through the palisades; they stood at the corner, when I went up to them at Mr. Maberley's house; they were at that time looking about, and I went up to see what they wanted; they asked me what o'clock it was, and I told them it was near nine. I thought they were very suspicious characters, one of them had a stick, one was a man of colour; I called Bissix, who was also a watchman there, to make observation, telling him I saw some suspicious characters." This witness does not affect at all to have any knowledge of the prisoner Davidson; therefore, it might be for any thing this witness knows, any other person of his complexion.

Bissix is then called, and he tells you that he was a watchman in Grosvenor-square on the night of the 22nd of February; he says "Smart was there at the same time; I saw two men in the square that attracted my notice, they passed us and asked what time it was; we told them it was near nine o'clock, and they passed along; they took particular notice of Lord Harrowby's house, and some other houses in the square; and one of them, a man of colour, had a stick in his hand, larger than persons usually have."

The use that is made of this is to confirm the narrative given you by Adams; that in consequence of his communication of the impression which Hobbs had instilled into him, that there were suspicions afloat in the minds of the police officers and the secretary of state, that something was wrong, it was determined a watch should be set and relieved from time to time; Adams tells you, that the prisoner Davidson was one of that watch; the two watchmen tell you, not indeed that Davidson was one of that watch, but that there were persons there whose appearance, whose conduct, whose demeanor, created suspicion in their minds, and was of a nature inducing them to believe that they were persons watching lord Harrowby's house and other houses, to see what was going in and coming out of those houses, corresponding with the account given that a watch was set to enable the committee to come to a determination whether they were betrayed or not, by perceiving whether soldiers or police officers were introduced into that neighbourhood, aye or no; these witnesses prove, that one of the persons on that watch was a man of colour, who might have been, but is not proved to be, the prisoner Davidson; I say, though it would have gone higher, if they could have identified Davidson to be one of that watch, yet it is a strong confirmation of the witness Adams, that there was a watch, and that one of the men so watching, was a man of colour.

The next witness that they call to you is Henry Gillan; he says, he lives at No. 15, Mount-street, Berkeley-square; and nobody has urged an observation that is discreditable to him; nobody suspects that he has done any thing which ought to bring his testimony into discredit; he stands before you then a person as well entitled to credit, for any thing that appears in this cause, as any one of you would, if you were to be sworn in court. The account he gives is that he sometimes at his leisure went into a public-house called the Rising Sun; he says, "I was there on the 22nd of February last; the house is situated at the corner of Adams-mews and Charles-street: I was there in the evening between nine and ten o'clock; I saw Adams and Brunt come in:" Now you will recollect what Adams has said about this; Tidd was to have gone with Brunt to relieve Davidson and the first watch; but Brunt came back, and said, that Tidd had met with a man of too much importance to part with, and that therefore somebody else must be substituted in his place; I was the man substituted in his place, and I went with Brunt; we went to our watch, but not thinking it necessary to be upon the watch every moment, we relieved ourselves from the fatigue of that watch by going into a public-house, and not only that, but to avoid being ourselves too much the objects of observation; we had some refreshment, bread and cheese and beer, and Brunt played two games of dominos with a young man in that house, who was a stranger to Adams, down to the very moment of his being examined here. Those who had the care of the interests of the public in conducting this prosecution, probably went to the public-house and so traced out this young man. He says, "I saw two men there;" Who were those two men? "Brunt and Adams." Did Brunt go there as a watchman that night? Did Adams go there as a watchman that night? Were they there during the period which Adams speaks of? Ask this young man, an unsuspected witness; "I played two games at dominos with Brunt; I left the house at near ten o'clock, leaving them in that house." They submit to you on the part of the prosecution, that this is a most important circumstance, in order to give confirmation to the testimony of Adams, not in some circumstances quite collateral to the subject of our present inquiry, but intimately connected with one of those transactions of that night, which had for its object to enable the conspirators to determine, whether they should go on to the completion of their object, or should retire from it, on the conviction that they were suspected, and that precautions were taken.

They then call to you a person of the name of John Hector Morrison;—he tells you that he is a journeyman to Mr. Underwood, of Drury-lane, a cutler; he says, "Ings brought a sword to me to be ground, on Christmas eve; he gave me directions, that it was to be ground from the heel to the point, and also the back to be ground, which was done for him;" he says, "he fetched the sword away himself; he employed me again afterwards; he brought me another to be ground as the first was, which was done and delivered to him;" it was sharp to the extreme, and that which a cutler's art could put upon it appears to have been made still more destructive and more mischievous by having been sharpened highly upon a stone, or a steel, after it passed out of his hand. The Crown submit to you that this is a strong circumstance to support the testimony of the accomplice; he has told you Ings was armed with such an instrument as this, and the cutler tells you, that he received it from Ings, with this remarkable instruction, and that he afterwards brought another, which has not been identified before you, but probably your minds have been directed to that by a part of the melancholy transaction. You may, perhaps, conjecture, that the sword used in the destruction of the officer, in Cato-street, may be that which was thus sharpened, and you may, perhaps, think it not difficult to account for the non-production of it here to day, by supposing that it was the instrument used on that occasion; it is not, however, proved to you that it was, nor is it of importance, and therefore you may dismiss that from your consideration.

They then call to you Edward Simpson;—he says, "I am corporal-major of the second regiment of Life-guards; I know the prisoner Harrison perfectly well; he was in that regiment upwards of five years; his regimental duty made him acquainted with the King-street barracks; there were five windows in those barracks looking out of the loft into Gloucester-mews; they are stopped up now; they were stopped up two or three days after the affair in Cato-street; the lofts contained hay and straw chiefly, and by throwing any thing in at the windows, particularly opposite where the straw was lodged, it was possible to produce a fire; there were two or three loads of straw there at that time at the least, in a situation which might have been reached by a fire-ball going in at the window, as they were situated about four feet from the window."

It is stated by serjeant Hanson, that one of those fire-grenades thrown into the window of this room, which would have burnt for three or four minutes in a blaze, and afterwards have deposited upon the hay and straw a red-hot body of fire, would have been vastly more than sufficient to have destroyed all the contents of the lofts of that barrack, and probably to have effected that purpose which is stated to have been recommended by Harrison, and to have been adopted by the conspirators.

Then a witness of the name of Aldous, says, "I am a pawnbroker; I have known the prisoner Davidson for two or three years; he pawned with me a brass-barrelled blunderbuss, and he took it out of pawn on the 23rd of February in the morning," the day to which your attention has been so constantly addressed. "I have since seen it in the hands of Mr. Ruthven, the officer." It is produced among the articles found in Cato-street, or by some of the officers; he looks at it now, and he identifies it. They desire you, upon the part of the prosecution, to ask yourselves, whether this affords to you any probability that the testimony of Adams is true, and gives any corroboration to the narrative he has given you. When you find that a brass-barrelled blunderbuss, which had been pledged by the prisoner Davidson, in January, and redeemed by him on the 23rd of February, formed part of the magazine intended for the exploit of the 23rd of February, proceeding from Cato-street, I think you will probably consider that a strong confirmation of the narrative stated by the accomplice Adams.

They then call to you a witness of the name of John Monument;—he states that he is a prisoner in the Tower; and the observations which have been made (and which cannot be too often pressed in favour of prisoners standing in this situation) apply likewise to the testimony of Monument; for though you will perhaps think, he was not so deeply embarked in the conspiracy as Adams, yet still he must be taken, for the purposes of this inquiry, to be an accomplice, and therefore not to be received but with jealousy and suspicion, and to be attended to only as the evidence he gives is corroborated and supported. The account he gives is, that he is a shoemaker, living in Garden-court, Baldwin's-gardens. He says, "I know a person of the name of Ford; I recollect seeing Thistlewood at Ford's, it was about three months before I was apprehended; in consequence of seeing Thistlewood at Ford's, he afterwards called upon me in company with Brunt; my brother and my mother were in the room at the time; after he had been in the room some short time, he said he wished to speak to me; in consequence of that intimation, I went out of the room with him, leaving my brother and Brunt in the room; my brother's name is Thomas Monument. When we got out, Thistlewood said, great events were at hand, the people were everywhere anxious for a change; that he had been promised support by a great many who had deceived him, but that now he had got men who would stand by him. He asked me, whether I had any arms, I said no; he said, every man ought to have arms, all of us have arms, or to that effect; some have got a sabre, some have got a pistol, and some have got a pike, every one has got something; he said, I could buy a pistol for about four or five shillings. I told him, I had no money to buy pistols with; and he said, well, he would see what he could do. He then said, that the man he brought with him was in the same line of business with myself, a boot-closer, and that he lived in a court in Gray's-inn-lane. We returned into the room, and found Brunt there, and Thistlewood and Brunt shortly afterwards went away; I lighted them down stairs, and Brunt gave me his address. On Tuesday, the 22nd of February, Brunt called upon me with Tidd, the prisoner; I said to Brunt, I thought I had lost you;" he had not seen him for a considerable length of time, a couple of months or more. "He said, the king's death had made an alteration in their plans; I asked him what plans; he said, there was to be a meeting the following evening up at Tyburn-turnpike, and we should hear all about it; then he turned to Tidd, and asked him, if he should give me the word? he said, yes, he supposed there would be no danger in it; and then Brunt said, when I came to the place, Tyburn-turnpike, if I saw any people about, I was to say, b, u, t, and if they were friends they would answer, t, o, n; he said, he should be at our house the following morning to tell me all about it, and at what time it was to take place, and went away with Tidd, leaving me and my brother together." He says, "Brunt came alone, about half past four the next day; my brother was with me; he called me down stairs; he said he wanted me to go in half an hour; I told him I could not, for that I had some work to finish, which must be done before I went; he asked me what time it would be done; I said about six; he said he could not wait so long as that, but that I must go with the person whom he had brought the day before; he told me that his name was Tidd, and that he lived at Hole-in-the-wall Passage, Brook's-market; I went to Tidd's lodgings about half-past six, and found him there; he said he had been waiting for some more men, whom he expected to go with him, and that if no one else came before seven o'clock, he would not wait any longer; he says, no more did arrive, and I asked him, where it was we were going to? He said, to a mews in the Edgeware-road; Tidd went to a corner of the room, and took a pistol out of a box, and put it into a belt which was round his body; he took also about six or eight pike-heads, wrapped up in paper, which appeared to me to be three square, like bayonets; then he took a staff of about four feet long, with a hole at the end of it, as if to put a pike in; after he had thus provided himself, we went out together; we went down into Holborn, he tried it, and found, when he took it to Bow-street, that it was one which had been recently discharged, for there was the moisture produced by a recent discharge.

Then John Muddock was called, and he stated, "I am a soldier in the Coldstream regiment of guards; I was one of the party that went to Cato-street; I recollect seeing a man near the stable door; I saw him the next day at Whitehall, and I found his name to be Tidd;" then he pointed him out; "he presented a pistol at lieutenant Fitzclarence; he fired it off, and I saw serjeant Legg secure him afterwards; after this I went towards the stable door, and I saw a person cut with a sword at lieutenant Fitzclarence; he went in again, and I did not see who he was, and afterwards Mr. Fitzclarence attacked them, and went in at the door, and I followed him in; after I had got into the centre of the room, the prisoner Wilson presented a pistol at my breast; it flashed in the pan but did not discharge; I made a stab at him with my bayonet; I secured him, and took him to a public-house, where I looked at him by a light; I now see the same person at the bar."

Then William Legg is called; he says, "I am a serjeant in the Coldstream-guards; I was one of the party that went under the command of lieutenant Fitzclarence on the night of the 23rd of February to Cato-street; I observed a man standing with his back against the wall, between the gateway leading out of John-street and the stable door; he had a pistol in his hand, and he levelled it at lieutenant Fitzclarence, who was about a yard and a half at the head of me; upon my observing that, I knocked the pistol aside with a pike, and seized the muzzle end of the pistol with my left hand; a scuffle upon that ensued between the man and me, and the pistol went off in the scuffle; whatever the pistol was loaded with, tore the sleeve of the jacket of the right arm; as soon as the pistol went off, he let it go easily, and I secured him, and delivered him over to the police officers; that man was Tidd; I saw him afterwards, and I have seen him since; I then went into the stable, and up into the loft; the persons who were in the loft had surrendered when I got there to part of the piquet; I assisted in securing some of the arms that were taken in the loft."

Then Lieutenant Fitzclarence is called, who says, "I am a lieutenant in the Coldstream-guards; I was applied to on the evening of the 23rd of February to send a piquet to John-street; I accompanied that piquet; when I got to John-street, my attention was attracted by the report of fire arms; I brought my piquet forwards towards Cato-street; on getting to the archway leading into Cato-street, I met a police officer, who was calling out 'soldiers, soldiers! the stable door!' I made towards it, and the moment I got to the door I met two men, one of them presented a pistol, and the other cut at me with a sword; we exchanged several cuts; he seeing the body of the piquet coming up, ran into the stable, and I followed him; on entering the stable, I came up to one man, who said, 'do not kill me, and I will tell you all,' it turned out afterwards that that was Monument; "I gave him in charge, and then returned and took out another man, and the soldiers took him away; I then led the men up into the loft, and there I found three four or five men, and a large quantity of arms, consisting of blunderbusses, pistols, and pikes; I assisted in securing the persons in the loft, and the arms."

Upon his cross-examination, he says, "I took Davidson into custody; he was taken to Bow-street, having been first brought into the stable in Cato-street; I do not know that in proceeding from the stable he was taken into any public-house, or any other house; I will not be certain that he was not taken into the Horse and Groom; Tidd and another person were there; but I think," lieutenant Fitzclarence added, "he was not to my knowledge, in the Horse and Groom, nor in a public-house, till he was carried to Bow-street."

The next witness called is William Westcott, who says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I went to Cato-street on the 23rd of February; on going up I saw Ings, one of the prisoners, at the foot of the ladder."

Then John Wright is called, who says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I went up to the foot of the ladder in the stable in Cato-street; I saw a stoutish man standing there; I took from him a butcher's knife and a sword; there was wax-end twisted round the handle of the knife; that knife is in the possession of the officer; immediately afterwards I was knocked down, and received a stab in my right side, and that man made his escape from me; Ings was immediately afterwards brought back in custody."

John Champion, who is also one of the Bow-street patrol, says "I was at the stable in Cato-street on the night of the 23rd; I saw Ings at the foot of the ladder; on the officers appearing, he said, 'look out above there'; he afterwards made his escape; Brooks afterwards came up, bringing him in custody; we took him to Mary-le-bone watch-house, and searched him there; we found two haversacks slung across his shoulders under his great coat, a tin case nearly full of powder, three pistol balls, a knife case, and a belt round his breast; the knife-case was made of cloth, for a large knife; there is a knife wrapped round with wax-end, which fits it, and which is in it now."

Then William Charles Brookes is called; he says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I met a man running in John-street on the night of the 23rd; he presented a pistol at me and fired it; the ball went through my clothes, bruised my shoulder, and grazed my neck; I staggered into the street, and the man ran on; he was afterwards laid hold of by Moay, a watchman; I searched him in the watch-house, and took from him two haversacks, a belt round his body, and a tin case nearly full of powder;

I asked him how he came to fire at me, a man he had never seen before; and he damned me, and said he wished he had killed me, as he wanted to do."

They then called Samuel Hercules Taunton, another of the officers, who says, "on the morning of the 24th of February, I went to Brunt's lodgings, to apprehend him; I took him in the front two-pair of stairs room; I found there two rush baskets, an iron pot and a pike-staff; I asked him about the back room, and he denied its being his apartment; I then called up the landlady, and asked her whose it was; she, in his presence, said the lodgings were let in his presence to a man, but she did not know what his name was; I asked Brunt who he was, and he said he had only seen him once at a public-house, and he did not know who he was; I then went to Tidd's lodging, in Hole-in-the-wall passage, and found some articles of ammunition;" which are now lying on the table, and enumerated in that list which I shall by and by state to you.

Daniel Bishop, another Bow-street officer, tells you that he apprehended Thistlewood on Thursday the 24th of February, between ten and eleven in the morning; he says, "I found him at the house of a Mrs. Harris, No. 8, White-street, Moor-fields; he was then in bed, with his breeches and stockings on, and his coat and waistcoat by the bed-side; in the pockets I found three leaden balls, a ball-cartridge, two flints, and a small silk sash; I took him to Bow-street, and then to the Secretary of State's."

On his cross-examination, he says, that several of the patrol went with him to apprehend Thistlewood, and that they surrounded the house before they entered it, for fear of mischief. This was all the evidence given to you yesterday.

Then, gentlemen, they have this day again called before you, Ruthven, the officer, who says, "there are now upon the table the arms and ammunition found in Cato-street; there were six more hand-grenades than there are here, which have been opened in the course of the investigations; the pike staves were ferruled at the time they were found; but some of the ferrules have dropped off, in consequence, as I suppose, of the greenness of the wood; some of the pike-heads are files sharpened, and others are bayonets; the poles are bored for the pike-heads to screw in; the hand-grenades were all fitted with fuses." Then he points out the haversacks and the belt, the knife and the knife-case, found upon Ings. He then verifies a list, which he says he made out, of the various articles; thirty-eight ball-cartridges, firelock and bayonet, one powder-flask, three pistols, one sword, six bayonet spikes and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet-spikes and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet-spike and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades, two fire-balls, one large grenade and bayonet, rope-ladder, one sword-stick, forty ball-cartridges and one bayonet, three loose balls;" these were all found in the loft. "In the stable, in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball-cartridges, three balls and some string put round him to act as a belt; the pistol which it is alleged that Tidd fired, the pistol which it is alleged that Wilson attempted to fire, blunderbuss, sword, belt and scabbard, one pistol, one sword, twelve sticks with ferrules. In the pocket of Tidd, two ball-cartridges, and round him a leather belt; two ball-cartridges facing the stable, and ten ditto in Newnham-street; one musket cut down, and one sword from Davidson, one haversack, cross belts, one pricker, bayonet, scabbard, cartouche-box, and a belt round his body; two haversacks, one belt and tin." The remainder of the enumeration of the articles I would read to you, if there was any thing in it that tended to the benefit of the prisoners; but my learned brother suggests, that probably you have so good a recollection of the enumeration of the articles which are exhibited before you, that you may not perhaps think it necessary that I should go through it again.

Foreman of the Jury.—No, my lord, it is not at all necessary.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Then, gentlemen, this being the enumeration of the articles, the witness says, "the stick that was found in the public house was the one left by Cooper, and afterwards asked for by Gilchrist."

John Hector Morison is then called again, and a sword being shewn to him, he says, "this is the sword that was brought for me to grind; my directions were, to grind it on both sides, and to make the point as sharp as a needle; it is particularly sharp." I asked him if that was the one he called a scimitar, and he says, "they are both of a similar shape;" then he says, "since it left me the edge has been made much keener by sharpening it with a steel or a stone, I cannot exactly say which."

Then Benjamin Gill is called again, and selects the carbine and sword taken from Davidson, from the arms which are upon the table; he had stated, that he believed there was a string attached to the sword taken from Davidson, and the one produced has such a string; "the carbine was not loaded when I took possession of it, because he had discharged it at me before I took it to Bow-street, it was quite damp."

Ruthven is again called, and he says, "the greater part of the fire-arms were loaded when we took them; we had them drawn for the purpose of being produced here; they were loaded with ball, with the exception of one gun, which had large shot."

Then Mr. Aldous, the pawnbroker, is called again, and having looked at the blunderbuss produced to him, he states, that he believes it to be the same that was taken out of pawn by Davidson, on the 23rd of February. Being asked by the the prisoner Davidson whether cution, they say further, that the testimony of Monument, if believed, goes to prove the whole, namely, that there had been a conspiracy of a certain number of persons, of whom these persons were part, by force of arms, and by rising in the town, and by the destruction of his majesty's then confidential ministers, to compel his majesty to change his measures, or to bring about a destruction of the constitution by rebellion and revolution. They say, you may infer this from the testimony of Monument, if for the moment you were to forget altogether the testimony of Adams, remembering always that you ought to deal with the testimony of Monument as you have been advised with the testimony of Adams,—to receive it with care and caution, and to receive it only as it is supported in such manner as to give to it the effect of truth, and not to convince you that it is not the result of invention.

Now to support his evidence, they call before you Thomas Monument; with respect to whom it is but fitting I should state, that there is not a single imputation on his character. He says, "I am a shoemaker, and live with my brother; I recollect Thistlewood calling upon him at his lodgings, accompanied by Brunt. Thistlewood said, he wished to speak to my brother; they went out together;" leaving Brunt with the witness; "they returned in three or four minutes; and Thistlewood and Brunt went away together. On the 22nd of February, Brunt called upon my brother in company with Tidd the prisoner; my brother said, I thought I had lost you." Now these brothers had had no opportunity, since John was taken into custody in Cato-street, of comparing notes, and yet you will perceive there is an extraordinary coincidence in the narrative they give of the visit of these two persons to John Monument. "Brunt said something concerning the king's death, which had made an alteration in their plans; my brother asked him what the plan was; he said they had different objects in view. Brunt asked Tidd if he should give an outline of the plan; I did not bear any answer to that; Brunt said, we were to meet the following evening at six o'clock at Tyburn-turnpike, and he gave the pass word that we were to use, the letters b, n, t; and if any of their party were there, they would answer t, o, n." Now so says the accomplice John Monument; and the accomplice John Monument tells you that was so communicated in the presence of his brother, when these persons were there that evening. I have already told you these two brothers have not been together since that evening; you will therefore ask, whether the accomplice, when he gives that account, confirmed as he is by the other witness, is giving you the language of falsehood or of truth? "Brunt came the next afternoon between four and five o'clock; my brother could not go with him as he had some work to finish. Brunt then said, you must call on Tidd in Hole-in-the-wall passage, and he will take you; I believe my brother went about seven o'clock; I did not see him afterwards; I did not go myself. This man's character stands as fair in the transaction as any man's whatever. Now, is the account John Monument has been giving to you, the language of truth or not? if it were necessary to prove the fact that John Monument was invited to go, that he was directed to go to Tidd's house; that he had the word button given to him as the pass word; that they were directed to go to Tyburn-turnpike; if they were to sink John Monument in the bottom of the sea, they could prove the whole by that brother.

Tidd.—My lord, you have just observed, as to these witnesses, that they never saw each other; now I can prove, by the evidence of the warden of the Tower of London, that they have been together an hour or two together in each week.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—I am very glad you have made the observation; if that fact be so, which was unknown to me, that takes off the effect of so much of the observation as applies to the similarity of manner in which they have told the story, and it stands just the same as if there was no such fact. This man is confirmed by a man who may have heard it from his brother, but who comes here pledging his oath, his soul, and his salvation, and that which he states is precisely that which his accomplice brother has stated.

Davidson.—My lord, here is Mr. Underwood, one of the yeoman warders, can speak to the fact of their having been together.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—We will take the fact to be so. You will observe, gentlemen, that breaks in only on the observation, which had struck me very forcibly; as to Adams and John Monument it stands precisely the same, but you will take it with the circumstance the prisoner has mentioned, though it is not proved; that I think is the whole of the evidence of Thomas Monument.

They then call to you a witness, certainly of the highest importance, and that is Thomas Hiden; he says, that previous to these transactions he lived in Manchester-mews, and was a cowkeeper and milkman there; he says, "I have now the misfortune to be a prisoner for debt;" he is brought here by his majesty's writ of habeas corpus; "I went to prison a week ago, last Saturday morning; I know the prisoner Wilson very well; a few days before the 23rd of February he met me, and asked me if I would make one of a party to destroy all his majesty's ministers at a cabinet dinner; he said, every thing was ready, they were waiting only for a cabinet dinner, and that they had got such things as I never saw; that they were covered with tarpaulin, and bound round with cords, filled full of nails and other things, some of them made of tin, and very strong indeed; he said the strength of them was so great, that if they were set fire to and put under the walls other things, left at our house, which was never, to my knowledge, uncorded during the time it remained, which was till the morning of the 24th, when the officers took it away; what it contained I do not know." You will probably not wonder, that the learned counsel for the Crown did not address any question to the witness, because it was undoubtedly true, as was stated in the reply, that if the case had remained short on the part of the prosecution, much confirmation would be derived from the testimony of this unhappy person, called in order to effect the security of her near relative; I shall make no further observation upon it; that is undoubtedly well justified.

Thomas Chambers is the next witness; he says, "I live at No. 3, Heathcock-court, in the Strand; I know Adams; I remember the day when the people were taken up in Cato-street; he called upon me twice, about a week before, in company with Edwards; Edwards asked me, in the presence of Adams, if I would go along with them; I asked them where; he said I was not such a fool as not to know there was something on foot; I replied, I did not; Adams said, we are going to kill his majesty's ministers, and we will have blood and wine for supper; Edwards replied, by God, Adams, you are right, it shall be so." He says, "on the Monday before the Cato-street discovery, they both came; they had a bag with them; they asked me to let them leave it there; I asked what it contained, and Adams said, only a few pistols and such like; a man named Tunbridge was there at the time. I refused to let them leave it, and I never saw them afterwards."

Some questions are addressed to him on cross-examination, and in answer to them, he says, "I do not know what book I was sworn upon; I never took an oath but once, before I came here the other day; this is the third time; it is a Prayer-book, I should suppose. I am a churchman; I believe in Christianity, and have always said so; I always believed in the Bible, and was brought up to the church; I never saw Paine's works. I know both the prisoners at the bar; I have known Davidson since about the time of Mr. Hunt's procession; I have only known Tidd in the trade, we are brother shoemakers; I cannot say how long I have known him, whether twelve or nine or six months. I did not particularly know him at the time of Hunt's procession." Upon being pressed as to how long he had known him, he says, "it might be at some of the meetings in Smithfield; I attended every meeting that was held openly in the air; I carried banners; I cannot say but that I might have walked in the procession with some of the prisoners who are indicted. I know Ings and Brunt and Wilson, and I know Harrison very well; I do not know Bradburn so well, but I do know him." Then he is asked whether he went to any of the Smithfield meetings in company with any of these persons, and he says, "I cannot say, they might be there; I had no weapon at the Smithfield meeting; I carried no pistol in my pocket, nor do I know that any body else had any; I have known Thistlewood ever since Mr. Hunt's procession; he has been at my place repeatedly since, for I took home the flags, and he has been there to fetch them, and to distribute them to those who were to take them. I have seen him since, on one Sunday evening, at the Black Dog in Gray's-inn-lane. I know the White Lion in Wych-street very well; I have attended meetings there; there is no name to the meeting, except that it is a meeting of reformers; I had no number or section. I saw Thistlewood at the Smithfield meeting, when Mr. Hunt was in the waggon; I was always in the waggon; I cannot say who else was there, there were thousands I believe; I do not think I saw Davidson there." Then he is asked whether he thought they were such ferocious monsters as were going to commit assassination, and he says, "Yes, but I did not consider they would get fools enough to do it; I considered myself a fool, but not so big a fool as that; I never heard a man say a word against his majesty's ministers, except those men, Edwards and Adams; I thought the thing so preposterous and absurd, that no man would be found foolish enough to do it. I first met with Ings at a shop where pamphlets were sold; I only read Mr. Cobbett's works; I have got plenty of them."

Then they called another witness, John Bennett; he says, "I live at No. 4, Little Park-lane, New-street, Mary-le-bone; I am a bricklayer by trade; I know Hiden, he has called upon me, and asked me to accompany him to private radical meetings; he has endeavoured to persuade me to accompany him more than ten times; he did not tell me any thing was to be done there, but only requested me to go with him, and I might sit and see and hear, and say nothing unless I chose; I never did accompany him, nor ever went to any radical meetings, either private or public."

This is all the evidence called on the part of the prisoners to any facts.

They then proceed to call witnesses to the respective characters of the prisoners. For the prisoner, Davidson, the first witness they call is Isaac Cook, who says "I live in Charlotte-street Blackfriars'-road; I have known Davidson about six years; about six years ago he worked as a journeyman for me in the cabinet line, and he has since occasionally called at my house in the way of business; at the time he worked for me, he was a very honest hard-working industrious man, but I have not known sufficiently of him since to speak to his character."

For the prisoner Tidd, they call Stephen Hales, who keeps a grocer's shop at No. 17, Bell-court, Gray's-inn-lane; he says, "I have known Tidd about fifteen months, and during that time I never saw any thing in his conduct treasonable, or that looked like conspiracy; he was a very prudent and industrious man,

It has been suggested to you that the testimony of this witness ought not to receive credit at your hands. I have listened with all the attention which it is my duty to do, to the very able argument. I do not say that as a word of course, or of compliment; this is not the place so to deal with these cases, but because it is due to the great exertions made for these unhappy men to say that every thing has been done which great care, great learning, and great talent, could do for them. But it is said, that this evidence ought not to receive credit at your hands. I have endeavoured to understand this argument, and I state, unfeignedly, under the solemn sanction on which I am called to perform the solemn duty cast upon me (the same sanction under which you are called upon to discharge the duty lying upon you) I cannot understand the argument. If it is suggested, that it is an extraordinary thing that a man should communicate to another a plot of an extraordinary nature, the answer to the observation is upon the surface,—this was a thing which must be done, if at all, by many, and must be done by canvassing many, some of whom may become accessaries to the thing proposed, and others may decline to have to do with it; but a man does not purpose to become an active member of a confederacy, but wishes to be acquainted with it, and having got information of it, thinking there is danger to his own life if he apparently or avowedly testifies a disposition to retract, he is told that the persons who may retire shall be murdered; I cannot understand, that a man who shall not disclose such a combination, shall be a person, who, when he comes under the exigencies and demands of justice, and under the solemn sanction of his oath, to state this in a court of justice, is not to be believed. But in what situation does this witness stand? He has heard this, does he conceal it, and, as far as depends upon him, allow it to have complete effect? With an anxiety which does him infinite credit,—with an anxiety to make that which, for aught he knew, might be the only communication which stood between the eminent peril of the destruction of those eminent men, and the accomplishment of that blow; he became anxious to make the communication to one of his majesty's administration, probably more known to him by name, because more seen as the minister in the House of Commons; he endeavours to avail himself of any opportunity of delivering a letter to lord Castlereagh, to whom, as we may suppose, he made in substance his present communication, for we cannot look at that letter, not being able to see the noble lord to whom the letter was directed; he addresses himself to lord Harrowby, with respect to whom, it would be disgracing him to suppose such a thing as that he could tamper with, or hold any improper intercourse;—nobody suggests or believes any thing of the sort. This man, finding the difficulty of communicating with lord Castlereagh—these are not times when noblemen in office are too easy of access to importunate strangers, whose business is mysterious,—he finds his way to the house of lord Harrowby, urged by the desire to communicate the information of this grand stroke intended to be struck; there he watches the person who, by the waiting of the servants at the door, he supposes to be the master of the house, and he way-lays him in the Park, in order that he may make him the medium of communication of his letter to another of the cabinet ministers. My lord Harrowby receives it, and with the care and caution which belongs to all men of honour, even a letter of this sort he does not presume to open when it is addressed to another; but observing that the man who makes this communication to him is afraid of being seen in his company, lord Harrowby says, I will meet you to-morrow; and, on the following day, his lordship passed him on entering the Park, and went down to the shrubbery; in the mean time the letter had been opened, and had been made the subject of communication. What is the conduct of this man? He discloses the whole of the conspiracy, as it has come to his knowledge, of the imminent peril and danger which, according to him, is impending only by a thread over the heads of these persons, and which would branch out, immediately after that catastrophe has been effected, into all the wide-spreading ruin which was intended; is it to be said of such a man as this, that he is not deserving of credit? that there is something vicious—something depraved—something to cut down his credit? if it be so, I should beg to be introduced to the contrast of such a character, to learn who in society is a meritorious member of it.

But it is suggested that he stands here probably with a degree of influence on his mind; that is treated with an uncommon, though not an improper delicacy by the learned counsel, they are obliged to deal with it with so much delicacy, that it is almost lost. Is he a witness coming here to earn a reward? No, that would be high treason against the character of every man of honour in society; but it is said the man thinks he has done the state so much service, and has so much merit with these noblemen, whose lives and whose families he has saved, that he probably thinks he shall derive, at some future period of his life, some reward for the benefit which he has been the instrument of Providence in conferring upon them. Does that enable him to invent a false story? has that enabled him to tell the story Adams has told, or Monument has told, without communication one with the other? did that enable him, before the police officers turned their attention to the stable in Cato-street, or the piequet under the command of lieutenant Fitzclarence turned their steps toward that place, to invent the plot for the assassination of all these persons, to get all this ammunition together in that place? and did this milkman and dairyman find out my lord Castlereagh?—No, he did not, but he attempted it, and failing, he did find out my lord Harrowby to make to him a communication of all this; in no other way can I see how any inroad is to be made into the testimony of Hiden, to whom, under Providence, probably every one of us assembled here to-day is under no small obligation.

The next witness called before you is John Baker; he says, "I am butler to the earl of Harrowby; I recollect, on the 18th or 19th of February last, issuing cards of invitation to the cabinet ministers to dine at his lordship's house on the 23rd; before that time the cabinet dinners were suspended, in consequence of the late king's death, and that was the first after the king's death; the dinner was prepared, and the preparations went on till after the dinner hour; about eight, the dinner was countermanded; up to that time, I and all the servants expected the dinner would take place; the archbishop of York's house is adjacent to lord Harrowby's; I observed carriages taking up there between six and seven o'clock."

The next witness called is Richard Munday, who says, "I live at No. 3, Cato-street; on the 23rd of February last, when I came from work in the afternoon, I saw Davidson walking to and fro in the gateway, and I saw him running away after the transaction took place; but I had seen him, between that, lighting a candle with another candle in his hand. I saw him push the stable door open and go into it, and I saw Harrison at the door at the time; Davidson's coat flew open as he stooped with his hat over the candle, and I observed a cross-belt round him, and another belt with two pistols and a sword, or something I thought to be a sword; I heard a nailing up in the afternoon, and I looked up and saw some sacking being nailed up over the railing over the door; I thought it was to keep the place warm, being cold weather, but it would keep any person from looking into the room; the stable had been for some time empty; the cows were taken away before Christmas; when I passed by I saw two men go in and three come out."

If Hiden's evidence wanted confirmation—if the presence of Davidson at this place at this time, needed to be confirmed, the testimony of Munday goes the full length of that confirmation.

George Caylock is called, he says, "I live in Cato-street; I saw Harrison there on the 23rd of February; I had known him before; I saw him go into the stable, he told me he had taken two chambers there, and was going to clean them up; I saw from twenty to five-and-twenty other persons go in and out of the stable that evening."

Then Ruthven the officer is called, he says, "I am one of the constables of Bow-street; on the 23rd of February, I went to Cato-street; I went first in the afternoon, and then again at six o'clock; I went into the Horse and Groom, and saw Cooper and Gilchrist there, with a mop-stick or broom-stick, which he left there; Gilchrist came back for it, but I had it; the stick had a place in it as if to receive a socket; I went into the stable about half-past eight o'clock; Ellis and Smithers were with me; I observed a man with a gun on his shoulder; I did not know him; I then went up a ladder which led to a loft; I saw a bench with arms upon it, and I heard a clattering of arms; I suppose there were about four or five-and-twenty men; I said, we are officers; seize their arms. Thistlewood, whom I immediately saw, seized a sword, and retired to the inner room; he stood fencing with it, endeavouring to keep any body away that approached him; Smithers approached him; and Thistlewood stabbed him, and he died immediately; after this a pistol was fired, and the lights were put out instantly; I heard a voice from the corner where Thistlewood was, call out, kill them," using a vulgar expression, "throw them down stairs; I joined in the cry, and got down with them; I got out into John-street, and met the soldiers, and returned with lieutenant Fitzclarence; upon returning to the stable door, I saw Tidd endeavouring to get away from the stable door; I said to somebody, lay hold of him, and, as I spoke, he held up his arm, and then I saw a pistol; I laid hold of that arm, and turned him round, I fell upon the dunghill, and he upon me; the soldiers came up soon afterwards, the pistol went off, but whether in his hand or not, I am not aware; he was secured, and I conducted him into the public-house; he was searched, he had a leather belt round his waist, and a ball-cartridge in his pocket; before I had finished searching him, Bradburn was brought in; I searched him, and found a string twisted five or six times round his waist, and some ball-cartridges and six balls loose in his pocket; Wilson, and the black, Davidson, were afterwards brought in, but I did not search either of them; Davidson cursed and swore against any man who would not die in liberty's cause; that he gloried in it," and he sang part of that popular song which has obtained so much celebrity, 'Scots wha' ha' wi' Wallace bled;' "Wilson said it was all up, he did not care a damn, they might knock him on the head now. I returned to the loft, and there were some soldiers there, and three of the prisoners, Strange, Cooper, and Gilchrist, and one who has been a witness, Monument; I found two swords myself, and I saw some pistols found, and a gun or two." Then he speaks of the hand-grenades, and other things found there, which I will enumerate by and by; he is asked whether, on searching Tidd, he did not say there was nothing but a tobacco-box; and he says, "No;" that was in answer to a question put to him by the prisoner Tidd.

VOL. XXXIII.

Then the Earl of Harrowby is examined, and his lordship says, "I am one of his majesty's privy council, and one of his majesty's ministers; cards of invitation were issued, by my direction, for a cabinet dinner, on the 23rd of February; the members of the cabinet, with their respective offices, are the lord chancellor; lord Westmoreland, the lord privy seal; the earl of Liverpool, first lord of the Treasury; Mr. Vansittart, the chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Castlereagh, the secretary of state for the foreign department; lord Bathurst, secretary of state for the colonial department; lord Sidmouth, the secretary of state for the home department; my lord Melville, first lord of the Admiralty; the duke of Wellington, master-general of the ordnance; Mr. Canning, president of the India board; Mr. Robinson, president of the board of trade; Mr. Bragge Bathurst, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Wellesley Pole, master of the mint; the earl of Mulgrave; and myself, as president of the council, fifteen in number; in consequence of his late majesty's death, the cabinet dinners were postponed; the noblemen and gentlemen I have mentioned, are all privy councillors, and compose what is called the cabinet council. I recollect riding in the Park on the day preceding that on which the cabinet dinner was to take place; I was accosted by a person near Grosvenor-gate; he gave me a letter;" and on the letter being shewn to his lordship, he replied, "that is the letter,—it is addressed to lord Castlereagh; the person told me it contained intelligence of great importance to his lordship and myself, and desired I would have it communicated to lord Castlereagh;" by the rules of law, we cannot inquire into the contents of the letter. "I asked him whether he had put his name and address to it? he said he had not" (as I observed before, lord Harrowby did not propose to open the letter); "he expressed a wish to have some further conversation with me; I said, if I was to communicate with him, it would be necessary I should know his name and address, and, upon that, he gave me a card containing them; when I knew what were the contents of the letter, I made an appointment to meet him in the Park the next morning at eleven o'clock; the letter was produced by lord Castlereagh at the council; I met the same person the next morning in the young plantations, near the ring; I appointed that spot, because he was extremely apprehensive of being seen with me, when I met him the day before near Grosvenor-gate; in consequence of my having seen this man, the dinner did not take place; preparations were made for it, and went on until I wrote a note from lord Liverpool's house, between seven and eight o'clock, which must have reached my house about eight;" the preparations went on past the usual hour of holding the cabinet dinner, so that none of his lordship's establishment would be informed that it was not to take place until between seven and eight; "that was the first communication I made to my servants that it was not to take place."

5 E

The next witness called is James Ellis, one of the officers of the patrol at the Bow-street office. He says, "I went to Cato-street on the evening of the 23rd of February, with Ruthven; I went into the stable about half-past eight o'clock; I saw a man, whom I believe to be Davidson, about half way between the foot of the ladder and the door of the stable; he had a carbine, or something of the kind, in his right hand, and a sword at his left side; he appeared as if he was walking sentinel; he had white cross-belts on; there was another person in the further stall of the stable, nearest the ladder, whom I did not know; when I entered the stable, I took Davidson by the collar, turned him half round, and looked in his face, and I saw he was a man of colour; I took him into custody in about five minutes afterwards; he was then dressed in exactly the same way as I had observed him before; he had a white cross-belt, a carbine, and a sword; I followed Ruthven up the ladder, into the loft; I observed a number of people falling back to the back part of the room; there appeared to be about four or five-and-twenty altogether; some of them were apparently attempting to enter a small room adjoining; as I went up, Thistlewood brandished his sword at me; he was advancing rather towards me, when I told him to desist, or I would fire, at the same time holding up a pistol with one hand, and my staff with the other; upon that, he retreated back towards the door of the little room; Smithers followed him, and Thistlewood made a push, and stabbed him in or near his right breast; he fell back, and I fired at Thistlewood, but without effect; Smithers staggered against me and fell; a general rush and confusion then took place, and I was pushed down the ladder, into the stable; I then attempted to get into the door-way, into Cato-street; I remained in the door-way for a few seconds, when two or three shots were fired by a man standing under the ladder; I then attempted to go outside the door, when some shots were fired from the window of the little room, looking into Cato-street; they were fired towards the door; I then heard a cry of stop him; I saw Davidson running, and I pursued him, and took him into custody; when I first came up, I caught him by the collar, and he made a cut at me, but I was too close to him, and Gill, another officer, came up, and assisted in disarming him; he had the carbine and the cross-belts when I took him; after I had left him in the custody of others, I returned to the stable, and assisted in securing two or three others."

They then call to you Robert Chapman, one of the Bow-street patrol; he says, "I was appointed to go to Cato-street on the 23rd of February; I went to the Horse and Groom, with Lee, the constable; I saw Davidson and Cooper come in, and another man, whom I believe to be Gilchrist; they stood observing us for some time, and we then went away; Davidson had a large drab great coat on; we then passed on to Molyneux-street, and thence towards Queen-street. I saw them again walking backwards and forwards; Cooper said he should go in, and have some beer; and, as they passed, they looked us in the face, as if observing who we were. After this, when we were at the Queen-street end of Cato-street, I heard the report of a pistol; in consequence of that, I ran up Cato-street, and persons were then running very fast out of the stable, and there was a firing; two short men ran down the street, and, as I had just overtaken them, I heard a piece go off, and I turned round, and heard somebody say, stop him; I saw a man with his hand up; I went up to him, and he struck at me with a sword; Ellis laid hold of him by the collar, and he and I took him against the wall; he had also a carbine; the man was Davidson, but he was dressed quite differently then to what he was when I saw him before; we took him into a chandler's shop; he had a couple of pistol flints in his pocket."

On his cross-examination, he says, "I did not go into a public-house with Davidson; he remained in my custody from the time he was overtaken till I went back with him to the stable; he was not taken into any public-house; then Benjamin Gill came up, and took the carbine; he also struck Davidson on the sword-hand, and took the sword from him; I saw that done." Then he is asked, whether the carbine was not at some distance from him when he was taken? and he says, "No, I think not;" this was to contradict the testimony of Ruthven. On the testimony of the witness Chapman, and of lieutenant Fitzclarence, who says that he conducted him to Bow-street, and that he was not in a public-house while in his custody, it is supposed, that Ruthven has purposely or accidentally made a mis-statement; how that is I am at a loss to say. Ruthven states this fact, and it rather stands on the testimony of lieutenant Fitzclarence and of Chapman, that he was not in a public-house, but only in that small shop in Cato-street, but each speaks only to the time Davidson was in their respective custody.

On his re-examination he says, "I conducted him to a chandler's shop, and afterwards to the stable, with a file of soldiers. I afterwards gave him up; and whether he was taken into a public-house, or not, I cannot tell, but I do not think that he was; I do not know one way or the other."

William Lee is a Bow-street patrol; he says, "I went, on the 23rd of February, in company with Chapman, about half-past six, near the door of the Horse and Groom. I observed Davidson, Gilchrist, Cooper and Harrison; in a short time we walked away, and Thistlewood followed us; he came and stared us in the face; and I said, it was very rude to stare us in the face. Chapman answered, I suppose the gentleman thinks he knows us. Thistlewood said, it is a mistake; and he turned on his heel and went away. I and Chapman had been sent as officers less known than some others. I took a turn and came again into Cato-street, and then I saw Davidson leave the stable, and come to the corner; at that time, Gilchrist and Cooper were under the gateway. I will not be sure of Harrison being there at that moment, but I saw him there soon afterwards; they were talking to a man dressed like a baker; at half-past eight I entered the stable with the party that accompanied Ruthven and Ellis. Ruthven and Ellis, and one or two more, went up the ladder. I heard a firing and confusion up there, and they were hustled down again; the lights appeared to be put out; there were several afterwards fell down the ladder. Ruthven desired me to stop under the gateway; there were some shots fired from the window of the loft; shortly afterwards the military came and entered the stable."

The next witness they call to you is a person of the name of Benjamin Gill, who is one of the Bow-street patrol; he says, "I formed one of Westcott's party that went to Cato-street. I cannot state exactly what time we arrived. I went into the stable; Ruthven and Ellis were there before me; there was a light in the stable. I saw a man standing at the bottom of the ladder, of a dark complexion, short, thick and stout; he had some arms but I cannot say what. Ruthven, Ellis, and Smithers went up, and I followed Nixon; he was on the ladder; he was near the top, and I was as close to him as I could possibly get. I heard the report of a pistol or something in the loft. Ellis came tumbling down; he knocked Nixon down, and Nixon fell upon me in the corner; there was a rush from the loft; I got near the door, and by a sudden rush I was pushed into Cato-street; when I got there I saw Davidson coming out of the door with a carbine; he was running out and he discharged the carbine right at me, and passed me. I then saw that he was a man of colour; he had also a large sword; I ran after him and cried out, stop him, stop him! I had very nearly reached him when he made a back cut at me with the sword, and then he advanced forwards again. He was stopped by Ellis. I struck him with my truncheon on the wrist, and made a grasp at the blade of the sword with my left hand. I found it very sharp; it cut my fingers, and I let go of it again. I think it was fastened to his hand, or he would have dropped it when I struck him. I think it was twirled round his wrist by a cord; the sword fell, and I picked it up. I took the carbine out of the other hand. Ellis and another man had got hold of him when I picked up the sword; I never lost sight of him after I saw him with the sword; he was taken over to a little shop in Queen-street. I took the carbine with me, and left the sword with Ellis. The sword and the carbine are both forth coming, and I shall know them again." The carbine is then produced to him. He identifies that and the long sword, which was produced as being that which was found upon the person of Davidson, with which he cut at him, which appears to have a leathern thong round it. The carbine, he says, was the same as was fired at him; that he tried it, and found, when he took it to Bow-street, that it was one which had been recently discharged, for there was the moisture produced by a recent discharge.

Then John Muddock was called, and he stated, "I am a soldier in the Coldstream regiment of guards; I was one of the party that went to Cato-street; I recollect seeing a man near the stable door; I saw him the next day at Whitehall, and I found his name to be Tidd;" then he pointed him out; "he presented a pistol at lieutenant Fitzclarence; he fired it off, and I saw serjeant Legg secure him afterwards; after this I went towards the stable door, and I saw a person cut with a sword at lieutenant Fitzclarence; he went in again, and I did not see who he was, and afterwards Mr. Fitzclarence attacked them, and went in at the door, and I followed him in; after I had got into the centre of the room, the prisoner Wilson presented a pistol at my breast; it flashed in the pan but did not discharge; I made a stab at him with my bayonet; I secured him, and took him to a public-house, where I looked at him by a light; I now see the same person at the bar."

Then William Legg is called; he says, "I am a serjeant in the Coldstream-guards; I was one of the party that went under the command of lieutenant Fitzclarence on the night of the 23rd of February to Cato-street; I observed a man standing with his back against the wall, between the gateway leading out of John-street and the stable door; he had a pistol in his hand, and he levelled it at lieutenant Fitzclarence, who was about a yard and a half at the head of me; upon my observing that, I knocked the pistol aside with a pike, and seized the muzzle end of the pistol with my left hand; a scuffle upon that ensued between the man and me, and the pistol went off in the scuffle; whatever the pistol was loaded with, tore the sleeve of the jacket of the right arm; as soon as the pistol went off, he let it go easily, and I secured him, and delivered him over to the police officers; that man was Tidd; I saw him afterwards, and I have seen him since; I then went into the stable, and up into the loft; the persons who were in the loft had surrendered when I got there to part of the piquet; I assisted in securing some of the arms that were taken in the loft."

Then Lieutenant Fitzclarence is called, who says, "I am a lieutenant in the Coldstream-guards; I was applied to on the evening of the 23rd of February to send a piquet to John-street; I accompanied that piquet; when I got to John-street, my attention was attracted by the report of fire arms; I brought my piquet forwards towards Cato-street; on getting to the archway leading into Cato-street, I met a police officer, who was calling out 'soldiers, soldiers! the stable door!' I made towards it, and the moment I got to the door I met two men, one of them presented a pistol, and the other cut at me with a sword; we exchanged several cuts; he seeing the body of the piquet coming up, ran into the stable, and I followed him; on entering the stable, I came up to one man, who said, 'do not kill me, and I will tell you all,' it turned out afterwards that that was Monument; "I gave him in charge, and then returned and took out another man, and the soldiers took him away; I then led the men up into the loft, and there I found three four or five men, and a large quantity of arms, consisting of blunderbusses, pistols, and pikes; I assisted in securing the persons in the loft, and the arms."

Upon his cross-examination, he says, "I took Davidson into custody; he was taken to Bow-street, having been first brought into the stable in Cato-street; I do not know that in proceeding from the stable he was taken into any public-house, or any other house; I will not be certain that he was not taken into the Horse and Groom; Tidd and another person were there; but I think," lieutenant Fitzclarence added, "he was not to my knowledge, in the Horse and Groom, nor in a public-house, till he was carried to Bow-street."

The next witness called is William Westcott, who says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I went to Cato-street on the 23rd of February; on going up I saw Ings, one of the prisoners, at the foot of the ladder."

Then John Wright is called, who says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I went up to the foot of the ladder in the stable in Cato-street; I saw a stoutish man standing there; I took from him a butcher's knife and a sword; there was wax-end twisted round the handle of the knife; that knife is in the possession of the officer; immediately afterwards I was knocked down, and received a stab in my right side, and that man made his escape from me; Ings was immediately afterwards brought back in custody."

John Champion, who is also one of the Bow-street patrol, says "I was at the stable in Cato-street on the night of the 23rd; I saw Ings at the foot of the ladder; on the officers appearing, he said, 'look out above there'; he afterwards made his escape; Brooks afterwards came up, bringing him in custody; we took him to Mary-le-bone watch-house, and searched him there; we found two haversacks slung across his shoulders under his great coat, a tin case nearly full of powder, three pistol balls, a knife case, and a belt round his breast; the knife-case was made of cloth, for a large knife; there is a knife wrapped round with wax-end, which fits it, and which is in it now."

Then William Charles Brookes is called; he says, "I am one of the Bow-street patrol; I met a man running in John-street on the night of the 23rd; he presented a pistol at me and fired it; the ball went through my clothes, bruised my shoulder, and grazed my neck; I staggered into the street, and the man ran on; he was afterwards laid hold of by Moay, a watchman; I searched him in the watch-house, and took from him two haversacks, a belt round his body, and a tin case nearly full of powder;

I asked him how he came to fire at me, a man he had never seen before; and he damned me, and said he wished he had killed me, as he wanted to do."

They then called Samuel Hercules Taunton, another of the officers, who says, "on the morning of the 24th of February, I went to Brunt's lodgings, to apprehend him; I took him in the front two-pair of stairs room; I found there two rush baskets, an iron pot and a pike-staff; I asked him about the back room, and he denied its being his apartment; I then called up the landlady, and asked her whose it was; she, in his presence, said the lodgings were let in his presence to a man, but she did not know what his name was; I asked Brunt who he was, and he said he had only seen him once at a public-house, and he did not know who he was; I then went to Tidd's lodging, in Hole-in-the-wall passage, and found some articles of ammunition;" which are now lying on the table, and enumerated in that list which I shall by and by state to you.

Daniel Bishop, another Bow-street officer, tells you that he apprehended Thistlewood on Thursday the 24th of February, between ten and eleven in the morning; he says, "I found him at the house of a Mrs. Harris, No. 8, White-street, Moor-fields; he was then in bed, with his breeches and stockings on, and his coat and waistcoat by the bed-side; in the pockets I found three leaden balls, a ball-cartridge, two flints, and a small silk sash; I took him to Bow-street, and then to the Secretary of State's."

On his cross-examination, he says, that several of the patrol went with him to apprehend Thistlewood, and that they surrounded the house before they entered it, for fear of mischief. This was all the evidence given to you yesterday.

Then, gentlemen, they have this day again called before you, Ruthven, the officer, who says, "there are now upon the table the arms and ammunition found in Cato-street; there were six more hand-grenades than there are here, which have been opened in the course of the investigations; the pike staves were ferruled at the time they were found; but some of the ferrules have dropped off, in consequence, as I suppose, of the greenness of the wood; some of the pike-heads are files sharpened, and others are bayonets; the poles are bored for the pike-heads to screw in; the hand-grenades were all fitted with fuses." Then he points out the haversacks and the belt, the knife and the knife-case, found upon Ings. He then verifies a list, which he says he made out, of the various articles; thirty-eight ball-cartridges, firelock and bayonet, one powder-flask, three pistols, one sword, six bayonet spikes and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet-spikes and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet-spike and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades, two fire-balls, one large grenade and bayonet, rope-ladder, one sword-stick, forty ball-cartridges and one bayonet, three loose balls;" these were all found in the loft. "In the stable, in the pocket of Bradburn, six ball-cartridges, three balls and some string put round him to act as a belt; the pistol which it is alleged that Tidd fired, the pistol which it is alleged that Wilson attempted to fire, blunderbuss, sword, belt and scabbard, one pistol, one sword, twelve sticks with ferrules. In the pocket of Tidd, two ball-cartridges, and round him a leather belt; two ball-cartridges facing the stable, and ten ditto in Newnham-street; one musket cut down, and one sword from Davidson, one haversack, cross belts, one pricker, bayonet, scabbard, cartouche-box, and a belt round his body; two haversacks, one belt and tin." The remainder of the enumeration of the articles I would read to you, if there was any thing in it that tended to the benefit of the prisoners; but my learned brother suggests, that probably you have so good a recollection of the enumeration of the articles which are exhibited before you, that you may not perhaps think it necessary that I should go through it again.

Foreman of the Jury.—No, my lord, it is not at all necessary.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Then, gentlemen, this being the enumeration of the articles, the witness says, "the stick that was found in the public house was the one left by Cooper, and afterwards asked for by Gilchrist."

John Hector Morison is then called again, and a sword being shewn to him, he says, "this is the sword that was brought for me to grind; my directions were, to grind it on both sides, and to make the point as sharp as a needle; it is particularly sharp." I asked him if that was the one he called a scimitar, and he says, "they are both of a similar shape;" then he says, "since it left me the edge has been made much keener by sharpening it with a steel or a stone, I cannot exactly say which."

Then Benjamin Gill is called again, and selects the carbine and sword taken from Davidson, from the arms which are upon the table; he had stated, that he believed there was a string attached to the sword taken from Davidson, and the one produced has such a string; "the carbine was not loaded when I took possession of it, because he had discharged it at me before I took it to Bow-street, it was quite damp."

Ruthven is again called, and he says, "the greater part of the fire-arms were loaded when we took them; we had them drawn for the purpose of being produced here; they were loaded with ball, with the exception of one gun, which had large shot."

Then Mr. Aldous, the pawnbroker, is called again, and having looked at the blunderbuss produced to him, he states, that he believes it to be the same that was taken out of pawn by Davidson, on the 23rd of February. Being asked by the the prisoner Davidson whether he did not recollect his saying, when he pledged it, that it was not his own, he says the prisoner might make that observation, but he does not recollect it.

Taunton, the officer, is then called again, and he enumerates the articles found in the rush baskets at Brunt's; he says, "in one basket there were nine papers, with rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients; those," he says, "are what are called fire-balls; there were also some steel filings in a paper, about half an ounce; in the other basket, which was wrapped up in the blue apron, there were four grenades, three papers of rope-yarn, tar, and other ingredients," that is, more fire-balls; "two bags of powder, one-pound weight each, they are made of flannel;" these are made up in the best manner they can be made for cartridges for cannon by a person not having a mould for the gun, and perfectly answering the purpose of a more regular cartridge; "five flannel bags empty, one paper of powder, one leather bag, sixty-three balls, one iron pot," it appears that tar, or some such substance has been heated in it, "a pike-handle;" these were all the things that were found at Brunt's; he says, "the hand-grenades found in Cato-street, and those found at Brunt's, are of the same description;" then he says, "at Tidd's, there were found in a haversack, 434 balls, 171 ball-cartridges, 69 ball-cartridges without powder in them, three pounds of powder in paper, and also in a coarse canvass cloth ten grenades, eleven bags of powder, one pound each," of the same sort with those found at Brunt's; "ten bags empty, a small bag with a tin powder flask with some powder, sixty-eight balls, four flints, twenty-seven pike-handles, of the same description as those found in Cato-street, ferruled and bored, and a box containing 965 ball-cartridges," which, he says, are made up in parcels of five each; then, upon a question being put by one of you, gentlemen, whether that box was strong enough to remove them from place to place, he says, "it was tied up strongly when I found it under the bed; it was strong enough, certainly, to be removed."

Then they call Serjeant Hanson, who says, "I am a serjeant in the royal artillery, and acquainted with such things as are now before me. The flannel bags of gunpowder, containing one pound each, I suppose were meant for cartridges for a six-pound gun, they would answer that purpose; they are made differently from what a military man of experience would make them, he would make them in a mould fitted to the gun. The ingredients of those fire-balls are nearly all alike; they are made of oakum, tar, resin and brimstone; one was without brimstone," that he supposed had been intended for the bottom of a hand-grenade; "they would be effectual in setting a building on fire, and if one of them was thrown into a hay loft with two or three loads of hay and straw, it would most assuredly burn it down, or thrown into any building and resting on wood, it would set it on fire; it would burn for three or four minutes. In the hand-grenades I have opened, there is a small box of tin, containing about three ounces and a half of gunpowder, with a fuse brazed into it; I weighed the gunpowder in one, and they all appear to be the same, that is, more than sufficient for a nine-inch shell; first there is rope-yarn, then paper, then more rope-yarn, then the tin-box, with a number of pieces of iron tied tight round it. I found as many as twenty-five pieces of iron; if these were thrown into a room where fifteen persons were assembled, it would be discharged in about half a minute, and probably be attended with death and destruction to all the persons in the room." Then he opens one, and gives you a description of its contents; he says, "the powder is very good; the hand-grenades are not made as a military man would make them, but they are constructed so as to be very effectual and destructive; the regular hand-grenades have a shell which can only be obtained at a foundry's;" the one he opens has only four pieces of iron in it, but he says he found in another twenty-five; they vary according to the size of the pieces.

This is the whole of the evidence on the part of the prosecution. You have been addressed by the learned counsel for the prisoner upon the subject of the case which had thus been submitted to you, and you have since been addressed by the prisoners themselves. I shall not at present state to you at any length the observations which have been made by the one or by the other, but shall follow the learned lord chief baron, who presided at the only trial at which I have been present here, by desiring you, upon whom the speeches of counsel were most peculiarly calculated to make a deep and lasting impression, to give the fullest effect to all the observations that were addressed to you. I shall recommend to you to pay the utmost attention to what has been said. I have a reason for not going much at large into the observations which you have heard, which probably you will give me credit for believing is not one created by a feeling otherwise than humane towards the prisoners at the bar.

On the part of the prisoners there have been called to you as witnesses two persons to facts; the first of these is Mary Barker, who tells you, she is the daughter of the prisoner Tidd; that she knows Edwards and Adams; that Edwards, about a fortnight before the affair in Cato-street, left at her father's lodgings some hand-grenades and powder; she says, "Adams left the large grenade; Edwards asked, if he might leave them for a little while; they were not to remain there, they were to be called for again; Edwards took them away once to finish them, and brought them back again; this was about a week before the Cato-street affair; they were taken away again on the 23rd by Edwards, and brought back on the 24th, about an hour before the officer came; the person who brought them back was an entire stranger to me; there was a corded box, among other things, left at our house, which was never, to my knowledge, uncorded during the time it remained, which was till the morning of the 24th, when the officers took it away; what it contained I do not know." You will probably not wonder, that the learned counsel for the Crown did not address any question to the witness, because it was undoubtedly true, as was stated in the reply, that if the case had remained short on the part of the prosecution, much confirmation would be derived from the testimony of this unhappy person, called in order to effect the security of her near relative; I shall make no further observation upon it; that is undoubtedly well justified.

Thomas Chambers is the next witness; he says, "I live at No. 3, Heathcock-court, in the Strand; I know Adams; I remember the day when the people were taken up in Cato-street; he called upon me twice, about a week before, in company with Edwards; Edwards asked me, in the presence of Adams, if I would go along with them; I asked them where; he said I was not such a fool as not to know there was something on foot; I replied, I did not; Adams said, we are going to kill his majesty's ministers, and we will have blood and wine for supper; Edwards replied, by God, Adams, you are right, it shall be so." He says, "on the Monday before the Cato-street discovery, they both came; they had a bag with them; they asked me to let them leave it there; I asked what it contained, and Adams said, only a few pistols and such like; a man named Tunbridge was there at the time. I refused to let them leave it, and I never saw them afterwards."

Some questions are addressed to him on cross-examination, and in answer to them, he says, "I do not know what book I was sworn upon; I never took an oath but once, before I came here the other day; this is the third time; it is a Prayer-book, I should suppose. I am a churchman; I believe in Christianity, and have always said so; I always believed in the Bible, and was brought up to the church; I never saw Paine's works. I know both the prisoners at the bar; I have known Davidson since about the time of Mr. Hunt's procession; I have only known Tidd in the trade, we are brother shoemakers; I cannot say how long I have known him, whether twelve or nine or six months. I did not particularly know him at the time of Hunt's procession." Upon being pressed as to how long he had known him, he says, "it might be at some of the meetings in Smithfield; I attended every meeting that was held openly in the air; I carried banners; I cannot say but that I might have walked in the procession with some of the prisoners who are indicted. I know Ings and Brunt and Wilson, and I know Harrison very well; I do not know Bradburn so well, but I do know him." Then he is asked whether he went to any of the Smithfield meetings in company with any of these persons, and he says, "I cannot say, they might be there; I had no weapon at the Smithfield meeting; I carried no pistol in my pocket, nor do I know that any body else had any; I have known Thistlewood ever since Mr. Hunt's procession; he has been at my place repeatedly since, for I took home the flags, and he has been there to fetch them, and to distribute them to those who were to take them. I have seen him since, on one Sunday evening, at the Black Dog in Gray's-inn-lane. I know the White Lion in Wych-street very well; I have attended meetings there; there is no name to the meeting, except that it is a meeting of reformers; I had no number or section. I saw Thistlewood at the Smithfield meeting, when Mr. Hunt was in the waggon; I was always in the waggon; I cannot say who else was there, there were thousands I believe; I do not think I saw Davidson there." Then he is asked whether he thought they were such ferocious monsters as were going to commit assassination, and he says, "Yes, but I did not consider they would get fools enough to do it; I considered myself a fool, but not so big a fool as that; I never heard a man say a word against his majesty's ministers, except those men, Edwards and Adams; I thought the thing so preposterous and absurd, that no man would be found foolish enough to do it. I first met with Ings at a shop where pamphlets were sold; I only read Mr. Cobbett's works; I have got plenty of them."

Then they called another witness, John Bennett; he says, "I live at No. 4, Little Park-lane, New-street, Mary-le-bone; I am a bricklayer by trade; I know Hiden, he has called upon me, and asked me to accompany him to private radical meetings; he has endeavoured to persuade me to accompany him more than ten times; he did not tell me any thing was to be done there, but only requested me to go with him, and I might sit and see and hear, and say nothing unless I chose; I never did accompany him, nor ever went to any radical meetings, either private or public."

This is all the evidence called on the part of the prisoners to any facts.

They then proceed to call witnesses to the respective characters of the prisoners. For the prisoner, Davidson, the first witness they call is Isaac Cook, who says "I live in Charlotte-street Blackfriars'-road; I have known Davidson about six years; about six years ago he worked as a journeyman for me in the cabinet line, and he has since occasionally called at my house in the way of business; at the time he worked for me, he was a very honest hard-working industrious man, but I have not known sufficiently of him since to speak to his character."

For the prisoner Tidd, they call Stephen Hales, who keeps a grocer's shop at No. 17, Bell-court, Gray's-inn-lane; he says, "I have known Tidd about fifteen months, and during that time I never saw any thing in his conduct treasonable, or that looked like conspiracy; he was a very prudent and industrious man, always at his work when he had any to do ; and when he had none he took a walk with his family, or employed his time in reading."

Then William French is called, and he says, "I am a carpenter and undertaker, living at No. 18, Union-court, Holborn ; I have known Tidd nearly three years, he was a lodger and tenant of mine ; during that time he has borne the best character ; he appeared a very industrious and honest man, and was always a punctual paymaster ; I never wished for a better tenant."

Samuel Lands says, "I live at No. 11, Charles-street Hatton-garden ; I am a boot-maker ; I have known Tidd turned of three years ; he has borne a very good character to the best of my knowledge ; he always appeared to be an honest and industrious man ; he has worked for me the whole of that time, and has deserved my good opinion."

Then on the behalf of Davidson, Robert Wood is called, and he says, "I am a tinman and brazier, living at No. 5, Elliott's-row near Lord's Cricket-ground ; I have known Davidson upwards of three years, and during that time he has appeared to be a very industrious sober man."

This is the whole of the evidence which has been laid before you in the course of these two laborious days, upon this most important and anxious trial ; and before I proceed to any other subject, I would observe upon that which has been the last topic of evidence—the character of the prisoners ; I think you may take it upon that which has been proved by the witnesses on their part, that they have received from them unexceptionable characters—then I address you in the language of all judges upon such subjects, by saying to you, that if the case imputed to the prisoners remains in any doubt, you ought to give them the full benefit and advantage of character, and that ought to turn the scale in their favour ; but if the case admits of no doubt whatever, character ought not, cannot, and it would be most preposterous that it should operate to find a man not guilty, where the evidence is clear against him.

In the course of this inquiry, it has been suggested to you, that, with all the evidence which you have heard from the testimony of witnesses, pure and impure, it is impossible for any men, who expect to have any attention paid to their observation, to hesitate in admitting fully, broadly, up to the fullest extent, that a conspiracy of many persons, characterized by those who have spoken of it as of a most diabolical, detestable nature, such as is a disgrace to any civilized country, has taken place. It has been admitted, that it is impossible to deny that the persons included in this indictment have each of them had their respective shares in that conspiracy ; but it is said, we must not confound crimes, that it was a conspiracy which in point of moral guilt, in point of diabolical turpitude, in point of cold-blooded wickedness, nothing can by possibility exceed ;

and the gentlemen have, in a manner which nobody could doubt for a single moment was a candid and fair declaration of that which they were feeling at their hearts, stated, that they could not for a single moment be the apologists of such crimes as those ; but that horrid and detestable as they were, they did not amount to the crime of high treason now charged. What is the conspiracy, then, which these gentlemen ask you to adopt in the place of that which the prosecutor says was a conspiracy to subvert the government, to depose the king, to levy war, to produce rebellion and insurrection in the country ? What is it they give you in the place of this ? why, a conspiracy to destroy by the most destructive and horrible means by which human life has ever been taken away by any assassins in any time or in any country, fifteen persons, whose names and stations have more than once been stated to you ; but feeling that it would be impossible to induce any men of your understanding to believe that was quite all, because it would be difficult to induce any man or number of men, who had no common interest, no common cause of complaint, no common sentiment of malice or revenge, by any seduction, by any temptation of reward, by any possible means to procure their accession to such a transaction—to engage in it merely for the purpose of taking off such men as those—I speak of those fifteen persons only as we find them in the evidence—this is not the place, if I had the honour of intimate acquaintance with any of those noble personages, for me to introduce that as a topic for your consideration—I speak of them only as the evidence in this case and the history of the country presents them to you ; were those the only persons who were to be destroyed according to the testimony which bears so strongly on the case (but which the gentlemen say cannot expect any credit with you, but that which the witness Adams has told you was the construction of his own invention, and not the invention of the conspirators).—Were those fifteen persons the only persons who were to become the victims of these attempts ? No ; there was one other, and that was another who, when the name is pronounced, will furnish a strong clue to ascertain whether the destruction of ministers and the plunder of houses was the only object in view, or whether it had ulterior objects of wide-spreading destruction.

You will not fail to recollect that the fire-balls, which were to light up the illuminations of the metropolis, to intimate to the friends of liberty that now was the time for them to come forward, for that their tyrants were destroyed, and that a provisional government was sitting, were to destroy, among others, the house of the bishop of London. I believe I may say of that person, that of all the learned and excellent men who have ever presided in the see of London, there never was a man, and I believe I may venture to say there never will exist a man, so utterly incapable of giving the slightest offence to any human creature; or if I may use an expression which sometimes has been employed upon such subjects, of giving uneasiness even to the worm under his foot—the creature of benevolence—a man whose character and conduct, in public and private life, have conciliated the esteem and affection of all who know him, and of whom, I believe it may be truly said, it is impossible he should have one enemy; and yet this prelate, with his interesting infant family, and every thing that is dear to him in this world, were, according to the account you have heard of that which was to be accomplished on the 23rd of February, to be included in that which it is admitted was one of the purposes of this conspiracy, to destroy the lives of ministers and to burn the houses.

But was there no ulterior object? yes, it is admitted there was; there was an object of pillage and plunder, and it was said, they were to kick up a row, for they were too poor to wait longer. Gentlemen, forget for a moment that there was such a man as Adams in the world—forget for a moment that there was such a man as John Monument in existence, take the account you have heard from Hale, from Hiden, from lieutenant Fitzclarence, from the officers, from lord Harrowby, from his butler, from witnesses upon no one of whom the least stain is attempted to be fixed; look at the apparatus upon your table, and at the ammunition which has been carried away to a place of safety,* and ask yourselves, what more was there of conspiracy here? and had it for its only object the destruction of the lives of ministers, and some plunder? Men accommodate their means to their object; then according to ordinary experience, we may expect to find these persons going forth, if plunder is their object, as plunderers usually do, in all the possible security arising from the stillness of the night, and they will not add murder to plunder, unless murder becomes necessary, in an attempt to prevent detection; but these men are to cut off the heads of fifteen of his majesty's cabinet ministers, and to plunder; and it was said to you, "oh, the carrying the haversacks, with the accompaniment of the butcher's knife, was not to cut off and bring away the hand and the heads of his majesty's ministers; that was a wicked diabolical invention of Adams." If you ask, say the learned gentlemen, what they were all for, they were for the carrying away the plunder. You have seen these things, gentlemen, what was the plunder which might have been expected at the house of one of his majesty's ministers? probably an extremely valuable service of plate to the amount of four or five hundred pounds or more, much of it in massive articles. We shall find persons going out to plunder with the means of carrying away the plunder when they have got it, but shall we find them encumbered with things which will not enable them to carry it away; shall we find the party with only two haversacks over the shoulder of one of the men? and yet that is the only object to be accomplished. What is to become of them afterwards? The project is to relieve their dire necessities; they are in want, they can wait no longer; why; there is no article they could have found any where less convertible to the immediate purpose of life, than a service of plate off a nobleman's sideboard, unless the crucible was already prepared to melt it down, and some person ready to sell the ingots produced; but besides that, they would want the accommodation for carrying away plunder. What was required for the destruction of the cabinet ministers of the king? Were the articles on the table necessary? Were the hand-grenades which remained at Brunt's necessary? Were the large grenade and the other articles found at Tidd's, the next morning, necessary? Were cartridges for six-pounder cannon, were ball-cartridges fit to be served out to very few short of a thousand men, in parcels of five, necessary for the purpose of accomplishing the great stroke to be performed, the West-end job, which was to consist in destroying his majesty's fifteen cabinet ministers in the dining-room of the earl of Harrowby, the president of his majesty's council! If those were not wanted for this purpose, for what purpose were they wanted? your verdict will give the answer, whether they were wanted for the purpose of creating a nucleus for rebellion and insurrection, and, trying whether that which one of these men said was true, that the people were every where anxious for a change, and that they wanted only a leader to be found in numbers equal to the carrying all this into execution.

But you are told (and it is the argument used on many occasions of this sort) that for the imputed ulterior objects, the means are utterly inadequate to the end, and you are asked with a triumphant sarcasm, what were they to destroy his majesty's ministers, to kill all the opposing million of inhabitants of this metropolis, to trench the Tower all round, to burn down all the barracks, and to take possession of the Mansion-house, and then send out their mandates to all the outposts, informing them their towns were to be battered about their ears, with six bags of a pound each in flannel, and some hand-grenades, and five-and-twenty men or forty men, and is the country to be revolutionized by these means, and are we to be all undone by them? Nothing can be more ridiculous, nothing more preposterous. But is that the proposition, is that the expectation of the conspirators? is it that which one of them declares to be his expectation? He declares, if you believe the evidence, that he has been disappointed by men who promised to stand by him, but that he has now men who will stand by him, and that when the tyrants shall have been destroyed, and the provisional government shall be sitting, the men who have been looking anxiously for a change, will see that they have now a service presented, in which their exertions may be successful. What is necessary to this? crowd to the standard of rebellion—erected by whom? erected by a band of ruffians, with their hands reeking with the blood of some of the most illustrious men who have ever adorned any country; with cannon stolen from the repositories in which they were supposed to be secure, with the blood streaming from the heads of two of his majesty's secretaries of state, in order to affect those who are likely to be affected by such scenes as these, and to assure the friends of liberty that those heads would not have been there by the instrumentality of mean and insignificant traitors, but that there were men of more consequence behind, who would come forward whenever an opportunity presented itself.

* The gunpowder and other combustible matter had been removed out of court, at the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution.

But it is said this is so preposterous, so absurd, so ridiculous (that is, I believe, the expression of one of the learned gentlemen) that a man who could be walking about the street without a keeper, without a strait waistcoat to put upon him, could not for a single moment have entertained so ridiculous an idea. What is this preposterous proposition? why, that by this strength, and a probable accession to it, they should overturn the government? no, but that they should make an attempt with a probable expectation that they shall receive a support carrying them to the ultimate attainment of their object. Is this the first occasion on which, by small means in the beginning, enthusiastic men have made similar attempts? I am sure I must address myself to several gentlemen who, by their appearance, must be of an age to have seen, what I never can forget as long as memory holds its seat, this metropolis without a leader, or any one pretending to be a leader under the dominion, for many successive days, of a mob, originally composed of wretched miserable boys and women, and of drunken men; with, I believe, at one time no fewer than seven, of what in the language of to-day, are called illuminations, houses on fire, in different parts of the metropolis and its neighbourhood; all men aghast, and not knowing where it would end, until the firmness and vigour of our lately departed, revered, and excellent sovereign, to whose virtues and to whose courage his subjects in time past have owed, and certainly futurity will owe obligations which never can be overstated—obligations which to him never can be re-paid, even by the gratitude of those who might not have lived but for his exertions. No one can answer for the consequences of such beginnings; we have evidence that one of the conspirators said, "We have gone so far we cannot recede, if we do, it will be another Despard's job." What was Despard's job? a heated enthusiast; a man who had been in the army; with preparations like these? no, with preparations which this exceeds beyond all the bounds of calculation; fancying himself strong enough to summon the Tower of London, and believing there were but a few hours before he should become at the head of a provisional government, the king having been deposed; if we talk, indeed, of furious and Quixotic expeditions, what can be more absurd than the practical proposition of the man to whom I have alluded, who, it will be recollected, proposed that his majesty, the late king, should be taken off by firing the long gun, which then stood and now stands in the park, at his majesty's carriage, as he should be going, as his present majesty has been to-day, to meet his parliament; and when one not so deeply dipped in blood, or with the intention of dipping himself so deeply, remarked that a great many innocent persons would be killed; he replied, "Oh, that cannot be helped—to accomplish a great good, private suffering is not to be regarded." This is a part of the history of our country, and yet we are to be told it is impossible this can be true, because no man or set of men could believe they could put it even into motion without more adequate means.

If we are to talk on the subject of adequate means, let us turn our eyes to a period not removed to the distance from that of which I had the honour to speak to you, about a quarter of a century, and ask if any man had predicted that the king or the queen of France, or the best blood of that kingdom (mixed with a great deal, undoubtedly, as will always be the case, of the worst blood of it) could have been destroyed by such beginnings as ushered in the French revolution, the destruction of monarchy and all the miseries the world has endured, he would not, to use the language which has been used on the present occasion, have been considered as a man in a waking dream, who ought to be put into safe custody to prevent his doing mischief to others, and to be consigned during his life to a cool cell? and yet these scenes have been exhibited; do not let me be misunderstood; do not let it be supposed that I mean to say that I apprehend the providence of God will ever permit the people of this country so to be demoralized—so to forget all they have derived from their ancestors—all the blessings they now enjoy—all they can hope to enjoy, while they continue loyal, virtuous, and attached to our constitution—that a revolution in the country can be a thing of easy accomplishment, or that it is to be accomplished at all; the charge here is not the having accomplished a revolution; the charge is, in the language of the law, having conspired or imagined to depose his majesty, having formed the intention by these overt acts to force his majesty to change his measures; and these, I tell you, if they are made out to your satisfaction, are acts of high treason, which are imputed by the present indictment.

But let us consider it in another point of view, which has been pressed upon us over and over and over again; the learned counsel, anxious to do the best for the unfortunate men who have solicited their kind aid, tell you, they cannot help thinking they have deceived themselves, and that this story is so absurd that it cannot possibly be believed; what are you to contrast it with? you are to contrast it with a conspiracy to destroy fifteen men, unknown to them, perhaps, even by name; unknown to them by any past wrongs—by any present suffering—by any expectation of future injuries, by a band got together in this way. If I were to be asked, which of the two things, after the experience the world has afforded us, is the more absurd and ridiculous, the least likely to be adopted, and the least likely to be attempted to be carried into execution, an attempt of rebellion, in hopes of bringing about a revolution, or a project of conspiracy, by a certain number of men, in the metropolis of the British empire, going furnished with a hand-grenade—with a butcher's knife, and all this apparatus, to effect the destruction of fifteen such men,—if I were bound upon my oath to say which of the two things I think most probable, until I had the grievous misfortune to hear the testimony of yesterday and to day, I should have said the latter proposition; that any number of British men could be found, in cold blood, to perpetrate such an act, was so much more improbable than any other act I have ever heard stated, that I should have thought even successful rebellion more probable than such an attempt. It is for you to say whether you are satisfied that conspiracy has been entered into, and whether the two prisoners were members of that conspiracy. If you are of opinion it had no other object than to murder these fifteen ministers, and to plunder and burn certain houses, you will acquit the prisoners of high treason; but if you think that it was their intention thus to lay the inception of the work of rebellion, insurrection and the destruction of the constitution, with all its necessary consequences—if you are of opinion, that the destruction of his majesty's ministers was only one step towards the accomplishment of that object, and that the other objects were those for which these mighty preparations were made;—in that case, you will feel it your duty to find the prisoners at the bar guilty of the charge of high treason, for which they at present stand indicted.

Foreman of the Jury.—My lord, we should wish to be accommodated with a copy of the indictment.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—There is one, gentlemen, and annexed to it an abstract of the indictment, that will be perhaps a convenience to you; the counsel for the prisoners have seen it.

Mr. Curwood.—Oh, certainly; there can be no objection to it, it is in the most convenient form, and is a correct abstract.

[The Jury retired at twenty-five minutes past seven o'clock, and returned into Court at five minutes past eight, with their verdict, finding both the prisoners Guilty on the third count, excepting the eighth and tenth overt acts.]

Mr. Curwood.—I believe your lordship was not in court when the prisoner Wilson was arraigned; he pleaded a misnomer. My humble motion is, that Wilson may now be permitted to withdraw that plea, that he may plead de novo to the indictment.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Do you wish that to be done to-night?

Mr. Curwood.—If your lordship pleases.

Mr. Attorney General.—I do not object, my lord.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Let the prisoner Wilson be put to the bar.

[The prisoner Wilson was placed at the bar, and on being addressed as James William Wilson, he answered to that name.]

Mr. Curwood.—It is not necessary to read over the indictment again to the prisoner, as he has heard it.

Wilson.—I withdraw my former plea, and wish to plead guilty to the former indictment.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Prisoner, are you apprised of the consequences of that which you know propose? You propose to withdraw your plea, which would entitle you to be tried by a jury of your country, and to plead guilty; the consequence of that would be, that the Court would be under the necessity of passing upon you the sentence of death: it will be enough for me to know, if that is so, that you do this advisedly, have full knowledge of the fact, and its consequences; and do you, notwithstanding, now desire so to conduct yourself? The question will be again put to you by the officer of the Court, and you will make such plea as you think proper.

Clerk of Arraignment.—James William Wilson; you stand indicted for high treason: you have pleaded not Guilty, and also a misnomer; are you desirous to withdraw that plea?

Wilson.—Yes.

Clerk of Arraignment.—James William Wilson; you stand indicted for high treason; are you guilty, or not guilty?

Wilson.—Guilty.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—The prisoner having pleaded, after full information of his situation, his plea must be recorded.

Mr. Walford.—My lord, on the part of the remaining five prisoners, Harrison, Bradburn, Strange, Cooper, and Gilchrist, I am instructed to make a similar application.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—We had better have them at the bar, perhaps, before you address the Court.

[They were placed at the bar.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Gentlemen of the jury; I am arrived now at a state of things, in which I can give you your option, either to go now, or wait a few minutes; but after the very great fatigue you have undergone, I would not keep you one moment unnecessarily. For the business of to-morrow we had provided other jury, so that we should not have given you the trouble of coming here again till Monday; the course which is now being pursued, will prevent the necessity of your further attendance. One prisoner has applied for permission to plead guilty, and has so pleaded; and it is now prayed that the same course may be taken with respect to the remaining prisoners, and the Attorney-general does not object to that; so that your further attendance will not be required. I lament as much as any man can do, the great expense of time, and the great inconvenience to which you have been subjected; your country is much indebted to you for your services, and you are now dismissed from further attendance.

Mr. Walford.—My lord; these five unhappy men have confided their defence to my learned friend, Mr. Broderick and myself. We have looked into their cases with the most serious attention; we have considered every thing which could be urged in their behalf with inconceivable anxiety, and having done so, we feel that we shall best consult their interests by pursuing the course which has just been pursued in respect of the prisoner Wilson. The fate of their fellow-prisoners acts as a warning to them; they are anxious to throw themselves upon the mercy of our sovereign, who, like his revered father, considers the prerogative of mercy as the best jewel of his Crown. They hope that their contrition will plead for them, and will not plead in vain.

Mr. Broderick.—My lord; being assigned as counsel for the prisoners at the bar, I am most anxious that every thing I could do, as far as my humble judgment enabled me, should advance their interests. I only beg to add, that I fully concur in the application of my learned friend; and I am sure, no man will venture to surmise, that in adopting that course, we do any thing but prefer their interests. They desire to plead guilty, as the only reparation which they can make to the outraged laws of their country—they certainly do not demand mercy—they own they deserve none; but if they should in the depth of mercy find it, we will still hope (though we do not ask a promise that it shall be granted), that, if consistently with justice, mercy can be granted, it will be extended from the Crown, where it is the brightest attribute, even though the person of the sovereign may have been menaced by their crimes.

Mr. Baron Garrow.—Prisoners at the bar; You now stand charged with the high offence of high treason. In the commencement of the proceedings, counsel were assigned to you, to assist you in your defence. The two learned gentlemen, who were so assigned, have stated to the Court, that they have paid, as I am quite sure they have, their best attention (and no better could have been paid) to your cases and that you desire now to withdraw the plea of not guilty, and to plead guilty. I cannot take that from the representation of those learned gentlemen, though I entertain no doubt about it, without being perfectly persuaded from yourselves, personally, that you adopt that as your own act, and the result of your own judgment, with a certainty that the sentence of death must be passed, and with all the consequences that may follow from it: There is no engagement entered into with you; these gentlemen say they do not ask it, nor expect it, but that they for you, and you for yourselves, desire to submit yourselves entirely to the Crown by your plea of guilty. If, having considered all these circumstances, you desire this plea should be recorded, it will be done accordingly.

[The prisoners severally desired to withdraw their former plea; and on its being withdrawn, pleaded guilty.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—The prisoners may retire from the bar.

Strange.—I beg to throw myself on the mercy of my sovereign.

[The prisoners were removed from the bar.]

Mr. Baron Garrow.—As, happily, we have now finished all the trials for high treason, notice must be given to as many of those gentlemen who are within such distance that it may be expected to reach them at so late an hour, that their attendance will not be required; and to such as may happen to be present, I take this opportunity of returning thanks for their very assiduous and painful attention.

[Adjourned to to-morrow morning nine o'clock.]

SESSIONS HOUSE, OLD BAILEY,

FRIDAY, 28TH APRIL, 1820.

Present

The Right Hon. Lord Chief Justice Abbott,
The Right Hon. Lord Chief Justice Dallas,
The Right Hon. Lord Chief Baron Richards,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Best,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Richardson,
The Common Serjeant.

[The prisoners were placed at the bar; and on being severally asked by the clerk of the Arraignment, "What have you to say for yourselves, why the Court should not pass upon you sentence to die, according to law?"—made the following answers:]

Thistlewood.—My lords: I consider that I

* Several unwarrantable and highly indecent reflections upon the conduct and characters of the judges of the court, although the prisoner was permitted to give utterance to them have not had a fair and impartial trial, and that the execution of the law cannot be carried into effect without evident injustice. After my counsel, Mr. Adolphus, had finished his address, I was asked by the Court, if I had anything further to offer? and I then tendered evidence, which had just been obtained, to impeach the credit of the two witnesses for the Crown, Dwyer and Hiden, but I was told it was too late, and these men were represented to the jury as being witnesses of credit. In common justice, my lord, surely it never can be too late for a jury, when investigating a charge which involves the life of a fellow-creature, to receive information in the regular form, previous to their delivering their verdict; but in my case, it was offered before the Solicitor-general rose to reply, and he would have had the opportunity of observing on the testimony; and, my lord, if I had been allowed to call the evidence I tendered, Dwyer would have been proved a villain of the blackest atrocity; for even since my trial, a partner in his guilt, named Arnold, has been capitally convicted at this very bar, for obtaining money under circumstances of an infamous nature.

On the ground, therefore, of a mis-trial, in not being allowed to call witnesses to fact, I humbly submit, that judgment ought not to be passed on me.

Ere the Solicitor-general replied to the address of my counsel, I applied to the Court to hear my witnesses, the Court inhumanly refused; and I am, in consequence, to be consigned to the scaffold. Numerous have been the instances, in which this rule of Court has been infringed.

I had witnesses in court to prove that Dwyer was a villain beyond all example of atrocity. I had witnesses in court to prove that Adams was a notorious swindler, and that Hiden was no better; these were the three witnesses, indeed almost the only ones, against me; but the form and rules of Court must not be infringed upon to save an unfortunate individual from the scaffold. I called those witnesses at the close of Mr. Adolphus's address to the jury, and before the Solicitor-general commenced his reply, but the Court decided that they could not be heard. Some good men have thought, and I have thought so too, that before the jury retired all evidence was in time, for either the prosecutor or the accused, and more particularly for the latter, nay, even before the verdict was given, that evidence could not be considered too late. Alas! such people drew their conclusion from principles of justice only; they never canvassed the rules of Court, which have finally sealed my unhappy doom.

Many people, who are acquainted with the barefaced manner in which I was plundered in the course of this his address, I have expunged.

by my lord Sidmouth, will perhaps imagine that personal motives instigated me to the deed; but I disclaim them. My every principle was for the prosperity of my country; my every feeling, the height of my ambition, was the welfare of my starving countrymen. I keenly felt for their miseries; but when their miseries were laughed at; and when, because they dared to express those miseries, they were cut down by hundreds, inhumanly massacred and trampled upon; when infant babes were sabred in their mothers' arms; nay, when the breast from whence they drew the tide of life was severed from the body which supplied that tide, my feelings became too intense, too excessive for endurance, and I resolved on vengeance; I resolved that the lives of the instigators should be the requiem to the souls of the murdered innocents.

In this mood I met with George Edwards; and if any doubt should remain upon the minds of the public, whether the deed I meditated was virtuous or contrary, the tale I will now relate will convince them, that in attempting to exercise a power which the law had ceased to have, I was only wreaking national vengeance on a set of wretches unworthy the name or character of men. This Edwards, poor and penniless, lived near Pickett-street, in the Strand, sometime ago, without a bed to lie upon, or a chair to sit in. Straw was his resting place; his only covering a blanket. Owing to his bad character and his swindling conduct, he was driven from thence by his landlord. It is not my intention to trace him through his immorality; suffice it to say, that he was in every sense of the word a villain of the deepest atrocity; his landlord refused to give him a character; some short time after this he called upon his landlord again, but, mark the change in his appearance, dressed like a lord, in all the folly of the reigning fashion. He now described himself as the right heir to a German baron, who had been some time dead; that lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth had acknowledged his claims to the title and property; had interfered in his behalf with the German government, and supplied him with money to support his rank in society. From this period I date his career as a government spy.

He got himself an introduction to the Spenceans, by what means I am not aware of, and thus he became acquainted with the reformers in general. When I met with Edwards after the massacre at Manchester, he described himself as very poor; and, after several interviews, he proposed a plan for blowing up the House of Commons. This was not my view; I wished to punish the guilty only, and, therefore, I declined it. He next proposed that we should attack the ministers at the fête given by the Spanish ambassador. This I resolutely opposed, because the innocent would perish with the guilty—besides, there were ladies invited to the entertainment, and I, who am shortly to ascend to the scaffold, shuddered with horror at the idea of that ; a sample of which had previously been given by the agents of government at Manchester, and which the ministers of his majesty applauded. Edwards was ever at invention, and, at length, he proposed attacking them at a cabinet dinner. I asked, where were the means to carry his project into effect? He replied, if I would accede, we should not want for means. He was as good as his word; from him, notwithstanding his apparent penury, proceeded the money provided for purchasing the stores which your lordships have seen produced in court upon my trial. He, who was never possessed of money to pay for a pint of beer, had always plenty to purchase arms or ammunition. Amongst the conspirators he was ever the most active; ever inducing people to join him, up to the last hour ere the undertaking was discovered.

I had witnesses in court who could prove they went to Cato-street by appointment with Edwards, with no other knowledge or motive than that of passing an evening amongst his friends; I could also have proved, that subsequent to the fatal transaction, when we met in Holborn, he endeavoured to induce two or three of my companions to set fire to houses and buildings in various parts of the metropolis; I could prove that, subsequent to that, again he endeavoured to induce men to throw hand-grenades into the carriages of ministers as they passed through the streets; and yet this man, the contriver, the instigator, the intrapper, is screened from justice and from exposure, by those very men who seek vengeance against the victims of his and their villainy. To the attorney and solicitor general I cannot impute the clearest motives; their object seems to me to have been rather to obtain a verdict against me, than to obtain a full and fair exposition of the whole affair since its commencement. If their object was justice alone, why not bring forward Edwards as a witness, if not as an accomplice; but no, they knew that by keeping Edwards in the background, my proofs, aye, my incontrovertible proofs, of his being a hired spy, the suggester and promoter, must, according to the rules of Court, also be excluded.

Edwards and his accomplices arranged matters in such a manner as that his services might be dispensed with on the trial, and thus were the jury cut off from every chance of ascertaining the real truth. Adams, Hiden, and Dwyer were the agents of Edwards, and, truly, he made a most admirable choice, for their invention seems to be inexhaustible. With respect to the immorality of our project, I will just observe, that the assassination of a tyrant has always been deemed a meritorious action; Brutus and Cassius were lauded to the very skies for slaying Cæsar; indeed, when any man, or any set of men, place themselves above the laws of their country, there is no other means of bringing them to justice than through the arm of a private individual. If the laws are not strong enough to prevent them from murdering the community, it becomes the duty of every member of that community to rid his country of its oppressors.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Prisoner, while you have been expressing yourself in the way you have towards us who are here present, we have not thought it right to interpose, but we cannot allow a person, standing even in your situation, to justify assassination and murder.

Thistlewood.—I have just done, my lord. High Treason was committed against the people at Manchester, but justice was closed against the mutilated, the maimed, and the friends of those who were upon that occasion indiscriminately massacred. The prince, by the advice of his ministers, thanked the murderers, still reeking in the gore of their hapless victims. If one spark of honour, if one spark of independence, still glimmered in the breast of Englishmen, they would have rose to a man; insurrection then became a public duty, and the blood of the victims should have been the watch-word to vengeance on their murderers.—

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—We cannot allow this.

Thistlewood.—I have but a few lines more. The banner of independence should have floated in the gale that brought their wrongs and their sufferings to the metropolis; such, however, was not the case; Albion is still in the chains of slavery; I quit it without regret; I shall soon be consigned to the grave, my body will be immured beneath the soil whereon I first drew breath. My only sorrow is, that the soil should be a theatre for slaves, for cowards, for despots. My motives, I doubt not, will hereafter be justly appreciated; I will therefore now conclude by stating, that I shall consider myself as murdered, if I am to be executed on the verdict obtained against me, by the refusal of the Court to hear my evidence. I could have proved Dwyer to be a villain of the blackest dye, for since my trial, an accomplice of his, named Arnold, has been capitally convicted at this very bar, for obtaining money under circumstances of an infamous nature.

I seek not pity; I demand but justice; I have not had a fair trial, and upon that ground I protest that judgment ought not to be passed against me.

Davidson.—My Lord;—The first thing I have to say for myself is this; I do entirely protest against the proceedings on the trial. I always understood that, in a court of justice, where a man stands indicted for his life, the balances of justice ought to be fairly held by those who ought to have exhibited justice to him who stands there, helpless as it were, for I am not allowed to contradict the evidence till such time as it has made an impression upon the hearts of those gentlemen in the box.

When I had that opportunity I made it as plain as I could; but, alas! what effect had it all; the attorney-general rose as a sweeping flood, and overturned what I had fairly said; and I appeal to any man that was in court, whether, in the summing up of the evidence, Judge Garrow did justice to me, as a prisoner at the bar. Was he not inveterate against me? did he not influence the minds of the jurymen, and almost insist upon their pronouncing me guilty? did any person identify me to be the identical person except those officers who, we all know, and every Englishman must know, have been always instrumental to the death of innocent men. I have never been in a public life. I appeal to all those gentlemen, whether I have ever engaged in any plot, if I had fifty lives, and they were wanting for the public good, they should have them; and if it were my blood, they should take every drop, and I would stand here while they took it, and fall a victim to my enemies; but in what manner is it I could ever be guilty of high treason? it was never pretended I had ever said any thing, directly or indirectly; I must have been a silent spectator from the nature of my colour. I should have been immediately remarked if I had taken an active part. I have got a deal to say for myself where I feel it to be proper; but there is not one single witness has ever said that I said any thing, consequently I could not be a person that was in the conspiracy; they have said, only that there was a man of colour, and, unfortunately, I was caught near the spot, and was fixed on by them; but still justice ought to be done to every man, and especially where it is done in the revered name of British justice.

In regard to the blunderbuss, Mr. Aldous must be confused; for I told him, that I pawned it for a friend, and when I fetched the blunderbuss from the place where I had pawned it, I did it at the desire of Edwards. Mr. Edwards received it from me. Mr. Edwards gave me the money to get it out of pawn; and I stand here and say, before God, that I did not know what it was fetched for.

I was found with a sword in my hand; I have told the Court how I came by that sword; but I protest on my soul, as I shall stand before God, that I never made a blow at any man, or discharged a blunderbuss at any man. As to Munday, a man who has come here merely for the hire for his day's work, as a witness against me, who has come as to a common day's work, to take a man's life away, I declare I never had a pistol in my possession in my life. This man says he saw me with a long sword; on one occasion he has stated that, and on another omitted it; but suppose I was found with a sword in my hand, who can prove that I meant to overturn the government? who can prove that I meant to assassinate the ministers? who can prove that I meant to lay my hand on my sovereign? Is my character so black as for it to be said in this country, or where I have travelled, that I am an assassin or a murderer? I appeal to every man who knows me, whether I am a man of that character or stamp directly or indirectly, to do such a thing; but even if the sword was in my hand; and my intention was even to join with those people, I do not see that it was a conspiracy against the lives of any ministers or of the king himself; because in the passages of Magna Charta, when king John granted that charter, the passage runs in this form; that the people should choose twenty-five barons from among them, with an intent that those twenty-five barons shall see that the acts of this charter are not violated by his majesty or any of his ministers; and if any of them be violated by the king or his ministers, four of those barons shall go and insist on redress; and if redress is not given within twenty-five days, they are to return and compel them to give it—how? with empty hands? no; with arms to stand and claim their rights as Englishmen; and if every Englishman felt as I do, they would always do that. But it goes on further to say; and if redress be not forthwith given, they shall seize on his revenues and his castles, and place such persons in his castles as will see and observe the duties imposed upon him by the barons. And our history goes on further to say, that when another of their majesties the kings of England tried to infringe upon those rights, the people armed, and told him that if he did not give them the privileges of Englishmen, they would compel him by the point of the sword; that is language never used by me, or those with whom I acted, and yet those persons were not considered as beneath the character of Englishmen, and to be condemned to death. Would you not rather govern a country of spirited men, than cowards? Another sovereign was threatened, and his minister taken before his face, and executed; a few years after that he collected himself, and after packing a parliament, he brought this matter before the parliament, and charged those persons as conspirators; but there was that spirit in the heart of every Englishman, though he had packed them, what did they answer him? That the people who had so done, had deserved more his thanks than his enmity, for they had destroyed that which would have destroyed thousands of men, and which had destroyed his honour, his wealth, and his revenues, and formed a ground for war between the king and his subjects, and without the life of that man, peace could never have been made between him and his subjects; and having done that, did he catch up a number of poor harmless individuals, as we are? no; but a few years after that, he again took up these measures, and what was the consequence? he was dethroned; but I solemnly declare, that I knew of no intention to dethrone the king; I was entrapped; I am ashamed to say I was entrapped; a man of my spirit to be entrapped by such a scoundrel as Mr. Goldsworthy, to get me to the Horse and Groom just at that time:

I did not know at that time that he knew Edwards; and when, as I was going away, there was a cry of "stop thief" behind me, I felt that an indignity, and turned round to resent it; but this man swears falsely, for I never struck at any of them; they have come forward to swear my life away on this charge, and I now tender my life to your service; I can die but once in this world, and the only regret left is, that I have a large family of small children, and when I think of that, it unmans me, and I shall say no more.

Jags.—I have got but very little to say for myself, for you will not allow me to speak; if Mr. Edwards had not got acquainted with me, when I kept the coffee-house, I never should have been here; he came to my house, and got acquainted with me; unfortunately I could not get on with my business, and get a living for my family; and early in January, I met him in Smithfield, and he went and gave me victuals and drink; I got acquainted with him through that, and he bought me things, and gave me a great many things; and in my anxiety of mind, for I could not keep my family, it was, that I was induced for the sake of these things, to keep company with him, and it is through him I shall lose my life; I do not mind dying, if you will let that man come forward, and die with me; he was the instigator and the author of all the atrocity I was going to commit. The murdering his majesty's ministers, I admit, was a disgrace to human nature; but those ministers meet and conspire together, and pass laws to starve me and my family and my fellow-countrymen; if I was going to assassinate those ministers, it is not so bad as starvation, in my opinion, my lord.

There was a meeting, if you recollect, called at Manchester, under the protection of the great charter of England, which our forefathers bled and fought for, and made king John sign in the open air; those men were met under the protection of that law, to oblige parliament to give them their rights. My lord, previous to the meeting, the Manchester yeomanry cavalry carried their swords to the cutlers to be ground; for my own part, I see no harm in grinding swords, but they cut down unarmed men, women, and children; that was a disgrace to the name and character of Englishmen; I carried a sword to be ground, but I never used it; I hope my children will live to see the day that there will be justice administered in the country; that they all will be freemen, and live like men; I had rather die like a man, than live like a slave; I am sorry I have not got abilities to address you, but I have not, and therefore I must withdraw.

Brant.—Why, my lord and gentlemen, I am precluded from saying much, for I intended to have committed my short defence to paper; but as I had not an opportunity of pen, ink and paper, I am precluded from so doing. As such, I shall state shortly what I think concerns my life. I shall commence with the remarks which I made to the jury when I was being tried, and which has been so ably knocked down by the learned Solicitor-general, who appears by his sophisticated eloquence to be capable to make even crime a virtue. I then entered into a detail of the character of Mr. Adams, and the sort of enmity he had to me, which should induce him to deprive my wife, of a husband, and my children of a father. I next adverted to the character of Edwards, who was the man who once before laid a trap for me, which I avoided, and afterwards entrapped me: he laid a trap for me when there was a dinner at the earl of Westmoreland's; he said, he had been watching the earl of Westmoreland when there was a dinner there, and he mustered his men, but there were not enough, and so he would not betray them. There is no doubt Mr. Hiden was in this plot, for he told me of it at the Scotch Arms, in Round-court; and of all the nefarious practices that ever were carried on in the known world by any government, or any set of men, there never was any thing so villainous in this world as that of the gentlemen sitting round there to carry on the nefarious practices on the part of the evidences, as well as in keeping Edwards in the back-ground; this I protest, and I protest, and will again, that there is no man on the terrestrial globe who ought to care aught for his life if it is to be sacrificed in liberty's cause. When I look at that sword of justice, and those tablets by the side of it, it makes every drop of blood boil within me, when I hear a man get up and defend the villain who has come up to swear my life away. It can be proved by my wife, and people in my house, that I never went after him. Can he say, when he sent letters to me to call upon him, did I ever call upon him? No; the villain wanted me to go to him in prison, and then he would have got me in I suppose; but the moment he gets out, he comes to me again, and he is furnished with arms, with a brass-barrelled pistol, and a blunderbuss, which he has not stated here; he said a sword was not sufficient for him; the sword belonged to Edwards, and he had it for the situation he volunteered to in lord Harrowby's house. This is the villain who has entrapped me, though the Solicitor-general stated so ably that I was a liar and a villain, and that I could not prove these facts; when men of character at the West-end of the town, whom he has been in the habit of calling upon, know them well. He got me into it, because he knew I was a man of principle; he knew I was a man of principle, and that if I said, I will put a tyrant out of the world, I would do it, or perish. If this is a crime, let me die here instantly; I have no objection, not the least. But that, even after I went before the privy council, had not I an offer to become a villain then? might not I have turned against these people, and others that are not taken? might not I, if I was a villain in nature—but never shall it be said that ever I betrayed a man.

Now, gentlemen, respecting what the solicitor-general stated, that I was a liar in saying what I did, for that it was not the fact. I say this man can be brought forward now; that I can bring forward a man of the name of Dowling, a man of unimpeached character, who went in company with him and Mr. Thistlewood and Edwards, to the Cross Keys, at the end of Drury-lane; he fetched out this man, with not a halfpenny in his pocket, and took him into the public-house, and treated him; but I would wish to observe, while Mr. Thistlewood and this man and Edwards were together, while I was gone out, he made an observation which this man had art enough to see through; he said, "If I had a hundred such men as you, I could do more good for this country than the duke of Wellington with an hundred thousand men;" he laughed at it, and asked him what he meant; he said, "If I see you again, I will make a man of you." He treated him with beef steaks and rum; and he called upon me two days afterwards to go to this man again; and he said to me, "that man will do very well;" but this man saw through him, and he said, "I know he is a villain; I do not like the appearance of him at all; and as to his saying he has got secret political friends that will advance him money, and so on; how do you know but he is receiving money from the government;" however he preyed on my credulity; I did not see him in that light then, which I have since I have been in prison, though I never attempted to vilify any man; the solicitor-general says I spoke falsely, and that I cannot prove this respecting Adams. It can be proved that he is as big a rogue as ever lived.

Gentlemen, I should like to know what Christianity will receive from being so ably defended by the solicitor-general. This man acknowledged himself he had been an infidel till the 24th of February, till he had a noose about his neck, and that God Almighty then strengthened his mind to take my life away. Is this christian repentance? if it is, never let me embrace it; I have a different idea of Christianity. I believe, were I guilty of that, my Creator never would suffer me to approach him; and I consider that I am right. This villain, as I say, has watched every opportunity; he has come to me in the greatest distress, and begged a shilling of me, as I was a little better off than himself, though not much, to get his family a supper, and now he comes forward to this bar and swears my life away. Is this, gentlemen, the evidence to be taken in a court of justice, to take the lives of a number of men: more I did expect; but as I understand a number of my fellow prisoners are suffered to plead guilty, and so I suppose there will not be quite so many sacrificed.

Now, gentlemen, I will go to my apprentice. The learned solicitor-general likewise observed, what a pure evidence he was, and an evidence that no one could doubt. I can prove him, and I have before, to be a villain in nature, though young; and had it not been for his having a table of mine regularly to go to, when I did not sometimes earn a pound a-week to support my family, that villain would have been transported before now, for he went about thieving at nights——

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—We cannot hear, now, the character of a person who has been examined at this bar arraigned in this way; if he had been guilty of any offence he might have been tried for it.

Brunt.—I will state nothing but facts; I have had a steel in my hand that he stole; he sold it for 3s. 6d. and cheated the boys who stole it with him; am I to harbour this in my mind?——

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—If there is any thing in it, it ought to have been proved on the trial.

Brunt.—My lord, there are a number of witnesses I could call, to shew the guilt of this Edwards. There was a witness I was willing to call, to prove that he wanted to sell something in Warwick-street, in order to use the money in buying these arms—why have you not brought that person forwards? he was subpoenaed by the Crown, but they would not call him; and so then I was told, these witnesses could not come forward on our parts at the trial; but he wanted to get money to purchase these grenades and fire-balls, which he well understood, for he said he had had a college education; for my part, I know no more about a fire-ball, I know no more about those things than a child unborn, and no man can say, from the evidence, that I made any of them. Adams says, Edwards made the fire-balls and the fuses, and I am to suffer for what he has done. I must confess, and I will confess, and I wish it to go abroad to the world, that I have an antipathy to a man whom I consider as an enemy to my country; that I possess a general feeling for those termed the lower orders, who are the stability of my country; that I regard an industrious man, a moral man; and when I see a man, or a set of men, such as my lord Sidmouth or my lord Castlereagh, who have been the cause of millions being murdered, and tens of thousands starved to death, that I have an antipathy against those men; but if I conspired to put them out of the world, is that high treason? I never did agree, and Adams has acknowledged at the bar, that when it was proposed to make an attack on London, while the king's funeral was carrying on, I rejected it, and said, nothing short of attacking the cabinet, or some of the ministers, would satisfy me—this I acknowledge I agreed to; but for a verdict to be returned against me, that I conspired to depose his majesty, that I conspired and intended to levy war, is untrue. I never did; and here I must certainly make an appeal to the learned judge who tried me, and that is, respecting a question that was put by one of the jurymen, I believe a gentleman by the name of Mr. Goodchild : if this is law, certainly I am a very illiterate character, I know nothing of law ; but I should wish to know from the gentlemen who sit and stand round me, is this law ? My lord, he stated it in these words. " My lord, I wish to be informed on a point of law, is arming and resisting the civil power, levying war." To which the learned judge answered, " Yes." If this is law, gentlemen, certainly I am guilty—I certainly am guilty, if this is law ; but it is law only in my case. Gentlemen, it is not law I am well convinced, ignorant as I am ; it is not law I am certain ; and as for the whole course of this evidence, it has never come out that ever I was seen by the soldiers, or that ever I was recognized by the officers. When the officers came, being, as I acknowledge I was, in the place, I made the best of my way I could ; but to say I have been guilty of high treason, I have been guilty of no such thing ; and I will not go out of the world with the stigma of its being said, that I have been a traitor to my country and my king. Say I was an enemy to lord Castlereagh and lord Sidmouth, and the rest of the cabinet, but do not heap upon my head, that I am a traitor to my king or my country. I never suffered any man to run on against my sovereign in my life, and why should high treason be reckoned to me ! If any man has done a thing of that sort, let him be punished for it ; but I should not have been here on that charge. Let me be tried for murder, if I have committed it ; but I am no traitor—I am no enemy to my king. I have a love to my king and country ; but I am an enemy to the boroughmongering faction, that destroys the vitals of my country ; but to my king and my country I am a loyal and dutiful subject. I consider the king equally enslaved as the people, by those very men ; if you mean to say the sovereignty of the people is vested in the boroughmongering faction, then I am guilty of high treason ; but if you do away with that, the verdict ought to be set aside.

Now I will go a little further ; when the jury were called back, the learned judge will admit this I am sure, whether it might be that he did not hear I will not say, I will not impute wrong motives to the judge, whether he did not hear the question I cannot tell, but I will presume to say this, that two of the learned judges, the one on his right and the other on his left, immediately rose from their seats, and whispered to the learned judge that tried me. I have not the pleasure to know his name, nor is that material, but the jury were called back, and he wished the gentleman to repeat the question again, at which he was very confused, as, I dare say, a man of common capacity in a crowded court is, and he may make an error ; he begged the judge's pardon for intruding, but he considered it a duty to put the question to the judge ; and the learned judge said, the conspiring and aiming to depose the king, was a levying of war. This is a different question from that put by the jury—this is a very pretty perversion of justice—I maintain, if I were tried again by an honest jury, an honest set of men, give me justice, and there is no man on the face of the earth can prove me to be a traitor. Even Adams acknowledged that the moment Ings and I came into the room, after we had heard the proposal of Harrison, we said no, we would have nothing to do with it, that nothing would do but putting those obnoxious characters out of the way—I mean obnoxious to us, not to you, gentlemen, to the man who has nobody to look up to to protect him, and who, when he petitions and cries for bread for his family, can get none. I have been in the habit of earning three or four pounds a-week, and then I never troubled myself about government ; but when I came to earn, perhaps, not ten shillings, I began to inquire why I had a right to be starved ; the Creator of the world, who made the world, gave every man a right to live in it ; and why it was taken from the people, and I and thousands more should be starved, why men who toiled should not enjoy a little, and why millions should toil and some few should dissipate it ; and this brought me to the conclusion of being an enemy to those men. After the massacre of Manchester, but not before, when I considered there was not sufficient, with heaping up all the treasure in the country, to relieve the country, but that these men were starving them to death, literally starving them to death, and that yet they were not satisfied, but they must call in ruffians, not men, to murder them, for I am a descendant of the ancient Britons. I thought nothing could be too bad for those men, and there would be men in the country who would come forward and join me ; Edwards told me he had got plenty, and I was willing to be one ; I am satisfied nothing can be done in this country if men are afraid of their lives. I do not mean to say that I was not willing to die in it—I was willing to do even murder in liberty's cause ; and I would have died there upon the spot, if my lord Sidmouth and lord Castlereagh had come to take me, they should not have had me ; but when I heard the man say at the door, the soldiers are coming, I made the best of my way off ; I found the thing could not be done then, and now I am indicted for high treason. If resisting the police, if resisting a man that came into the room and stood forward, as I declare a man did to this man (Thistlewood), and said, if you make any resistance I will blow your brains out, is treason, where is the man that can withhold his arm then ? Is not my life as dear to me as a peace officer's life ? certainly ; had the man come as a soldier, I should have said, he has sworn allegiance to the king, and it is my duty to obey him ; but when a man comes threatening me with authority, without shewing a warrant, and threatening to kill me, here is an arm that, while there is a nerve in it, shall resist. This is the extent of my guilt, but why say I am guilty of conspiring to levy war or depose the king? I have never been guilty of any thing of the sort.

Now, gentlemen, on the other hand, as I am here for the last time of declaring the truth which I know, I will declare another fact respecting the two Monuments, upon whom the learned solicitor-general did not forget to pass the highest encomiums for gravity; their appearance standing up there at that bar; they were such pure witnesses that no man in his senses could doubt that they were very good indeed; these two witnesses came forward here to swear the lives of eleven individuals here, and I know they have rehearsed their evidence as common as they do a new piece at the theatre; these men have been in the habit of meeting twice a-week in the Tower; I know they have met twice a-week; I do not even know their christian names, but I believe they were John and Thomas; the one who is in custody said to me at Cold-bath-fields, and at Whitehall, at the Treasury, that he knew me, and why did not I tell him something; I told him for certain reasons, namely, because I did not know myself; he says at this bar he was instigated by fear to come; and he said to me in the room, "why did not you tell me what was going to be done, and I would have brought my brother;" then when he sees me at Cold-bath-fields, he says, why did not you tell him more? and I said, because I knew nothing more. Then my lord Sidmouth, who has a very great feeling to us, or the public in general, sends his brother to him; but, my lord, I have a previous remark to make—my lord Sidmouth told him, in the first instance, "I will be a friend to you;" that would enliven him very much, and if he could have sworn all the Englishmen's lives away that were upon the earth, he would have done it; and as a small memorandum, says he, he sent my mother a pound note, as she was very much disturbed; then this very man, who is coming as an evidence against us, goes twice a-week to the Tower, and, because his brother knows nothing there, he tells him something; they rehearsed together, and they do not deviate a jot or a tittle; how can they, till one of them comes to speak of what passed in the room, and then the brother was not there; this is admitted to be a very excellent witness; it must be famous evidence to take my life upon, when they met twice a-week for two or three months, to compare their evidence, in order to take my life; he swears, that I said I would sooner perish myself than the cause should be dropped; and Adams swears, that I said if there were only six or eight I would be one. To take my life away on such evidence cannot be justice.

I expect to go out of the world shortly; I care not how soon it is, for I shall die with the same sentiment that I stand here; I know that injustice is done me, and that I have an undoubted right, as an Englishman, to demand justice in this Court; I never conspired, and no man can be found, unless he is a villain and a traitor, to say that I conspired to depose my sovereign, or that I conspired to levy war, unless therrepulsing the police officers is treason; if you call that treason, I am guilty of treason; and I admit that I and others have agreed to attempt that which I wish we had done; for if I could have seen some of those men put out of the way, I should have thought the country would have been highly compensated, for I think it is what they merit, I actually think it is what they merit; I think the circular issued by lord Sidmouth was nothing but a thing sent out to instigate the cavalry to murder those men at Manchester; and if a man murders my brother I have a right to murder him. What does the scripture say, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." I have no private enmity against any gentlemen in the country; it was for the public good that I came forward, and I would have gone through with it. I declare, at the hazard of my life, which I cared nothing for, but the king's name was never called in question where I was; and as to the attempt to find me guilty of conspiring to depose his majesty, or to levy war against him, I am not guilty; the verdict ought to be set aside. Try me for murder—hang me—draw me—quarter me—but let me have justice, that is all I have to say.

Tidd.—My lords and gentlemen, being only found guilty so late last night, I have not had an opportunity to make up any defence; for my own part, I am a very indifferent orator, or perhaps I might have brought in something more satisfactory; but all I can say is this, that I do positively say, that every evidence that came against me swore falsely, exclusive of that gentleman there, captain Fitzclarence, and he stated, that he did not know that I shot at him; but sooner than I would shoot at that gentleman, as a private gentleman, I would shoot my own father. I cannot say further, gentleman, for I am not prepared.

Wilson.—Gentlemen, I am not gifted with a tongue much to say much, but I certainly have been drawn into this by Hiden.

Harrison.—They were all false witnesses; they have all sworn falsely against me.

Bradburn.—My lords and gentlemen, the evidence that Adams has given against me I consider is not right.

Strange.—I have only thus much to say, gentlemen, that as to the evidence that Mr. Brunt's apprentice, Joseph Hale, and likewise Mr. Adams gave against me, I declare solemnly to God, before whom I now stand, and the gentlemen round, they are both perjured villains.

Gilchrist.—What I shall say I will say as in the presence of my God, and before you. I knew nothing of it till about four o'clock in the afternoon; I was going to look for work;

I had neither money nor bread, so I met with a man who told me to come to the Horse and Groom, that they were going to have a supper there. I was not a man that suffered myself to be among radicals, but I had nothing to eat, and absent from my friends, and none to help me. I went to the place appointed, as I have stated to my Attorney, and likewise stated to my lord Sidmouth, at six o'clock at night; I cannot cut it short; I must tell the truth; I went to the place at six o'clock at night, and met four or five men whom I did not know, but Charles Cooper. I borrowed a halfpenny, and bought some bread at a shop; with that I followed Hiden; I was a few yards behind him in going to this shop; before I could get a penn'orth of bread they were away from me; I followed them on, not knowing what I was going about; as my God hears me that is true, and I never wish to come out of this place if I say any thing false. I went on, not knowing what I was going about, and when I went up stairs, in a very little time came in bread and cheese; I took an old sword and hacked it down; the men came round seemingly as hungry as I was, and I never asked, 'till near about the conclusion that the officers came, the meaning of those arms; this very man that came here was the very man that answered me first; he says, you shall know by and by; there is one that we expect to come; says I, I am not willing to stop here; says he, ranging the swords, any man that shall go out here I will run him through. I immediately, in a manner, went backwards from the end of the table, stepping towards this little man, and I was then going to make an excuse to get away out of this company, when up came an officer, and the words that he said were, "Lay down your arms." I heard no more; I was confounded. I knew by his neckcloth, and the appearance of a gentleman, that it was my duty to surrender myself. I never had any thing in my hand, but that sword that I cut down the loaves with, and I stand here convicted of high treason. I served my king and my country twelve years, and this is the recompense; O God! I have nothing more to say.

Cooper.—My lord, I have very little to say; I am brought in here unexpectedly this morning; I did not expect to be called up so soon; in the first place, they have called no evidence, but they convict me of high treason, I have been given to understand. I consider, my lord, there is no evidence to convict me of high treason; I am certain of that. It was my intention to say more, but it seems the desire of my friends, that I should say nothing more; but I consider myself a voluntary exile for the good of my friends.

Gilchrist.—I would volunteer myself, if my life would save another man's. I never knew this man (Cooper) till I came into this room, but with compassion I will resign myself, if it is to save another man's life. I am innocent; indeed I never meant to take any man's life.

SENTENCE.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Arthur Thistlewood, William Davidson, James Ings, Thomas Brunt, William Tidd,—you have severally been tried and found guilty upon an indictment charging you, together with others, with the crime of high treason, in compassing and imagining to levy war against his majesty, in order to compel him to change his measures and councils.

John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, Charles Cooper,—you being each persons charged with the same offence, by the same indictment, originally pleaded Not Guilty to that indictment, but after the trial and conviction of the five persons first indicted, you desired to be allowed to withdraw those pleas of Not Guilty, and to plead guilty to the charge of treason imputed to you by that indictment, and you were permitted so to do.

James William Wilson, you having been charged with the same offence, pleaded to that indictment a mistake in your name—of that plea you had the benefit, but it was a benefit that could not long be of any avail; another indictment for the same offence was preferred against you, and to that indictment you, after the trial of the five persons whom I first named, have also thought proper to plead guilty.

You, therefore, James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper, have thought fit voluntarily to acknowledge the crime with which you are charged, and to cast yourselves upon the mercy of your sovereign. If any of you shall have your life spared, which as to some of you I trust may be the case, I hope you will always bear in your minds, that you owe that life to the benignity of your sovereign—to his merciful disposition, aided and seconded by the merciful disposition also, of those very persons whom you had doomed to a violent and sudden death.

One of you (Arthur Thistlewood) has now complained, that at your trial, you proposed to call certain witnesses, whom the court refused to hear. It is true that you did request permission to call a person with a view of impugning the testimony of a witness of the name of Dwyer, and no other, as far as I then understood; the learned counsel, whose assistance you have had, previously called witnesses for the same purpose; it could not be allowed to you, according to the ordinary course in which justice has been administered in this country for ages, at that time to adduce such evidence; nor, indeed, could it have availed any thing, if you had been allowed so to do, because your case did not depend upon the testimony of that witness alone; and three several verdicts pronounced upon the same conspiracy, by juries before whom that witness Dwyer was not examined, have shown that the testimony of that person was not necessary to establish the conspiracy, or to prove the guilt of any of those concerned.

Some of you have thought fit to say much of a person who has not appeared as a witness upon this occasion. We proceed only upon the evidence that is laid before us; of that person, therefore, to whom you have alluded, or of his actings, we have had little proof; upon the testimony, however, that was adduced against you, there was abundance to satisfy the juries of your guilt, and that each of you voluntarily took a most active part in the treason.—From all that has appeared in the course of these trials—from much that has been now urged by many of you, the Court has plain reason to see that you did not embark in this most wicked design, till you had first suffered your minds to be corrupted and enflamed by those seditious and irreligious publications with which, unhappily for this country, the press has so long teemed. Your case shows that which indeed, even without evidence, may in the case of all great crimes be reasonably presumed, that no man wholly forgets his duty to his king, or his duty to his neighbour, until he has put from his thoughts the fear of God and a future state. I make not these remarks to aggravate your guilt, or to enhance the sufferings of your present situation; I make them as a warning to all those who may hear of your unfortunate end, that they may be taught by your example to avoid those dangerous instruments of seduction, by which the heart of man is influenced to every evil deed, and is withdrawn from every moral and proper sentiment.

The treason with which you were charged, and of which you have been found guilty, was that of compassing and imagining to levy war against his majesty, for the purpose of compelling him to change his measures and councils. The assassination of those persons by whom the affairs of his government were at that time, and had for some time before, been administered, was intended by you as the first, but by no means the only step to be taken; many of you hoped, that at that same instant, other persons, connected with yourselves and acquainted with your designs, would make violent attempts in other parts of this great metropolis, to seize arms and ammunition, and who were to be joined by you after you should have accomplished that abominable purpose. You vainly hoped that there were in this great town, thousands and tens of thousands ready to join you in your purpose of mischief and destruction, and to enable you to assume the whole government of this country into your own hands. To the proof of that intention on your part, the evidence of all the witnesses concurs; and the gentlemen of the jury by whom you were tried, must have been satisfied that the assassination of his majesty's ministers was a part only of the purpose which you had contemplated.

You have endeavoured now to complain of the testimony of some of those persons who were examined as witnesses against you; several of them were accomplices in your guilt. It has happened to you on the present occasion as to many others before you, that the principal instruments by which you are brought to justice, are persons who have partaken in your own guilty design. I trust that that circumstance will have its due weight in the consideration of all who shall become acquainted with your situation, and with the circumstances of the trials, and that they will ever, for the sake of their own personal safety, if they cannot be restrained by any other consideration, be induced to abstain from those evil combinations and confederacies which have brought you into the melancholy situation in which you now stand. The intention to assassinate has been now avowed by some of you; an intention to which, all that we had ever heard of, before we became acquainted with your case, bears no comparison. That individuals, laying aside the national character, should meet and assemble to destroy the lives, in cold blood, of fifteen persons unknown to them, except by public character, is without example in the history of this country, and I hope will remain without a parallel in future times.

It now only remains for me to pass upon you the awful judgment of the law; but before I do so, let me exhort you to employ the time that may yet be left to you, in endeavouring to obtain mercy from that Almighty Power whom you have so deeply offended; the mercy of Heaven may be obtained by all who will duly seek it; but it must be sought in penitence and in prayer, sorrow for your crime, and prayer to the Almighty for mercy, through the merits of our Redeemer. Whether the exhortation that I have offered to you will be by you received and acted upon, it is not for me to say; but I again, once more, solemnly intreat you not to suffer your eternal happiness to be lost by a perseverance in that hardness of heart which too many of you have exhibited even in this place at this time. Repent, I exhort you—repent, and obtain the mercy of that God whom you have offended. The judgment of the law is, that you, and each of you, be taken from hence to the gaol from whence you came, and that you be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, and there be hanged by the neck until you be dead; and that afterwards your heads be severed from your bodies, and your bodies divided into four quarters, be disposed of as his majesty shall direct, and may the God of mercy have mercy upon your souls!

Tidd.—The irons I have got on are so heavy, that I cannot step; my legs are very tender, they have been very bad for some time.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—I have no doubt the keeper of Newgate will do every thing in his power to contribute to your ease, so far as it can be done with safety.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, an order was made three days ago,* directing Mr.

* See the proceedings at the commencement and conclusion of the trial of John Thomas Brunt supra.

Clement, the proprietor of the Observer, to attend here this day at nine o'clock, to show if he could give any reason why he had published the trial of Thistlewood and the trial of Ings, notwithstanding the injunction of your lordship. I have an affidavit of the service of that order.

[William Innell Clement was called, but did not answer.]

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Let the affidavit of service be read.

[The affidavit of Elijah Litchfield was read, stating, that he had, on the 26th instant, served the order of this Court above referred to, upon William Innell Clement, by delivering it to a servant of Clement, at the house of Clement, No. 169, in the Strand, at the same time showing to the servant the original order.

The order was read, directing William Innell Clement, the printer, publisher, and proprietor of a certain newspaper, called the Observer, to attend this Court this morning at the hour of nine precisely, to answer for unlawfully and contemptuously printing and publishing in the said newspaper, the trials of Arthur Thistlewood and James Ings, for high treason, pending the proceedings against John Thomas Brunt and others, who were included in the same indictment with the said Arthur Thistlewood and James Ings, for the same high treasons, contrary to the order of this Court and to the obstruction of public justice.]

Mr. Attorney General.—My lord, I have also an affidavit, which will satisfy your lordship of the extent of this publication; an affidavit of the register of newspapers in the Stamp-office, and also another person, that on the 15th day of April instant, there were supplied at the Stamp-office, for the use of the Observer-newspaper, published by William Innell Clement, of No. 169, Strand, in the said county of Middlesex, fifteen thousand stamps; and on the 21st instant, three thousand stamps, for the same paper; and on the 26th instant, five thousand stamps for the same paper, making a total of twenty-three thousand. The other deponent then states, that he has for the last six months supplied ten thousand stamps every week for the said Observer-newspaper; so that it appears that during the last week, in consequence of the publication of these trials, they had stamps to the extent of twenty-three thousand. This Sunday newspaper was published in a double sheet, one sheet containing the trial of Thistlewood, and the greater part of the other occupied by the trial of Ings; and in this very paper, as I have stated to the Court, there is a notice given by the lord chief justice on the first day, on the commencement of the trial, interdicting the publication of these trials, so that this person has knowingly published this against the express injunction of the Court.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—Is the newspaper a weekly paper?

Mr. Attorney General.—Yes, my lord; the price paid for the two sheets by the person who purchased it, who was a newsman, was a shilling; the price paid by the public is sevenpence for each sheet.

It will be in the recollection of your lordship, that at the request of the prisoner's counsel, the witnesses for the prosecution were desired to withdraw from the court, in order that they might not be apprised of what was passing during the examination of others; and undoubtedly your lordship's order was intended more for the benefit of the prisoners than otherwise, that the subsequent juries might come, with as little knowledge as possible of what had passed, to the consideration of the cases they were to try.

Lord Chief Justice Abbott.—No person can rationally doubt that the publication which has been complained of, manifestly tended to obstruct the course of public justice; it is extremely desirable that all the gentlemen who may be assembled as jurymen to serve on any trial should come with minds as little influenced as possible by any thing that may have taken place on any former trial. It was requested by the learned counsel for the prisoners, that the witnesses to be examined on the part of the Crown at the first trial should be examined separately, that no one should know what another had said; but by the publication of what had been said on any one of the trials, the persons summoned as witnesses were enabled to obtain that knowledge previously to a future trial, which it was the proper desire of those who were intrusted with the interests of the prisoners to prevent their obtaining. The mischievous tendency of such publications cannot, as I have already said, be doubted by any mind; the Court thought it right before the first trial was begun, to express in the strongest terms its opinion as to the impropriety of any such publication, and to admonish those who were concerned in the publication of the daily or weekly papers to abstain from such insertion; to that admonition it seems the editors and publishers of all the daily papers, and, as far as I am informed, of all the weekly papers, yielded a due and respectful obedience, with the exception of the single person whose case has been brought before us; that person, therefore, must have been led to this by a desire of gaining to himself extraordinary profits, by becoming the first who was to gratify the public curiosity, by the publication of these trials—a desire to engross the whole of the profit to himself, in contempt of the admonition of the Court, in contempt of the general rules and principles of law, and to the prejudice of all persons concerned in the public newspapers, who had, as I observed before, yielded obedience to the law and to the admonition of the Court.

Being called upon now by an order of this Court to answer for this contempt alleged against him, and to offer what he might think fit either in justification or in excuse of his conduct, he does not appear so to do. By thus withdrawing himself, he saves himself certainly from that imprisonment which, if he had been present the Court would have thought it right to inflict; but he must not save himself, nor ought he to be allowed to save himself from another species of punishment, which in his absence, under the circumstances of his having had notice to attend, it is in the power, and therefore it is the duty of the Court to inflict. Under these circumstances, therefore, the Court, approving highly of the conduct of those persons who yielded to its admonition, disapproving as we must do, in the strongest degree, of the conduct of the individual against whom the application is made, think it due to public justice to order that William Innell Clement do, for this contempt, pay to the King a fine of 500*l*.

[Vide R. v. Clement 4 Barn. Ald. 218; Watson's case, 11 How. Mod. State Trials 80, 109, 111, 538; Brandreth's case ibid. 766, 779; Turner's case ibid. 957.]

On Monday, the 1st of May—Arthur Thistlewood, William Davidson, James Ings, John Thomas Brunt, and Richard Tidd, were brought out to a platform erected in front of the debtors door, Newgate, where they were hanged until they were dead, when they were cut down, and their heads were severed from their bodies, his majesty having been graciously pleased by warrant to remit that part of the sentence which directed that their bodies should be divided into four quarters, and to direct that the bodies, and heads, should be forthwith privately buried.

James William Wilson, John Harrison, Richard Bradburn, John Shaw Strange, James Gilchrist, and Charles Cooper, received his majesty's pardon, on condition of being transported to such place beyond the seas as his majesty, with the advice of his Privy Council, should be pleased to direct, for life.

A D D E N D A

TO THE CASE OF VALENTINE JONES, Esq.

*Vol. X. of this Continuation, Page 336.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH,

14th JUNY, 1809:

Mr. Attorney General.—I am to move your lordship for the judgment of the Court against Mr. Valentine Jones.

Mr. Dallas.—In point of form, I ought to request of your lordships that the gentleman before the Court may be permitted to sit.

Mr. Attorney General.—I make no objection.

Lord Ellenborough.—We understand that the defendant is in a situation requiring it: indeed the manner in which he came into Court shewed it.

Lord Ellenborough read his report of the evidence on the trial.

The following Affidavits were read:

Valentine Jones, late of the parish of Batheaston and county of Somerset, now confined in the King's-bench, the defendant named in the indictment tried at Westminster on the 26th day of May last past, maketh oath and saith; that he this deponent, having previous to the year 1795 served in divers public situations of credit trust and responsibility in his majesty's service in the West Indies, had the happiness to acquit himself in them all with general satisfaction and approbation, and that having in the said year 1795 received the appointment of commissary-general and superintendant of stores, provisions and extraordinaries to the army serving in the Leeward islands, he this deponent embarked for his station in the fleet under admiral sir Hugh Christian, and after an unsuccessful attempt to perform the voyage, and after the dangers and difficulties so well known to have attended that enterprise during eight weeks' storms and contrary winds, returned to England in so impaired a state of health that he despaired of being able to fulfil the appointments aforesaid, and endeavoured to obtain permission to resign the same; but that not finding he would be allowed to do so, this deponent made an effort to embark again in the fleet under command of admiral Cornwallis in March 1796, in which he was prevented by a most dangerous attack of gout in his stomach, which had nearly put an end to his life; that this deponent, however, still animated by zeal to do that duty which had been so particularly required of him, lost as little time as possible, when he had sufficient strength, in going from Portsmouth to Falmouth, and there embarking in a packet for the West Indies: that on his passage the deponent was again attacked by severe illness from the gout; but finding, on his arrival at Barbadoes on the 23rd of April 1796, that an armament under the command of general sir Ralph Abercrombie had sailed against the island of St. Lucia, this deponent, although obliged to be carried to and from the shore, did immediately follow and join the said armament on the 26th of April at St. Lucia, and entered on the duties of his office, without regard to personal suffering, in a most arduous and difficult employment in the midst of military operations.

And this deponent saith, that on undertaking the vast laborious and extensive avocations of his appointments aforesaid, he had but one deputy commissary general under him, and three assistant commissaries at a time when more aid and assistance were required than at any other period ever known in that country, and during the whole of his employment; whereas at subsequent periods in more circumscribed service four deputies have been allowed and treble the number of assistants.

And the deponent saith, that the calls of the service and supply of so large an army (for the wants of which calculation was to be made on the scale of 30,000 persons) required him to leave a general agent, with means competent to undertake the supplies, and having general connection with the chain of islands wherein the said troops were stationed; and accordingly this deponent having renewed a contract for vessels with Mr. Matthew Higgins (who had furnished the same by a former contract previous to the arrival of the deponent), he did also engage with the said Higgins to be the merchant or agent to do the greater part of the business required as to furnishing stores of all kinds; and this preference the deponent gave to him the said Matthew Higgins, from his having been employed as a contractor and being a creditor of the public to a large amount; and also from his possessing the good opinion of the commander in chief, sir Ralph Abercrombie, to whom the said Matthew Higgins had been useful in the negotiation for surrender of the colonies of Demarara and Berbice to his majesty's arms; and further, from the said commander in chief having expressed to this deponent that he could not do better than employ the said Matthew Higgins.

* The proceedings, subsequent to the trial of Valentine Jones, having been mislaid, were unavoidably omitted in the Volume which contains the trial itself; but as they have since been recovered, they are here inserted.

And this deponent saith, that by the first contract for vessels which the said Matthew Higgins had with quarter-master-general Knox, he was to provide for the pioneers of the army, which part thereof this deponent would not renew, but consulted the interest of government in altering the same.

And deponent further declareth and saith, that during the whole time the said Matthew Higgins continued to furnish supplies, he, the deponent, never did, directly or indirectly, take any steps to enhance the profits thereon or interfere therewith for his own ultimate benefit; always believing that the public service was benefitted by the manner in which the business was done. And he believes that if he, this deponent, had not confined himself so much to the said Matthew Higgins, but had purchased generally of the merchants, the articles would have cost government in the aggregate as much as was charged by him the said Matthew Higgins. And this deponent verily believes the same, from his observation at the time and inquiries since.

And this deponent further saith, that he most solemnly declareth, that with the accounts of the said Matthew Higgins, made out for his agency, he had no connivance in fraud, if such there be, and that he was perfectly innocent of any delusion in the mode of making out the same by the said Matthew Higgins or his sub-agents for any sinister motives; And that he, this deponent, cannot be charged with any fiction or deception whatever to the injury of the public on his part, with regard to such accounts, as the contents thereof are all duly fully and specifically debited to this deponent in kind, and the consumption thereof accounted for by him, and himself made responsible therefore.

And this deponent here further saith and declareth, that the letter written by him to John Glassfurd, deputy commissary general (which from misconception of its contents and a mistaken construction of its terms has been deemed injurious to him and dictated by conscious misconduct) has no connection whatever with his dealings with the said Matthew Higgins, or any bearing on the case in which he is implicated with him, as the terms used in that letter do not in anywise apply to provisions, or bills for provisions, or purchases or transactions between him and this deponent; but that the said John Glassfurd having had chiefly under his direction that portion of the business which appertained to deliveries to the issuing commissaries, for the purpose of literally feeding the troops, and the receiving their bills and vouchers, and this deponent, by under many difficulties been obliged to make up the accounts finally from the perfect papers transmitted to him by the said Glassfurd (papers which the secretary himself of the West India commissioners had in charge for the deponent and knew the mutilated state of), had nor could have no other meaning than that the said deputy commissary general should not, by any new statement alter the official mode by which deponent had arraigned the imperfect documents before furnished by the said Glassfurd himself: and the suggestion that the said deputy might not remember points of business so long gone by, arose from the conviction that he literally and truly could not (by reason of the difficulties with which the complicated and multiplied vouchers in detail had been collected by him) bear them in remembrance; for this deponent saith that the vouchers here described relate to the serving out in the fields, on marches, on the water, in quarters, and in every possible circumstance of the service, to the amount of upwards of twenty millions of rations issued, and to the accounting for every pound, ounce, gallon, pint, or more minute delivery.

And this deponent on his oath further saith, that he never intended by any expression in the aforesaid letter to prescribe to the said deputy commissary general what he should say as a witness upon oath; nor could the deponent fear any thing from him in that character; which the deponent is warranted in saying, nothing having been produced from any examination of the said John Glassfurd against him, this deponent, in his office of commissary general, his department in which fell under the constant observation of the said John Glassfurd.

And the deponent saith that he has not only rendered accounts and vouchers long since for the issue and expenditure of every species of stores coming to his hands in any way, but that in six weeks after his return to this country (that is to say on or about the 14th day of August 1798) this deponent delivered in accounts and vouchers for all the expenditure of cash and bills of exchange which had passed under his direction to the amount of more than two millions sterling, and that as soon as he was required by the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury to pay the balance due from him to the public, he, this deponent, did pay the same without hesitation, in the manner ordered, in six months after his return from his official station in the Leeward Islands.

And deponent saith that he was kept in the execution of his office there, contrary to all remonstrances and requests to be relieved, for twelve months after his knowledge of the rumours spread against him; but neither in that time or any other did the deponent use or adopt any measure of enriching himself by borrowing from the public funds under his control for purchases and speculations, which he could, in common with many, have made with vast emolument. And this deponent saith, that on the subject of the indictment upon which he has been tried it would ill become him to say one word, further than that he has not shrunk from the charge, or attempted to withdraw himself from the justice of the country. Whatever the extent of his offence may have been, the deponent waits with submission the punishment for that offence which this Court may think fit to inflict.

And this deponent further saith, that a mind distressed and agitated has increased the sufferings of a body worn down by an afflicting malady, and previously exposed thereto by fourteen years spent in public occupations in an unhealthy climate; that he is seldom free from the gout, the consequences whereof are contractions of the joints, and that from exposure to cold and damp situations the deponent might be liable to the loss of the use of his limbs—if not of life.

Thomas Broughton, clerk, A. M., rector of St. Peter's in the city of Bristol, and one of the acting magistrates for the county of Gloucester, maketh oath and saith, that he hath known the above-named Valentine Jones for thirty years now last past, and that he has been intimately acquainted with him for a considerable portion of that period; and that during all such time he has been so frequent a witness of his many excellent qualities, that he has always esteemed him as a man not only of the most humane and benevolent, but of the most upright and honourable character, and that he is one of the last persons amongst his acquaintance he should deem capable of any intentional misconduct.

Thomas Howard Griffith, of the city of Bath, esquire, maketh oath that he knows the above-named defendant Valentine Jones, and that he knew and was well acquainted with him for near ten years during his residence in the island of Barbados, and has since known him during his subsequent residence in England. And this deponent saith, that the said Valentine Jones was received and much esteemed in the first ranks of society in the said Island of Barbados, and always conducted himself in an upright manner, and with honour and credit; and was looked upon as a person of very estimable character and unsuspected integrity.

George Phillips, of French Hay near Bristol, in the county of Gloucester, esquire, maketh oath and saith, that he has known the above-named defendant, Valentine Jones, esquire, from a very early period of his life, and for the space of thirty-six years, and during a considerable portion of which time he hath been intimately acquainted with him. And this deponent saith he hath known many instances of the said Valentine Jones's excellent qualities as a member of society, and he hath always esteemed him as a man, not only of the most humane and benevolent disposition, but of the most upright and honourable character.

John Cobham, of Berkley-square, in the city of Bristol, esquire, maketh oath, that he knows the above-named defendant, Valentine Jones, and that he knew and was well acquainted with him for thirteen years, during his residence in the Island of Barbados. And this deponent saith, that the said Valentine Jones was received and much esteemed in the first ranks of society in that Island, and always conducted himself in an upright manner, and with the greatest honour and integrity, and was looked upon as a person of very estimable character, and respected by all who knew him.

Samuel Perry, of Park-street, in the city of Bristol, esquire, maketh oath that he has known the above-named defendant, Valentine Jones, for the space of twenty-five years last past. And this deponent further saith, that he was intimate and well acquainted with the said Valentine Jones for fifteen years of that period, during his residence in the Island of Barbados. And this deponent saith, that the said Valentine Jones was received and much esteemed in the first rank of society in that Island, and always conducted himself in an upright manner, and with great honour and integrity, and was looked upon as a person of very estimable character.

The Reverend John Brome, A. M. (at present of Welbeck-street in the county of Middlesex, and a member of his majesty's council in the Island of Barbados), maketh oath and saith, that he personally knew the above-named defendant Valentine Jones for several years during his residence in the said Island, where he filled the office of clerk of the council and deputy secretary, offices of considerable trust and importance, in the execution of which this deponent always understood, that the said Valentine Jones conducted himself with the utmost correctness and propriety.

And this deponent further saith, that the said Valentine Jones was at that time received, and considered by the first ranks of society in the Island of Barbados, as a gentleman of great respectability, and generally esteemed a person of strict honour and integrity.

Thomas Fowkes Luttrell, of the city of Bath, in the county of Somerset, esquire, maketh oath and saith, that he knows the above-named defendant Valentine Jones, and that he knows and was intimately acquainted with him, for the space of about three years and a half during his residence in the Island of Barbados. And this deponent saith, that he has always considered the said Valentine Jones as a man of the strictest honour and integrity, and incapable of any intentional misconduct.

John Randall Phillips, of Winterbourne, in the county of Gloucester, esquire, maketh oath that he knows the above-named defendant, Valentine Jones, and that he has known him for the space of fifteen years last past. And this deponent saith, that he was intimate and well acquainted with the said Valentine Jones, for about five years, during his residence in the island of Barbados; and this deponent further saith, that the said Valentine Jones was received and much esteemed in the first rank of society in that Island, and conducted himself in this deponent's estimation in an upright manner, and with the greatest honour and integrity, and was looked upon as a person of very estimable character.

Robert Lovell, of the city of Bristol, doctor of physic, maketh oath and saith that he hath known the above named defendant, Valentine Jones, for upwards of twenty years last past, and that during the said Valentine Jones's residence at Naish House near Bristol, and afterwards at Bath, he this deponent has frequently in the capacity of his physician, attended him in very deplorable and distressing attacks of gout, which have confined him to his bed and room for weeks and even months together.

And this deponent further saith that he is well acquainted with the constitution and general state of health of the said Valentine Jones, which have been greatly impaired by the frequent and violent attacks of gout with which he has been afflicted, and from which attacks he is never free for any considerable length of time together.

And this deponent further saith he has also found the health of the said Valentine Jones, during the period he has attended him professionally, greatly affected by change of situation and states of the atmosphere, and for these reasons he this deponent, is firmly of opinion it is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the life of the said Valentine Jones that he should have a free and open circulation of air, and be protected as much as possible from damp and cold.

William Bowen, of the city of Bath, in the county of Somerset, Apothecary, maketh oath that he hath known the above named Valentine Jones for nine years and upwards, during which time he, this deponent hath been the Apothecary to the said Valentine Jones and his family, and this deponent, in his medical character, hath very often attended him the said Valentine Jones. And this deponent is well acquainted with the general state of health of the said Valentine Jones, and that he is of a very gouty habit, and in the course of the above period he hath had repeated and most violent attacks of the gout, some of which have confined him to his bed and room for several weeks together, and that, during the said above specified nine years, he the said Valentine Jones hath seldom been entirely free from the gout. And this deponent saith that the health of the said Valentine Jones has been, during the time he this deponent hath known him, much affected by the change of situation and season, and that in the judgment of this deponent it is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the life of the said Valentine Jones that he should not be subject to any damp or cold situation.

Sir Walter Farquhar, of Conduit-street Hanover-square, in the county of Middlesex, baronet, maketh oath and saith, that in his character of Physician he hath frequently attended the above named defendant, Valentine Jones, for many years past; and that during the last month he hath often visited him in consequence of the said Valentine Jones being afflicted with violent gout, and the unpleasant consequences of a broken constitution; and that his situation was so very critical and alarming that he requested the assistance of doctor Baillie.—And this deponent saith, that from the debility that now exists, his life might be endangered by exposure to cold and damp; in short this deponent is absolutely convinced that the said Valentine Jones's disease is so deeply rooted in his constitution, that nothing but the greatest care and attention can preserve his life.

Samuel Chilver, of new Burlington-street, in the county of Middlesex, Surgeon and Apothecary, maketh oath and saith, that he hath attended the above named defendant Valentine Jones, for many years past in severe attacks of the gout which, in consequence of the very irritable and broken down state of the said Valentine Jones's constitution, have sometimes been accompanied with symptoms the most serious and alarming,—And this deponent saith that during the last month the said Valentine Jones has been suffering severely from one of his usual gouty attacks, for which he has been several times visited by sir Walter Farquhar, and attended by this deponent. And that from his knowledge of the said Valentine Jones's constitution, he is fully convinced that if the said Valentine Jones were to be exposed to cold and damp air, that imminent risk and danger to his life would be thereby incurred.

Mr. Dallas.—My lords, I am now to address a very few words to your lordships on the part of the defendant. I have always thought, and have often felt, the situation in which I now stand to be precisely the most painful to one's self and the least satisfactory to others that can occur in the discharge of our professional duty. From the nature of the proceeding, the party himself must unfortunately be present, and as, notwithstanding the verdict of a jury, it does not always happen that parties are disposed to admit their guilt, and as the observations of their counsel can proceed upon that footing alone, it often appears to them that a surrender of their innocence is made from that quarter from which they least expected it. On the other hand, if any observation were to be made inconsistent with the verdict, it would be immediately and properly checked by the Court, who must look to the preservation of their own rules. The effect is, to produce a state of embarrassment and difficulty which all of us have felt in our turn, as well those who continue where I now am, as those, who, fortunately for the justice of the country, have been raised to a higher, though in many respects a not less anxious and painful situation.

Looking then, my lords, at this case in the only light in which I am permitted to consider it, that is, through the verdict, I of course can have but very few observations to offer. The fact itself is unfortunately established beyond the possibility of doubt, and with respect to its nature, I fear it cannot become the subject of any opposition in argument. I can therefore only generally lament that this is one other to be added to the long list of innumerable instances in which a person of the most amiable and unblemished character, of the most tried and approved worth and integrity as this gentleman appears to have been, not only from the affidavits that have been read, but upon the testimony given in support of the prosecution, should, at an evil hour, in a moment of self-abandonment have been betrayed into conduct inconsistent with the whole of his former life—that he should have given way, unfortunately, to a temptation which he found too strong to resist.

When I say this, I hope it will not be supposed that while speaking in a court of justice, or indeed if I were speaking elsewhere, I mean for a moment to insinuate that any temptation can be of sufficient strength to overpower a right and proper sense of duty—most undoubtedly (and I beg to be so understood), I do not mean to extend the observation to any such limits but what we are not permitted to defend we may be allowed to deplore; and I am sure it must be matter of deep regret to every person who has heard the evidence in this court that a gentleman of the defendant's character in life should have reduced himself to the situation in which he now appears before your lordships.

I may at the same time state to the Court, without any concealment, that this is a case in which a despair of doing service and a dread of doing mischief make me advance with fear and trembling; and therefore in the very moment in which I am making these observations, I cannot but perceive the probability that they may be retorted upon me and that I may be told that this is a case in which above all others, the consideration of past character and of past conduct ought to be of the least avail; for the appointments bestowed upon this gentleman, the duties of which he is charged with having violated, brought their remuneration and reward; he was trusted because he had been tried; and there may possibly be pointed out to the Court (and if it were not, I feel it is not possible that it should escape its observation after the report which has been read) the circumstances of the conversation with Mr. Rose after the appointment, and of the increase of salary for the purpose (as that gentleman stated), of securing a faithful performance of the duty. It is quite impossible for me to deny that these are circumstances which may be fairly pressed upon the part of the prosecution; but at the same time I will do the attorney-general the justice to believe that they will not be urged beyond their proper extent.

The conversation with Mr. Rose does not appear to me deserving of much weight; for, admitting, as I do most distinctly, that the hire of duty in this case was perfectly clear, and such as no man could mistake, if no such conversation had happened, the want of Mr. Rose's verbal communication could not have been urged as a circumstance in favour of the defendant, and, therefore I trust that its having taken place will not be pressed to his disadvantage: in truth, in the correct consideration of the subject it has no operation on either side. But the increase of salary stands on very different ground, and I hardly know what observation I dare make upon this part of the case; it seems however to me that if the complaint is to be confined to a mere breach of duty, whether the allowance given was more or less, becomes perfectly immaterial; for I must admit that the performance of duty cannot depend upon the extent of compensation: but if the question is to be shifted from the point of duty and put upon the extent of allowance, then to obviate its effect in point of aggravation

I submit that the salary of fifteen or eighteen hundred a-year to be paid to a man for most laborious duties cast upon him in a country in which the expense of living is necessarily great, in which life is pre-eminently uncertain, in which the middle season of life—that in which provision for the future must be made—might be of short duration. Eighteen hundred a-year under these circumstances ought not, I think, to be pressed as matter of aggravation to make this a case of a worse description than any which have gone before it.

There is another circumstance upon which I would wish to trouble the Court with a very few words, not only as it is of consequence to the defendant, but as it relates to my own conduct in the management of his case. It is perfectly well known, that, on the very eve of this trial taking place, a report of the military commissioners appeared for the first time not merely upon the table of the House of Commons, but it found its way into all the public prints, containing charges of the most odious description against this unfortunate gentleman, and accompanied by comments of the most injurious and inflammatory kind. In stating the case on the part of the prosecution the attorney-general (as it was likely he would do) properly and humanely adverted to this circumstance, and cautioned the jury to forget whatever they might have read or heard, and to confine their attention to the simple charge before them. On the part of the defendant I complained of the circumstance perhaps a little too urgently. In summing up, his lordship stated to the jury that if any such publications had appeared, and had produced any prejudice against the defendant, an application ought to have been made to the Court to postpone the trial—an observation to which I perfectly assented at the time, and of which I do not mean now in the slightest degree to complain. I will merely state to the Court, with their permission, why no such application was made. It was submitted to me by the defendant himself, but when I considered the nature and extent of these charges—the quarter from which they proceeded—that they had found their way into the hands of every man perhaps from the highest to the lowest in this country—that years must elapse before any refutation could take place, so that it was impossible any change could happen in the public feeling in the interval between one sittings and another—feeling as I then did and now do, that, from the nature of these charges, if the unfortunate gentleman being at liberty, were to walk the streets of this town, his life would be in danger—I did not think it my duty to defer the trial to a more distant day (when I foresaw that the public feeling would be precisely the same) at the expense of a continuation of the misery which the defendant must endure.

There is only one other circumstance to which I would draw your lordships' attention, and that is, the dreadful state of this gentleman's health. Though I do not mean to say that the degree of guilt can be varied by his state of health, yet in fixing the sort of punishment to be applied, I am sure the Court will attend to it, and will not make that, which would be merely imprisonment in one case, the means of destruction and death in another.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lords, the painful duty is imposed upon me of drawing your attention to those circumstances of this case which, in my view of it, require you not to pass a light sentence upon the defendant. But let me at the same time do him that justice which I should wish to do every man, particularly one against whom it was my duty to bring forward so heavy a charge as that which I have on this occasion proved by incontrovertible evidence. My learned friend has truly stated that the defendant has, in his path through life, in all the relations of civil society, performed his duties correctly and without blame. I think he deserves that character; and to whatever reflection he may justly be exposed, he will find that the recollection of his virtuous acts will be his best consolation: but I must not leave him to hope that they can be of any avail to him on the present occasion, otherwise than as an internal consolation.

Your lordships, I know, feel (as I do) upon this occasion, that you have a painful duty to perform. You feel that it is peculiarly painful to pass a severe sentence upon a man the general tenor of whose life, if you were to except the particular transactions presented to your view, would incline you to mercy; but whom, notwithstanding that, it is your duty to punish as the crime he has committed deserves, and that you must not be led aside by the considerations which have been urged by my learned friend.

I did endeavour, as far as I could, to guard the jury against any impressions that might have been made upon their minds by what they had heard out of doors. I did not advert to the report of the commissioners to which my friend has in terms adverted; but I did advert to reports which every body must have heard, and which certainly had prevailed much to the prejudice of the person against whom these charges were preferred. I cannot, however, think it was matter of blame in the commissioners that they published their report at the time when they did so; they ought not to be biassed by any consideration of circumstances of this sort as to the time when that duty to the public which they were bound to discharge should be performed. It was not their fault that the trial of this cause had been so long delayed; it certainly was their bounden duty, as soon as they were prepared for the execution of that trust which was reposed in them, to execute it, and I hardly think (although it struck those interested for the defendant as a hardship upon him) that the commissioners would have been satisfied in delaying the performance of their duty of publishing their report, on account of the particular case of the gentleman who is now to receive your lordships' judgment.

If there were the slightest reason to suppose that the publication of that report, and the effect which it produced in the public mind, had any connexion with the verdict of the jury—if upon the evidence which his lordship has just read I could entertain the slightest doubt of the guilt of the defendant—I should be the first to request your lordships that he might have the benefit of a rehearing, and that that which might by possibility have been produced, by the prejudice of the public, might not operate injuriously to him. But, my lords, it is impossible for a man possessed of even the most common understanding, after hearing the report which his lordship has just read to the Court, to entertain the slightest doubt that the guilt imputed by the indictment to the defendant has been brought home to him by incontrovertible evidence—by evidence which in its own nature cannot be supposed to be false—by evidence which if false he had the most ample means of refuting. Your lordships will observe that this indictment, supported as it is by the evidence, not only imputes to the defendant that he entered into a corrupt contract with Mr. Higgins to share with him the profits which Mr. Higgins contrived to make upon the supply of provisions, but that he entered into this contract, through the agency of another person, Mr. Hugh Rose, who was a participator in the same fraud, although he could not (for reasons to which I adverted at the trial) be joined in this indictment.

Mr. Higgins was the person by whom in the first instance, I proved the guilt of the defendant. There was no imputation cast upon the evidence of Mr. Higgins except that he was himself a participator in the same fraud. I took the liberty, at the trial,* of doing that which I shall do in one word now; I shall distinguish the case of Mr. Higgins from the case of an accomplice, who, having a crime fixed upon him, comes forward to say, "it is true I committed this crime, but if you will let me off I will shew you who was concerned with me." That was not the case of Mr. Higgins, because he proved the guilt of the defendant, in which he stated himself to be concerned, and, unless he spoke truly of the guilt of the defendant, he was himself not an accomplice. That is the distinction between the case of Mr. Higgins and the case of a common accomplice.

But why do I waste your lordships time in speaking upon this? Mr. Hugh Rose was in the kingdom—he was attending the Court; and if that which Mr. Higgins stated to have passed from Mr. Jones, through the intervention of Mr. Rose, to him were not true; if that relation, which fixed the same degree of guilt upon Mr. Rose as upon Mr. Jones, and gave Mr. Rose as strong an interest to support the innocence of Mr. Jones, as any man would have to support his own were not true; if the charge was not truly brought against Mr. Jones, why was not Mr. Rose called to contradict Mr. Higgins?

It would be wasting your lordships time to observe further upon the sufficiency of the evidence for the conviction, indeed upon the impossibility of suggesting a doubt in the case. Mr. Winter stated, that he called upon Mr. Jones, by his desire, to communicate to him the amount of the profits Mr. Higgins had made. What had Mr. Jones to do with the amount of the profits Mr. Higgins made, if Mr. Jones was not to share them? The interests of the two parties were in direct opposition to each other. The object of Mr. Jones should have been to keep down Mr. Higgins's profits, if their transactions were honest: the object of Mr. Higgins must have been to conceal from Mr. Jones the enormity of those profits: but, instead of his thus acting, you find him communicating to Mr. Jones, the amount of those profits. If any further confirmation were wanted look to what they call the American adventure. The whole transaction not being yet wound up, something was still to be done; and you have a further sum of 800*l.* paid by Mr. Higgins to Mr. Jones on account of the profits of this adventure, and a receipt from Mr. Jones to Mr. Higgins for that sum. Is not that a sufficient confirmation (if any were needed) of this story? Here was money paid by Mr. Higgins to Mr. Jones: on what account? What was the situation in which these two persons stood with relation to each other? Mr. Higgins was to supply the provisions and shipping, and Mr. Jones was to pay him for his supplies. In the course of that transaction Mr. Jones might, while acting for the Crown and contracting with him, be indebted to Mr. Higgins: but it is impossible to conceive, that any debt could arise from Mr. Higgins to Mr. Jones, unless through the corrupt agreement which we have charged.

I beg your lordships' pardon for having called to your attention the manner in which this case was proved. I think after reading the evidence, there cannot be the slightest doubt upon any man's mind. It remains for your lordships to determine by what punishment an offence of this sort shall be visited.—It is not for me to suggest it to your lordships; we all know the different species of punishment that may be inflicted. All that I feel justified in doing, having done something of the same sort in a former instance, is to point out those circumstances of the case which may possibly incline the Court rather to one than to another species, and to show how far the civil rights of the parties concerned may still be affected.

Your lordships will recollect the case of Mr. Davison,* that he receiving a compensation from government for a certain check which it was his duty to exercise upon the contractors, had misconducted himself by sending in a false account of goods as furnished by other persons, when in fact he had supplied them himself. It was evident, therefore, that he had withdrawn that check from the public. He had, notwithstanding, received a considerable commission upon that account. There was no civil claim upon him to recover back that commission; but justice required that he should not be remunerated for services he had not performed; and yielding to that, which I believe the civilians call an imperfect obligation, he did restore the pay he had not earned, and the Court considered that in the judgment they pronounced against him. The case would have been different, if the Crown, who had paid that sum to Mr. Davison, had had the means of recovering it by civil process; for it would have been unjust first to visit him in the shape of a fine, because he had received that sum of money, and then to put the law in motion against him for the purpose of recovering back that money. I think it right, therefore, to state to your lordships how, in my view of the case, Mr. Jones stands with respect to this money. As commissary-general, Mr. Jones was bound by his duty to purchase from others, that which was wanted for the supply of the troops: the prices at which he purchased those goods from others he charged to the government. Supposing, therefore, Mr. Higgins to have charged the commissary one million, for what he furnished, the commissary would receive from government one million. But when Mr. Jones comes to make up his accounts with Mr. Higgins, he, instead of paying Mr. Higgins the one million, as he ought to do, and which he represented to government that he had done, keeps back one half of what Mr. Higgins states to be his profits, amounting to 87,000*l.* sterling. He charges that money to government as if he had paid it, but in fact he had never paid and never intends to pay it. This is for your lordships' consideration. It appears to me that that money, if it has been received by Mr. Jones from government, is money had and received by him to the use of government; or that, if it has not been received but remains a supposed debt from government to him, it never can be allowed to him: in other words, his charge against government upon the whole is for money disbursed upon their account; this money he never did disburse, and therefore, if he has received it from government he has received it wrongfully; if he has not received it, he never can recover it; and in my present view of the case it remains either a civil debt from him to government if he has received it, or if he has not received it, any claim which he may suppose himself to have against government, he assuredly has not. I trust your lordship will excuse me for entering somewhat at large into this consideration, because it appears to me that it might weigh with your lordships in considering what sentence you should pass upon Mr. Jones.

I have only now shortly to submit to the Court some remarks upon the extent of this offence. It must have occurred to your lordships that Mr. Higgins himself was the purchaser, in the first instance, of the greater part of the stores before he rendered them to the commissary, on behalf of government. He established a house, for the purpose of making those purchases: that house was composed of Tully Higgins his brother, Nathaniel Winter, and a brother of Hugh Rose. It was proved that that house bought the provisions for him of the merchants; that they charged him, five per cent commission for making the purchases, and then they handed over the provisions so purchased to him; and he when he had paid them the price which they gave and their five per cent, rendered them to the commissary at such an advanced price as produced a profit, in the course of nine months, upon little more than a million, of 306,000*l.* currency. That, your lordships see, is an advance of thirty per cent.

His lordship put a very material question to the witness, Nathaniel Winter. That which you purchased for Matthew Higgins, upon which you charged a commission of five per cent, would you not have purchased for government upon the same terms, and would you not, having purchased these things of the merchants, at the same terms have supplied them to government, contenting yourself with your five per cent? Mr. Winter hesitated a little in answering; but having the question pressed upon him, he was obliged at last to say (and in truth it was not necessary he should say it) that certainly he would have done it.* Then, my lords, the case stands thus; that, for no other purpose whatever than adding this thirty per cent profit, Mr. Higgins stands between government and those from whom the provisions might have been procured at a lower rate. He adds to the price, at which they might have been rendered to government, that thirty per cent for no benefit whatever to be derived to government; for the witness admitted that the merchants who supplied Mr. Higgins would have supplied government at the same price at which he supplied Mr. Higgins, that mercantile house taking to itself a fair remuneration. Mr. Higgins, however, chooses to take that to himself which might have passed to government at the same price; and having taken it from the merchants at that price, he adds to it a profit of thirty per cent. And why? not merely to gratify himself, my lords, but in order that he might be enabled to carry into execution the corrupt contract which the defendant had made with him; that the profit he derived from the adventure might be divided between them; that he might be able to render a moiety in the first instance to Mr. Jones, and a moiety of what remained to Mr. Rose.

My lords, I cannot conceive any fraud bearing more directly or more largely upon the interests of the public than such a transaction as this. Your lordships must see the extent to which frauds of this kind are likely to go. You must see how important it is that such frauds should be corrected: how they are to be corrected I leave to your lordships. I am sure that you will do that which justice requires, I am sure that you will not overlook the interests of the country.—I am sure that you will not be restrained by any consideration from inflicting such a punishment upon the defendant as the nature of the case demands. At the same time I do not desire your lordships to be unmindful of his bodily sufferings.

Lord Ellenborough.—Let the defendant be committed to the custody of the marshal, and brought up to receive the judgment of this Court on Monday next.

JUNE 19th.

Mr. Justice Grose.—Valentine Jones; you are brought here to receive the sentence of this court for the very great offence of which you have been convicted.

[The learned judge, after stating the substance of the several counts of the indictment, of which see the abstract, at the commencement of the trial, vol. x. p. 251, proceeded as follows.]

Such was the charge of fraud and speculation which has been preferred against you, and upon your plea of not guilty you were convicted of it under circumstances which have been fully stated in evidence. The facts were incontrovertible; they can leave no doubt of your guilt; especially when we recollect that his lordship and the jury were most properly warned to dismiss from their minds the recollection of all that had been improperly stated upon the subject, and might have been seen by them in the publications of the day.

The pernicious consequences of your crimes were so ably and lucidly explained in this place a few days since by his majesty's attorney-general, that it is hardly necessary for me to make any comment upon them; indeed recollecting the particular instructions you received upon your appointment, and the very honourable and proper advice given you from another quarter, it is impossible to suppose that you could be ignorant of your duty; and one cannot but see the conscious guilt you felt when you wrote that letter in 1802 to Mr. Glassford. In short, you stand convicted of having illegally and corruptly appropriated to your own use, in violation of your duty and in fraud of his majesty, the sum of 87,000*l.*; a larger sum than has ever appeared in this or in any other court to have been amassed by any public offender within our experience: and this sum was but a moiety of that which was divided between you and others.

Of a punishment adapted to the offence we find no precedent, for we find no precedent of an offence of this sort so enormous as yours. What proceedings elsewhere may be instituted it is not for us to suggest or inquire: it is only for us to consider of and to provide such punishment, not as may be likely to correct, for it may be difficult to correct a mind so debased by avarice, and the love of sordid lucre, as yours must be, but such as may warn others employed in the public service, and teach them that honesty is the best policy, and that however practices of this sort may be concealed and unpunished for a day, there are modes by which the most artful may be detected.

We have heard in your favour testimony of good character such as it rarely falls to the lot of any human being to deserve. Under all the circumstances some of those affidavits appear to be hardly founded in truth but if they be founded in truth, we can only lament that you did not sufficiently value a good character to prevent your casting upon it a stain which the constant efforts of the longest life can never wipe away; and most assuredly, attending to the times in which, and the modes by which, your frauds have been conducted, it is difficult to conceive that that character can be well deserved. We are led to suspect it could be attained only by the most consummate hypocrisy. Be that as it may, offences of such pernicious example to the public can never pass without signal punishment. There never has occurred in my practice an instance of fraud so enormous. In your case we look in vain for any sign of repentance or any sense of shame; for a mind so void of shame it must be difficult to affix an adequate punishment; but others may be taught by your example a lesson salutary to them and beneficial to the state: for this purpose, taking all the circumstances of your case into consideration—This Court for the offence you have committed doth order and adjudge:

That you be committed to his majesty's gaol of Newgate, and there be imprisoned for the space of three years; and this Court doth further order and adjudge, by virtue of the statute^a in that case made and provided, that you be adjudged incapable of serving his majesty in any office or capacity, civil or military, whatever.

^a 42 Geo. III c. 85.

